I didn't read whom father had married. I didn't ask permission to go home, I told one of the girls to please tell them at school I had gone home on the afternoon train, and I went.

Trunk men were coming out of the basement door when I got home, and I went in that way and upstairs to father's study. Only Ellen saw me and she stood aside without a word.

I could hear them preparing to serve dinner, and I remember wondering why anybody wanted to eat. Beyond the door of father's study I heard voices, and I tried to keep from crying as I stepped inside.

Father was there, standing beside the table, with the light shining on him. He was handsome—my father. He turned and stared at me, and he was different.

The Confessions of a Useless Wife

To MARGARETTA TUTTLE

And father stood staring down at me, all big-eyed and white. Then he reached down and picked me up and held tight to me.

"Little Answer," he said softly.

And I went to sleep in his lap in the big chair.

We had all kinds of queer times holding on to each other, father and I. There were so many people, relatives and women friends, who wanted to fix things differently for us—wanted housekeepers, when Anna did well enough; or trained nurses, when Anna looked after me all the time; or wanted me sent away to school, when there were good day schools in New York.

IF FATHER was away on business; or if we went away together in the summer, sometimes with Anna, sometimes not; or if father was seen more than once with any of the ladies that asked him to dinner, there was always sure to be a visit of these aunts or cousins who wanted to rearrange things for us. Father called them the visitationers, and he usually answered them all alike: "Oh, I guess we'll hold on a little longer."

"Oh, father!"—and I found I could not keep from crying—"how could you treat me this way! How could you!"

I saw father get a little white. He looked—well, then I didn't know what it was; now I wonder if that isn't the look of those who have let go. But it didn't seem like father to me, not like my father who had buttoned my dresses and wound my tops and held my kites for me to start them flying.

"Leila," he said, and even his voice was changed, "this is —" He turned to a figure beyond the table that, with my heartache, I had not noticed; he didn't seem to know what to call her.

She didn't look like any of the women I knew, though she was very handsome. She was tall and slim and cool looking. She was like moonlight on the water, lovely to look at, but you don't love it, or I don't. When father stopped, she filled in the pause with a voice that was like moonlight on the water, cool and quiet. It made my stormy cry a little ridiculous. "I am Adele," she said. "Don't let's bother about titles, you and I. We will be friends who can call each other by their first names, shall we not, Leila?"

You can't think about words when your heart aches so with the one person you love most not playing square with you, and as for friends—you can't make friends that way, all at once. It wasn't she I wanted to speak to, anyhow. It was father.

"Oh, father," I whispered, "it isn't your getting married; that's for you—if you—oh, it's your never telling me; you letting me find it in a newspaper. It's having it all this time in your heart and never a word to me; you who always told me —" I couldn't go on. My words sounded so queer, with this new Adele watching me.

Even then, if she had gone away and left us alone, I think father and I might have fixed it up; but she didn't. She didn't even stay on the other side of the table. She came around to where father was and slipped her arm through his and leaned against him, as if she were comforting him.

I STOOD quite still, looking at them and then I don't know why I said it; all I could think of was that it wasn't any more use for me to reach out, or for mother to. "You're not going to give her mother's room, are you?" I asked.

And I knew then, even if I was only sixteen, that she would never forgive me. I knew it by the look she gave me that father didn't see. He was staring down at her hand on his arm. He didn't answer. He didn't even turn his head when I went out.

I closed the door and, because there were tears in my eyes that I didn't want the servants to see, I stood there a moment, and while I was standing there I heard Adele's voice: "But, Franklin, I don't want a big girl of fifteen calling me mother at my age. She's just a girl who never has been controlled. You've spoiled her. School is the place for her for a couple of years. Then she can make a formal debut and get married."

I waited to see if that was what father wanted, but I never heard, for something happened to me, and the next thing I knew I was in my own bed, and Anna was telling the doctor that she hoped he'd order me to stay there for many days. "If I did," said the doctor, "Mrs. Laughlin would never forgive me. This is her honeymoon. I think we'd better let the little lady go back to school."

I must have kept that little sentence of Adele's I had heard outside the door of father's study in the back of my brain. For it was still there three years later when Adele stood beside me, at the formal debut she had planned, and presented me to all my mother's old friends. I heard her tell father afterwards that the situation was delicious; that these friends of my mother's who had never come to see her would now be forced to include her in everything they did for me. And I remembered having heard one of the visitors say that Adele had married my father for a position she didn't win until she brought me into it.

I had laughed when I heard this. People were always like that about Adele; they were always hunting for some reason behind what she did.

ADELE was cross one morning because Anna was too sick to get out of bed, and Adele was getting ready to go away. Ever since I went to school Anna had attended to things for Adele; though, when I came home, she looked after both of us. Anna could do anything.

"Adele," I said, "the doctor says Anna has intestinal 'flu'."

Adele had asked me to telephone Anna's feeling to the doctor and have him send some medicine that would cure her at once, before the dinner she was giving that night, if possible. "He's a fool, that doctor," said Adele. "You don't get 'flu' in summer."

"If Anna's got it, what's the use of saying you don't get it?"

"Well, if she's got 'flu,' it's the hospital for her. Telephone the doctor to make arrangements, Leila."

"Oh, Adele! Look at the way Anna took care of you when you had the 'flu.'"

"But I'm going to close up the house. Besides, 'flu' is an awful thing to have around. I might let Anna stay and then in the fall when we came back, somebody would get 'flu' out of a clear sky, and we'd all catch it."

"Oh, Adele!"

"Well, I won't have her here. She's just as well off in the hospital."

"I'll stay here with her, Adele."

"You! You can't take care of yourself, let alone a sick woman. You'd get her out of bed to do your hair. About one day of you would make her pray for a nurse in a hospital."

It's no use talking to Adele. It wasn't any use appealing to father either. She had father all right. So I went up to the top floor to talk to Anna, but she didn't seem to care. She looked pretty bad. She didn't even care whether Adele sent her to the hospital in one of our cars or not. She said she'd rather lie down in an ambulance.

I never saw the inside of an ambulance before, though you'd think there were enough of them in the streets of New York to make us all know how they looked. But I couldn't let poor, sick Anna go in one with just an orderly.

Gainsborough's Blue Boy

DOUBLE interest attaches at the present time to the Blue Boy, which is reproduced on the opposite page. It is, in the first place, the most famous and in some respects the most remarkable of all Gainsborough's works. In the second place, its sale last fall to Henry E. Huntington, of New York and San Gabriel, California, was at the highest price, it is said, ever paid for a single picture. More than $800,000 is reported to have been involved.

The canvas is five feet ten inches by four feet, and was painted in 1770 or 1779. It is the portrait of Master Buttall, the son of a prosperous ironmonger of Soho, London. Young Buttall retained it in his own possession until 1796, when it passed into the hands of George, Prince of Wales. Later it was the property of John Nesbit and of one Koppner, who sold it to Earl Grosvenor.

The Blue Boy is said to have been painted by Gainsborough to refute the theory of academicians of the day, among them Sir Joshua Reynolds, that a portrait with blue as the dominant color could not be successfully made. Gainsborough himself, the story goes, said that the painting would never be of any value as a work of art.

It was sold last summer by the Duke of Westminster to Sir Joseph Duveen, and by him to Mr. Huntington. After its removal from the walls of Grosvenor House, Mayfair, it was exhibited at the National Gallery in London, and it will be brought to America this spring. It is reproduced in the HOME JOURNAL through the courtesy of Mr. Huntington and Sir Joseph Duveen.

The tireddest young interne I ever saw took charge of Anna at the hospital. But he was all there. He knew more in five minutes than Adele's doctor did in a half hour's talk over the telephone. He asked her questions in the kind of voice that made you like to answer them. I can't describe it; it was a regular man's voice; but Anna, who hardly ever talked, told him right away that she had been having blinding headaches for a week or so; and when she apologized for being unable to get out of bed when she had tried so hard to his voice lost all its gentleness. Even his face changed. But when Anna said, in answer to a question, that she had fainted a day or two before after only a couple of hours of standing up, he turned and snapped out at me: "Are you her employer?"

I can't tell you how I felt—all creepy! "No," I snapped back. "And everything you think I think. It's a—an infernal shame!"

"It is," he agreed, and whacked out a stethoscope.

"What's Anna got, Doctor Gordon—'flu'?"

"Typhoid," he said. "You want a private room?"

I KNEW Adele didn't want one, but I took it, anyhow. I would have engaged a special nurse, but the doctor said it wasn't necessary—yet. His "yet" had a queer sound in that voice of his; it twisted your heart. I thought of his eyes—nice, gray, tired-man's eyes—as I went to sleep that night; and when I awakened in the morning they were still with me.

So when Adele told me we'd go to Lake Placid for the summer instead of to our Long Island house, because we could do without Anna better at the Lake Placid Club than we could in our own house, I said I didn't see how I could go.

I had told Adele before that I couldn't go places, and it amounted to about as much as the breath I took to say it. But this time it was different.

She finally got father to speak to me. "It's so silly, Franklin," said Adele in the silken voice she uses in what she emergencies. "You know how hot it gets here. Leila stay in this heat." Adele rarely left me alone with father and then only for a day.

"Father's going to stay in it," I said. "Besides, may will be cool."

The day she left I got to the hospital early in the morning. Doctor Gordon had been up all night with Anna.

He scarcely looked at me when I stole in. "I have ordered a special nurse," was all he said. "She will go on duty half an hour. You can stay here until she comes. I come back then."

So I sat beside Anna, and once in a while she spoke to me. But when I asked her what I could do for her, all she was was some help for a girl she knew in the hospital. When Doctor Gordon came back I said to him: "Doctor, I want to take one of your patients—a girl with a three-week-old baby—home. She says she is leaving this morning."

Anna had told me that to most of their cases were impersonal and their interest in them finished when they were cured, that Doctor Gordon was different.

"If you will wait," he now said, "I see that she gets into your car."

He went with me when I left Anna. As we walked down the hall, I had a sudden inspiration. "Is there anybody else that could take home? It's no trouble, and coming here every day now, I could see somebody every time I left, if it would help."

He sighed. I thought he seemed tired. "Yes, that will be a help," he turned and gave me a thoughtful look, but he nothing else.

THE next day I had another inspiration. I asked that tired man if he couldn't go with the lame woman I was taking home the ride through the park wouldn't be good for the work he still had to do that day.

He hesitated, but he honestly looked if he wanted to come. "I will be glad to go to-morrow," he finally said. "It would be nice; but this isn't my time off to-day."

After that, he went with me several times and then, one Wednesday afternoon when he didn't have to go back to the hospital, I brought him home. Ellen, who was duty downstairs while the other servants were away on their vacations, brought a tea tray piled with hot muffins and cakes while we browsed about the library talk of the books. I hadn't known Ellen could arrange a tea tray, and I've no idea how guessed that young doctor was so hung. He was on his third muffin when father came in, and he had one of father's war books the arm of his chair.

Father was delightful. Since Adele I gone, father and I had been like two people who had returned to a place where they had once been very happy, yet where neither was now sure of the other's memories.

Father pulled a chair to the tea table, and I saw his eyes boring into the doctor's eyes the way he does when he's interested. He doesn't seem to go beyond the eyes, but knows all about the person he's looking when he looks that way.

"Then you went to the war," said father with a glance at the book on the chair.

"I did that, sir. I should have hated have missed it. It is what is making finish my hospital work so late. I was interrupted by two years' field work. But then you went, didn't you, Mr. Laughlin?"

"I didn't fight," father grieved. He will never get over that. "I only ran railroads."

I sat quite still and watched the way the library light made the doctor's gay golden hair glisten, and listened the sound of their voices, and wondered what adjective could apply to this man's voice. You couldn't call it winsome or musical or any of those effeminate things; it was too masculine. Yet there was something about it that seemed need a special term.

WHEN he had gone, father sat in a deep reverie. "Is your young man a New Yorker, Leila?" he asked at length. "No, father. He comes from Gordon City, Michigan. He's going back there to practice, soon."

"Why doesn't he stay here? Of course it takes money to get started here. Has he any?"

"I don't know, father. But he wants to work with people he knows and likes. He says life should be lived among your friends; and people haven't time for friends here."

Father looked at me thoughtfully. "How tall you he grown, Leila?"

"Didn't you expect me to grow up, father?"

"I hadn't realized that you were growing up so fast. I'm sorry you didn't want to go to college, Leila. I believe your mother would have liked it."

"But, father, the school you sent me to doesn't prep for college. And this is the first time you have said college to me. I didn't have much choice. You just arranged a time for me to debut and took me out of school to do it."

"I!" exclaimed father. "I had nothing to do with that. Well, then, Adele did."

(Continued on Page 90)

Human Nature in the Bible

Ruth, Eli, Samuel, King Saul and Jonathan

By WILLIAM LYON PHELPS

RUTH is a pretty name. In Hebrew it means "friendship" and in English "pity." She lived up to her name in both languages; she was both loyal and sympathetic. She is one of the most attractive girls in the Bible; her gentle, affectionate nature seems all the fairer in contrast with those terrible women of the Testament, Delilah and Jezebel. And what a charming story is hers—one of the best short stories in literature—ning as it does between two long books of crime and aghter!

There is nothing sentimental and nothing insipid in this; it is a pastoral, illustrating the grace of loyalty. We have learned in the twentieth century not to minimize the tie of loyalty; this fine flower of human nature has its deep in the human heart. The beauty of loyalty consists in giving rather than receiving; giving all if need be, asking nothing before or after. Selfish and calculating sons are conspicuously without it; and it is not fully understood by men of cold intellect. But there is always something splendid, something refreshing, about people who have "You remember in Shakspeare, when the various nobles disputing as to whether the king had a legal claim or the strong voice of Clifford is like a breath of fresh air:

King Henry, be thy title right or wrong,
Lord Clifford vows to fight in thy defence.

of the reasons why the character of D'Artagnan is so irresistibly attractive is because loyalty was his religion; the noble man rings true, said Stevenson, like a good sovereign.

Ruth Selects a Husband

NAOMI had reached the darkest hour in her life; driven from her country by famine, she migrated with her husband and her two sons. In the alien land of Moab her husband then both her sons died, leaving her a solitary Israelite, fit of kin and fortune. She started to return home, and used her two Moabite daughters-in-law not to accompany her; they were both young and could marry again among their own people. Orpah kissed her, but Ruth clave unto and spoke out those words that have brought down the their eternal fragrance, as fresh and sweet to-day as a first uttered:

hither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge; people shall be my people, and thy God my God; here thou diest, will I die, and there will I be buried: the Lord do to me, and more also, if I ought but death part thee and me.

here are women who, like Lady Macbeth, are meant to go forth men children only, but they are to be pitied. The relation of mother and daughter is one of the most beautiful in the world; each needs the other so keenly, and understand each other, because they are both women. A man may be proud of her son, but she can seldom be as to him as to her daughter. The neighbors were right; they said to Naomi, Ruth "is better to thee than a son."

Boaz was like a prosperous American farmer, head of a estate. He was a sound, hearty, healthy man, broad-shouldered and generous, whose relations with his hired reapers were cordial. He came out of the city to the fields, greeted his arm hands affectionately, and they responded in like manner. Then he noticed the slender girl bending over the ears of grain, and upon inquiry found it was that very foreigner of whose devotion to Naomi he had heard. His appearance was strengthened by his knowledge of her noble and affectionate character. He spoke to her kindly, then he said something to the young men that wins our assent:

Let fall also some of the handfuls of purpose for her, and leave that she may glean them, and rebuke her not.

Boaz had reached the age when he was flattered by her silent liking for him, for he had supposed that he must forthwith be and remain Boaz-sit-by-the-fire:

As for thou of the Lord, my daughter: for thou has shewed kindness in the latter end than at the beginning, inasmuch as thou followedst not young men, whether poor or rich.

The common opinion is that men select their wives. While undoubtedly happens here and there, it is equally true that women select their husbands. Boaz was marked down from the start by both mother and daughter, and he literally had no chance of escape. Fortunately for him, he fell into good hands; for a damsel that had shown such single-hearted devotion to Naomi would be faithful and loyal to the man of her choice. That every expression which we use so often, "the man of her choice," is significant.

We have a pleasant glimpse here of business dealings and the manner in which land contracts were secured. The historian narrates as though the custom in his own time had become obsolete:

Now this was the manner in former time in Israel concerning redeeming and concerning changing, for to confirm all things; a man plucked off his shoe, and gave it to his neighbour; and this was a testimony in Israel.

Therefore the kinsman said unto Boaz, Buy it for thee. So he drew off his shoe.

Ruth married an upright and successful business man; and Naomi went wild with delight at having a grandson. She "laid it in her bosom, and became nurse unto it." Her troubles were over. The boy was named Obed, and became the grandfather of a mighty king. The last word in the book of Ruth is David: "And Obed begat Jesse, and Jesse begat David."

After this bright episode the familiar story of war and of apostasy returns; the clouds gather again. Old Eli is a pathetic figure. He judged Israel forty years, was sincere and upright, submissive to the will of God. But like many religious men, he was not successful in bringing up his sons; perhaps his tacit acceptance of things as they were—for he was a religious fatalist—made it difficult for him to impose his will on his two bad boys. He remonstrated with them when what they needed was something more drastic. They were altogether too much for him, and their depravity bewildered as much as it shocked the old man. There was no point of contact, no mutual understanding between Eli and his children. He was as incomprehensible to them as they to him. This is a tragic but, unfortunately, a familiar spectacle in family life. Judging by the frequency with which the topic comes up in social conversation, in magazine articles and on the stage, it is regarded as a particularly difficult problem in the year of grace 1922. Some children shock their parents; some parents bore their children. There has always been a quarrel between the older and the younger generation, but since the World War the quarrel has passed into an acute stage.

Where Eli Failed

IT IS only where piety in the parents is accompanied with tact, sympathy and understanding, where the intelligence of the father and mother is respected by son and daughter, where the boy would really like to resemble his father and the girl her mother, that one sees an admirable family life; fortunately such examples are not extinct. Eli was dense. He could not make religion seem real to his sons. He went to church and they went to the devil. At the very gates of the house of the Lord they indulged in sensuality and crooked dealing. The Sabbath school was to them a means of flirtation and the offertory a means of support.

Eli was too placid, too good natured, to have keen perception; his mind decayed with his eyes. He thought Hannah was drunk when she was praying; and in the charming scene when the Voice came to little Samuel in the night, old Eli was neither excited nor jealous at the divine preference. But his reverence for the ark of God was high and sincere; he was like a church priest to whom the ritual of the church and everything connected with formal worship are more holy than a broken and a contrite heart. When the fateful messenger came from the field of battle and his appalling tidings proceeded from general to particular—as is so often the tragic unfolding of news—the army is defeated, your sons are killed, the ark of God is taken—then Eli "fell from off the seat backward by the side of the gate, and his neck brake, and he died; for he was an old man, and heavy."

His son Phinehas left a wife with child, near her time. Some idiot told her the news of the defeat and dishonor of Israel and of the death of her husband and father-in-law. She travailed and died; and just before her death the women spoke to her cheerily and said: "Fear not, for thou has born a son." They spoke to deaf ears: "She answered not, neither did she regard it." But she had named the child Ichabod, which means "Where is the honor?" her last words being: "The glory is departed from Israel."

I wish we knew something about Ichabod; he is never mentioned again in the Bible, except in the fourteenth chapter of I Samuel, where Ahitub is called Ichabod's brother. But, although the Bible is silent about him, he has been borrowed many times in literature and in history for his symbolical name. The good Whittier applied the word to Daniel Webster in 1850, not realizing that the speech for which that statesman was condemned was the finest and most patriotic utterance of his life.

The boy Samuel was dedicated by his mother Hannah to Jehovah's service; he became a great religious leader, never deviating from the path of sanctity and rectitude. Yet to me he is not a sympathetic figure; he had more holiness than charm. There is something unlovely about the man, something rigid and cold. I suppose it was natural, brought up as he was, that he should be a prig in youth and a statue of severity in his old age. He had no more luck with his sons than Eli; they were bad, as perhaps might be expected, and did not find the piety of their father alluring. Just as some humanitarians are kind to everyone except members of their own family, so I suppose some religious leaders have more zeal for God's house than affection for their own. Samuel's sons, like those of Eli, were a public scandal, as only minister's sons know how to be.

A Cowboy Israel's First King

SAMUEL'S stern integrity made him a powerful judge, respected and feared by the people, whose wanderings after strange gods he did not hesitate to condemn. He went on circuit through various cities, holding court. The Philistines were in terror of him, for so long as his decisions were regarded the Israelites prospered in battle; the power of the enemy receded, not to become triumphant again until after his death. He made his sons judges; they were corrupt, taking bribes freely, and the old man was shamed in the courts of law. The Israelites may perhaps be pardoned for their wish to have a king; they knew Samuel could not last much longer, and they regarded with natural apprehension the coming rule of his sons. They spoke to him with cruel frankness:

Behold, thou art old, and thy sons walk not in thy ways: now make us a king to judge us like all the nations.

Samuel was angry, not for the first nor the last time in his life; and he warned the people that their king would be a tyrant. But they, fearing his decrepitude and his sons' depravity, wanted a personable figure of a king, who should go before them, lead them into battle and incarnate the power of the whole nation. Their request was granted; the first king of Israel was the biggest and handsomest man in the country, every inch a king.

This tallest man came out of the smallest tribe, the tribe of Benjamin. Kish was a mighty man, a rich cattle dealer, and he had a son, whose name was Saul, a choice young man, and a goodly: and there was not among the children of Israel a goodlier person than he: from his shoulders and upward he was higher than any of the people.

I suppose he stood about six feet nine in his sandals.

Saul was a cowboy; and he had gone out to seek his father's strayed cattle when he met Samuel the Seer, the man of God. The venerable prophet gave him the astounding tidings that he was to be king. Saul was modest and unassuming; he reminded Samuel that he belonged to the smallest of the twelve tribes and that his family were socially unimportant; but Samuel took the embarrassed young man into the parlor and gave him the place of honor at a state dinner of thirty guests. That night a bed was made for Saul on the roof of the house—perhaps he was too big for the

(Continued on Page 112)

SYNOPSIS

The Unspeakable Gentleman is a story of the time of the Napoleonic debacle. An American adventurer, Captain George Shelton, escapes from France, taking with him a document which is much wanted by the French Government. With him also is the daughter of one of France's prominent families. Arriving in Boston, Captain Shelton is visited by his son, who tells the story and who has been brought up to believe that his father is everything that is adventurously unsavory. Captain Shelton's brother-in-law calls and demands the much-wanted paper, threatening to deliver the Captain to the French authorities. Captain Shelton offers to sell the paper, but after receiving payment refuses to give it up.

"I THOUGH
CAPTAIN, TH
YOU WERE T
SORT OF M
WHO COUL SUCCEED
ANYTHING Y
TRIED—YE ANYTHING"

The Unspeakable Gentleman

By J. P. MARQUAND

Illustrations by Arthur I. Keller

THE lines about my father's mouth softened as his gaze met mine after the exciting scene during Uncle Jason's unexpected morning call at our house. "I pride myself," my father remarked as his smile grew broader, "that my example is all you could expect from my reprehensible reputation. I fear I shall fall down in only one respect. My table manners, I fear, are almost impeccable." And he walked over to the window, taking care, I noticed, not to stand in front of it. "Sad, is it not, that I should fail in such a trivial matter? But it happened so long ago—while I was courting your mother, to be exact. My father-in-law, rest his soul, was an atrocity at table. I watched him, watched him with wonder—or was it horror? I cannot remember which—and I resolved to go, to go anywhere, but never to do likewise. The result to-day is perhaps unfortunate. Yet watch me, my son; even in that you see the practical value of a bad example."

"Yes," I said, "I am watching you." He seemed about to turn from the window, and then something outside held his attention. "Ha!" he said. "A sloop is coming in, a clumsy-looking vessel. Whose is it?" I walked to the window to get a better look, but he reached out and drew me near him.

"Let us be careful of the windows this morning. The light is bad, and we have very much the same figure. There! Now you can see it—out by the bar. It carries too much canvas forward and spills half the wind. Have you seen it before?"

The sun had been trying to break through the clouds, and a few rays had crept out and glanced on the angry gray of the water, so that it shone here and there like scratches in dull lead.

The three ships near our wharf were tossing fitfully, and on all three the crews were busy with the rigging. Out farther towards the broad curve of the horizon was the white smear of a sail and as I looked I could see the lines beneath the canvas. He was right. It was a sloop, running free, with the tide pushing her on.

"Yes," I said, "I know the boat, though I do not see why she is putting in."

"Ah," said my father; "and do you not? And whose boat may she be, Henry?"

"TWO days ago she sailed from Boston for France. She belongs to Jason Hill," I told him; and, a little puzzled, I looked again at the low dunes and the marshes by the harbor mouth.

"I think," my father murmured half to himself, "that perhaps after all I should have killed him. Brutus."

Brutus, who had watched the scene with the same aloof politeness that he might have watched guests at the dinner table, moved quickly forward.

"Has no word come yet?"

Brutus grinned and shook his head.

"The deuce!" said my father. "Aiken was here last evening and got the message I left him?"

Brutus nodded, and my father compressed his lips. Apparently deep in thought, he took a few unhurried steps across the room and glanced about him critically. "A busy day, my son," he said, "a very busy day, and a humorous one as well. They think they can get the paper. They think—but they are all mistaken."

"You are sure?" I inquired.

"Perfectly," said my father. "I shall dispose of it in my own way. I am merely waiting for the time."

"Huh!" Brutus cupped his great hand behind his ear and nodded violently.

MY FATHER stepped toward the hallway and listened. Above the hissing of the fire I heard a voice and footsteps. He straightened the lace about his wrists and his features lost their strained attention. As he turned towards Brutus he seemed younger and more alertly active than I had ever known him.

"Ah, what a day," he said; "what a day, to be sure. They are coming, Brutus. Gad! but the years have been long since I have waited for them. Place the glasses on the table, Brutus. We still must be hospitable."

The knocker on our front door sent a violent summons, but my father did not seem to hear it. With graceful deliberation he was filling six glasses from the decanter.

"Keep to the back of the room, my son," he said, "a listen. Who do you think is coming? But you never can guess. Our neighbors, my son. Fix your uncle, and then our neighbors. We are holding a distinguished salon, are we not?"

But before I could answer or even conjecture why he should receive such a visit, my father gave a low exclamation, partly of surprise and partly of well concealed annoyance, and stepped forward, bowing low.

Mademoiselle, bright-eyed, but very pale, had run into the morning room.

My father looked at her sharply, almost suspiciously. "How are you here?" he demanded quickly. "Did not Brutus lock your door?"

"The lock was very rusty," she answered.

"Indeed?" said my father. "And how long ago did you find it out?"

"Only a minute back," she said; and again he glanced at her narrowly and finally shrugged his shoulders.

As I look back on it, it was his first mistake.

"Then I fear you have not seen much of the house," said suavely.

BUT she disregarded his remark. "The paper, captain," she cried; "are they coming for the paper? For if they are, they shall not have it. You —"

"Pray do not be alarmed, my lady," he replied suavely. "At almost any time I am glad to see you, but just present—he raised his voice to drown the din of the knocker—"your appearance, I fear, is a trifle indiscreet. It is not the paper they wish, mademoiselle. It is merely myself, your humble servant, they require. But pray call yourself and rest assured they shall get neither. Let in our callers, Brutus."

He took her hand and bowed over it very low and looked for an instant into her eyes, still with a faint hint of curiosity. "And you?" she asked. "You have it still?"

"Temporarily, yes," he answered. "Show mademoiselle chair, my son, over there behind me, where you both can witness the little drama. Perhaps it is as well she can after all."

Brutus had not forgotten his days as a house servant. Erect and uncompromising he entered the room, facing towards us by the door. "Mr. Penfield," he called. "Captain Tracy. Captain Brown. Major Proctor. Mr. Lane. Captain Dexter."

"So," said Major Proctor, "you still have your infernal party manners."

They had entered the room and stood in a group before my father. Their faces were set grimly. Their manner was stern and uncompromising, as befitted men of unimpeachable position and integrity. As I watched them I still w wondering at their errand. Why should they, of all people, have paid this call? There was not one who did not own his ships and countinghouse, not one who was not a leading trader in our seaport. In all the years I had known them not one had looked at me or given me a civil word; and indeed they had little reason to give one. And yet here they were calling on my father.

It was an odd contradiction of the lesson books that of all the men in the room he should appear the most prepossessing. Though many of them were younger, his clothes were more in fashion, and time had touched him with a lighter hand. If I had come on them all as strangers I should have expected kindness and understanding from him first of any. His forehead was broader and his glance was keener. Indeed, there was none who looked more the gentleman. There was no man who could have displayed more perfect courtesy in his gravely polite salute.

"This," said my father, smiling, "is indeed a pleasure. I had hoped for this honor, and yet the years have so often disappointed me that I had only hoped."

Captain Tracy, short and squat, his hands held out in the way old sailors have, as though ready instinctively to grasp some rope or bulwark, thrust a bull neck forward and peered at my father with little, reddened eyes, opened in wide incredulity. "You what?" he demanded hoarsely.

"I said, Captain Tracy, that I hoped"; and my father helped himself to snuff. "Will you be seated, gentlemen?"

"No," said Major Proctor. "I have always noted," my father remarked, "that standing is better for the figure. The climate, major, has agreed with you."

MAJOR PROCTOR launched on a savage rejoinder, but Mr. Penfield leaned towards him with a whispered admonition. "I take it," he said to my father, "that you did not read our letter. You made a mistake, Mr. Shelton, a grave mistake, in not doing so."

"I am fond of reading," said my father, "and I found your letter—pardon my rudeness, but I must be frank—I found your letter most amusing."

Mr. Lane stretched a clawlike hand toward him. "You always did laugh," he cried shrilly.

"Never now, Mr. Lane," replied my father. "Yet I must admit, if laughter were my habit—" He paused and surveyed Mr. Lane's pinched and bony figure.

"You found the letter amusing, eh?" snapped Captain Tracy. "You found it funny when we ordered you out of this town, did you? I suppose you thought we were joking, eh? Well, by gad, we weren't, and that's what we've come to tell you. Heaven help us if we don't see you out on a rail, you infernal—"

"Gently, gently," interjected Mr. Penfield in a soothing tone. "Let us not use any harder words than necessary. Mr. Shelton will agree with us, I am sure. Mr. Shelton did not understand. Perhaps Mr. Shelton has forgotten."

"My memory," said my father, "still remains unimpaired. I recall the last time I saw you was some ten years ago in this very house. I recall at the time you warned me never to return here. In some ways, perhaps, you were right, and yet at present I find my residence here most expedient. Indeed, I find it quite impossible to leave. Frankly, gentlemen, the house is watched, and it is as much as my life is worth to stir outside the doors."

"GOOD heaven!" cried Mr. Lane in the shrill voice that fitted him so well. "We might have known it."

There was a momentary silence, and Major Proctor whispered in Mr. Penfield's ear.

"Captain Shelton," said Mr. Penfield, "I see your son and a woman are in the room. It might be better if you sent them away. Your son, I have heard, has learned to behave himself. There is no need for him to hear what we have to say to you."

My father adjusted his coat lapel with a nice deliberation. "Mr. Penfield is mistaken. I fear closed shutters make the room a trifle dark to see clearly. It is a lady, Mr. Penfield, who is with us."

Captain Tracy laughed. My father's hand dropped to his side. For a moment no one spoke.

Captain Tracy moved his head half an inch farther forward. "Well?" he asked.

"Let us leave the matter for a moment," said my father. "It can wait. Pray continue, Mr. Penfield. I am quite sure my son will be glad to listen."

Mr. Penfield cleared his throat and looked at the others uncertainly.

"Go on, Penfield," said the major.

"Mr. Shelton," began Mr. Penfield stiffly, "ten years ago you were a gentleman."

"Could it have been possible?" said my father with a bow.

TEN years ago you were a man that every one of us here trusted and respected, a friend of several. In the War of the Revolution you conducted yourself like a man of honor. You equipped your own frigate with a letter of marque and sailed it yourself off Jamaica. You fought in three engagements. You displayed a daring and bravery which we once admired.

"Could it have been possible?" my father bowed again. "I do recall I failed to stay at home," he added.

And for the third time he bowed to Mr. Penfield.

Mr. Penfield frowned and continued a little more quickly: "And when you did return you engaged in the China trade. You were a successful man, Mr. Shelton. We looked upon you as one of the more brilliant younger men of our seaport. We trusted you, Captain Shelton."

"Could it have been possible?" my father repeated.

"Yes," said Mr. Penfield in a louder tone, "we trusted you. You have only to look at your books to remember that."

"My books," said my father, "still contrive to balance."

"In the year 1788," Mr. Penfield went on—"you remember that year, do you not? In that year the six of us here

(Continued on Page 154)

BUT BEFORE HE COULD SPEAK, MADEMOISELLE HAD SPRUNG BETWEEN US. "YOU FOOL!" SHE CRIED. "PUT UP YOUR SWORD. WILL YOU NOT BE QUIET, AS I TOLD YOU?"

How Thin Folks May Become Plump

Health as Well as Looks Involved—Suggestions on Diet and Other Factors

By ROYAL S. COPELAND, M.D.

Commissioner of Health, New York City

There are four periods in which thinness is to be guarded against, as follows:

In early adolescence. After childbirth. At the age of about 45. At the age of about 65.

LIFE is a struggle between the fat and the thin. The "have nots" envy the "haves," and the latter would fain exchange their substance for poverty of figure. Every day a multitude of bold, if unheralded, explorers start out for the north and south poles of avoidupoids. Those who inhabit the region of the golden mean are often made dissatisfied by the voyaging of their friends, and just to be sociable they accompany an expedition in either direction.

Water seeks its level and Nature keeps her own balance, but humankind depends largely upon weighing machines in public places.

Just as it is easier to spend money than to make it, so it is easier to lose flesh than to acquire it. But this is no argument against earning money or seeking a legitimate addition in weight. Indeed it is the right of thin persons to bring themselves up to a normal standard of plumpness. They cannot add a cubit to their stature by taking thought, yet they may assuredly by proper means add pounds to their weight and inches to their circumferential measurements. Being thin is not usually a mandate of Providence or of Nature. On the contrary, it is a defective physical condition which it is within the power of the individual to remedy.

Cheer Up!

WHILE I do not make a fetish of mental treatment, I believe that thin persons are often inclined to be despondent and would profit by an initial attitude of hope and cheer. Therefore I would suggest to them the following slogans:

I HAVE A RIGHT TO BE PLUMP.
I AM THE MASTER OF MY FATE
AND THE CAPTAIN OF MY CONTOURS.

How do we know when a person is thin? If the fact is not obvious to the eye we may find out by reference to a standard table of normal weight. It is easy enough to get weighed, but the table is often mislaid and it is convenient to have a rule and to memorize it. Now here is a rule which has been recommended for ascertaining the normal weight: Multiply the number of inches over five feet in height by five and a half, and add one hundred and ten. The result is the normal weight in pounds. To give an example: If the height be five feet five inches, multiply five by five and a half, which equals twenty-seven and a half. To this add one hundred and ten. This gives the normal weight as one hundred and thirty-seven and a half pounds. If a person is ten pounds under this weight he or she may be considered under weight. There is nothing alarming about a deficiency of ten pounds; it is simply to establish a standard. Ordinarily, as a woman adds to her age she increases in weight. This is a perfectly natural condition, although in some cases there is more flesh during the adolescent period than at any time in later life. When one reaches the age of about sixty-five one is likely to begin to lose weight. The tissues are harder, they lose their soft substance, and as age progresses it is very likely to be accompanied by loss of flesh.

It is of the greatest importance in the first period because mature life depends on the nature of the youthful start. The second period is important because it may affect the welfare of the children as well as of the mother. The third is always critical for the individual; while longevity depends upon passing safely through the fourth period.

Underlying excessive thinness almost invariably is some physical disability. In most instances this defect is trifling, has no relation to life itself, but operates in such a way as to keep one thin and scrawny. Before any kind of treatment will be successful, and before you can be made plump and healthy in appearance, you must first discover the cause of your thinness. The human engine often has as tricky faults as an automobile. A slight adjustment at the right spot, and the motor hums with perfect vim.

House-Plan Contest Prize Winners

THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL conducted a House-Plan Contest in September and October last, in which were offered five first prizes and forty second prizes for the best sketch plans of small, conveniently arranged houses. Here is the announcement of the prize winners:

FIRST PRIZE, for the Southern Group, six-room bungalow, Mr. and Mrs. W. B. Livesay, Port Neches, Texas. SECOND PRIZES: Two-story farmhouse, A. H. Carter, Starkville, Mississippi; six-room bungalow, Mrs. Frederick H. McDonald, Decatur, Georgia; four-room bungalow, Mrs. John L. Driscoll, Shiro, Texas; five-room bungalow, Mrs. A. B. Ney, Alexandria, Louisiana; story-and-a-half house, Mrs. O. A. Herzog, Tulsa, Oklahoma; story-and-a-half house, Mrs. P. H. Smoot, Honolulu, Hawaii; story-and-a-half house, Mrs. W. F. Nehrling, Orlando, Florida; six-room, two-story house, Miss Faith Eggleston, Lexington, Kentucky.

FIRST PRIZE, for Northwestern Group, story-and-a-half farmhouse, Burnett Peterson, Van Hook, North Dakota. SECOND PRIZES: Three-room bungalow, Dr. Carl A. Fjelstad, Minneapolis, Minnesota; five-room bungalow, Sophomore English Class, High School, Gypsum, Colorado; story-and-a-half house, Mrs. John G. Gackle, Kulm, North Dakota; six-room bungalow, Mrs. Eric Therkelsen, Bozeman, Montana; story-and-a-half farmhouse, Mrs. Edna Plummer, Cavendish, Alberta, Canada; six-room bungalow, Miss Lucile Walter, Brookings, South Dakota; four-room bungalow, Miss Louise J. Peck, Gooding, Idaho; four-room bungalow, Will H. Johnston, Ogden, Utah.

FIRST PRIZE, for Eastern Group, seven-room, two-story house, Mr. W. Ellison Norton, Springfield, Massachusetts. SECOND PRIZES: Two-story, seven-room house, Mrs. H. M. Burritt, Albion, New York; story-and-a-half farmhouse, Mrs. W. O. Strong, Oceana, Virginia; two-story house, Mrs. F. K. Howell, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania; story-and-a-half house, Mrs. E. T. Bieak, East Elmhurst, Long Island; five-room bungalow, Ralph E. MacKeil, Bridgeport, Connecticut; four-room bungalow, Mrs. Stella U. Ritter, Bellevue, Pennsylvania; five-room farm bungalow, Mrs. Russell Cortelyou, Franklin Park, New Jersey; two-story house, Mrs. J. F. Klitch, Baltimore, Maryland.

FIRST PRIZE, for Western Group, three-room bungalow, Mrs. H. H. Cox, Los Angeles, California. SECOND PRIZES: Four-room bungalow, Mrs. H. C. Stockton, San Diego, California; five-room bungalow, Mrs. Nils H. Fleming, Bisbee, Arizona; five-room bungalow, Rogers Milner, Albuquerque, New Mexico; six-room farm bungalow, Mrs. W. F. McCabe, Merlin, Oregon; four-room bungalow, Elizabeth Lawnsdowne, Everett, Washington; five-room bungalow, George E. Campbell, Los Angeles, California; four-room bungalow, Mrs. C. W. Adams, Spokane, Washington; two-story, seven-room house, Mrs. Winifred Hill, San Angel, D.F., Mexico.

FIRST PRIZE, for Central Group, five-room bungalow, Miss Ordella M. Smith, Mount Vernon, Indiana. SECOND PRIZES: Story-and-a-half house, Mrs. Adelaide D. Huntley, Elroy, Wisconsin; story-and-a-half farmhouse, Miss Iva Conner, Winfield, Kansas; eight-room house, Mrs. A. J. Strohm, Chicago, Illinois; seven-room house, Mrs. George F. Sheetz, Detroit, Michigan; four-room bungalow, Mrs. Patti M. Conant, Cincinnati, Ohio; six-room bungalow, Harry Clifford McClure, Toledo, Ohio; five-room bungalow, Katherine K. Myhre, Des Moines, Iowa; five-room bungalow, G. C. Roop, Springfield, Ohio.

Use Your Lungs

IT IS a remarkable fact that many thin people have very poor chest development. Now don't be alarmed and think I am going to tell you you have tuberculosis or some other terrible thing. That idea is far from my mind. What I do mean is that the thin person has probably failed, by lack of breathing exercise, to develop the lungs. He is neglecting to give himself sufficient oxygen, and without oxygen there is failure of proper oxidation of the foodstuffs consumed, and consequently lack of nourishment, even though the consumption of food is sufficient. In other words, lack of oxidation may be one of the leading causes of thinness. This has a very particular interest for Americans, because it bears on the great American vice of improper ventilation.

Much as has been said about the necessity for open-air living and good ventilation, the average American seems to think he can live without oxygen. Except in communities where popular health education has been in force for years, the average person sleeps in an unventilated room.

Every bedroom should be so arranged that without causing a draft upon the head of the sleeper there is free circulation of air throughout the room.

(Continued on Page 124)

VI

WHEN we were playing The Duke of Killcrankie at the National Theater in Washington, President Roosevelt sent for me to come into his box during one of the intermissions. He and his party were in the box usually reserved for the President, and it has a small withdrawing room back of it. I had supposed that he would see me in this room. Instead, when he greeted me he drew me through the secret service men who were sitting at the back.

With him were Mrs. Roosevelt, two of the Roosevelt children and Mrs. Henry Cabot Lodge.

I felt much perturbed to be before an audience on the wrong side of the curtain. It did not occur to President Roosevelt at all that I should have any diffidence about coming before people with my make-up on. His greeting was most hearty, and he liked the play.

The last time I heard from him was a few weeks before he died, when he wrote me: "Just to wish you many happy New Years, John Drew; from an old friend and admirer."

Theodore Roosevelt's successor, President Taft, also brought me to the front of a box in my make-up. We were playing The Perplexed Husband by Alfred Sutro at the Empire Theater in New York, when President Taft asked me to come into the box. His party had arrived late and was not seen by the audience when they were ushered into the theater. The lights were turned on, and I appeared in the box just as the audience recognized the President.

Captain Marshall wrote two very delightful comedies in which I played, The Second in Command and The Duke of Killcrankie.

The Second in Command served me for two seasons. This play was the first time that khaki was used on the stage; that is, it was the first exposition of khaki on the stage in a military sense.

Guy Standing, who was knighted for his services in the British Navy during the recent war, was extremely good as Colonel Anstruther.

My nephew, Lionel Barrymore, who played the part of a young officer in this play, was very good; but the following season, as the Neapolitan organ grinder in The Mummy and the Hummingbird, his work was a revelation.

The Duke of Killcrankie was a very fine, light comedy in which four sharply contrasted characters are thrown together. These were played by that famous English actress, Fannie Brough, Margaret Dale, Ferdinand Gottschalk and myself.

After the Daly company disbanded, Mrs. Gilbert came under the management of Charles Frohman and appeared with Annie Russell in Jerome K. Jerome's Miss Hobbs and

My Years on the Stage

By JOHN DREW

Captain Marshall's play, The Royal Family. Then Charles Frohman decided to star her, and Clyde Fitch was commissioned to write a play for her called Granny.

This was produced with Marie Doro in the supporting cast at the Lyceum Theater. At the end of the play Mrs. Gilbert recited an epilogue which referred to the old Daly days and to Ada Rehan, James Lewis and myself. This might have been pleasant and proper on the first night, but it seemed rather strange to continue it through the run of the piece.

As the midweek matinee at the Lyceum did not conflict with my own, I was able to see Granny, and after the performance I saw Mrs. Gilbert in her dressing room. Nearly thirty years before we had played together for the first time at the Fifth Avenue Theater.

At a supper party Augustin Daly gave one year for Henry Irving and Ellen Terry at Delmonico's, I kissed Mrs. Gilbert's hand as I entered. She was not in the bill we were then playing at the theater, and I had not seen her for some time.

Irving, probably thinking that it was rather a formal greeting for people who saw each other every day, said: "You don't always do that, do you?"

"No, I usually do this." And I kissed her on the cheek.

This delightful old lady had been "grandma" to us all and had been on the stage many years. During the run of Granny she died.

After Augustin Daly died, Ada Rehan played in Paul Kester's play, Sweet Nell of Old Drury, and with Otis Skinner in revivals of some of the old Daly successes. I did not see her in any of these productions.

The last time I saw her was at her house in Ninety-third Street. She was ill then and had aged a great deal in appearance; but I do not believe either of us thought that it was our last meeting. Our conversation was more reminiscent than it had been before. We talked of those youthful days at the Arch Street Theater and the very early Daly days.

Ada Rehan had a fine mind; she was a great actress and she had a sweet soul.

The summer before I appeared in Captain Dieppe by Anthony Hope and Edward Rose, I met the two authors in London. We had lunch together, and Anthony Hope said to Rose: "You tell the story of Captain Dieppe."

Rose replied: "No; I told it the last time."

Finally, after some little arguing between them, they told me the story of this play, and it sounded fairly reasonable.

When it was presented, it did not have the quality of an Anthony Hope story, and it was not a success.

Elizabeth Marbury, who was Anthony Hope's agent, sent him a cable after the first performance in Providence where the play was tried out. "Play apparently pleased Providence public." I asked Miss Marbury afterwards whether she thought the alliteration would have any convincing power with Anthony Hope.

In that same early season in a play of Clyde Fitch's, called Glad of It, in which my nephew, John Barrymore, had a small part, there was a conversation between two shop-girls.

"Where are you going to-night, dearie?"

"Why, to see John Drew in Captain Dippy."

Unfortunately for this play, they did not have to change the line, for Glad of It was an even greater failure than Captain Dieppe.

The season of Augustus Thomas' play, Jim De Lancey, in which Doris Keane, Walter Hale, Margaret Dale and Guy Nichols played with me, we were booked to open New Year's Day at the Hollis Street Theater in Boston. There was no morning train at the time which we could count on getting us to Boston in time for a matinee.

Every year on the anniversary of the opening of The Players Club—New Year's Eve—there is celebrated Founders' Night. I very much wished to attend that year, especially as it was the first year that I was president of the club.

Through the influence of a friend in the railroad business I was given permission to have a private car containing my

(Continued on Page 147)

IN "ROSEMARY" JOHN DREW MET ANOTHER OF HIS MANY SUCCESSSES

AS MR. DREW'S LEADING WOMAN IN "MY WIFE," BILLIE BURKE FIRST CHARMED HER AMERICAN AUDIENCES

PAVLOVA AND JOHN DREW, AT THE TIME OF REVIVAL OF "ROSEMARY"

The Ladies' HOME JOURNAL

BARTON W. CURRIE, Editor

Editorials

As Others See Us

MRS. IRENE DARNELL-HARTWICK, of Low Moor, Virginia, has written an appreciation of THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL that we want all our readers to see. She has stated our editorial plan and policy with a sympathetic understanding that is more than gratifying to an editorial staff. In the slang of the day she gets what we are trying to put over. We doubt if any of us could so ably, in such brief space, state our aims and objectives. We are therefore doubly glad to allow Mrs. Hartwick to put us on record for what we stand for and for what we are striving to accomplish with every issue of what Lord Northcliffe recently designated as "pre-eminently the magazine of the American woman."

Mrs. Hartwick's letter was written to the Publishers' Information Bureau, Incorporated, of New York City, in response to a circular announcing that prizes would be awarded for the best letters describing what magazines women prefer and why. Thinking we might be interested in her discussion of THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, she sent a copy of her letter to us. The letter follows:

MISS ANNE R. EDGERLY,
Publishers' Information Bureau, Inc.
New York City.

Dear Miss Edgerly: The enclosed sheet, together with letter, was sent to me from the West, and I am wondering if I might not be an uninvited contributor to your letter contest, in view of the fact that I have long wished for an opportunity to express an appreciation of my favorite magazine, THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL.

In the first place, this magazine, as a whole, stands for and expresses through its printed pages the highest ideals of womanhood—culture, refinement, education, and the broad underlying principles of humanity upon which right human conduct is based.

In this magazine the trend of current events is indicated each month by editorials and special articles by men and women especially qualified to write upon these subjects.

The short stories, as well as the continued stories, are clean and wholesome, expressive of sweet, modest girlhood and earnest, broad-minded womanhood. In my home, copies of this magazine are left lying around, wholly uncensored, for my sixteen-year-old daughter to read. I know that therein she will find nothing that will destroy the ideals she and I are dreaming and building together.

The fashions, always of paramount interest to the gentler sex, are conservative and of good taste, befitting the rôle most women have to play—with a few breath-taking hints from that center of fashion, magic Paris.

The drawings, sketches, text, etc., of the advertisements are also an education and a shopping aid to those living in outlying districts, and no one who reads them will be utterly left behind in the march of Progress.

This journal is of an attractive size. The type is good and easily read. The paper used is of excellent quality, which insures good reproductions from paintings, photos, etc. The benefits derived from these reproductions can hardly be overestimated.

The Editors of this magazine must surely have been the last to raise their prices during the World War, and the first to lower them after the war ended. This bespeaks fairness to their public, composed as it is of so many women with limited allowances.

Indeed, there must be a wonderful personnel back of THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL to so create and uphold such a worthwhile publication, in which there is plenty of good fiction, enough wit and humor, a sufficient number of articles dealing with subjects of interest to modern woman—politics, home economics, child training, etc.—all of which, read intelligently, with an understanding outlook upon life as it is and as it should be, will give any woman, even though her reading be limited to this one magazine, splendid assistance in her natural vocation of building that greatest of institutions, the Home.

Sincerely yours,

(MRS.) IRENE DARNELL-HARTWICK.

Cheerfulness

IT'S a fine, heartening thing, is cheerfulness; and do we value it as highly as it deserves? There's a flavor about it, like hot buttered toast on a cold day, eaten round a fire while people crack jokes. We have pensive friends and sturdy friends and kind friends and sympathetic friends; there are gently chiding friends and vociferously earnest friends, but how few of them are there we would not swap for the cheerful, cheering friend.

The pensive friends will quote words of wisdom to us; the sturdy friends will slap us on the back and vow they'll stand by us through thick and thin; the kind and sympathetic folk will let the tears run down their cheeks and hold our hands compassionately. All these things are good in their way, but the cheery souls who make us see the glint of gold in the blackest clouds, those are the people who help us along life's road. They talk of sunshine and bird song and flowers in bloom and gladness; they turn our self-pity into self-forgetfulness and our feeble stumblings along the humdrum road of workaday into a triumph march.

They're not always pointing out the bright side; they're just living on the bright side—and that makes all the difference.

The Loneliness of Old Age

IT HAS a loneliness all its own. One wonders sometimes if all the love showered upon the "seventy-and-overs" can quite bar that loneliness out. For the old men and women are scattered here and there amongst the middle-agers and the young, and the middle-agers and the young can never quite sympathize and enter into the old folks' troubles—for they've never been seventy-odders themselves! They've never seen their opinions and methods set aside as entirely out of date, and the importance of shawls and nondrafty rooms is as nothing to them.

And Granny and Gran'dad "don't hold" with newfangled ways of dress, and the prices of modern food and things are a puzzle they cannot solve. The war has changed such a jumble of odds and ends that the gray heads get confused, and they ponder with puzzlement over the difference between these days and the days when they were young.

And their friends and relatives of long ago have passed on, many of them—those dear souls who remembered Gran's wedding dress and the little gray bonnet with blue forget-me-nots that she wore on her wedding trip. Young folks will listen, but their attention wanders. It means nothing really important to them that old Great-aunt Lavinia nursed all her children through mumps and scarlet fever single-handed. Indeed, at the tale they are a trifle bored.

Great-grandfather's lawsuit is as fresh to-day to old Miss Angela as it was sixty years ago; but eighteen-year Peggy stifles a yawn and promises to run in another day to hear the end of the story. Besides, the list of time-proved chums able to send finely pointed, written greetings on Christmas days and birthdays is dwindling in numbers: Jane Brown died last year; Sam Jones was buried two years back; and Mary Parsons was "taken" summer before last.

Yes, it's a lonely time! It behooves us to make it as cheery as we can for them. Let us ask for the reminiscence of that party when John Henry Smith kissed Gran under the mistletoe and Great-gran was so dreadfully shocked! Let us beg for the anecdote of the valentines which old James Stock sent to his pretty cousin Phoebe; and let us try to be really interested! It isn't a big thing to us to listen for half an hour to the oft-repeated words; but it is such a wealth of happiness to those to whom the once-upon-a-time of life is still the most precious of memory possessions.

Just a Beginning

Women Will Keep Up the Fight to Crush War Spirit Throughout the World

EVEN boys will disarm if they can find enough fun in it. They will scrap toy warships as quickly as they will fight mimic battles with them, if too much stress is not laid on the "goodness" of the process in the beginning.

That is one real factor in the great international problem to the solution of which millions of American mothers are going to apply themselves throughout this year of 1922. These women are very thoroughly mobilized still further to "morally disarm" the United States and to help foreign women still further "morally disarm" their countries, so that the next international conference, which President Harding and his associates expect will be called this year, may get the world a little farther along on the road to assured peace than the recent one could.

In every group of schoolboys there is opportunity for a little laboratory work on the raw material which eventually gets worked up into the mental attitude that characterizes foreign offices, war departments and admiralities. It is symbolic work largely. But there is in it also a most practical bearing on the future, because this new crusade for peace that the women of the world have undertaken may still be years from completion when the boys of to-day and of to-morrow are helping to make or break the world.

Danger in War-Map Game

AT THIS moment the boys in the Washington high school are engaged in an interscholastic war-map game to interest them and train them in battle strategy. The games are under the direction of an army officer appointed by the War Department. Contests began about the time America, Great Britain, Japan and the other powers assembled at Washington were at the climax of signing their treaties and agreements to get rid of war. These schoolboys in the national capital will keep up their war-map contests until the end of May, when prizes will be awarded to the winners.

The fun and interest the boys will get out of it this spring will not have any bearing on the public state of mind at the time of the next international conference, except perhaps indirectly, as it may react on some of their parents. But in the long run, covering, say, the periods of future renewals of naval holidays, it will not make for that general "will to peace" which the statesmen of all countries say is the one thing they most lack to enable them to straighten out the world.

It is a matter which might put itself almost automatically on the program of the National Congress of Mothers and the Parent-Teachers' Association, for those groups are member associations in the National Council for the Limitation of Armaments and have declared themselves against war.

Here is another school story: John, a nine-year-old youngster, home for a week-end holiday from a small-boys' boarding school, let it be known that he wanted a new battleship to add to his fleet. He wanted it immediately to take back with him, because there was a big naval battle to take place on the floor of his room in the dormitory on Monday.

The idea did not appeal to his parents, especially the mother. They did not want to encourage a game that would keep the boy indoors and away from the more healthful playgrounds and athletic field. Also, they were getting stirred up to a new view of things by their reading about the International Conference then in session. But suggestions of skates, hockey sticks and footballs as substitutes did not divert the boy's interest from the impending naval conflict on a carpet sea in a steam-heated zone. He was at the militaristic age.

"What's the use of all this talk in Washington about sinking our real battleships if schoolboys would rather play war than anything else?" remarked the mother.

"Who's going to sink our battleships?" asked the boy with the first real show of interest in his parents' side of the case.

"Why, we are going to sink them ourselves and the other countries are going to sink theirs," exclaimed the mother, seeing a new light. "Don't you know the newest thing is to get rid of ships instead of getting more of them? Why don't you play a game that's up to date?"

"How do you play it? Do you sink 'em with bombs?"

It was the father's turn to play, and he jumped into teamwork to follow his wife's lead. "Say, boy," he exclaimed, "how'd you like to see Washington? There's the Monument and a menagerie and the Capitol and the place where the President lives, and they're making the rules there right now for this new game of sinking battleships. All three of us can go there and back to-morrow and perhaps see them at it."

The next afternoon the family of three found themselves in the crowd of the curious lined up at the curb in front of the Pan-American Building to watch the arrival of the plenipotentiaries for their afternoon discussions. The boy was pushed to the front, where he could see.

"There goes Hughes," said the father, who was far more excited than the boy. "That must be Balfour. He looks like the pictures. There is Kato, of Japan, getting out of the next automobile." And so on through the list.

As Mother Sees the Peacemakers

OF COURSE the plenipotentiaries in silk hats and frock coats appealed to John less than the American soldiers in uniform pacing back and forth in front of the building, with rifles over their shoulders, to see that the bystanders did not encroach upon the space reserved for the passage of peacemakers. And he missed Viviani altogether, because there was the whirr of a navy airplane's engine overhead just as the French delegates arrived, and the boy was looking skyward. So was his father. The mother kept looking straight and hard at the peacemakers. She was beginning to get something, to feel something much more keenly than she had felt it on starting for their day's outing at the capital. Her hand was on the shoulder of the boy in front of her. She added ten to his nine years and wondered if, after all, these men of her own and other countries, whom she had come to see, would succeed in doing something now which ten years hence, at the end of their naval holiday, would keep that son of hers out of war.

But she didn't talk about what she felt then. It wasn't the time for it; the father did the talking and was practical. He used the lingo of the conference reports, but applied it in terms of toy battleships and schoolboy war games as the trio walked from the Pan-American and strolled through the White House grounds.

A small boy likes to argue and be reasoned with. But, like a foreign delegate from a small nation, he wants to reason back and have an opportunity to state his case, to explain why he should get something as well as yield something. He is tremendously interested in the theory of self-determination for small people.

In Terms of Toy Battleships

JOHN was interested, too, in what he had seen. He loved the word "holiday" and the word "naval," and putting them together aroused his curiosity for further information.

He got it. "John," said his father, "here is a plan. Tell me what you think of it. You ask for a new battleship immediately. I don't want to give it to you now for these reasons: We would rather have you play outdoors than in. You don't seem to care a rap about doing good work in reading either at home or at school, but you know that we want you to want to read just as much as you want this battleship. And we don't like the idea right now of war games when everybody is trying to think of a way to stop real wars. So here's what I propose: That you shall not have this battleship now, but that you will go back to school, do better reading, remember to write a letter home every Sunday afternoon according to the school rule, and try to get those other boys to take a naval holiday with you for three weeks. Don't play navy fights; don't get any more battleships. Instead, invent a good, new, lively game to play getting rid of some ships you've got. And if you write the letters, improve the reading and try your best to get the other boys to play the new game. I will give you a new battleship at the end of three weeks if you still want one. If you don't want one, then I'll give you something else. What do you think of that?"

The boy thought a lot about it—so much that they had walked way beyond the White House before he was ready to reply. Then he accepted the proposal "in principle," as Mr. Balfour and Baron Kato would say, but searched for some of the obstacles, as Mr. Balfour and Baron Kato would do, and suggested modifications as to details.

"How can we sink the battleships we've got? One of the strictest rules at school is that we mustn't use the bathtubs for anything except to take baths."

"You'll have to invent some way," replied his father, who was getting excited over his own game of playing that his name was Hughes.

(Continued on Page 150)

OTHER, "Mother Love," "The Hand That Rocks the Cradle"—these have been extolled so long in story, play, song and motion pictures that the idea of motherhood and all pertaining to it is sentimentally sacrosanct.

Any criticism of it is a thing to be horrified at, an affront to an idea which tradition and sentiment and the popular song writers and the more popular movies have invested with unassailable perfection. But despite these builders of a nation's sentiment, I must speak the truth; and the plain, unsentimental truth is that many of our song-worshiped mothers and many of our fathers should on the record of their deeds be classified as vices.

I am not here considering or addressing myself to those parents who obviously to every thinking person are vicious influences in their children's lives, parents who are frivolous, negligent, who take more interest in their own pleasure than in their children's welfare. I am here concerned only in the worthwhile parents who are earnestly desirous of doing their best for their children; and my concern is to show such parents how, perhaps in ignorance of child nature and better methods, they are unconsciously guilty of attitudes and practices that bring vicious results.

The vices of well-intentioned parents spring from many sources. There is of course ignorance. There is pride—pride in the child itself, our desire that it shall be recognized as the perfect child, our desire that we may be recognized as the perfect parent. There is the vice of ill-considered devotion, the senseless sense of propriety, the false idea of good behavior. And I might go on indefinitely cataloguing bad practices which are the perversion of good impulses. But the fact that the original instinct was good cannot alter the vicious effects of the practice and does not mend the injury which has been done the child.

Perhaps few of us have ever realized how many of our vices have their origin in our pride as parents, pride which has a hundred forms. Our pride may excite in us a mad desire to have our child excel beyond his merit and beyond his ability, which desire may be a vice when regarded from the viewpoint of its results. Perhaps no instance will serve to illustrate more poignantly the fallacies of our misconceived ambitions for our children than the case of Rosemary.

"An Exceptional Child"

ROSEMARY'S parents were determined that she should be regarded as an exceptional child, and they had the money to make her that in so far as the mere spending of money can achieve this result. Until the age of eleven Rosemary was coddled in all material luxury. She was tutored at home in school work and in all forms of art. She was taken to all kinds of amusements. And above all other attentions, everything was thought out for her and done for her. But despite all the care and thought and love and money bestowed upon her, Rosemary was physically weak, pale, listless and very slow in all her responses. Finally the little girl herself begged to be sent to school and after much begging the devoted mother consented.

To get away from that airless hothouse, her golden cage of velvet lining, proved exactly what Rosemary needed. School seemed like a paradise of freedom to her; she was allowed to do some things by herself and for herself. It stimulated her imagination, her creative ability, her ambition. At the end of a few months Rosemary was reborn, bubbling with life, happy, active, joyous.

After a time Rosemary decided to dramatize one of the stories read in school and decided to give the play as a surprise to her mother and father on her birthday, which was a few weeks off. The thought of doing it all herself, making the costumes out of colored tissue paper, assigning the parts to her friends, rehearsing them, thrilled her with joy. For three whole days she and her two little friends who were to have leading parts in the drama managed to keep this wonderful dream a secret. On the fourth day Rosemary's mother happened in upon them and discovered the plan. Following her usual practice with Rosemary, the mother immediately stepped into the affair and took charge of the production. She improved the play with her revisions, and from her costume trunks brought forth most attractive costumes for the various parts, which shamed Rosemary's poor tissue garments. She assumed responsibility over the rehearsals, supervised and directed them; and instead of allowing the event to remain a small, informal party, as Rosemary planned it to be, the mother invited a score of friends and decorated the house especially for the occasion.

The Sins of the Parents

By MIRIAM FINN SCOTT

As the mother saw it, the program was a great success. The audience showed its appreciation by enthusiastic applause, and at the end of the play the guests crowded about the mother to congratulate her on her remarkable daughter. The mother was aglow with excited happiness. After she had bid the last guest good-by at the front door, she rushed back to the theaterized living room to take Rosemary into her arms. But Rosemary was not there. After much searching the mother found Rosemary in her own room, stretched out on her bed, her face buried in the pillow.

"Darling," the mother called to her, "wasn't your play wonderful?"

Rosemary lifted herself slowly from her bed, looked up at her mother with a strange, fierce look in her eyes and in wild hysteria she cried: "Mother, you did it all—not I!"

Where Pride is Cause for Censure

AND so an experience which might have expressed childhood in all its genuine simplicity and naive beauty, an experience which should have proved the fruition of the child's own efforts, and might have been the quickening of Rosemary's independent growth, was made into a crushing tragedy by a loving, devoted, ambitious mother. And to this day the mother does not understand her own guilt or the true cause of Rosemary's behavior.

When she related the story her facts were practically the same as I have given; but this was her decisive conclusion and complacent interpretation: "It was a plain case of hysterical exhaustion. I had let her do too much. Of course after such an experience, I'm not allowing Rosemary to attempt any trying work again."

I think that every reader who understands children will join in exclaiming, "Poor Rosemary!"

The vice of Rosemary's mother was that in her pride and love she did everything for Rosemary. Some good parents go to the other extreme. There are few vices of parents which deserve more censure than establishing a too-exalted standard, sometimes an adult standard, as a model for the child's achievement. We cannot expect children to live up to our adult physical strength and intellectual power. We must realize that the crudity and imperfection of the little child's work are truly representative of the limited power of the growing child, and in its way that work is as nearly 100 per cent of possible achievement as our smooth and perfect performance. We parents in our efforts to make the little child do something which is entirely beyond him, discourage his efforts by overburdening him, and the result is often death to the child's ambition and misery to his soul. Life is filled with the tragedies of child phenomena, pressed forward by good parents, who wither and lose all their promise at just the time when they should be barely opening their buds.

Pride in our children is a wonderful quality; but when there is not combined with pride a full understanding of the child and sympathy for the child, then such a pride may become one of the worst of vices. At the very least our pride demands that our children should be the equals of children of the same size and age. The way in which we handle a physical condition may serve to illustrate the possible vicious effects upon our children of this kind of pride. Most of us good parents consider neither expense nor effort in securing the best medical attention for our children; yet few of us seem to appreciate adequately that if a child suffers physically all his bodily and mental functioning is affected; that all of him, not alone his physical body, needs special attention and consideration. The case of Olga is an extreme example to illustrate this point.

At seventeen Olga weighed over a hundred and eighty pounds. She had long been a problem to her parents. At the age of six Olga looked like a child of ten, and it was at that time that the parents consulted a specialist and discovered that Olga was suffering from an abnormal condition of her glands which caused this obesity and other physical disorders. The parents kept her under the care of this specialist, and while she is still an abnormality as to size and weight she is, nevertheless, in excellent physical condition.

But the parents' pride made them ashamed of her size. While the best of physical attention was being given to Olga, the other child concern of the parents was to save themselves the embarrassment of having so huge a child in a class with children hardly more than half her size—this regardless of the fact that she was no older than the average of the class. Their whole thought was: "What will other people think?"

The Child Who Had No Chance

CONSEQUENTLY they engaged private tutors for Olga in an effort to speed her up in her studies so that she would be in school with and mingle with children of her own size. Olga, however, had just the average mentality of her years and naturally enough she found it difficult to concentrate on her advanced studies. She responded rather poorly to the forcing process of tutors. Olga's unsatisfactory progress was not understood by her parents. They saw it as her fault; she was lazy and did not want to learn; that was the parents' verdict, and they had her pushed harder than ever. They did not realize that Olga had not had a real chance to gain a mastery of the fundamentals of any of her subjects, that everything was chaos and confusion to her. Their pride, or shame—sometimes the two are one—drove them on; and regardless of whether she was fitted for the classes or knew her work she was dragged through the primary grades, tutored always forcibly feeding her, through high school, and finally by her tutors' having luckily fed her just the right stuff before the entrance examinations, she was entered in a special preparatory school for college.

At this school, Olga, for the first time dependent upon her own efforts, found herself absolutely at sea. She was deficient in every subject and could not keep up with her class. At home, while the best physical care still was given her, the child had no sympathy for her poor standing in her school work. Her father especially could not understand her poor reports when she had been given so much outside help. As the school year progressed Olga found herself falling farther and farther behind in her work. She had nowhere and no person to whom to turn for help and sympathy. She struggled to hold her place in school; and to achieve this end she began to practice all kinds of deception. Finding that even this could not hold her a place in her class, and fearing the consequences at home of an open disgrace, in her desperation she wrote on a typewriter a letter to the

(Continued on Page 71)

My little speech tonight will reach
Across the U. S. A.
For I'll follow the trail of the wonderful sale
Of the soups that we eat every day.

The United States of Good Health

Good soup eaten regularly every day is a builder of robust health. Point to any place on the map of the United States and there Campbell's Soups are making healthier, happier people. Because these soups are so good and so convenient, Americans have learned to appreciate soup at its real value.

Campbell's Ox Tail Soup

is a thick, rich nourishing blend. The delicious flavor and great food value of this soup come from the medium-sized ox tail joints, choice and meaty, daintily diced carrots and golden turnips, selected barley, crisp white celery, a touch of French leeks and parsley grown on our own farms all the year round.

21 kinds

12 cents a can

A dainty garnish

Many housewives are fond of giving a "personal touch" to their dishes, especially when they are entertaining and wish everything to be even more attractive than usual. At such times you will find this a most pleasing garnish to Campbell's Ox Tail Soup: a thin slice of lemon in each plate, a thin slice or two of hard-boiled egg and a sprinkling of finely chopped parsley. The lemon may be cut in fancy shapes.

Campbell's SOUPS

LOOK FOR THE RED AND WHITE LABEL

NEARLY all parents believe that contagious diseases and school life go together. But our belief that these diseases of childhood are necessary accompaniments of school life needs thorough and complete revision. The common contagious diseases that we have accepted as necessary incidents of childhood are not necessary at all. Unfortunately, there are still some mothers who believe that their children should be exposed to the milder forms of these diseases at least, with the deliberate purpose of having them affected with measles or chicken pox, so that they may have the disease once for all and have it over with, the theory in such cases being that children are less acutely ill with the diseases in question than they would be if they should happen to contract them after they reach adult life.

This point of view is wrong. Contagious diseases are never without the possibility of harm. It is true that some of them seem so simple and have so little effect upon childhood that people do not view them with any particular apprehension; but it is also true that there is not a single one of the ordinary contagious diseases of child life that has not the possibility of becoming dangerous or leaving in its trail some serious complications which may become fatal.

We know that as children grow older and as adult life approaches there is increased resistance to disease. This is particularly true of those diseases that are caused by germs, or what are known as the "contagious" or "infectious" diseases. We use the word "immunity" to describe this condition of resistance; therefore it is correct to say that grown people are more immune—that is, less likely to contract contagious diseases—than are children; so that if we can bring our children up to the age of adolescence, or to the age of sixteen to eighteen years, when they may be considered to be approaching adult life, without having let them contract any of the contagious diseases, we need have slight apprehension that they will contract them later in life. If they do, they will probably be better fitted to resist disease than they would have been had they succumbed to them in childhood.

Another fact which seems to have escaped the attention of parents is that the contagious diseases we have mentioned are really not school diseases at all. They are, to a minor extent, diseases which are more or less prevalent during the time of life when the child goes to school, but they are far more prevalent under the age of six years than they are afterwards. Moreover, they are far more dangerous to the little children than to the older ones. Throughout the United States we find that ninety-five of every hundred deaths from whooping cough, eighty out of every hundred deaths from measles, sixty-two out of every hundred deaths from diphtheria, sixty-two out of every hundred deaths from scarlet fever, occur in children under five years of age. We find also, where we can obtain reliable statistics, that about eighty out of every hundred cases of all these contagious diseases occur in children under five years of age.

The School a Weapon Against Disease

FROM this it may be seen that the school cannot be held responsible as the main disseminator of infection of this type; nevertheless the school has been and in some instances may still be justly blamed for whatever share it has taken or is taking in making it possible for contagious diseases to spread. The chance for spread of infection is always increased whenever children are brought together in groups, whether this is at school, at children's parties, at picnics or any other place where children who would not otherwise have met are brought together in more or less close contact for a definite length of time. The truth of this is seen in the fact that in many of our largest and best boarding schools the officials look forward almost with certainty to an outbreak of chicken pox or measles or some one of the other more readily contracted contagious diseases within a week or two after the Christmas or Easter holidays. The children bring these diseases to school with them, and they are mainly the result of the children's parties that have taken place during the holiday season. As a matter of fact, whenever such an epidemic breaks out in a particular school it is usually easily controlled; and that brings me to the point I wish particularly to emphasize. Although the school has been blamed in the past for the dissemination of contagious diseases, the contrary of this can be and should be true. Thus, the school offers at the present time the most simple and the safest place we have for the prevention of the spread of contagious diseases.

During the great epidemic of influenza three years ago health officials were faced with the question whether it would be desirable to close all places of amusement and other places where people congregated, including the public and parochial schools. In New York City, where the health officials had for a long time believed that the school is one of the most valuable agents we have in the prevention of infection, provided proper medical supervision is given to the children, it was decided that the schools should remain open during the epidemic. The problem called for proper and continuous medical oversight. The children were not allowed to congregate in the playgrounds, but were sent directly to their classrooms. They were inspected each morning by their teachers in order to detect any symptoms of illness. If any child seemed in any way to need special attention, such child was referred at once to the school doctor or nurse or sent home. All these latter children were kept under observation in their homes until it was determined whether or not they were actually ill. No recess games were allowed, and after the school closed for the day the children were sent directly home.

Unnecessary Diseases of Childhood

By S. JOSEPHINE BAKER, M.D.

Director, Bureau of Child Hygiene, Department of Health, New York City

As a result of this health supervision it was found that the number of absences from school attendance was no greater during the progress of the epidemic than it had always been at the same time of year. Also, it was found that influenza was almost unknown among children of school age. The sickness and death rates from this disease were lowest in the age group from five to fifteen years, made up almost exclusively of school children. In other words, the epidemic was practically non-existent as far as they were concerned. Such evidence as this has been met with over and over again in all the large cities that have taken the school as a weapon to fight contagious diseases rather than allowing it to become a means whereby their incidence may be increased.

How to Fight Germs

PROBABLY one of the reasons why school life has been associated with contagious diseases is because the schools open in the fall, at just about the time we begin to live with closed windows. It is well known that fresh air and sunlight are the two best disinfectants we have. If one follows the curve which represents the beginning of contagious diseases in the fall, their rapid increase during the months of February and March, and then their equally rapid decrease until the schools close in June, we may easily assume that because the increase in the number of cases of contagious diseases closely follows the term of school life, they have a very definite relation to each other. We are more and more inclined to the belief that the closed window, the absence of fresh air and indoor life are responsible. As a matter of fact, contagious diseases would be as prevalent in summer as they are in winter if it were not for the fact that in summer we prefer to be outdoors a great deal of the time, and even when indoors we have an abundance of fresh air.

In learning to fight contagious diseases as well as all other diseases, we have first to learn a little about the way in which they gain access to the body. The acquiring of any disease may be divided into two parts: First, the germ or actuating cause, whatever it may be; that is, the thing that actually causes the disease. The second and equally important part has to do with the amount of resistance that the individual can show against incurring the disease; in other words, the state of physical health. When we understand these two points we are well started on our knowledge of what the school and the home can do to prevent children's having these diseases.

Contagious diseases are always caused by germs. These find their way into the body through the mouth and nose. Contrary to general opinion, these germs are not floating around in the air nor are they generally found in water or in dust. The only way in which contagious diseases can be transmitted from one person to another is by intimate contact with the person who has the disease in question. The germs of these diseases are usually conveyed by coughing, sneezing, speaking or kissing. While the germs can be in the fine particles of moisture that come out of a person's mouth in sneezing or coughing, and often when they speak, these germs cannot float in the air for any great distance. A good arm's length is about as far as we can expect infection to carry over. Anything that is soiled by a sick person can carry the disease to others. This is true of soiled hands, handkerchiefs and towels.

The child should wash his hands before meals and after going to the toilet, and the food that he eats should be kept covered and free from contamination. It has been said that "food, fingers and flies" are the cause of most of the diseases that may possibly be transmitted from one person to another. Action on the part of the community as well as of every householder in clearing up places where flies breed, proper screening of houses, cleanly handling of food and thorough washing of food that is to be eaten raw, combined with personal cleanliness, are all methods that are needed to keep the home and the people in it free from infection.

As contagious diseases can be carried only by actual contact with the body secretions of the person who is sick and can be acquired by a well person only by letting some of this infection actually gain entrance to the body through the mouth or nose, it may readily be seen that the first cardinal rule for prevention of infectious diseases is to see that nothing goes into the mouth that is not clean. If this one rule could be observed it would mean the wiping out of about one-half of our cases of contagious diseases.

The Meaning of "Resistance"

THE second cause of disease that we have referred to is lack of general good health; that is, what we call the "resistance" of the person is lowered. Every mother knows that there are certain types of children who take every kind of disease that is encountered in the neighborhood. Such children are those who have lowered resistance to disease. On the other hand, there are other children who may be continually exposed to contagion, yet who never seem to acquire any of it. These are children whose resistance or state of good health is normal. Resistance to disease is of two kinds: some people have what is called "natural resistance"; that is, they have within themselves certain substances that are antagonistic to certain diseases. Such people are called "immunes" and never contract the disease in question. Some people may be immune to several diseases or to only one particular kind. On the other hand, there are people who do not have this natural immunity, but who are able to resist disease because of the fine physical condition in which they always keep themselves. If this latter type of person contracts a contagious disease, he usually has it in very light form and gets well without any complications.

What we know as "bodily resistance" is definitely lowered by certain conditions of life, and children who are frail, who lack vitality and who do not live in the right health surroundings are the ones who are the first victims when any of the contagious diseases are present in the neighborhood. Such lowered resistance is caused by lack of fresh air, not enough nourishing food, the wrong kind of clothing—usually such children are overclothed—and lack of care of the functions of the body, which render the person much more likely to become ill. Regular bathing and wholesome exercise are needed. Overwork or overplay may easily result in mental and physical fatigue. When this fatigue can be cured by a good night's rest it need cause no apprehension; but when the hours of sleep are too short and the fatigue lasts over from day to day, then it is time to make a readjustment of the child's mode of living.

One of the most hopeful messages that medicine has brought us in a long time is that which has to do with assuring prevention of some of these contagious diseases. Scientists have been working for years upon the possibilities of developing a serum or vaccine which will prevent or cure certain types of diseases that are caused by the development

(Continued on Page 43)

You cannot cut the cuticle without piercing through in places to the delicate nail root that lies only one-twelfth of an inch below the surface of the cuticle

What causes hangnails?

With proper care you need never again have a raw, ragged cuticle

AUTHORITIES agree that hangnails are caused either by neglect or by wrong methods of care. If neglected, the cuticle will grow fast to the nail. As the nail pushes forward, the cuticle stretches until it can stretch no more. Then it splits—and you have a hangnail. Or, if you cut the cuticle with knife or scissors, you are likely to pierce through to the nail root and then you get the same result.

To prevent hangnails, therefore, you must constantly detach the cuticle from the nail—but you must do this without cutting or breaking it or you will have hangnails just as surely as if you neglected it. This thin fold of scarf-skin is like the selvedge edge of a piece of cloth. When it is cut or torn, the whole nail rim gradually ravel out. This is why you can never have smooth nail rims when you make a practice of cutting the cuticle.

Cutex Cuticle Remover will soften the cuticle, gently loosen it from the nail, and take off all hard, dry edges. If you will throw away your manicure scissors and begin to use Cutex regularly, you will never again have hangnails. Your very first trial will leave your nail rims smooth and even—however rough you may have made them by cutting.

Two new polishes to complete your manicure

Then for the gleaming luster that you want for your nails, try the two new polishes that Cutex now offers you. These represent a distinct advance on anything ever put out.

In the new Cutex Powder Polish you have for the first time, a powder polish that is practically instantaneous. With just a few light strokes, it gives you the highest, most lasting luster obtainable. It is scented, delicately tinted, velvet smooth. You will be astonished with its quickness, and enchanted with the way it brings out the natural luster and color of your nails.

Cutex Liquid Polish goes on with an absolutely uniform smoothness. It dries instantly, leaving a delightful luster that keeps its even brilliance for at least one week. It is a wonderful protection to the nails. Used as a finishing touch it will make a manicure last twice as long.

Your first Cutex manicure will seem like a miracle to you. Perhaps you may have made the cuticle at the base of the nails coarse and ragged by clipping it with the cuticle scissors. Cutex Cuticle Remover will leave it beautifully smooth, and you will agree that you have never used as wonderful a nail polish as any one of those provided by Cutex.

Cutex Sets come in three sizes

To many thousands of people, a Cutex Set is now an absolute toilet necessity. You can buy them in three sizes, at 60c, at $1.50, and at $3.00. Or each preparation can be had separately at 35c. At all drug and department stores in the United States and Canada and at chemist shops in England.

New Introductory Set—now only 15c

Send today for the new Introductory Set containing samples of Cutex Cuticle Remover, Cuticle Cream (Comfort), the new Liquid Polish and the new Powder Polish, with orange stick and emery board. Address Northam Warren, 114 West 17th Street, New York, or, if you live in Canada, Dept. 103, 200 Mountain St., Montreal.

Just work around the nails with an orange stick dipped in Cutex Cuticle Remover

A few swift strokes across the palm is enough to bring out the most brilliant luster

The New Cutex Introductory Set

MAIL THIS COUPON WITH 15 CENTS TODAY

Northam Warren,
Dept. 103, 114 West 17th Street,
New York City

Name _____

Street _____

City and State _____

The Complete Furnishing of the Little House

Curtaining the House

IN THE furnishing of the house the curtains are next in importance to the walls and the floors, for on the proper selection of the colors and materials used in the curtains, on the cut of the side drapes and valances, on the carefulness of the making and the method of hanging them, depends very largely the attractiveness of the completed home.

Usually you expect to achieve with your curtains that cozy and well-furnished atmosphere that is so desirable and so eagerly sought after by every woman who has a home in the making; also, you may depend on your curtains to supply the most important keynotes of your color schemes, which is logical enough, since the walls are always neutral, the floors quiet, allowing the very finest chance in the world for curtains showing the rich blues, the tawny mustards and old-gold tones, the friendly notes of rose, the greens or mauves, that by their mere presence at your windows tend to beautify. Your curtains may be as gay as your rooms will allow: cretonne or printed linen solves the need with peculiar adaptability, and when plain materials at the windows are a decorative necessity, you may dare extremely brilliant colors which may be partly hidden by more demure overdrapes when desired. To know how to choose just this right material for any certain room, to decide unerringly the proper quantity to use, so that patterns or bright hues will not be overdone, to be able to say at once how long the glass curtains and the side drapes shall be, what degree of formality should be attained, and whether there should be linings—these are only a few of the many details that crop up as the curtaining progresses, and require a working knowledge of curtain lore that seems appalling to the amateur, but which is not really difficult to master after all.

The very first step may be taken in learning as much as possible about glass curtains, which are those thin inner curtains that hang as close to the windowpanes as their rods can be placed. If the windows are also supplied with roller shades, these must be allowed room between the glass curtains and the glass so that they may roll up and down with ease. Glass curtains are always given a rod to themselves, but this I shall explain more thoroughly when we take up the subject of rods. Since glass curtains are meant to cover the glass, they do not extend above or below any more than is necessary: at the top of the window they are cased on a rod at the base of the upper window trim, set in toward the windowpane as far as is necessary if the window is in any degree recessed; in length they never fall below the window sill, but preferably just clear it. Usually glass curtains are cased on their rods instead of being attached by rings, because they are thin enough to do away with the necessity for pulling back and forth, and if glass curtains are needed at all they are hung the way they are intended to stay. When glass curtains combine with their own uses the attributes of draw curtains, and are of thicker material, obviating the use of the roller shade, they may be cased on rings, which as a rule are hidden from view by the valance of the overdrapery.

Glass curtains should never be tied back, with the exception of the small colonial window that is sometimes hung with ruffled sheer-white-muslin curtains, drawn ever so slightly to each side with tie-backs of folded muslin. The use of this particular type of curtain is sanctioned by custom for the quaint colonial house, and looks quite attractive from without; but from the interior standpoint, I feel its use is rather limiting, for one must be very chary of the kind of overdrapery one attempts to combine with glass curtains like these, since usually the simplest sort of side drape is the only thing that could be tolerated, and there is considerable doubt about any at all.

Even Hems are Unpretentious

DECORATIVE opinion holds that, save in the exception just cited, the glass curtains should hang straight from the inside top of the window to the sill, that there should be a pair for every window, that there should be scant fullness, so that the curtains will not appear too bunched, and that, as a rule, there should be very little noticeable space in the middle between the two curtains. When the view is too beautiful to obstruct and there is no need for protection from passers-by, glass curtains may be dispensed with entirely, arranging the windows becomingly without them.

Time was when people were thought either queer or poverty-stricken if they did not have much lace at their front windows; now they are considered old-fashioned and their taste is questioned if they do, for it has grown to be considered a sign of the love of overdisplay to choose glass curtains too ornate. We only find folk of a certain kind insisting on that newest version of the lace curtain, a little bit of linen "encrusted" with quantities of filet in the form of insertions, edgings and medallions; and, if the truth were known, the better shops offer this sort of curtain only to those they suspect of being unable to appreciate any other; and the good decorator looks upon too-fancy glass curtains with the same horror that is inspired by many diamonds worn in the morning. People who hanker in secret for lace curtains their Victorian grandmothers admired are stilling the longing with plain net or Valenciennes, hemmed plainly, which is as near as one can come, in safety, to the filminess of lace. Even trimmings of lace on plain materials, such as the use of bandings and edgings, have been relinquished in favor of unpretentious hems, and those who wish individuality in their glass curtains are preferring to pay as goodly a price by the yard as they can afford for handspun sheer linens, silk gauzes, sunproof materials and casement cloths.

For the average window one rarely needs more than two lengths of yard-wide goods, though, when the material is especially soft and the window wide, greater widths may be used without cutting. The favorite width for the curtain hem is an inch and a half or two inches, but one inch or three inches may also be considered. The hems appear at the bottoms and at the inner facing sides; the outside edges may be roll hemmed or, less conventionally, hemmed to match the other edges. Tiny hand stitches are an improvement over machine stitching, but the latter is better unless one has mastered the art of beautiful handwork. Ladder hemstitching, in any width desired, run at the top of the hems, is a favored form of curtain embellishment. If a shrinkable material is being used for the glass curtains, a precaution for extra length after washing may be found in two or three thicknesses folded into the casing while making, and which may be let out when needed, for there is no sorrier spectacle than an outgrown glass curtain. Casings should be made comfortably wide enough for the slenderest of rods, and as a rule show no headings, unless the glass curtain is the only dress the window boasts, or unless it is cased to and bottom on rods, a form peculiarly suited to the casement window and French door, if glass curtains are real necessities. This, however, is not always the case.

Never case your glass curtain on rods perched on top of the window trim, and flush with the room; often we see these, plus headings on the curtains and balls on the rods, and the effect is extremely bad. It cannot be repeated too often that glass curtains should be hung just as close to the windowpanes as possible.

The choice of materials that may be used for glass curtains is exceedingly varied. Among the cheapest are: cheesecloth of the finest quality, voile, scrim, muslin, marquisette and silk muslin. Handkerchief linen, casement cloth, sunproof materials, pongees and Jap silk, china silk, silk gauze and Georgette are all more expensive, but in certain rooms they justify their price when they can be afforded; sunproof materials in themselves outwear so many of the cheaper fabrics that their price is really no more in the long run. In choosing them it should be kept in mind that some of them try to look as ornate in sheen and pattern as the most intricate lace, so determine to choose one that is in unquestionable taste. The thin ones are particularly suitable for use next to the glass.

There is a growing tendency to avoid dead white in the material used for glass curtains. In perfectly conventional schemes the pale conventional tones are chosen for the purpose, the creams, oyster grays, café au lait, écru, mainly the palest of periwinkle blue, the veriest tint of rose. But as the more individual and artistic schemes are dared, the color of the glass curtains deepens, and we may see gay lengths of soft orange, the glint of gold sunproof material almost the counterpoint of cloth of gold, rust-colored Jap silk, coarse challis or even characterful cretonne when these accentuate the beauty of the interior and enhance the exterior of the house. Always, in deciding on a certain color for glass curtains, the house exterior should be taken into consideration: a house of red brick could only be improved by glass curtains of pale grays, creams or white; but stone, frame and certain of the off-color brick tones may welcome harmonizing colors, if these are suitable in other respects.

The "How" of Overdrapes

SINCE a very great proportion of all window schemes constitute merely the use of glass curtains and overdrapes, let us give overdrapes our next attention. These are divided into side drapes and valances, and are usually used together at one window, though we frequently see side drapes used separately, and very occasionally valance alone. Side drapes are cut in one of two lengths: either they extend to the floor, which is the formal length, or to the bottom of the window trim, which is usually about four inches below the glass curtains. The shorter length, of course, is more popular, and for the following reasons: it fits well into the homelike interior, it is easier for the amateur to manage artistically, and it is much, much cheaper, since less material is required. However, there are many rooms that are improved by the long side drapes, without at all increasing their formality; noticeably those with too low ceilings or ceilings that are beamed. The length of the side drapes is a matter that will have to be decided afresh in each individual case.

The apparent width of windows may be changed by the position in which the side drapes are hung. If a window is too long and narrow it may be apparently widened by setting the side drapes out on the wall on either side; it may be narrowed by allowing the draperies to extend over the glass, without taking up any more of the side-wall space than is necessary to cover the side window trims. If it is desired to have the side drapes act as draw curtains the width of each one must be sufficient to allow it to be drawn with ease to the middle of the window, where it comfortably meets its fellow without being pulled askew. If the side drapes are stationary they are cut the width that looks well without being too full or too skimpy. Usually, in materials about the weight of cretonne, the width is thirty-six inches.

Side drapes are always hung over the window trim and wall, no matter how deeply recessed the window and glass curtain may be, for the very good reason that the window proper should not be cluttered with overmuch drapery or there might as well be no window there. In the case of those old-fashioned windows with sills deep enough for seats and no trim on the turn of the plaster as it rounds out into the room, a satisfactory arrangement is found in the hanging of side drapes and Dutch valance on the wall surrounding the aperture, while the glass curtains are way in against the pane. The drapes and the valance should not cumber the opening any more than is necessary, just so they leave no visible gap of wall between themselves and the inner glass curtains. Of course there are exceptions to all rules, and occasionally one might hang the Dutch valance and drapes

(Continued on Page 144)

"Yes, this is a Paramount Night."

WHAT do you do about seeing all the great Paramount Pictures?

You know that you don't like to miss the really great photoplays, the real works of art on the screen, those that set a stimulating standard for all the rest!

Do you let it go at wishing?

Seize these pleasurable hours that Paramount prepares for you. Telephone your theatre. Put the question straight: "Is it a Paramount Picture?"

People everywhere are finding this is the thing to do. There never was a time when there were so few good pictures from other sources. Good productions seem to be scarce.

There are more than 16,500 theatres to be kept busy all the time. They cannot all have a Paramount Picture every day, but they can as often as you like to go, or can get the time to go.

You see how important it is to telephone first, or verify by theatre's advertisements or lobby display. The answer tells immediately whether the picture is the work of that unique cluster of talent drawn together by Paramount's unusual facilities.

Act today. Your telephone tells the day and the hour and the location of all the thrilling shows!

Paramount Pictures

If it's a Paramount Picture it's the best show in town

FAMOUS PLAYERS ~ LASKY CORPORATION

ADOLPH ZUKOR Pres. JESSE L. LASKY Vice Pres. CECIL B. DE MILLE Director General
NEW YORK

PARAMOUNT PICTURES

listed in order of release

February 1, 1922, to April 1, 1922

Ask your theatre manager when he will show them

Cecil B. De Mille's Production
"Saturday Night"
By Jeanie Macpherson

Betty Compson in
"The Law and the Woman"
Adapted from the Clyde Fitch play
"The Woman in the Case"
A Penrhyn Stanlaws Production

"One Glorious Day"
With Will Rogers and Lila Lee
By Walter Woods and O. B. Barringer

George Melford's Production
"Moran of the Lady Letty"
With Dorothy Dalton
From the story by Frank Norris

May McAvoy in
"A Homespun Vamp"
By Hector Turnbull
A Realart Production

"Boomerang Bill"
With Lionel Barrymore
By Jack Boyle
A Cosmopolitan Production

Ethel Clayton in "Her Own Money"
Adapted from the play by Mark Swan

John S. Robertson's Production
"Love's Boomerang"
With Ann Forrest
From the novel "Perpetua"
By Dion Clayton Calthrop

Constance Binney in
"Midnight"
By Harvey Thew
A Realart Production

Pola Negri in "The Red Peacock"

Bebe Daniels in
"A Game Chicken"
By Nina Wilcox Putnam
A Realart Production

William S. Hart in
"Travelin' On"
By William S. Hart
A William S. Hart Production

Elsie Ferguson and Wallace Reid in "Forever"
By George Du Maurier
A George Fitzmaurice Production

Gloria Swanson in
"The Husband's Tragedy"
By Clara Beranger

Wanda Hawley in
"Bobbed Hair"
By Hector Turnbull
A Realart Production

Cecil B. De Mille's Production
"Fool's Paradise"
Suggested by Leonard Merrick's story
"The Laurels and the Lady"

Constance Binney in
"The Sleep Walkers"
By Aubrey Stauffer
A Realart Production

Jack Holt in
"While Satan Sleeps"
From the novel
"The Parson of Panamint"
By Peter B. Kyne

Marion Davies in
"The Young Diana"
By Marie Corelli
A Cosmopolitan Production

Thomas Meighan in
"If You Believe It, It's So"
By Perley Poore Sheehan

The French Twins Go Exploring

(A story to be read in connection with the French Twin paper dolls on page 37 of this issue)

By LUCY FITCH PERKINS

Illustrated by the Author

ONE glorious summer morning before the close of the Great War, Pierre and Pierrette Meraut climbed down from their beds in the haymow, to the floor of the stable where they lived, and creeping quietly by the stalls where their father and mother and grandparents were still sleeping ran out into the golden sunshine.

At the door they put on their wooden shoes, Pierre seized a pair of oars which were leaning against the wall and lifted them to his shoulders, Pierrette took the basket of provisions which their mother had filled for them the night before, and the two children set off at a brisk pace down the path which led to the river.

The shadows were still long and pointing toward the west, the dew was sparkling like diamonds on the grass and the birds were singing. "Oh," cried Pierrette, skipping for joy, "just think, Pierre, here we are going off exploring all by ourselves without being afraid! When we were in Rheims it was just like being a mouse with the cat after us every minute."

"Yes," said Pierre; "now there is nothing to be afraid of, unless a German airplane should fly over and drop a bomb; but they usually come at night, anyway, and there hasn't been one even at night for ever so long."

"I didn't think mother would let us go," said Pierrette.

"Well, I must say it took a good deal of coaxing," admitted Pierre; "but I told her we just had to find out what there is beyond Fontanelle, and we're going farther behind the lines, anyway, so we're safer and safer all the time."

"It seems just as safe as heaven itself after Rheims," said Pierrette.

She shuddered as she remembered the months they had spent under bombardment in the doomed city, and their escape in a rowboat with their mother and their wounded father. It was a happy day when at last they had reached the little village of Fontanelle in their flight, and had found shelter with their grandparents and other refugees in the stable and outhouses of a ruined château.

"WE AREN'T going very far," said Pierrette, "and besides, I reminded mother that we are ten years old now, and about the commandant at the camp saying what good soldiers we are, and she said, when she kissed us good night, that she knew she could trust us. I'm sure nothing but nice things will happen to us to-day."

"A thousand thunders!" said Pierre—he had learned to say that at camp and was very proud of it—"I guess we can take care of ourselves. We aren't babies any more."

The lazy little river which flowed through Fontanelle was only about half a mile from the château, and hidden in a clump of bushes on the bank was "The Ark," the boat in which the Meraut family had escaped from Rheims. When they came in sight of it, the children broke into a run and slid down the little embankment to the water's edge. Here they untied the boat, pushed it out of its hiding place, shipped the oars and scrambled aboard. Their long journey from Rheims had given them good training in rowing, and with each of them plying an oar "The Ark" was soon skimming along over the shallow water toward the west, leaving a path of glistening ripples in its wake.

For some time they rowed steadily against the sluggish current without saying a word; then they rounded a bend in the river, the gray walls of the château on the hill disappeared in the distance, and they were in a part of the country which they had never seen before. On each side of the river green fields dotted with clumps of trees and groups of farm buildings rolled away toward distant blue hills. There was nothing to remind them of the war except an occasional shell hole or the blackened ruin of some building wrecked by a bomb from a German airplane. On and on they rowed, and there was no sound except the regular splash of the oars, the ripple of the water against the boat and the rustling of the leaves stirred by the gentle breeze. Then from far away came the sound of a horn.

"There's the call to mess at the camp already," said Pierre. "And I am as hungry as a whole regiment myself. Let's go ashore and eat."

"All right," said Pierrette, who was as hungry as her brother. "We'll land under that clump of trees yonder. It looks like a good camping spot."

A FEW strokes of the oars brought them to a curve in the shore line, where willow boughs hung down almost to the surface of the water.

They shot the boat under the trailing branches and were surprised to find themselves hidden in a cool, green bower. There was a tiny strip of sandy beach at the shore line and leading from it an overgrown path which ran from the water's edge back to a tangle of shrubs and wild grape vines, where it mysteriously disappeared.

"Oh, what a darling little secret place!" cried Pierrette. "You'd never guess it was here at all until you're right in it."

"I wonder where that path goes," said Pierre. "Let's get out and explore."

They climbed out of the boat, tied it to a willow tree and forgetting their basket of provisions in the excitement of discovery, ran up the overgrown path to the place where it lost itself in the undergrowth. Pierre led the way, nosing about in the shrubbery like a dog on the trail of a rabbit.

"That path doesn't go anywhere at all. It just stops," he said at last. "It certainly looks queer and I'm going to find out what there is beyond it, if I have to go on all fours."

He broke branches and tore away vines and soon had a hole large enough to crawl through.

"There's a wall and a tumbledown gate all wound tight with grape vines," he announced when a few moments later he backed out of the tangle again, "and I see a bit of thatched roof beyond the wall. Somebody must live here."

"It's just like the palace of the Sleeping Beauty," whispered Pierrette, "all buried, as if everyone had been asleep for a hundred years."

"Let's wake 'em up then," said Pierre boldly.

"Oh, dear, maybe they keep a dog," quavered Pierrette. They stood silent for a moment clutching each other's hands, but there was no sound of life anywhere about.

"It's dreadfully still," whispered Pierrette, beginning to tremble. "Maybe an airplane—" she shuddered. "Oh, let's go back to the boat!"

"You're a great explorer," said Pierre loftily. "Come along"; and, tearing aside the vines, he forced open the gate and pulled his sister through it after him.

They found themselves standing in the courtyard of a little deserted house.

"It was an airplane!" whispered Pierrette, gazing at the tumbledown chimney and the wreckage of one corner of the house wall. "Oh, I'm afraid!"

"What if we are scared!" said Pierre. "Come along!"

With hearts beating like drums they crossed the court and peered fearfully through the house door, which was open and hanging from one hinge.

IT WAS a sad sight that met their eyes. There was the desolate room where once a happy family had lived. The floor was covered with stones from the broken house wall and the wind had blown straw from the thatch and ashes from the fireplace over everything. In one corner there was a cupboard which still held a few dishes, though many were broken. There were two chairs covered with dust, and a table that was tipped over, with its four legs sticking up in the air.

The children tremblingly crossed the threshold and made their way over the wreckage to the door of a room beyond. There was a bed with the clothes thrown about as if some one had only just leaped out of it. Beside it was a cradle with the print of a tiny head still on the pillow.

The children gazed about them for a few moments and then tiptoed quietly out of the house.

"Anyway, nobody was killed here," said Pierre, heaving a great sigh of relief as they came out-of-doors into the sunshine once more. "The bomb must have fallen just outside and they were scared and ran away as fast as they could go and didn't come back."

"There must have been a mother," said Pierrette, "because there was a baby."

"And the father was away fighting," added Pierre.

"It's a darling little house," said Pierrette. "See the rose bush over the door. There was a geranium in the window; but it's dead now. The house looks dead too. Oh, don't you wish we could bring it to life?"

"Well," said Pierre, laughing, "you might try a kiss. It worked with the Sleeping Beauty."

Pierrette frowned at him. "You can't kiss a house," she said severely. And then suddenly she laughed, too, and clapped her hands.

"I have an idea!" she cried. "We can't kiss it, but we can love it and tidy it up and make it look alive again, and then when the mother and baby come back, if they ever do, how glad they will be! They will think the fairies did it."

There must have been magic in the very thought, for suddenly the silence no longer terrified them. They ran all about the place, exclaiming over the beehives they found in the garden and the apples not yet ripe on the trees in the little orchard.

"I just wish we could live in it ourselves," said Pierrette. "It's so much nicer than a stable."

The children had been so thrilled by their discovery that they had both forgotten about breakfast, but now Pierre's faithful stomach warned him that they had not had anything to eat. He ran to the boat and brought back the basket, and the two sat down on the doorstep to eat their rolls and drink their milk.

"There's a pail of soup in the basket for our lunch," said Pierrette, "and mother said we might build a fire to heat it if we'd be sure to put it out afterwards. She's put in some matches and I tell you what we'll do! We'll clean everything up and build a fire on the hearth and set the table and play keep house all by ourselves!"

They hurried through their simple breakfast, and then began in earnest their task of "bringing the house to life."

They carried out the fallen stones and piled them roughly into the broken wall. They swept up the ashes and put the straw bloom from the thatch into the fireplace and started a blaze upon the cold hearth. Pierre brought broken branches to feed it and water from the well to fill the kettle, and soon Pierrette was able to heat water to wash the dishes and to scrub the table and chairs and make everything tidy.

By noon, in spite of the hole in the wall, the kitchen looked almost as if nothing had ever happened to it. A bright fire was crackling on the hearth, the soup was bubbling in the pot sending out an appetizing odor, and two bowls of it were steaming on the table.

Pierre and Pierrette, like two Goldilocks in the house of the bears, were just about to sit down to eat their lunch when suddenly there was a sound of footsteps in the courtyard.

"A thousand thunders!" said Pierre under his breath. "What's that?"

Pierrette said nothing at all. She simply stood still as if she had taken root in the floor.

The steps came nearer and nearer.

And then there in the open door stood a woman with a baby in her arms! Her face was pale and thin, and she seemed almost too weak to stand.

FOR an instant she and the children gazed at one another without speaking. Then she gasped: "What are you doing in my house?"

"We're Pierre and Pierrette Meraut," said Pierrette modestly, finding her tongue before her brother; "and we have just cleaned up your house for you a little, so it wouldn't look so lonesome when you came back to it. We thought maybe you'd think it was fairies that had done it, and that would be a good joke, because it wasn't, you see. It was only us!"

The woman's dark eyes grew larger than ever with astonishment, then filled with tears. She began to laugh and cry at the same time, and Pierrette, seeing how weak she was, led her to the table, dumped the baby into Pierre's lap, and setting her own bowl of soup before the woman, begged her to eat.

"You blessed infants," sobbed the woman, "how did you ever think of it, and how did you know anything about me, anyway?"

"We didn't," said Pierre, quite innocently. "We just found the house, and knew you must be somebody, and that you had a baby, and that, of course, your husband must be away fighting."

"But it is not to believe!" cried the woman. "Surely the good God put the thought into your hearts!"

Then she told them how her husband had been called to the colors just after they had come to live in the little house; and how a few nights after he had gone, leaving her alone with her baby, the bomb had fallen and she had snatched her child from the cradle and rushed away with it into the night: of long months spent in the hospital while the nurse took care of her child.

"Just as soon as I was able to walk, I made up my mind to come back no matter how lonely I should be, so that Jacques would be sure to find us when the war is over," she finished, smiling bravely.

"You won't be lonesome any more," said Pierrette, patting her hand comfortingly, "because you see there's mother and father and grandpère and grandmère and, of course, there's us! We'll all come to see you, and I'd just love to take care of the baby sometimes."

THE woman laughed and hugged her; and she would have hugged Pierre, too, only she couldn't reach him, and besides the baby was pulling his nose just at that moment. Pierrette took the baby from him, to his great relief, and when he and the woman ate their soup she put the baby to sleep and tucked it away in its own little cradle once more.

It was a weary and happy pair of twins that came drifting home with the current in the late afternoon, and as "The Ark" rounded the bend of the river and the gray walls of the château came into view, Pierrette said: "After this, I shall say an extra prayer every day."

Take a KODAK with you

Eastman Kodak Company,

Rochester, N. Y.

The Kodak City

Do not omit the nightly cleansing with Pond's Cold Cream

Every normal skin needs two creams

*One cream to protect it against wind and cold
Another to cleanse it thoroughly*

For the following complexion flaws you need a protective cream made without oil

Windburn, roughness. Extremes of heat and cold, sharp winds, dust and dirt and smoke, all leave their mark upon unprotected skin. To guard against the devastating effects of wind and cold, protect your skin with Pond's Vanishing Cream before you go out. It acts as an invisible shield, preventing dust and dirt from clogging the pores and guarding against windburn and chapping. This softening cream cannot possibly make the face shiny, for it disappears the moment you rub it on and there is not a particle of oil in it to reappear.

Shiny skin. If you use Pond's Vanishing Cream as a powder base, rubbing it lightly on your face and neck just before powdering, you will not be embarrassed by a shiny nose or forehead. This dry, greaseless cream is absorbed at once by the skin, leaving a soft, velvety surface which holds the powder many times longer.

Tired, lifeless skin. When your skin needs instant freshening—when it feels tense and drawn and tight, smooth a little Pond's Vanishing Cream lightly into it. Notice how quickly the tired muscles of the face relax, how the color brightens and the very texture of the skin seems to take on more vigor. Pond's Vanishing Cream is based on an ingredient famous for its softening, soothing qualities.

Before going out into the cold air smooth a little Pond's Vanishing Cream into the skin

For the following flaws a cleansing oil cream is needed

Blackheads. Blackheads require a deeper, more thorough cleansing than ordinary washing can give.

Before retiring, wash the face with warm water and pure soap. Then rub Pond's Cold Cream well into the skin. This rich oil cream works its way so deep into the pores that it gets at all the dirt and purges the skin of every particle of grime. Do not omit this nightly cleansing if you would have a clear, lovely skin.

Wrinkles. Only a cream with an oil base can successfully fight the fine lines that are the beginning of wrinkles. Oil lubricates the skin and restores its elasticity, keeping the little lines from fastening themselves on the skin and becoming real wrinkles, which are almost impossible to eradicate.

At night rub a generous amount of Pond's Cold Cream into the skin. This rich cream acts as a tonic, rousing and stimulating the skin and supplying the oil that is needed to ward off wrinkles. Particular attention should be given to the fine lines about the eyes and mouth and at the base of the nose. Rub with the lines, not across them. Too vigorous rubbing is often harmful, but gentle, persistent rubbing is always helpful, no matter how sensitive the skin.

POND'S
Vanishing Cream

GENEROUS TUBES—MAIL COUPON TODAY

The Pond's Extract Co.,
108 Hudson St., New York

Ten cents (10c) is enclosed for your special introductory tubes of the two creams every normal skin needs—enough of each cream for two weeks' ordinary toilet uses.

Name _____

Street _____

City _____

State _____

POND'S
Cold Cream

Start today the use of these two creams

Begin today the use of the two creams every normal skin needs. Both creams are so delicate in texture that they will not clog the pores. Neither cream will encourage the growth of hair.

They come in both jars and tubes in convenient sizes. Any drug or department store can supply you. The Pond's Extract Co., New York.

The French Twins

By
LUCY FITCH PERKINS

(The story of the Twins is on page 34.)

Fold-A-Way Dolls Designed by Jessie Louise Taylor

DIRECTIONS FOR MAKING FOLD-A-WAY DOLLS

Mount doll on old magazine cover or letterhead. When thoroughly dry cut out all around dark outline and cut into lines or bases to make the locks; also cut slots in body into which the dress tabs fit. Fold over directly on the dotted lines at the top of the head and the dotted lines at the feet, but in opposite directions, as shown on the little figures. Bring bases together and slide locks from one side into the slots on the opposite side. Doll will then stand alone. The clothes need not be mounted, but will last longer if mounted on a light paper before cutting out. Cut into the slots and fold directly on the dotted lines. The hats should be tipped with paste on the inside, just below the slit only.

JESSIE LOUISE TAYLOR

"Twice in the months that followed I tried to run away, to return to the convent; but the servants whom I had counted my friends deceived me, and I was brought back to a beating, brought back strapped to his stirrup iron as I might have been a Nubian slave. Long since he had ceased loving me; that lasted such a little while. He called me Madonna, as though it were a term of shame, and cursed me for coldness and my nunnery ways. He was only happy when he read in my face the fear I held him in. And I was always afraid."

"Afraid!" echoed the man. "Until to-night I was never afraid."

"And then my baby came, and I was not afraid any more, but contented all through. I carried him always in my arms by day and night. So pink and little and with a smile that warmed like sunshine." She paused and added plaintively: "It's hard to remember when one was alive. My hands, my arms have forgotten the feel of him."

"I wish," said the man, "I'd had a second opinion. It might have frightened her though. Oh, heaven, how much longer! Don't mind me, little lady. You're helping no end. You were speaking of baby. Yes!"

"HE KILLED my baby," said the little Madonna, "because he had killed my fear of him. Then being done with me, he threw me out in the streets alone. I thought to end it that night, because my arms were empty and nothing could be good again. But I could not believe the baby was indeed gone; I thought if I searched I would find him in the course of time. Therefore I searched the city from end to end and spoke with mothers and peeped into nurseries and knocked at many doors. And one day a door was opened by a man with great eyes and bronze hair swept back from his brow—a good man. He wore a loose smock over his doublet, smeared with many colors, and in his left hand he held a palette and brushes. When he saw me he fell back a pace and his mouth opened. 'Mother of mercy!' he breathed. 'A real Madonna at last!' His name was Andrea del Sarto, and he was a painter."

"I am a painter too," said the young man, forgetting his absorption at the mention of a great name.

"He brought me into his room, which was bright with windows and a fire. He bade me tell my story, and while I spoke never once did his eyes desert me. When I had ended he rose and walked up and down. Then he took from a chest a cloak of blue and gold and draped it round me. 'Stand upon that throne, Madonna,' said he, 'and I will put an infant in your arms that shall live down all the ages.' And he painted me. So with the child at my breast, I myself had passed into the picture and found contentment there."

"When it was finished the great ones of many cities came to look upon it, and the story of how I came to be painted went from mouth to mouth. Among those who were there was he who had taken me from the nunnery, and, seeing me in perfect happiness, a fury was born in him."

"I was hidden behind a hanging and watched the blackanger rising up and knotting his brow into ugly lines. He bough the canvas, and his servants carried it away. But since the child was in my arms for all time it mattered little to me."

"Then one night two men came to my lodging and without question took me across the city and led me into the palace where I had lived with him. And he came forward to meet me in the great hall. There was a mocking smile on his lips and he pointed to a wall upon which a curtain was hanging."

"I took away that child," he said, "because you valued it higher than the love of man. Look now." At a gesture a servant threw back the hanging and revealed the picture. The babe was gone and my arms crooked to cradle him were empty with the palms upturned.

"I died then—to the sound of his laughter I died, and, looking down from the canvas, I watched them carry me away. And long into the night the man who twice had robbed me of my child sat at the long table staring out before him, drinking great draughts and sometimes beating the boards with his bare fists. As dawn broke he clapped his hands and a servant entered. 'He pointed at me with a shaking hand. 'Take it away,' he cried. 'To a cellar, and let masons brick up the door.' He was weeping as they carried me down to the dark beneath the house."

"WHAT a strange being you are!" said the young man. "You speak as though these were real memories. What happened to the picture then?"

"I lay in the dark for so long—hundreds of years, I think—and there was nowhere I might look. Afterward I was found and packed in a box and presently put upon the wall in the sad room, where everything is so old that I shall not find him there. This is the furthest I have dared to look. Help me find him, please! Won't you help me find him?"

"Why, little lady," he answered soothingly, "how shall I help? That's a woman's burden that heaven isn't merciful enough to let a man share." He stopped abruptly and threw up his head. "Did you hear that—there?"

Through the still, early morning air came a faint, reedy cry. The young man was upon his feet, fiercely fitting a key into the lock.

The little Madonna had risen, too, and her eyes were luminous, like glowworms in the dark.

"He's calling me," she cried. "He's calling."

"Mine," said the young man.

She turned to follow, but the door closed between them.

To the firm of Messrs. Ridgewell, Ridgewell, Hitchcock and Plum was given the task of disposing of the furniture and effects of the late Sabina Prestwich, spinster, of 22a Cambridge Avenue, Hyde Park, W.

Empty Arms

(Continued from Page 11)

As Mr. Ridgewell, Junior, remarked to Mr. Plum while engaged in compiling the sale list and supplying appropriate encomiums to describe an upright grand by Rubenthal, Berlin: "Victorian muck! Lucky if we clean up two-fifty on the lot."

Mr. Plum was disposed to agree. "Though I must say," he added, "it wouldn't surprise me if that picture was worth a bit. Half a mind to let old Kineagle have a squint at it."

"Please yourself," responded Mr. Ridgewell, Junior, "but to my mind it's ten guineas for nix."

It was the chance discovery of an old document amongst a litter of receipts and papers that persuaded them to engage an expert opinion. The document stated that the picture had been discovered bricked up in a Florentine cellar some fifty years before and had been successfully smuggled out of Italy. But the man who found it died, and it passed with a few other unvalued possessions to Sabina Prestwich, now deceased.

The result of Eden Kineagle's visit to the house in Cambridge Avenue was the immediate transference of the canvas to Sotheby's Sale Rooms, a concerted rush on the part of every European and American connoisseur, a threatening letter from the Italian Foreign Office, some extravagant bidding and the ultimate purchase of the picture for the nation, after a heated debate on the part of twenty-two Royal Academicians and five painters of the new school, who would have accepted death rather than the letters, R. A., after their names. Extensive correspondence appeared in the leading papers; persons wrote expressing the opinion that the picture had never been painted by Del Sarto, that it was the finest example of his work, that the price paid was a further example of government waste, and that the money would have been better employed repairing the main road between Croydon town hall and Sydenham High Street, the condition of which constituted a menace to motorcyclists.

FOR nearly ten days scarcely a single publication appeared that failed to reproduce a comment or criticism upon the subject; but, strangely enough, no single leader writer or casual contributor remarked upon the oddness of the composition or the absence of the Infant from the Madonna's arms. In the course of time—that is to say, on the eleventh day—the matter passed from the public mind, a circumstance explainable perhaps by the decent interment of the canvas in the National Gallery, where it affected no one save those mysterious folk who look at pictures for their pleasure and the umbrellaless refugee who is driven to take shelter from the fierceness of storms.

The little Madonna was placed upon a south wall, whence she could look out upon a brave company. And sometimes people would pause to gaze at her and then shake their heads. And once a girl said, "How sad she looks! I wonder why."

Sanctified

By LILLIAN GARD

WHEN Baby came

A guardian angel bent his shielding wings
About the house, and shut out sordid things.

The race for wealth, position, place and fame
Seemed such a paltry thing—when Baby came.

We longed to set some standard, sweetly wise,
Of life before those innocent blue eyes.

We aimed at leading toddling feet through fair
And holy lands—the angel helped us there.

And somehow every little meaner place
Within our souls took on a higher grace;
Our spirit music thrilled with grander sound;
Our feet climbed Godwards in the daily round
When Baby came.

And once a little old lady with industrious hands set up an easel before her and squeezed little twists of color upon a palette, then thought a long time and pursed her lips, and puzzled her brow and finally murmured, "I could never copy it. It's so—so changing." And she, too, went away.

The little Madonna did not dare to step from her frame at night, for other mothers were at hand cradling their babes and the sound of her footfalls might have awakened them. But it was hard to stay still and alone in that happy nursery. She could see through an archway to the right a picture Rubens had painted, and it was all aglow with babies like roses clustered at a porch—fat, dimpled babies that rolled and laughed in aerial garlands. It would have been nice to pick one and carry it back with her. Yet perhaps they were not really mothers' children, but sprites and jays that had not learned the way to nestle. Had it been otherwise surely the very call of her spirit must have brought her leaping to her arms.

And then one day came a man and girl, who stopped before her. The girl was half child, half woman, and the man gray and bearded, but with brave blue eyes. It was seventeen years since the night she had stolen across the way and talked with this man in his hour of terror, but time did not cloud the little Madonna's memory with the dust of forgetfulness.

"That's the new Del Sarto," said the girl, who was reading from a small blue book. "See, daddy?"

Then the man turned and looked at her, fell back a step, came forward again, passed a hand across his mouth and gasped. "What is it?" asked the girl.

He did not answer at once, then: "The night you were born—" he said. "I'm certain. . . . It's—it's the Sarto too! And the poor empty arms. Just how she looked, and I closed the door on her."

"DADDY, what are you saying?" There was a frightened tone in the girl's voice.

"It's all right, dear, don't mind me. I must find the keeper of the gallery. Poor little lady! Run back home, tell your mother I may be late."

"But, daddy—"

"There are more things in heaven and earth," he began, but did not finish. It seemed as though the Madonna's eyes were pleading to him, and it seemed as if he could not hear her say "Help me find him, please!"

He told his story to the Committee of the National Gallery, and, to do them credit, it was received with the utmost courtesy.

They did not require him to leave them while their decision was made. This was arrived at by a mere exchange of glances, a nod answered by a tilt of the head, a wave of the hand, a kindly smile; and the thing was done.

As the chairman remarked: "We must not forget that the gentleman was living at the time opposite to the house in which the picture was hanging, and it is possible that a light had been left burning in the room that contained it."

"Those of us who are fathers—and I regret for my own part that I cannot claim the distinction—will bear me out that the condition of a man's mind during the painful period of waiting for news as to his wife's progress is apt to depart from the normal and make room for imaginings that in sane moments he must dismiss as absurd. There has been a great deal of discussion and not a little criticism on the part of the public as to the committee's wisdom in purchasing this picture, and I am confident you will all agree with me that we could be responsible for no greater folly than to work upon the canvas with various removers on the bare hypothesis unsupported by surface suggestion, that the Madonna's arms actually contain a child painted in the first intention. For my own part, I am well assured that at no period of its being has the picture been tampered with, and it is a matter of small surprise to me, sir, that an artist of your undoubted quality and achievement should hold a contrary opinion. We are greatly obliged for the courtesy of your visit and trust that you will feel after this liberal discussion that your conscience is free from further responsibility in the matter. Good day."

That was the end of the interview. Once again the door was slammed in the little Madonna's face.

THAT night the man told his wife all about it. "See you see," he concluded, "there is nothing more we can do."

But she lay awake and puzzled and yearned long after he had fallen asleep. And once she rose and peeped into the room that used to be the nursery. I was a changed room now, for the child had grown up and where once pigs and chickens and huntsmen had jostled in happy, farmyard disorder upon the walls now there were likenesses of Owen Nares and Bert Ainsley, obligingly autographed.

But for her the spirit prevailed, the kindly bars still ribbed the windows and the sense of sleeping children still haunted the air.

And she it was who told the man what he must do and although it scared him a great deal he agreed, for in the end all good husbands obey their wives.

It felt very eerie to be alone in the National Gallery in the dead of night with a tiny electric lamp in one buttonhole and a sponge of alcohol and turpentine in one's hand. While he worked the little Madonna's eyes rested upon him and it could hardly have been mere fancy that made him believe they were full of gratitude and trust. At the end of an hour the outline of a child, faint and misty, appeared in her arms, its head, circled by a tiny white halo, snuggling against the curve of her little breast.

Then the man stepped back and gave a shout of joy and, remembering the words the painter had used, cried out, "I will put an infant in your arms that shall live down all the ages."

He had thought perhaps there would come an answer of gladness from the Madonna herself and looked into her face to find it. And truly enough it was there. Her eyes, who for centuries had looked questingly forth from the canvas now drooped and rested upon the baby. Her mouth, sadly down turned at the corners, had sweetened to a smile perfect and serene content.

But the men will not believe he washed away the sinness of her looks with alcohol and turpentine. "I didn't touch the head. I am certain I did not," he repeated.

"Then how can you explain—"

"Oh, heaven!" he answered. "Put a child in a woman's arms."

MAE MURRAY

CORINNE GRIFFITH

RUBY DE REMER

MARION DAVIES

ALICE LAKE

How Famous Stars Keep Their Hair Beautiful

STUDY the pictures of these beautiful women and you will see just how much their hair has to do with their appearance.

Beautiful hair is not a matter of luck, it is simply a matter of care.

You, too, can have beautiful hair if you care for it properly. Beautiful hair depends almost entirely upon the care you give it.

Shampooing is always the most important thing.

It is the shampooing which brings out the real life and lustre, natural wave and color, and makes your hair soft, fresh and luxuriant.

When your hair is dry, dull and heavy, lifeless, stiff and gummy, and the strands cling together and it feels harsh and disagreeable to the touch, it is because your hair has not been shampooed properly.

When your hair has been shampooed properly, and is thoroughly clean, it will be glossy, smooth and bright, delightfully fresh looking, soft and silky.

While your hair must have frequent and regular washing to keep it beautiful, it cannot stand the harsh effect of ordinary soaps. The free alkali in ordinary soaps soon dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle and ruins it.

That is why leading motion picture stars and discriminating women everywhere now use Mulsified Coconut Oil Shampoo. This clear, pure and entirely greaseless product cannot possibly injure, and it does not dry the scalp or make the hair brittle, no matter how often you use it.

If you want to see how really beautiful you can make your hair look, just follow this simple method:

A Simple, Easy Method

FIRST, wet the hair and scalp in clear, warm water. Then apply a little Mulsified Coconut Oil Shampoo, rubbing it in thoroughly all over the scalp, and throughout the entire length, down to the ends of the hair.

Two or three teaspoonfuls will make an abundance of rich, creamy lather. This should be rubbed in thoroughly and briskly with the finger tips, so as to loosen the dandruff and small particles of dust and dirt that stick to the scalp.

After rubbing in the rich, creamy Mulsified lather, rinse the hair and scalp thoroughly—always using clear, fresh, warm water. Then use another application of Mulsified, again working up a lather and rubbing it in briskly as before.

Two waters are usually sufficient for washing the hair; but sometimes the third is necessary.

What any woman can do to make her hair improve her looks

BETTY COMPSON

These stars were among the first to discover that shampooing with Mulsified makes and keeps the hair beautiful—hence the vogue of Mulsified in the Movies.

You can easily tell, for when the hair is perfectly clean, it will be soft and silky in the water, the strands will fall apart easily, each separate hair floating alone in the water, and the entire mass, even while wet, will feel loose, fluffy and light to the touch and be so clean it will fairly squeak when you pull it through your fingers.

Rinse the Hair Thoroughly

THIS is very important. After the final washing, the hair and scalp should be rinsed in at least two changes of good warm water and followed with a rinsing in cold water.

When you have rinsed the hair thoroughly, wring it as dry as you can; finish by rubbing it with a towel, shaking it and fluffing it until it is dry. Then give it a good brushing.

After a Mulsified Shampoo you will find the hair will dry quickly and evenly and have the appearance of being much thicker and heavier than it is.

If you want to always be remembered for your beautiful, well-kept hair, make it a rule to set a certain day each week for a Mulsified Coconut Oil Shampoo. This regular weekly shampooing will keep the scalp soft and the hair fine and silky, bright, fresh looking and fluffy, wavy and easy to manage—and it will be noticed and admired by everyone.

You can get Mulsified at any drug store or toilet goods counter, anywhere in the world. A 4-ounce bottle should last for months.

Keeping a Child's Hair Beautiful

CHILDREN should be taught, early in life, that proper care of the hair is essential.

The hair and scalp should be kept perfectly clean to insure a healthy, vigorous scalp and a fine, thick, heavy head of hair.

Get your children into the habit of shampooing their hair regularly once a week. A boy's hair being short, shampooing takes but a few minutes. For either a boy or a girl, simply moisten the hair with warm water, pour on a little Mulsified and rub vigorously with the tips of the fingers. This will stimulate the scalp, make an abundance of rich, creamy lather and cleanse the hair thoroughly. It takes only a few seconds to rinse it all out when through.

You will be surprised how this regular weekly shampooing with Mulsified will improve the appearance of the hair; and you will be teaching your child a habit that will be appreciated in after-life, for a luxuriant head of hair is something every man and woman feels mighty proud of.

3 When thoroughly clean, wet hair fairly squeaks when you pull it through your fingers.

4 When the hair is dry, always give it a good, thorough brushing.

Makes Your Hair Beautiful

WATKINS
MULSIFIED
COCOANUT OIL SHAMPOO

Rose-colored lights are always popular and effective, as is proved by their use in this dining room, featuring the knife-boxes with the Heppelwhite sideboard. There are plenty of blue notes in the color scheme of the room, though the rose lights augment the scheme charmingly, with the result that the room is very much more attractive than if it were entirely rose-hued to match the lights.

In these electric wall brackets the finish is of first importance: one considers the advantages of antique gold, colonial brass, polished old silver, polychrome, enamels of various colors, old bronze, weathered old brass and colonial pewter. The newest offerings are old silver and enamels, it seems, and there is a distinct trend toward the use of mirrors and small drop crystals.

Dining-Room Lights

By Ethel Davis Seal: Drawings by Marion Dismant

SOME years ago, when hanging domes were doing their merriest worst to the appearance of nine out of every ten dining rooms, I spent an hour or so in as charming a domeless dining room as I have ever seen, a room that was indeed much ahead of the times. Wainscoted for nearly six feet in paneled wood painted a flat putty color, one was unprepared for the pure joy of the colorful black-grounded chintz that was hung as paper is hung on the rather narrow strip of upper wall that ran between the wainscot and the grayish-cream ceiling. Gleaning on this dark expanse were lighting fixtures of pewter-colored metal that must surely have been forerunners of many of the sconces and fixtures that are within the reach of many of us to-day; and, used in this room, spaced at proper intervals on the dark-flowered background, the effect of them was arresting, each holding its ivory candle case that delicately led to the small satin-finished bulb of electricity at the tip. Providing just that necessary finish of detail to the scheme of lighting there were tall silver candlesticks set on the oblong walnut table, with its richly carved edge, its wide runner of Italian lace and linen, very beautiful against the background of black and creamy tones, dusky walnut, and the deeply vivid rose of the curtains. Truly charming and quite dependent on its lights for the measure of beauty achieved: in proof of which I ask you to image the effect here of a multicolored glass dome swung neatly above the linen and lace of the dining table, with ruination in every multicolored ray!

We have only to cast our eyes backward to remember the horrors of toned red, green or yellow opaque glass four-sided or circular domes finished in bead fringe that dominated more past dining rooms—if I may be allowed the apt coinage—than present-day owners of silver-colored fixtures care to admit. Perhaps at some time or other in our past we have all had a dome. But since the advent of indirect lighting and the popularity of alabaster and near-alabaster the domes are frankly inverted and inoffensively white, so that even the least expensive of modern apartments and houses are spared much of the fantastic horror of the lighting fixtures of yore. However, the frailties that every fad is heir to manifest themselves in this case in assemblages of drooping and frilly bulbs, pendants upon clanking chains, hanging from the central light. And the upper middle area of many otherwise promising rooms contains a thousand-legged of a light that absolutely ruins any chance the room might otherwise have of being beautiful. We wish to observe restraint in all things, so why is it that upon the immediate accomplishment of cheapness things always begin to show ridiculous elaboration? In consequence, the alabaster bowls that were such an improvement on the glaring domes are in grave danger of being cast from our homes into the outer darkness. At any rate, the opaque translucence of alabaster is no longer the magic watchword at the door of who's who in dining-room lights. We now invariably take our lights silk-coated or vellum-dressed, when we do not demand the friendly presence of tall unshaded candles on our tables and on our walls. In this new era of proper lighting fixtures a soft but adequate glow, rose-colored or golden, permeates to the farthest corner; one is seen, and sees others, under the most flattering conditions; and one partakes of dainty dinners with a sense of well-being and delight entirely lacking in the garish crudity of a room that is wrongly lighted.

(Continued on Page 198)

The type of light, the color and type of shades, if these are used, the sort of candlesticks—the choice of these is laid down by the general rules of good taste, though there will be found infinite variety within the pale.

ARMOUR'S ROLLED WHITE OATS
COOK PERFECTLY
IN 10 TO 15 MINUTES
MANUFACTURED AND GUARANTEED BY THE ARMOUR GRAIN COMPANY
CHICAGO

“No Question About It—Breakfast Will Be Ready On Time”

She serves her family Armour's Oats, steaming hot, delicious and satisfying! Breakfast is always easy to get when you know

ARMOUR'S OATS
Cook Perfectly in 10 to 15 Minutes

Put them on to cook when you start the coffee. They'll both be done at the same time. And you'll find that the wonderful oat flavor has not been impaired by long cooking. Once the exclusive advantages of Armour's Oats become known, they're naturally given a prominent place on the pantry shelf. Ask your grocer for them.

Manufactured by
ARMOUR GRAIN COMPANY, Chicago
Manufacturers of Armour's Guaranteed Cereals—Oats, Corn Flakes, Pancake Flour, Macaroni, Spaghetti, Noodles

Boys and Girls—Send a 2-cent stamp with your name and address for a cut-out train. You can have lots of fun with the Armour Cereal Line. Address Armour Grain Company, Chicago

AMAZING NEW EXPERIMENTS WITH YEAST

just completed by one of America's great Scientists

Ideal health maintained on diet with Fleischmann's Yeast

White rats chosen because they eat and thrive on the same kind of food as man

ACTUAL feeding experiments of far reaching significance have recently been completed on yeast. The findings are of vital importance to yeast therapy and to the millions of men and women—1 out of every 5 you meet—who are eating Fleischmann's Yeast.

One hundred and fifty white rats were fed meals of the same food value that any man or woman might eat. No element was missing except the water-soluble vitamin B. The rats, which were young and sleek to start with, at once began to lose weight and strength.

Immediately recovered on fresh yeast

When the loss in weight had progressed to a definite point, Fleischmann's Yeast was added to the white rats' diet at the rate of .2 gram a day. The white rats ate the yeast greedily. Immediately they began to pick up and soon reached normal weight. They maintained normal growth from then on as long as they ate Fleischmann's Yeast.

Identical feeding experiments were made with a number of yeast preparations in tablet and capsule form, as well as with other yeast products now on the market.

In every case, instead of recovering, the rats lost weight steadily until the dose was increased from .2 gram to .7 gram and upward to as many as two whole grams. In two cases satisfactory growth was never attained. The animals remained infantile in appearance and in size.

Findings on white rats hold good for people—our health and strength depend on what we eat

In scientific research white rats are chosen for feeding experiments because they eat and thrive on the same kind of food as man. Just as a white rat cannot maintain normal vigor and health without the vitamin B, neither can a human being.

Many of the meals that we eat every day lack this necessary vitamin. The result is a gradual lowering of health until the body loses its resistance to disease. Digestive troubles, the constant need for laxatives, and lack of energy are the first symptoms.

Later in life this lowered vitality shows in premature age and even death. Each year thousands of young men and women in America die unnecessarily of diseases that come normally only with old age.

Fresh yeast is in itself a food and supplies in our diet the vitamin which we must have in order to preserve normal vigor and health. Fleischmann's Yeast as a food is doing for people what medicine cannot do naturally or permanently—keeping them vigorously healthy, protecting them from unnecessary disease and premature old age.

Men and women subjects fed especially selected meals—yet no need for laxatives

A nourishing but very concentrated diet was given to men and women subjects who underwent a feeding experiment to observe the value of yeast in replacing laxatives. They ate eggs, milk and cheese, all foods the opposite of laxative in effect. The only corrective food they had was Fleischmann's Yeast fresh daily.

In the period of one month during which this diet was maintained, none of the subjects showed any need for laxatives. When they ate this diet without Fleischmann's Yeast all the subjects immediately felt the need of laxatives.

Add Fleischmann's Yeast to your regular diet. Eat 2 or 3 cakes daily before or between meals. Your grocer will deliver it to you fresh daily.

Send for free booklet, "The New Importance of Yeast in Diet." Address THE FLEISCHMANN COMPANY, Dept. 103, 701 Washington St., New York.

FLEISCHMANN'S

YEAST is a food—not a medicine

Diagram showing how Fleischmann's Yeast maintained ideal growth in white rats

Dotted lines A and B—Represent ideal growth.
1, 2, 3 and 4—The low points which white rats reached on diet without the necessary vitamin B, and where feeding of Fleischmann's Yeast began—.2 gram.

Lines 1-C, 2-D, 3-E and 4-F—Show the growth of white rats after being fed .2 gram Fleischmann's Yeast. Note that they follow closely the dotted lines A and B which represent the ideal growth of white rats.

Diagram showing how tablet preparations failed to bring health

Dotted line A—Represents ideal growth.
1 and 2—Low points reached on diet without the necessary vitamin B, and where feeding of tablet preparations began—.2 gram.

Lines 1-3 and 2-4—Show subnormal condition of white rats though being fed 2 1/2 and 3 1/2 times the normal dose. Note how they fail to follow the dotted line A which represents the ideal growth of white rats.

Unnecessary Diseases of Childhood

(Continued from Page 30)

of germs in the body. Everyone is reasonably familiar with the vaccine used for the prevention of smallpox. We know that the great plagues which swept over Europe a hundred years ago are now things of the past, and that cases of smallpox are now so few and far between that when one occurs it attracts a great deal of attention. We also know that for a number of years we have had an antitoxin for the prevention and cure of diphtheria. Thousands of children's lives have been saved through the use of this diphtheria antitoxin. The difficulty with this, however, has been that it is unlike the vaccination against smallpox in that its value in preventing diphtheria lasts for so short a time. If a child is given antitoxin to prevent an attack of diphtheria, it makes the child safe in that regard for a period of about three weeks. However, as a curative measure, antitoxin is of enormous value and should always be used as soon as we are sure that a case is actually one of diphtheria.

In 1913 Dr. Bela Schick of Vienna made a most remarkable discovery. He found that by injecting into the skin, usually just above the elbow, a very minute quantity of what is called the "toxin" or poison of diphtheria, a small reddish spot would appear within twenty-four hours if the person who had been injected was liable to take diphtheria at any time. If no reddish spot appeared it meant that the person was "immune" to diphtheria and would never take the disease.

None Safe Unless All are Safe

THIS discovery of Doctor Schick's led to further work by a large number of scientists and finally to the discovery of what is known as diphtheria toxin-antitoxin, which is given to children in just the way that the ordinary diphtheria antitoxin is given, but it has much more far-reaching effects. Nowadays the use of the Schick test to see whether a child is susceptible or likely to get diphtheria, followed by the injection of toxin-antitoxin, if the child is found not to be immune, has opened the way for the protection of all children in the country. There is no danger, and practically no discomfort, either in making the Schick test or in injecting toxin-antitoxin. In fact, any reaction that the child may have is usually hardly noticeable. The results, however, are of the greatest importance, as we know now that with the use of this toxin-antitoxin we can protect everyone from diphtheria just as easily as we can protect everyone from smallpox by the use of the ordinary vaccination.

In the other diseases such as scarlet fever, whooping cough, chicken pox and measles, we have no such sure method of vaccination or serum treatment which gives absolute protection against the disease. Some advances have been made in securing a vaccine for the prevention or treatment of whooping cough, but experience has not yet shown that the use of this vaccine will absolutely prevent the disease or cure it if it has occurred. These treatments by means of vaccines and serums have been mentioned because they are of immense importance, but it must not be thought that the spread of contagious diseases cannot be controlled in other ways. As a matter of fact, we know that with our present knowledge we can prevent the spread of infection almost entirely and make any community safe for children if we follow the plans and methods that are outlined in this article.

The control of contagious diseases in children is essentially a community problem. No child in any community is safe from infection unless every other child is safe. This is one of the reasons why parents' associations and the teachers in our schools should make every effort to apply the few simple rules that are necessary to keep the schools and the town free from these devastating epidemics. The procedure is not a difficult one. Moreover, the rules that I am going to give have been tried and found to be effective, so that they can be used with the certainty of being well worth while, provided the whole community is in earnest about the matter, and the rules are universally followed, not simply obeyed in certain parts of the town and disregarded in others.

The part of the school in this program is an important one. Classrooms should be well ventilated with open windows. They should not be overheated, the temperature never being allowed to rise above sixty-eight degrees Fahrenheit. Desks should be far enough apart so that there is at least a two-foot space between the seats of the children. The use of the common towel and the common drinking cup should be absolutely prohibited. The children should be observed to see that each one brings his own pocket handkerchief and that it is never used by another child. Pencils should be kept by each child in his own desk and never used by anyone else. In fact, any article that can be put into the mouth should be the individual possession of the child in question, and never passed around. Children should be taught to hold the handkerchief in front of the mouth whenever coughing or sneezing. This should be an absolute rule. At the beginning of each morning session the teacher should observe each child in the classroom. If any one shows evidence of any of the following symptoms, the teacher should send him home at once—it is always better to exclude a child from school attendance on suspicion; if the child is not ill the loss of one day's schooling cannot be measured in harm against the possible loss that would result if the child had been ill and had had an opportunity to infect others.

The symptoms that should be generally looked for are those of extreme flushing of the face or unusual paleness, evidence of any rash or swelling, a condition of extreme apathy or fatigue where the child seems unable to make any effort, discharge from the eyes or nose, cough or evidence of sore throat. These are all reasons for sending a child home at once. A good general rule for the teacher to observe is that no child who is ill should ever be allowed to remain in school, no matter what the cause of the illness may be. When the child is sent home a note should be sent to the parent, calling attention to the fact that the child does not seem well and asking that he be taken to the family physician at once.

A Germ's Requirements

AT HOME the mother must learn that the child should live in the most healthful surroundings possible. He should be as much as possible in the fresh air, both day and night, outdoors and indoors. He should not be kept in overheated rooms, nor should he be overclothed. Indoors, the kind of clothing that is advisable is the same type that is worn in the summer. For outdoors, a heavier coat, mittens and cap can be used. A cool sponge bath every morning is one of the surest preventives of colds we have, and it is also one of the finest tonics. At least eight hours' sleep every night for every child is necessary. Nervous excitement should be avoided, meals should be simple and should consist always of nourishing and easily digested food. Good wholesome play is necessary.

As all infections enter the body through the nose or mouth, particular care must be taken to see that these are kept in good condition. Germs require four things for their development: warmth, moisture, darkness and food. There is no better place for germs to develop than in the mouth that has one or more decayed teeth. Every element that is necessary is present, therefore one of the most certain ways to avoid contracting contagious disease is to see that the mouth receives regular attention, that the teeth are cared for and that they are brushed at least twice a day, night and morning.

One of the commonest ways in which contagious diseases are acquired is, first, through the mouth and, next, through the tonsils. This is particularly true of tonsils that are very large or in a diseased condition. If the child shows any evidence of obstruction in his throat, if he is subject to frequent sore throat or colds, the throat should be examined as soon as these symptoms develop. In any event, the child should have a complete physical examination, including examination of nose and throat, before he goes to school for the first time, and every effort should be made to see that physical defects are corrected and that the child is put in sound bodily condition.

Health Rules for Boys and Girls

A MOTHER should never allow her child to go to school if any symptom of illness is shown.

Finally, there are rules that the child must observe for himself. The first thing to do is to get the child interested in carrying out a regular health routine. It must be remembered that children have no concern whatever with health for the mere sake of health. The only thing that is important to them is the thing that is happening at the moment. To-morrow is not their concern, therefore health habits must make an immediate appeal. A boy will not usually brush his teeth or go to the dentist because he wishes his teeth to look white or because he is afraid he may have a toothache some time next month, yet he will brush his teeth and go to the dentist when necessary if neglect of these simple habits will mean that he cannot chew his food properly and so becomes ill-nourished, and as a result is not strong enough to play on the baseball or football team. I have seen many boys go of their own accord to have adenoids or enlarged tonsils removed simply because their inability to breathe properly kept them out of games which involve running or other strenuous physical exercise.

The main thing to be remembered is to determine the thing the child wants most to do and try to adjust it as closely as one can with the health idea. All children are ambitious. All children love power, and the health idea should be put forth to them not by a threat of being sick but rather with the promise that they will be stronger and better able to do everything other children do if they follow the simple rules that are given. It is quite permissible to think of other rewards such as special treats and permission to have some coveted thing or to go to some desired place. There are innumerable things that every child wants to do. Sometimes it seems easier to say "no" than "yes," but if the "yes" can be made dependent upon the child's taking an interest in his own well-being, then it is a perfectly permissible reward to use.

The rules that ought to be hung up in the room of every boy and girl and that ought to be followed regularly, day by day, are as follows:

1. Brush the teeth night and morning.
2. Wash the hands before each meal and after going to the toilet. See that the finger nails are kept clean.
3. Use a clean handkerchief every day. Never lend it to anyone or borrow anyone else's.
4. Use your own pencil.
5. Never put into your mouth anything that has been handled by anyone else.
6. Stand erect.
7. Breathe deeply.
8. Eat slowly.
9. Sleep at least eight hours every night.
10. See that you have a bowel movement every day.

and Del Monte Apricots see what you can do with a single can

One of the best ways to prove the real economy of Del Monte Fruits in adding tasty, healthful variety to every-day meals, is to try the following group of recipes—all made from a single No. 2½ can of Del Monte Apricots—each in adequate portions for six people.

Apricot Cereal Chops (For Breakfast)

Make a stiff mush from 1½ cups of boiling salted water and ½ cup of oatmeal. Pour into a wet loaf pan and cool. Cut in thick slices and shape to resemble chops, roll in crumbs and brown in a frying pan. Insert short lengths of uncooked macaroni in one end, arrange on a hot platter, surround with ½ cup (½ can) DEL MONTE Apricots and serve all with the hot sirup from the apricots.

Apricot Salad (For Luncheon)

Slice ½ cup (½ can) DEL MONTE Apricots and 1 DEL MONTE Red Pimiento, arrange on lettuce and serve with either mayonnaise or French dressing.

Apricot Charlotte Russe (For Dinner)

Cut a sponge cake into squares and split each square. On each layer place slices of DEL MONTE Apricots, about ½ cup (the remaining ½ can). Dot the top of each piece with whipped cream and serve.

This same economical use is possible with all Del Monte Fruits. Prove it by trying the hundreds of simple, tasty menu suggestions contained in our book "Del Monte Recipes of Flavor." For a free copy

Address Department A
CALIFORNIA PACKING CORPORATION
San Francisco, California

The can that makes summer last all year long

Fleurs d'Amour

(FLOWERS OF LOVE)

You cannot picture Flowers of Love. You cannot say in words what it means. Only in a single fragrance is the loveliness of the thought fully interpreted—a fragrance of infinite delicacy, alluring, abiding—the fragrance,

Fleurs d'Amour

(FLOWERS OF LOVE)

The Most Luxurious
Perfume In The World

Fleurs d'Amour was not an accident. It is the supreme result of three generations of continuous, artistic effort on the part of an old firm of Parisian parfumeurs, famous the world over—the house of Roger & Gallet.

In all the most necessary toilet articles:—Extrait, Eau de Toilette, Poudre, Talc, Sachet, Savon, Bath Crystals, Brillantine

For the chapping winds of March use Roger & Gallet Lip Sticks. Absolutely pure they protect and beautify the lips. In various containers and colors.

ROGER & GALLET

PARIS

25 WEST 32ND STREET
NEW YORK

CREATORS OF RARE
PERFUMES

Our Guide to the most exquisite "Parisian Toilet Specialties" on request.

Best Dealers
Everywhere

Mrs. Hayes surveyed her younger daughter quizzically. She was a woman of vast sympathy for the difficult age of adolescence and some skill in handling it. "I don't know but you're right," she agreed. "And when Virginia's married you'll be Miss Hayes too. I suppose we ought to begin to call you Margaret. Babe is—rather intimate."

"It's silly," insisted Babe defiantly, yet softened a little by her mother's acquiescence.

The last big party was to be at the Hayes home on the night before the wedding, an entertainment for all the maids and ushers and just a few more of Virginia's friends—a dinner, a dance, a late supper, all planned for lavish gaiety.

BABE dressed for it alone a little wearily. Everyone was over across the hall, revolving excitedly about Virginia, and the younger sister seemed to be forgotten. So Babe put on the frock among her new frocks that she liked the best, a silver-and-white, vague little affair that accorded with her mood, and hooked it up herself, feeling forlorn and lonely. It had taken her a good while to do her hair, because she found it hard to make her erstwhile docile braids "stay put" in the modes and manners of a grown-up coiffure; but even so, she was early. She slipped down the stairs like a scrap of moonshine and at the foot of them ran plump into Doctor Ted.

He put out eager hands. "Babe—by all that's lucky. I was just wondering if I could get a quiet word with you before the show begins. Come into the parlor."

They went together into the flower-garlanded parlor, now cleared for dancing, the lights still low. She did not look at him; but her eyes widened with romantic expectations. Perhaps—perhaps he was going to tell her that now, even at the last minute, he had found out the mistake of his heart, and that she, Babe, was his real love. And she would say: "It is too late"—and leave him!

But he was speaking. "Say, Babe, you know I promised you a bully nice usher? Well, I meant you to have my cousin, Tenney Abell, for he's just about the best friend I have. And didn't I get a wire late this afternoon that he's gone and smashed an ankle in an automobile accident and will be laid up for a month or two? So he's sending his young brother, Ross, to take his place, and I just wanted to tell you how awfully disappointed I am and to ask you to be as nice as you can to Ross. I haven't seen him since he was a youngster, but Tenney says he's a good scout and will do his best. He's almost through college, I think; I'm not quite sure; it's so hard to keep track of a lot of young cousins. But—but you'll be nice to him and see that he has a good time, won't you? And you understand that I really meant you to have Tenney?"

"It doesn't make any difference to me," said Babe coldly. "I'll be nice to him of course."

"OH, LOOK here, Babe!" protested Doctor Ted. "I wish you'd get over your grouch on me and—like me again. It's been the one blight on our engagement, the way you've felt about it. You know, honey, I've always been awfully fond of you, and even if you do feel that I'm not any great shakes and not nearly good enough for Virginia, honestly, I'm not bad enough to get such a hate on. Aren't you ever going to forgive me and be my little pal again? Come on, kiss and make friends."

She raised her eyes and gave him a level look. His little pal! Of all the fatuous words! But she would be noble, she would be generous at all cost. "I forgive you," she said. "I'm sorry I've been such a pig. I couldn't help it," she said and slipped away even as Virginia appeared.

"I've made it up with Babe," said Doctor Ted with satisfaction. "And I've told her about Tenney and asked her to be nice to Ross, and she says she will. Darling, you look like a dream and an angel and a magazine-cover girl, all mixed up together."

"I wonder," said Virginia, rewarding the compliment by putting her cheek against his shoulder,

Babe Groves Up

(Continued from Page 13)

"if we oughtn't to turn Ross over to one of the older girls? Sometimes the kids resent being herded together."

"Too late now," said Doctor Ted. "But if we see they're unhappy we'll form a rescue party and save them. Of course Babe may not fancy Ross either."

It was just before they went out to dinner that Doctor Ted brought Ross Abell to her. Babe was surprised at his appearance. Doctor Ted had somehow implied that Ross was young. To Babe he seemed perfectly mature, a tall, dark, rather gloomy stripling, impeccably correct in every detail of his dress.

"I hope it won't be dull for you to-night, with so many strangers," she offered hospitably as they sat down at the table. Then added, from an unaccountable impulse: "It's rather dull for me. My sister goes with the older set, you know. All of these are her friends, not mine. And I'm not very keen on this sort of thing anyway. So trivial." Her little wave of the hand dismissed the laughing, chattering throng as unworthy.

THE gloomy brow of Ross unbent a little and a tiny flame of interest lit his eyes. "I know," he sympathized. "Just dancin' round and makin' a lot of noise. Seems as if whenever anybody gets married they're bound to do it. I'm not keen on it either."

"What do you like?"

"Oh, well—a fellow can't exactly talk about it, but you see, nowadays, when there's so much work to do in the world, and everything's in such a frightful mess, seems as though we oughtn't to waste any time, that we all ought to be digging in every minute. Reconstruction, Americanization, you know—politics too."

"Oh-h." Babe breathed a sigh of rapture. "I think that's wonderful. Oh, how I'd like to do something. Something awfully big."

They found a great deal to say to each other along these lines. By the time dinner was over the frown had left Ross' brow and much of his grand air had departed. Music could now be heard from the parlor. "Look here, must you go dance?" he asked. "I wish we could sit around and talk more."

Babe hesitated. She loved to dance. "Oh, but, you see, being Virginia's sister, I suppose I must for a while, anyway."

"That's so. Come on, then, give me the first one."

He was a marvelous dancer, in spite of his preference for talk. And it is a fact to be noted that Babe's heavy heart had not affected the lightness of her feet. They danced together twice, then Babe gave two more dances to other claimants, and at the end of the last one Ross cut in determinedly.

"Let's go sit out a bit now," he said in a tone that admitted of no argument.

They took a vantage point outside, where they could look in on the colorful, changing crowd.

"Old Ted seems frightfully keen on your sister," commented Ross as the Doctor and Virginia swung by.

"He's crazy about her," said Babe and was moved to cynical comment. "But what does it all amount to? They'll settle down to the dull atmosphere of domesticity. I can tell you, I'm never going to marry."

Ross surveyed her with approval. "I like your spirit. You know, I've determined that I'll never marry either. A man can't get on and do his work with a family hanging round his neck. 'Member what Kipling says, 'He travels the fastest who travels alone.' I believe in that. I made up my mind long ago that was going to be my motto."

This was a delightful idea. "Oh, do you love Kipling too?"

"Crazy about him. Greatest poet we ever had, living or dead, I say, bar none. No Wordsworth and Milton truck for me. Give me a man that's got something to say and says it."

"I FEEL just exactly the same way about him. But I do love some of Mrs. Browning's sonnets. And then there's that Rossetti poem, 'Sister Helen,' about the girl who loved a man and he scorned her, and she put a wax image of him before the fire and melted it, and as it dripped away he died. I think that was great."

"I don't care for love poetry," said Ross loftily. "It's all a part of the game to get a man tangled up with some nice girl, and the next thing he knows he's paying rent for an apartment and buying near-Colonial furniture on the installment plan. No, a man who wants to do anything must stay single."

"It's just as true for women. A woman who wants a great career mustn't ever think of marrying. That was why I made up my mind I wouldn't."

"What line are you going to take?" asked Ross respectfully. Great Scott! This girl's got sense, was his inner comment.

"I think not an art," said Babe musingly, "not an art, for there's no use going in for music or painting or anything like that unless you've got special gifts, and I haven't. But perhaps the stage or—or some service to humanity, where devotion and ability would count"—the words came from a circular letter addressed to her mother on behalf of a local charity, but of course there was no use mentioning that to her listener.

THEY talked more of Kipling, and he told her some stories about the fellows he knew, and how unusual it was to meet a girl with such understanding and sound ideas, and how he'd been boning law all summer because he was going to enter the law school this fall, and a lot more of the life-is-real-life-is-earnest stuff, although of course he assured her that he realized that certain recreations were necessary, and had she seen Ina Claire in The Gold Diggers?

And she replied with stories of boarding school, with a description of all the responsibilities that had rested on her shoulders concerning this wedding, with more of her hopes and fears for her career; and yes, she had seen Ina Claire, and didn't care much for her, but had he seen Lionel Atwill in Deburau?

This exchange of views was sandwiched in with more dancing not only with each other, but duty dances with the rest of the party. But they always returned for more talk, more and more and more.

Doctor Ted called Virginia's attention to it. "Ross and Babe are going fine," he said. "Hasn't he grown into a nice-looking, tall boy?"

"He's a dear," said Virginia. "But he seemed so in awe of me when he danced with me. I could hardly get a word out of him. Maybe he's shy."

She did not know the youth's comment to Babe. "Your sister's a mighty sweet girl, but just like a thousand others. She's the marrying type too. I'll bet she never thought of anything else. She and old Ted will get along fine—clinging-vine stuff and all that. Stupid prospect for them!"

And without a pang at her treachery to herself and her hopeless affection for Doctor Ted, Babe answered blithely: "Dull as dish-water." They did not have much chance to see each other the next day, but Babe found it

(Continued on Page 47)

Canned Foods Week
March 1st to 8th, 1922
Don't forget the date

Curing the appetite's spring-fever

Give the family menu that variety of good things which the system craves more than ever, these first days of spring

HOW the first bright spring days make one tire of eating the heavy winter foods that one has had all the cold, dark months!

The family appetite seems to have a bad case of spring-fever—almost to go back on its job entirely. But serve something new—something lighter and more savory—and watch the appetites pick up!

Now you can easily add variety to your March menu—and without spending too much for out of season novelties. The Libby farm kitchens at Blue Island, Illinois, are built to help you do just this thing. In these spotless, sunny kitchens, skillful Libby cooks put up all sorts of wholesome, appetizing delicacies so they are ready for you to serve in your table.

The delightful spiciness of apple butter

Take Libby's Apple Butter, for instance. How much zest and enjoyment it adds to biscuits and bread! For Libby's Apple Butter is different—spicily sweet, with the tang of cider, the fragrance of apple—you must taste it to realize how exceptionally good it really is.

This spicy apple butter is good—it makes piping hot biscuits even better! As a spread for bread, instead of butter or jam, it is a real economy—besides being one of the most wholesome and unusually delicious sweets

From the Libby farm kitchens comes a wealth of other foods, equally delicious. In Libby's Catchup and Chili Sauce, for instance—you have big red tomatoes, ripened on the vine, cooked blended with American seed and cinnamon, pepper, ginger and vinegar. Its delicious mild tang adds interest to the flavor of familiar foods.

And Baked Beans—Toasted!

And even baked beans the Libby cooks have prepared for you by an entirely new process—so they are as appetizing as they are nourishing—oven-baked in a slow, dry heat!

Then they are toasted for that flavor of flavors that only toasting gives. To complete the dish are tender cubes of sweet, succulent pork—and a wonderfully rich new tomato sauce.

Indeed, from the variety of foods prepared at the Blue Island kitchens you can arrange, with very little work, a meal so savory and stimulating it will make the most winter-weary appetite awake and smile.

Libby, McNeill & Libby, 103 Welfare Bldg., Chicago

Libby, McNeill & Libby of Canada, Ltd.,
 Chatham, Ontario, Canada

Beans baked the new Libby way—oven-baked to mellow sweetness—then toasted! And to give them still greater goodness and flavor a rich sauce made from vine-ripened tomatoes is baked right into them for exactly the right length of time with pure granulated cane sugar, choice blended spices and fine vinegar.

And then there is Libby's Mustard—ground from the best mustard seed of Old England—

LIBBY'S OLIVES—At the Blue Island kitchens, Libby so packs for you the wonderful large olives which they import from Spain in big heads. These olives are so large, so rich, that three of them give you as much nourishment as four square slices of cheese a quarter of an inch thick

"A Skin You Love to Touch," by Clarence Underwood

A complete miniature set of the Woodbury skin preparations

For 25 cents we will send you a complete miniature set of the Woodbury skin preparations, containing:

- A trial size cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap
- A sample tube of the new Woodbury's Facial Cream
- A sample tube of Woodbury's Cold Cream
- A sample box of Woodbury's Facial Powder
- Together with the treatment booklet, "A Skin You Love to Touch."

Send for this set today. Address The Andrew Jergens Co., 103 Spring Grove Ave., Cincinnati, Ohio. If you live in Canada, address The Andrew Jergens Co., Limited, 103 Sherbrooke St., Perth, Ontario. English Agents: H. C. Quelch & Co., 4 Ludgate Square, London, E. C. 4.

You too, can have "A skin you love to touch"

PERHAPS you have always longed for a beautiful skin—but felt that your skin was something you could not change.

You are mistaken; your skin is what you make it.

Every day it is changing in spite of you; old skin dies and new takes its place. This new skin you can make what you will!

If some special condition of your skin is giving you trouble—find the treatment that will overcome this trouble in the booklet of famous treatments that is wrapped around every cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap. Begin using this treatment tonight. You will be surprised to see how quickly you can free your skin from faults that have always troubled you.

To keep your skin clear and smooth use Woodbury's Facial Soap regularly in your daily toilet. The same qualities that give Woodbury's its beneficial effect in overcoming common skin troubles make it ideal for general use.

Get a cake of Woodbury's today, at any drug store or toilet goods counter. A 25-cent cake lasts a month or six weeks for general toilet use, including any of the special Woodbury treatments. The Andrew Jergens Co., Cincinnati, New York, and Perth, Ontario.

Babe Grows Up

(Continued from Page 44)

exceedingly pleasant when, in the golden glory of her bridesmaid's apparel, she took her appointed place in the procession, to find him beside her and to hear his quick whisper: "You look a peach."

Also, listening to the ceremony that gave Doctor Ted forever to Virginia was less an ordeal than she had anticipated. She even found time to exchange quietly amused glances with Ross as Doctor Ted stuttered through his vows, glances that clearly indicated how absurd they found this archaic business of marrying and being given in marriage. And when the minister demanded that any possible objector should speak Babe had not the slightest inclination to shriek a desperate protest. And how white Virginia was, and how long and shiny Doctor Ted's shoe soles looked as he knelt in prayer! And why did her mother cry, when she'd been so pleased all along? Ross looked even handsomer and more impressive in his dress clothes. She hoped Mary and Clare could see that he was the usher who had walked with her. He was certainly preferable in every way to the others, especially that fat little Grueby Moore. Why Ted had ever asked him—

She recalled herself with a start. The minister was kissing Virginia and shaking hands with Doctor Ted. The wedding march was resounding triumphantly. She turned and paced sedately by Ross's side down the long aisle.

"Well, it's over," he said. "They're tied to each other for life. Isn't it fearful?"

"Frightful," she replied. He said no more, but he was very masterful in finding her place in one of the waiting cars. "See you later," he called as they drove away.

THE reception was in full swing when he appeared again. With the other maids she was in the line and could only smile at him. Crowds of people were coming, too, and it was the duty of the ushers to find chairs for old ladies, to run briskly about with plates of salad and ice cream, cups of coffee, glasses of punch.

At the very height of it Virginia slipped away, and so did Doctor Ted.

Ross managed to win to Babe's side with two well-laden plates. "Here," he said. "I've been waiting for you."

"Let's go out into the hall," she acquiesced, "so's we'll be there when Virginia comes down in her traveling dress. I suppose I ought to be up there helping her, really."

"Well, you're not going. You must be tired to death glad-handing the maddening throng. What did I save all these eats for, if you desert me now? Come on."

The hall was just as crowded as the other rooms, but they found a corner and fell upon their food with healthy young appetites.

"Some salad, I'll say," remarked young Mr. Abell appreciatively. "Wish I had got another roll."

"Have a piece of mine," offered Babe, "it's such a big one."

They were at the last crumb when Virginia appeared, slender and tall, at the head of the stairs, dressed in her dark traveling cloak, out her great bouquet of white roses and lilies of the valley a moon of shining loveliness against the shadows.

"Look out, girls—I'm going to throw it. The next to be married will get it," she called, and the bridesmaids pressed laughingly around the foot of the stairs.

ONLY Babe hung back; it didn't matter; she wasn't ever going to marry, so why worry about the bouquet. Perhaps it was because she did hang back that Virginia's brow, a little wild and uncertain, went over the heads of the others and came straight to Babe.

She could not help putting out her hands—that else could she do?—and the mass of fragrant flowers crushed into them; the trailing white ribbons flew around her.

"Oh, Babe!" everyone cried, and crowded about, laughing and teasing.

She righted her catch and straightened the tangled ribbons. As Virginia and the Doctor came down attention turned to them, away from her, and she laid the bouquet back on the little telephone table, out of sight. "Mother'll want to keep it," she explained to Ross.

Then she, too, ran forward to kiss Virginia good-by and join the mass of hilarious confetti throwers surrounding the car. They whirled away, Doctor Ted and Virginia, and Babe waved as gayly as any until they were out of sight. She came in to stand by her mother and say good-by to the guests.

Among the last was Ross. He stooped confidentially. Somehow he seemed embarrassed. "You know," he said, "I've been thinking over what we said last night, and—and I don't know but we—might be wrong. I don't see but that two really serious-minded people, people who were in earnest, I mean, could go on and have great careers, even—even though they did get married."

Both of 'em, I mean, of course—to—to each other. I—I've heard of such things. Look here—will you—will you write to me and let me know what you think about it? I've got to hop to catch my train, but—look—here's a card with my address and everything and—let me know right away what you think about it, will you? As I said, I really can't see why marriage should be so dull—with the right people and—interested in the really vital things. You will let me know, won't you? Of course, the man wouldn't hamper the woman in having her career, not a bit—"

HE WAS swept inexorably on, and with a last clutching handshake he was gone. A few old friends prepared to sit down and have a quiet chat with Mr. and Mrs. Hayes. Maids brought hot coffee, remnants of the feast. Clearly Babe was not needed here.

"Mother," she asked, "shall I stay down?"

"No dear," said Mrs. Hayes. "Run on to bed." She kissed her younger daughter tenderly. "You've been the greatest possible help and comfort, though I hardly know my Babe with her hair up and that frock on. Run on, dear, I know you're tired."

Babe kissed her father, smiled good night to the others and went upstairs.

It was over—it was over! Doctor Ted was forever Virginia's. Funny she couldn't manage to keep her mind on it at all. She kept thinking and thinking—of what Ross had said. It was a big thing when a man like Ross changed his views, a very big thing.

Perhaps—perhaps he was right. Perhaps two serious-minded people might marry and yet have great careers. She could see that there was something to be said for such a situation—oh, decidedly.

She took the card with his address out of her sash and in putting it carefully on her pincushion she knocked over Doctor Ted's picture and did not bother to pick it up. Phrases of a letter began to form in her mind as she undressed.

PRESENTLY she slipped drowsily into bed. Yes, she believed Ross was right, and that they had been foolish to condemn marriage altogether. To-morrow she would begin that letter.

But suddenly across her determination came a swift lance of memory. Why, she had a broken heart! She had expected to spend to-night weeping and reading poetry.

A broken heart! Tears! Poetry! Oh, shucks!

Babe gave a delicious little giggle, yawned, snuggled down against the pillow and slipped away into twenty fathoms of slumber with her lips and her lashes still smiling at the joke on herself.

She did not know it, but now she was really grown up. And only the people who break their hearts and laugh at it are.

GIFTS THAT LAST

All Ready, Mother!

Father's pardonable pride in the appropriate anniversary gift is joyously reflected in Mother's beaming smile.

For the anniversary of wedding or birth, or the spontaneous expression of affection, so dear to the heart of every wife or mother—what gift can compare with silver from the House of Holmes & Edwards?

The chaste simplicity and enduring beauty of the Jamestown Pattern, illustrated, will endear it to all true lovers of artistic design and fine craftsmanship.

Silver-Inlaid, solid silver where it wears
Super-Plate, protected against wear
At the Better Dealers in Silverware

THE HOLMES & EDWARDS SILVER CO.
INTERNATIONAL SILVER CO., Successor
Bridgeport, Connecticut

Manufactured in Canada by
STANDARD SILVER CO.
of TORONTO, Ltd.

The JAMESTOWN Jelly Server

For Serving Jellies, Jams and Marmalades

The House of HOLMES & EDWARDS

© H. & E. 1922

INTERNATIONAL SILVER CO.

The picture at the top shows little Miss Juanita at the age of six months—inclined to view life seriously, perhaps, but vigorous and sturdy from her Eagle Brand diet. Anyway, smiles will triumph with continued good health, as the picture at the right, taken ten months later, shows!

Juanita is the daughter of Mrs. Bennie Lunsford, Macon, Missouri.

All through childhood

Constant good health for her child is the mother's goal

CHILDHOOD is the time when the foundations for life-long health are laid. Mrs. Bennie Lunsford of Macon, Missouri, is one of those mothers who can look with pride on her baby's sturdy physique and splendid health, sure that little Juanita is beginning life without a handicap.

Juanita has been fed on Eagle Brand nearly all of her life. She thrived on it from the beginning, and continues to thrive, as the two pictures on this page testify. "She is certainly doing fine and always has," says Mrs. Lunsford. And Juanita's doctor says she is the finest baby in town or country that he ever saw.

Though the intelligent advice of her doctor and her mother's constant care have been partly responsible for Juanita's fine development, Mrs. Lunsford says Eagle Brand deserves the credit. Certainly children fed on Eagle Brand usually continue to thrive, as thousands of other mothers besides Mrs. Lunsford have testified. Doctors recommend it for babies who are thin, undernourished, underweight—for it is very easily digested.

If for any reason you cannot nurse your baby don't experiment with his feeding. Eagle Brand has proved the successful food with countless babies for three generations. It is not really a "special food" at all, but pure milk—milk and sugar—the natural food if mother's milk is not available.

Wherever you go you can depend on Eagle Brand. It is always pure, uniform, and on sale everywhere.

Do you want a beautiful little record book, "The Best Baby," in which to keep your baby's record? We will gladly send it to you, free, with instructions and feeding chart for Eagle Brand.

THE BORDEN COMPANY
Borden Building New York

Borden's
EAGLE
BRAND
Condensed Milk

Foursquare

(Continued from Page 5)

the story, and finally laid the magazine down with suspicious quietness, to sit staring into the fire without a comment.

Her brother, now smoking a well-colored brierwood pipe, while he put in order a mass of papers at his desk, looked up at the slight creak of the old rocker in which Harriet sat. "Well?" he demanded.

Harriet hesitated. Then she temporized: "I thought the description of Californian scenery—the atmosphere and coloring and all—was realistic."

"It was."

"The story is certainly charming and unusual," defended Harriet, with the obstinacy her brother particularly enjoyed in her. "I can never get over admiring Mary's use of words. She flings them about so recklessly; she uses up so many striking phrases; and yet she never seems to run out or say the same thing in the same way. It's all so fresh and facile. It's —"

"Keep on," encouraged her brother grimly. "Say it all; it's all true. But that's precisely the trouble."

"What's precisely the trouble?"

"THAT she has so many tools in her workshop, that they're all sharpened to so fine an edge—all so fitted to her hand, and that she keeps on making with them nothing but pretty toys."

"Oh, Mark! Think of her war work."

"That was mighty good, certainly," he admitted. "It could hardly be otherwise. She was writing fact, not fiction, and she was keyed up to do her best work. There was nothing distinctly creative about it; she was only a reporter of a very high order. In a way, the experience did injury to her creative faculty. This very story—the first, I judge, she's written since she came back—shows a poverty of conception, a reversion to the old type of gay and clever and perfectly meaningless tale-telling for an idle hour which—well, it gives me such a sense of disappointment that I can't get over it."

"I see you can't. Miss Graham's probably right; Mary's tired. And she wanted the money, so she wrote this story and got it—the easiest way. Her prices must be enormous by now. What she earned by that alone will bring her here and pay expenses till she can rest and go at the work she really plans to do—and is capable of doing." Though it was not yet time to do it by twenty-four hours, Harriet now wound the clock with firmness and decision.

Mark, relaxing from his critical attitude, laughed and came across to pat her shoulder as she said good night. "You're a great little champion of the downtrodden author with a yearly income which makes yours and mine put together look like the widow's mite. And I hope you're right. Anyhow, it will be interesting to see what success—in the ordinary acceptance of the term—has done for the girl we used to know so well."

LEFT alone by the smoldering fire Mark absently picked up the magazine and absently turned the pages till he came to "And, Behold" again. Then, by no means absently, he reread the closing paragraphs, and with a sudden gesture of distaste flung the unoffending copy of "The Centrepiece" into the fire.

Then, as he watched the flames slowly surround the bulky pages, he all at once remembered something which he was destroying along with Mary's despised work. He snatched the magazine from the fire, with some difficulty extinguished the smoldering singe along the edges, and finding the page which bore the reproduction of Mary's photograph, carefully tore it out. The remains of the magazine went back into the fire, but the picture received a second thorough scrutiny. Finally, the sheet which bore it went into Mark's lowest desk drawer.

One might resolve to do one's whole duty, as a man and a brother, by a young woman who looked like that, but one needn't necessarily destroy so striking an image of her. The picture, as Harriet had said, was really very lovely, and didn't in the least, like the story, deserve burning.

II

"FRANKLY," said John Kirkwood, irritation in his voice, "I don't like it."

"I'm very sorry to lose her," agreed Miss Alexandra Warren heartily. "But I don't see that there's anything we can do about it. When Mary makes up her mind it's not I who can unmake it. Neither—with all honor to your powers of persuasion, Mr. Kirkwood—can you, I'm thinking."

"In my opinion," continued Mr. Kirkwood, editor of a deservedly popular magazine and very much accustomed to having his own way, "she will be making the mistake of her life at a critical moment when she can least afford to make it. It's absurd, preposterous, that she should go off and bury herself in the country for a year with the idea of producing anything worth while."

"Of course it isn't quite the country," objected Miss Warren. "And it's a college town —"

"What college?"

"Newcomb, I believe."

"Who ever heard of it?" demanded Kirkwood.

"I asked Mary that," admitted Mary's friend. "She gave me a long list of distinguished names, all graduates."

"They became distinguished in spite of their college, not because of it, then," declared the editor. His lean jaw stiffened, the frown between his eyes deepened. "This is the place for her to do her work, unless of course she intends to write a history of Newfane—what is it?—Newcomb College."

"I don't think she has the least idea what it is she wants to write."

"She won't get her great idea walking along a country road or at a village tea party or anywhere except here, in the midst of life, where the big things happen, where the stimulating contacts are possible, where —"

THE telephone bell in the pleasant little apartment rang almost in the speaker's ear. "Perhaps that's Mary," Miss Warren came over to the desk, from which Kirkwood removed his elbow to give her room. She sat down, a graceful figure, and listened with a smiling face to a rapid explanation which seemed to leave no room for expostulation. "I see. . . . Yes, he's here. . . . I'll tell him. . . . Do you want to speak with him? . . . Wait a minute. . . . No—wait a minute, dear, please."

Miss Warren covered the transmitter with one hand while she said softly: "She's been detained downtown, can't get home for dinner, wants me to tell you she would be sorry, if she had time to be anything except horribly rushed. She hasn't time to talk with you —"

Kirkwood seized the instrument from Miss Warren's hands, with a sort of growl by way of apology. "Mary," he began, "if you have to stay downtown—though why in the world . . . I beg your pardon, I know it's no affair of mine. . . . But if you are downtown, won't you let me come and take you to dinner? Please!"

Miss Warren sat back, much amused, as she watched the editor pass rapidly through the various stages of confidence, uneasiness, loss of hope and final despair which were readily indicated by his spasmodic utterances into the telephone. When he at last hung up the receiver with an exasperated jerk she had no need to have him tell her that Mary Fletcher was probably the most unreasonable and impossible young woman in the whole city this night.

"You can hardly blame her," she reminded him, "for wanting to get away, if

(Continued on Page 50)

STARTING OFF CLEAN

The White
Spirit of Purity lives in
FAIRY SOAP

ALERT, progressive Americans find joy in a clean start. Appearances go for much in business and social life. To be clean is the first imperative demand of every busy day.

But more than mere "cleanliness" has become the rule of an increasing number of people to whom the soap-and-water habit is a natural part of life. People of discernment are learning the value of white cleanliness; they are choosing their soap for whiteness, the sign of purity—assurance of all that is best in soap and most essential to bath and toilet comfort.

For this reason, Fairy Soap, the whitest soap in the world, is making new converts to the white cleanliness habit everywhere, every day.

It is to be found in homes of refinement, in the foremost men's clubs and Turkish baths, and wherever else the utmost in soap quality is appreciated.

Fairy Soap smooths and soothes the skin. It lathers readily and abundantly in any water. It rinses off instantly and thoroughly. It leaves no annoying odor in its wake. It invigorates as well as cleanses. And, of course, it floats.

For the finer laundering, and for every particular cleansing use about the house, Fairy soap is just as efficient and dependable as for toilet and bath. You cannot get a soap whiter than whitest, or purer than pure—Fairy.

THE N.K. FAIRBANK COMPANY

FAIRY SOAP

PURE

FLOATING

WHITE

For 30 Cents

Think what you get in extra-flavory oats

The large Quaker Oats package—family size—costs 30 cents, save in distant localities.

It makes 60 large dishes.

It supplies 6221 calories of nutriment.

The flakes are not ordinary oat flakes.

They are made from queen grains only—just the rich, plump, flavory oats.

The small, insipid grains are discarded, so we get but ten pounds of Quaker Oats from a bushel.

That is why Quaker Oats dominate.

They have won oat lovers all the world over by that delicious flavor.

You want your children to love oats.

That is their food of foods—rich in 16 needed elements—almost the ideal food.

Then serve them the Quaker Oats quality.

Quaker Oats

With that world-famed flavor

Try these delicious Macaroons

1 cup sugar, 1 tablespoon butter, 2 eggs, 2½ cups Quaker Oats, 2 teaspoons baking powder, 1 teaspoon vanilla.

Cream butter and sugar. Add yolks of eggs. Add Quaker Oats, to which baking powder has been added, and add vanilla. Beat whites of eggs stiff and add last. Drop on buttered tins with teaspoon, but very few on each tin, as they spread. Bake in slow oven. Makes about 65 cookies.

Packed in sealed round packages with removable cover 3680

Foursquare

(Continued from Page 48)

she's going at all, as quickly as she can. I never saw her so tired. She did work desperately hard over there, and now, to get away, she must do all this shopping —"

"Shopping—to go to the country?" Alexandra Warren laughed. "Why not? Though she snatched up a few pretty things in Paris, she's really dependent on her tailor and her dressmaker here to put her in shape to go anywhere. That's where she is to-night, getting a last fitting on a brown tweed suit that is positively the prettiest —"

"You don't expect me to believe," Kirkwood interrupted, "she's getting a fitting from any New York tailor at this hour."

"Even so. Mary can wheedle anybody into doing anything. She says the tailor came from the country originally, and is in great sympathy with her going back there." She laughed at Kirkwood's face.

HE GOT up, his tall figure unfolding itself not quite erectly, for his shoulders showed the effect of prolonged desk work. He glowered down at Alexandra Warren as she looked up at him, a capable woman in the middle thirties, a librarian in one of the great city libraries, well dressed, alert, charming in a way which didn't especially interest him. He knew her principally as Mary Fletcher's friend, who lived with her in this rather luxurious small apartment and made it possible for him to come here now and then, when Mary would permit it, to "talk shop."

"Well," he said, "if it's the clothes question which is chiefly absorbing our young friend, perhaps I needn't fear she'll take her visit to the country too seriously. You say she means to stay a year. I'll give her three months—no, I'll give her six, since spring and summer are pretty decent up that way. But let fall come, with the theaters and the concerts beginning, and she'll come back, like a homing pigeon. Mark my words, by October she'll come back. And in November she'll begin the new book—in New York, the book she couldn't get in the country." He picked up his hat, his odd, half-cynical smile showing in the corners of his well-cut lips. "I don't believe in that tailor at all; I don't think she's been near one—not at this hour. One excuse will do as well as another. We quarreled violently the other evening over this plan of hers; she didn't even tell me when she's going. Perhaps you'll let me know that? I might at least have the satisfaction of sending her some flowers and magazines for the journey."

"WHY, of course. She would want you to know. She goes to-morrow night on the ten-five," Alexandra responded, and saw him depart with a sense of pity for him.

Ten minutes after the editor had gone the door opened again, and was closed with a decided bang behind the subject of the last hour's discussion.

"Why, Mary!"

"Yes, I know. I met him—at the Subway entrance. Such hard luck! Now I'm going to dinner and a play with him, to keep the peace. Why didn't you get him off sooner?"

"My dear, you said you were staying downtown. But of course I might have known —"

"That I'd do the erratic thing? If I didn't you'd almost be disappointed, wouldn't you, Sandy?"

She looked like that—she looked exactly like that, Alexandra Warren thought—as if she would do the erratic thing. Just what it was about her that kept one watching her, as her friend watched her now, it was difficult to tell. The fact was that one did watch her, study her, enjoy her, even when she was most trying to one's sense of responsibility and judgment.

SHE stood for a minute on the hearth rug, before one of those gas grates which pass for fireplaces in such apartments, resting her arms upon the chimney piece and looking down at the play of small orange-and-blue flames. She had thrown a wide cape of brown beaver upon a chair, and stood, a slim figure in brown tailored suit, a tight little brown hat edged with beaver pulled down over her hair. She was all brown, was Mary Fletcher, from her bronze-brown hair to her slim, high-arched feet. Even her face held tints of brown in its pallor, and the pallor was new. Before Mary went to France exquisite soft hues of rose had mingled with the slight duskiness of her brunette coloring; they were all gone now.

"He said the tailor was a myth," said Alexandra Warren. "I begin to think he is myself."

"No myth at all. I've just come from the fitting. I bribed him heavily to get in two in one day and finish the suit by noon to-morrow. Oh—I don't want to go out with John Kirkwood to-night! But when I met him my ridiculous heart failed me, he looked so miserable. Well, he'll be back in an hour."

ALEXANDRA followed her friend into Mary's own room, went on into the tiny bathroom where she drew a full tub, and then, with the soft sound of splashing in her ears, got out the one evening gown left provisionally out of the early packing and laid it, with its underlying accessories, on the bed. She was rewarded presently by the feel of two cool, satiny arms about her neck, a fresh and fragrant cheek against her own face, and a low, revived voice in her ear.

"Oh, what doesn't a bath do for one? I'm all made over new—temporarily. If you'd just be angel enough to do my hair—"

Alexandra combed and brushed the heavy brown locks with care and skill.

"Thank you, Sandy dear, that's perfect. I don't let you maid me very often, do I? But it is a comfort to-night, I'm so fagged."

The apartment bell rang; Miss Warren answered. She came back with a square florist's box, at which Mary threw a kiss.

"The sinner! He means to get under my guard to-night—with his orchids and his dinners and plays."

(Continued on Page 53)

Armstrong's Linoleum

for Every Floor in the House

The basis of the color scheme for this group of rooms is the Brown Jaspé Linoleum, installed as a permanent floor when the house was built.

There is a New Kind of Linoleum

LINOLEUM today is as different from the linoleum of ten years ago as the automobile of today is different from the automobile of ten years ago.

This modern linoleum is not tacked down as a floor covering, but installed as the floor itself throughout the house.

These floors of linoleum are smooth, solid, substantial. Fabric rugs are laid on them just as on any other floor. They are waxed occasionally to keep them in perfect condition. They are easy to clean. They are not expensive.

Architects are specifying linoleum floors for up-to-date homes—not just for kitchens and pantries, but for living-rooms, dining-rooms, libraries, bedrooms, sun porches.

The linoleum is cemented down over a layer of builders' deadening felt—the most satisfactory way to lay linoleum as a permanent floor.

If your home needs new floors, or if you expect to build, go to a first-class store and ask to see the new Jaspé linoleum, brown, gray, green, or blue. Also plain color effects, carpet designs, matting designs and tile inlaid.

Write to our Bureau of Interior Decoration for advice as to proper patterns and colors for use in any scheme of home decoration. No charge for this service. All Armstrong's Linoleum is fully guaranteed to give entire satisfaction.

"The Art of Home Furnishing and Decoration"

(Second Edition)

By Frank Alvah Parsons, President of the New York School of Fine and Applied Art. Sent, with de luxe color plates of fine home interiors, on receipt of twenty cents.

ARMSTRONG CORK COMPANY, LINOLEUM DEPARTMENT
927 Mary St., Lancaster, Pennsylvania

730

690

Look for the CIRCLE "A" trademark on the linoleum

8364

If one of these Armstrong patterns is more suitable for your home than No. 11, in the illustration, order (by number) from your linoleum merchant.

Armstrong's Linoleum Rugs

You can also buy rugs of Armstrong's Linoleum, suitable for kitchen, dining-room, or bedroom, and fully guaranteed to give satisfactory service. Send for free booklet, "Armstrong Linoleum Rugs," showing color plates of pleasing and artistic designs.

Lord and Lady Baltimore Cakes—make them for your next party. One takes the egg whites, the other the yolks.

Lady Baltimore

(White Cake)

1 cupful sugar 2½ cupfuls flour
¾ cupful Crisco 2½ teaspoonfuls baking powder
½ cupful cold water ½ teaspoonful salt
1 teaspoonful vanilla extract 6 whites of eggs

For the Filling

1 cupful sugar Pinch cream of tartar
½ cupful boiling water ½ cupful chopped candied cherries
2 whites of eggs ½ cupful chopped candied pineapple
1 teaspoonful vanilla extract

For cake. Cream Crisco and sugar together. Sift together three times dry ingredients and add alternately with water. Add vanilla, beat mixture well, then fold in stiffly beaten whites of eggs. Divide into two Criscoed and floured layer cake tins and bake in moderate oven twenty-five minutes.

For filling. Put sugar and water into sauce pan, stir till boiling, add cream of tartar, then boil until it forms a soft ball when tried in cold water, or 240° F., pour on to the stiffly beaten whites of eggs, pouring in a steady stream and very slowly, adding, while beating, vanilla, cherries, and pineapple, beat till thick and divide between and on top of cake.

Sufficient for one large layer cake.

Lord Baltimore

(Yellow Cake)

Exactly the same as "Lady Baltimore" except that you use the six egg yolks in the batter, and use ½ cupful chopped raisins, same of chopped nut meats, and 5 chopped figs instead of the cherries and pineapple in the frosting. Confectioners' sugar icing may be used instead of boiled frosting if desired.

Do you know the right way to cool a cake?

Learn the correct way, and all the other little knacks of making perfect cakes, from the big Crisco cookbook, "The Calendar of Dinners", in which Marion Harris Neil, formerly cookery editor of "The Ladies' Home Journal", gives the cooking knowledge that made her famous. Tells how to judge meats, fish, game, fowl, and vegetables; what to do and what not to do in baking, broiling, roasting, and frying all kinds of food; gives 615 exclusive, useful recipes and 365 complete dinner menus—one for every day in the year. 211 pages. Illustrated. Clothbound. Send us 10 cents in stamps, today, and we'll mail you one copy, postpaid. (Only one copy to an address, as each book costs us almost 50 cents.) Write to Section D-1, Department of Home Economics, The Procter & Gamble Co., Cincinnati, Ohio.

What is safe economy in making fine cakes?

THE expert cook knows that when she attempts to economize by reducing the number of eggs in a fine cake recipe, she forfeits the fine, feathery, moist texture of the perfect cake. She knows that bread flour, instead of pastry flour, tends to make the cake coarse-grained and bread-like.

In the choice of shortening, however, it is possible to economize and still have the richest and most delicately flavored cake that can be made. You are sure of the utmost in texture and flavor, but your cake costs less, when you use Crisco.

Crisco makes cakes as rich as can be because it is all richness itself, free from salt and moisture, both of which are found in the best butter. It is tasteless, like unsalted butter; therefore only the addition of salt to the batter is needed to produce a delicious butter-like flavor. It is so white and delicate that it is ideal for the finest white cakes. Being strictly vegetable and of a solid cream-like appetizing appearance, the very knowledge that it has been used in a cake appeals to all who are particular about the food they eat.

Any woman who ever has used Crisco for fine cake-baking will tell you that it is an unnecessary expense to use butter. Try it yourself. Get a can from your grocer—use it for cake-baking, pastry-making, and frying—and see how much better everything tastes.

Crisco always comes in sanitary, sealed cans, 1, 3, 6 and 9 pounds, net weight; never in bulk. Costs less per pound in the larger sizes.

Made and sold in Canada

CRISCO
For Frying—For Shortening
For Cake Making

Foursquare

(Continued from Page 50)

She pinned on the delicate cluster, gave a last touch with a powder puff to throat and chin, thrust a scarf of tulle about her neck, and let Alexandra lay a fur-lined wrap about her shoulders. She left the lightest of caresses on her friend's cheek when she went down a few minutes later in answer to a summons from the hall boy.

It was quite another John Kirkwood than the one who had given vent to such bitter complaining an hour before who drove away with Mary Fletcher in the taxi over the wintry streets. He had worked faster than she to accomplish it all and find time to dress as well, and he was exultant, though he tried not to show it overmuch.

He saw with triumph, as the evening advanced, that his skillful work was telling, as, knowing Mary Fletcher pretty well, he had been sure it was bound to do. Throughout the dinner his companion had shown indications of courteously disguised indifference to the wiles at work, in spite of the care with which he had chosen the place and ordered the appetizing food.

BUT later, at the end of the second act of a brilliant play, one he had counted upon to absorb and thrill her with the perfection of its art, both literary and histrionic, he looked down at her and saw more than a touch of that which he had hoped to bring to her expressive face. She hadn't been able to resist it; it had taken her off her feet.

"Oh, what craftsmanship!" she said. "That dialogue—was there ever anything so clever? And yet, it's all so simple, so without strain for effect. That climax—what could be quieter?"

"Nothing. Nor more tremendous." "Oh, yes—tremendous; there's no other word. And of course the acting is perfect. What a joy it must be to have such lines to speak!"

"Do you know," he began, looking down at his program and turning its pages lightly, as if the moment hadn't come for which he had been playing and as if he weren't thinking very carefully how he should put the thing he wanted to say, "there have been places all along in this play, in the turn of a phrase here and there, the sudden, unexpected force of a word, which reminded me inevitably of—you?"

"No!" She glanced at him skeptically. "Oh, no; of course not."

"Yes," he spoke thoughtfully and gravely, as if the idea had only just occurred to him and he were turning it over and looking at it on both sides. "I didn't recognize it at first, the play of wit and wisdom was so swift I was left breathless. But after a time I began to wonder why there was something so familiar here and there in the use of words, in the way of putting things. And then it came to me—it is Mary Fletcher, with the strokes a little heavier, the lines drawn with a bit of extra finish. Why shouldn't it be so? He's a master; you're not even a pupil of his. But you might be; you have all the marks."

She was silent. He waited. He thought her breath came a trifle more rapidly than before.

AFTER a minute he did venture to add one more touch to his effort to reach her: "I think—if you will let me say so—that you have the genius too. And—may I remind you?—I've never said just that to you before."

A little laugh came then and a quick thrust back. "Oh, Mr. John Kirkwood, you're the genius, to put such a thought into my head. It's absolutely untrue, but of course you know it will work and work in my brain, and be my undoing."

"It should be your making," he looked at her gravely, refusing to answer her comprehending smile. She had seen through him; he realized that. Yet the strange thing about flattery is that it seldom fails of its mark, though it may seem to glance off quickly enough thereafter. "To have your ability shine so clearly that the type of it, the class, the amazingly high class is instantly recognized by one who knows your work as I do—that should be a magnificent stimulus, and an absolutely justifiable one."

"You know perfectly that I could no more touch such work than I could—reach that electrolier above us."

"Not yet perhaps, though I'm not so sure. And the current that makes that electrolier blaze so brilliantly is precisely the same sort as that which lights these small side lights over here. Run that current anywhere, it's bound to produce light. In your case I don't think you half realize how high the voltage is."

"You shouldn't try to raise it—you might burn out the fuse," she said gayly, to hide the real stirring of the thing in her brain which it was impossible not to recognize when the stimulus was applied.

"Ah, I knew you'd shy away from such a suggestion," he said in a disappointed tone. "I never knew anybody who so persistently refused to be rated where she belongs. Never mind. When you bring out your first real book, then you will capture the audience I covet for you. The thing I'm anxious about now," he went on rapidly, lest at any moment he should catch the wink of the orchestra's signal light which would mean the raising of the curtain on the last act, "is to put into your mind the thought that when you come to plan the book, even though you do it a long way from here, you can't quite leave John Kirkwood out of it. I think it's helped you in the past to talk things over with me. Won't you promise me that when you begin to think out your new scheme for work you'll at least let me know? I can't tell you quite how unhappy I shall be if you won't."

SHE did not answer at once, and while she waited the signal he was dreading did come, the curtain rose, and instantly she was lost to him in the magic spell put upon her by the scene across the footlights.

The curtain fell. He put her fur-lined cloak upon her, got into his coat, and they moved up the aisle without speaking. He was somewhat baffled by her silence; she had kept her head turned away from him to the very door. He glanced again and again at that turned-away profile as they made their slow progress from the theater door to their car, which was far down the line and had to be waited for.

He thought, as he had thought many times before in such places, that among all the women about them, their attractions enhanced by every trick of dress and adornment, Mary Fletcher possessed something which set her apart from them. Far more beautiful women elbowed her on either side, priceless furs and costly wraps of all sorts made her more simple evening attire insignificant by contrast, her slender figure was dwarfed by many a gorgeous, towering creature who looked down upon her with supercilious eyes—yet—yes, there was something about her which made him supremely content to be there by her side, and to try as best he might to protect her from the pressure of the crowd, eager to be away.

They were in their cab at last, and out of the block which always impedes traffic at a playhouse door. Then John Kirkwood, aware of the flying moments, put a question which could wait no longer. "Well, would you mind putting a poor editor and beseeching friend out of his misery?"

She spoke without looking at him. Her eyes were upon the flying lights outside the cab windows, but her voice was kind. "Just what do you want me to say?"

"That the line holds. That's all I'll ask for; that is, I'll try to be satisfied with that."

"I don't throw over my friends for a misunderstanding, John Kirkwood. Of course the line holds."

THERE was a moment's silence, then Kirkwood laughed—a rather bitter little laugh. "Man is never satisfied, but I'll try to be. I'd hoped that the evening and the play would —"

"I know," she said evenly. "You expected it to take me where I'm weakest, get hold of my imagination, and make me sorry that I'm going. Well, you may be content. It has taken hold of my imagination—that terribly dangerous imagination of mine that has such control of me. I went as mad over that wonderful play as you could hope I would, was as crazy to do something like it—afar off, in my line as I could compass. I'm just as much afire with a perfectly futile longing to do a big, splendid thing that would take everybody off his feet as I ever was in my life. The only difference is —"

He thought she was never going to find the ending to that sentence. "Yes?" he prompted her at last, with a glance at the number of the street they were passing. "The only difference is —"

"It's that for the first time in my history I've—lost confidence in myself. I'm going away to find it."

"Oh, for heaven's sake!" Instantly he was his old insistent, professional self. "Why, you were never so equipped to do the big thing. You're merely tired; you're overworked. I'm really glad myself you're to have a rest. As soon as you've had it you'll be yourself again. Then the fires will burn. And then—I want to be at hand to pour on the oil."

She looked round at him at last. There was only one block more to pass. Her eyes were dark with unhappiness, but she smiled at him like her old self, as far as friendliness was concerned. "When I find I need the oil that you so well know how to pour, I'll send for you. I'm quite willing to admit I may find it hard to do without you. You've given me so much; I haven't been half grateful enough. Thank you for a delightful evening; I'm so glad I gave in and let you take me."

HE HELD the hand she offered him close for a moment; then as she drew it away he said slowly: "I'm going to believe that generous speech makes it all right between us. Please don't mind my saying that I never dreamed anything could be so hard as it is to let you go. I'd counted more than you know on the winter—with you here."

"I may come back sometime," she said without turning her head toward him.

"I pray you will. If I didn't count on that —" He let the sentence end there with a suppressed breath she couldn't fail to hear.

After that there were only a few words of leave-taking at the door of the elevator in the apartment-house lobby. As Mary Fletcher was borne upward she leaned against the side of the car, her head drooping like the flowers below her breast. Inside her own door she laid her head for a moment upon the shoulder Alexandra Warren presented when she saw the trouble in her friend's eyes.

"Sandy," Mary said with some difficulty. "I know now how the Lord felt when the

(Continued on Page 55)

Regence Pattern

Buy Your Linens at "The Linen Store"

It does not matter where you live, in California, New York, Michigan or Florida, you can conveniently shop at "The Linen Store." Our Mail Order Department will give your order the most careful and painstaking attention.

Four Linen Specials

The Table Cloth pictured above is of finest quality Pure Linen Damask, in a Regence pattern. It is a design of unusual classic beauty. 2 x 2 yds...$12.50 2 x 3 yds...$19.00 2 x 2½ yds... 15.50 2 x 3½ yds... 22.00

Larger sizes priced in proportion

Napkins to match, 22 x 22 in. $15.00 doz., 24 x 24 in. $17.50 doz. Other Cloths in exclusive Floral and Ornamental designs, $9.50 for 2 x 2 yd. size—and up.

$11.75 Italian Luncheon Set

Fancy Linens

There are Fancy Linens, too, of fine weave and exquisite workmanship. Madeira Centerpieces, Rectory Cloths, Luncheon Sets, etc. Such Linens are always economical. They keep their beauty, they wear well, and are intrinsically satisfying. A

The Italian Luncheon Set (illustrated above) is of heavy, Round-Tread, Cream-colored Linen. Hand-hemstitched and edged with Needlepoint Picots. The Set consists of a fascinating Oblong Runner, 19 x 54 in. with six 12 x 18 in. Place Mats at $11.75 a Set.

Towels

In Towels, every variety may be had; dainty Guest Towels, practical everyday ones of Huck, and big, rough ones for the bath.

Very Special Prices

A—Damask Towels of Pure Linen, Hemstitched, 21 x 39 in. at $12 a doz. B—Towels of Pure Linen Huck, Hemstitched 20 x 36 in. at $15 a doz.

Mail your order today

Registered Trade Mark

Established 1853

James McCutcheon & Co. Department No. 56 345 Fifth Ave. New York

In the Morning

Puffed Rice with cream and sugar forms the finest breakfast dainty ever served

In the Evening

Puffed Wheat in milk—whole wheat puffed to bubbles—forms the utmost in a food

No Foods Like These in taste and texture, or in dietetic value

Puffed Grains are now known to millions as the greatest cereal foods in existence.

Each grain is a tantalizing morsel in its texture and its taste. Each is a bubble grain, flimsy and crisp. Each has a nut-like flavor.

Children revel in these Puffed Grains. They find them food confections, morning, noon and night.

Eat more whole grains

Since Puffed Grains came, children get more whole-grain diet. And that is what they need.

A grain of wheat, when eaten whole, contains 16 needed elements. Children need them all. Since Puffed Wheat made the whole grain tempting, more children get those elements in plenty.

No elements are lost

In Puffed Grains, every food cell is exploded and fitted to digest. Thus every granule of the whole grain feeds.

Like Nuted Fruit

Puffed Rice will add the nut-like blend to any dish of fruit, and the grains are crisp and flimsy.

With Melted Butter

Another way to serve. It also makes a food confection for hungry children after school.

Wafers for your Soups

Toasted grains, thin and crisp, ever ready for your soups.

That was the object of this invention of Prof. A. P. Anderson. Ordinary cooking breaks part of the food cells. He aimed to break them all.

So the grains are sealed in guns, then revolved for an hour in a fearful heat. The bit of moisture in each food cell turns to steam.

When the guns are shot that steam explodes. Over 125 million steam explosions are caused in every kernel. Thus every granule easily digests.

Airy, flavory tidbits

The grains are puffed to 8 times normal size. The walls—thin, crisp and toasted—are ready to crush at a touch.

The flavor is so nut-like that the grains are used in candy making and as garnish on ice cream. Yet they supply whole-grain nutrition in its ideal form.

Serve both Puffed Grains in plenty, in every way you can. When you find such foods so welcome, see that children get enough.

Puffed Rice

Rice grains puffed to bubbles

Puffed Wheat

Whole wheat, steam exploded

The Quaker Oats Company Sole Makers

Foursquare

(Continued from Page 53)

devil led Him up to the top of the mountain and showed Him all the kingdoms of the earth. The only difference between Him and me is that He refused them knowing He could have them, and I refuse them only because I can't get them!

"And so I'm going to bed. At least, when one can't have the kingdoms of her earth, she can always go to bed. And just possibly she'll sleep. I'm only afraid she can't."

III

"I THINK, Bates," said Miss Graham, anxiously leaning forward to reach her driver on the front seat of the surrey, "we shall need to make a little haste."

"Yes, ma'am," Bates responded, touching his fur cap. "That train's liable to be late, though, Miss Graham."

Nevertheless, he sent the two well-groomed fat horses along at what was for them quite a spanking pace. They were not taken out often enough during the winter to keep them in condition for rushing to trains and, since the last of the March snow was just off the streets, this was the first time they had drawn the surrey in many months. Miss Graham had never cared to exchange her beloved chestnut horses for a motor car, nor her faithful man-of-all-work, gray though he was getting to be with years, for a smart young chauffeur. The well-kept equipage had none the less a certain distinction upon the streets of the college town, since it was known to come from "the old Graham place" with its tall white pillars and its air of old-time hospitality.

The surrey swung round into the station driveway and came to a standstill behind the building.

Miss Graham alighted promptly. "I will go myself to meet her, Bates," she said. "I think the horses may be a little restive when the train comes in."

"Yes, ma'am, they may be, not having been to train much all winter. Miss Mary can hold 'em while I get her luggage; she'll be liking to, I'm thinking, if she's not changed."

"We shall find her much the same in such ways, I imagine, Bates. Indeed, she spoke of you and the horses in her last letter."

BATES glowed with pleasure. He had been meeting Mary at this same station since she was a small girl, when the fat old horses had been the shyest of lively young colts, and even then she had been wild to "hold them"—and could do it, too, after a little of Bates' delighted training.

Miss Graham paced the station platform until the train came in. Her sensitive face, beneath the soft gray plumes of her becoming hat, was pink with delicate color; her small form, wrapped in rich gray furs, was carried very erect. When the train arrived, Bates, though his hands were busy with his horses, had one eye for the station platform and presently saw a slim figure in brown run along it up to Miss Graham, saw a vivid, laughing face he well remembered, and shifting the reins into one hand touched his cap in answer to a happy hail as Mary Fletcher came close.

"Oh, Bates!" A firm gloved hand gave his big gauntleted one a friendly grip. "I'm so glad to see you. And here are Billy and Tom, looking as young as ever."

"I'm glad to see you looking so well, Miss Mary," grinned Bates. "Want to hold the horses, while I get your things in?"

"Of course I want to." She was up in the front seat at the word, kept the horses in order, and when Bates came back with the small leather trunk, a typewriter in a pig-skin case, and a big hamper of fruit from a city market, helped him stow them, making merry comment all the while and causing him to chuckle with amusement.

All the way up the village street her eager eyes were scanning the familiar landmarks, and when they passed the "green" upon which stood a certain white church with a tall spire, she leaned to look back at it till it was out of sight. Miss Graham understood. In that church Mary's father and mother had been married, and from it they had been borne to their burial.

When they were well past and were proceeding more slowly up the long hill, half-way up which lay the Graham house, and upon whose summit stood the group of college buildings which overlooked the town, Mary's hand came upon her aunt's with a close pressure. "I didn't know how I loved it all till I came back to it this time," she said in a low, moved tone. "It's really more like home to me now than any other place in the world. Oh, and there's the house! How dear—how dear it looks!—just as it always did."

"WE PUT on a coat of white paint each spring," said Miss Graham, "but it always seems to look a little dingy before the year comes round."

"It doesn't look a bit dingy to me," Mary insisted as the carriage turned in at the graveled drive between two tall posts.

The place was surrounded by a thick hedge, never allowed to grow high enough to shut it in. The house stood well back from the street. Bates was sending the horses along smartly now; it was his special pride to have the carriage sweep around the curve to the end of the long porch and stop with a hint of a flourish. Dusk was descending, and several windows showed lights.

The big front door swung open as Mary ran down the porch, and a stout figure in a black dress and white apron stood beaming in the doorway.

"Oh, Eliza, bless your heart!" Mary had both the housekeeper's hands in hers. "How good it is to see you! I didn't think everything could seem just the same. But it does, even to you. Why, you haven't a gray hair."

"Indeed I have, Miss Mary. But you're looking just the same. I could think you were just the girl that used to come here and ask for cookies before you got inside the door."

"You'll see I'm not—by many years, Eliza, though I like cookies just the same. Oh, this beautiful old hall! Aunt Sara," as Miss Graham with Bates and the luggage came in, "there never was another hall quite like this."

SHE was all over the house in the next fifteen minutes, ending by standing in the doorway of the upstairs room which had always been hers on all her visits and looking in at it with happy eyes. Miss Graham had followed her about, enjoying her pleasure in the familiar scenes.

"It's all exactly the same," Mary exclaimed—"the old mahogany pieces, the white matting on the floor and the blue rugs and hangings, the desk-bookcase, with, I'll wager, the very same books."

Miss Graham nodded.

"And the lovely old blue-and-white English jugs and bowls on the washstand. Oh, but the lamp is new! How pretty it is. Why, it's electric. Have you wired the house then?"

"Yes, I had to come to it," Miss Graham explained, smiling. "I was sorry for a while, but now I am glad, for it permits me to use several table lights in places where I could not before. Do you like this one then? It seemed to me to fit the room—and you."

(Continued on Page 56)

Be More Careful of your teeth—combat the film

This offers a test of a new way of teeth cleaning which means much to you and yours.

Authorities now advise it. Leading dentists everywhere are urging its daily use. Millions of people employ it.

Make this ten-day test and let the results show what really clean teeth mean.

That dingy film

Film is what clouds the teeth's beauty. It causes most tooth troubles. Countless teeth look dingy, discolored and decay, because of the film-coats on them.

Film is that viscous coat you feel. It clings to teeth, enters crevices and stays. That is what discolors—not the teeth.

Film is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Germes breed by millions in it. They cause many serious troubles, local and internal.

Ways to end it

Dental science has in late years found two ways to fight film. It has proved them by careful tests. Now they are embodied in a new-day tooth paste—called Pepsodent—for daily application.

Pepsodent
REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

The New-Day Dentifrice

A scientific film combatant, which also acts in other essential ways. Approved by highest authorities, and now advised by leading dentists everywhere. All druggists supply the large tubes.

What you will see

Send this coupon for the 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coat disappears. Then read the scientific reasons for the other good effects. It will mean a new era in teeth cleaning.

Dentists here and abroad now advise it. It is now bringing a new dental era to some 40 races of people.

Other new effects

Pepsodent brings three other effects, natural and very important.

It multiplies the salivary flow—Nature's great tooth-protecting agent. It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva, to digest starch deposits. They may otherwise cling and form acids.

It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva, to neutralize the acids which cause tooth decay.

Thus every use does five things which dental authorities now regard as essential.

You'll quickly see

A 10-Day Tube of Pepsodent is sent to all who ask. That shows the delightful effects. In a week you will realize that this method means much to you and yours.

Send the coupon for it. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear.

They mean such cleansing, such protection as authorities now desire. Get this 10-Day Tube and see how much they mean to you and yours. Cut out the coupon now.

10-Day Tube Free

THE PEPSODENT COMPANY,
Dept. 645, 1104 S. Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill.

Mail 10-Day Tube of Pepsodent to

Only one tube to a family.

BERKEY & GAY

Furniture

"The Chatterton" — Shown During March

To fit simply into the modest home is the mission of this new Berkey & Gay Chamber Suite. Yet its charm is worthy of the most pretentious.

A Sheraton or a Hepplewhite, designing for the home of today, might create such a suite. In its pleasing proportions, its grace and refinement, it is true to their best traditions. A delightful color effect is achieved in the contrast of the beautifully figured mahogany panels with the darker-toned birch framework.

See "The Chatterton" during March at foremost furniture stores. You will find its genuine excellence well within the popular price range. For you never pay more for Berkey & Gay quality—often less—than for makes of unknown worth.

Our Brochures, describing "The Chatterton" and other Berkey & Gay Furniture, together with name of nearest dealer, sent on request

BERKEY & GAY FURNITURE CO.
440 Monroe Ave., Grand Rapids, Michigan
New York Wholesale Showroom, 119 West 40th Street

This trademark is inset in every Berkey & Gay production. It is the customer's protection when buying and his pride ever after.

Foursquare

(Continued from Page 55)

"It's perfect, and the touch of rose gives just what was needed with all the blue and white. Yes, in here, Bates, please, with all the things," and Mary had her key in the lock of the traveled-looking small leather trunk by the time it was fairly in place.

For the following hour she was busy with the unpacking. So Miss Graham, sitting in a chintz-covered armchair by the big square table in the corner between two windows, found herself in a maze of interests. The most of Mary's belongings had preceded her, and this trunk had been devoted to the books, pictures and special articles which she had wanted to keep with her till the last.

"They make home for me anywhere, so how can they help but make a superhome here?" Mary demanded, as she placed blue-pottery book ends on the table and filled them in with a long, crowded row of books.

SHE hung several choice small prints on the white walls between the tiny blue-and-green stripes of quaint paper, using glass-tipped pins which did not mar; set up photographs on the white chimney piece, beneath which glowed a small bedroom fire, and spread bureau silver and crystal jars upon the chaste white linen of the dressing table.

"I always did love this long mirror, with the Mount Vernon picture in the upper panel," she said, pausing to look into it with a smile, which changed to the suggestion of a frown as she added: "And how I've changed since I used to sit and admire my brown curls! Aunt Sara, do you realize that I'm twenty-seven years old, all but a month? No girl any more!"

"My dear, you don't look twenty-one," Miss Graham exclaimed.

"Yes, but I do, begging your kind pardon. I did keep rather fresh for a long time, but I'm jaded now, no doubt about it."

"Child, you are tired. I've known it all along. You worked too hard over there. Just as soon as you are rested —"

But Mary had already left the painful subject of her years, and was burrowing in the trunk again, toward the bottom. In a moment she came to place two framed photographs on the table before Miss Graham, without speaking. The elder woman looked and looked again.

"How fortunate—how fortunate you are, dear, to have such pictures of them. I never saw these; I didn't know they existed."

"I found them among some snapshots I took of them myself, hunted out the films and had them enlarged. They're so much more satisfying than any portraits, don't you think?"

"Much more."

ONE of the pictures, of a goodly size, was of a middle-aged man of fine face and distinguished bearing, standing before a vine-clad wall, apparently absorbed in looking at some object not within range of the camera. One hand was thrust into his pocket, his eyes were intent, his mouth evidently ready to break into a smile.

"In the snap," explained Mary, "one of the boys was facing him, talking excitedly; his expression was absurd, with his mouth open, so I didn't like to leave him in. But father looks so exactly as he always did when he was giving the other fellow a chance to explain, but meant to come back at him with some keen speech which would show him where he stood. I thought it was by far the most typical moment that has been preserved. It makes a wonderful picture, doesn't it?"

"Oh, yes. It's better of him than this of your mother, though this is really lovely. But it doesn't show her full face, and that disappoints me."

"I know; yet can't you see how the next instant she will look up and say some sparkling thing that will make you delight in her? Mother's sense of humor was one of the most delicious things about her, wasn't it? Oh, how beautiful she —" Mary's voice failed her for an instant, and she turned quickly away to hide it.

She dove into the trunk again and brought up a long silk scarf of blended hues of violet and blue and, dropping it in Miss Graham's lap, gently took away the photographs. "That's the prettiest scarf to be found in Paris," she said triumphantly. "It looked so like you I pounced on it and all but took it away from a woman who was hesitating over it. In my very best manner I managed to convey to her a subtle suggestion that the pink-and-amber one she was also considering was by far the more becoming to her youth and beauty."

The unpacking and bestowing was all done after a time, and the trunk sent away. Then came dinner and a long, quiet evening by the fire in the drawing-room of which Mary had written so longingly. She had slipped into a little frock of dull blue, in which, Miss Graham thought, she looked a picture, with the firelight bringing back the old warm color into her cheeks. It seemed just the Mary of five years ago who told her stories of French life, with many a sparkling comment of her own, or, when the tale was a pathetic one, giving to the telling that touch of the dramatic which was Mary's own.

WHEN the grandfather's clock in the hall struck ten, however, she stood up and saluted snappily with a clear "Yes, sir!" like one of the soldiers of whom she had been speaking. Then she proposed something so foreign to all Miss Graham's habits that it quite startled the small person in the wing chair.

"Aunt Sara, let's put on some big boots over our slippers and go out for a little walk. Will you? It's a nice night, and the fresh air will make us sleep. Besides, I want to see how the hill looks in the dark."

Quite as of old, Miss Graham found herself submitting to her niece's will, though she entered one small protest. "How can you walk in those high-heeled slippers, dear?"

Mary laughed, bent and inspected Miss Graham's heels and shook her head. "Those are very nice little black satin pumps, Aunt Sara, but the heels certainly are outrageous."

"Why, I had them altered —"

"I see you did. They must be all of an inch high now. Never mind; I was so afraid you might have begun to wear those wide, flat, elderly things women succumb to, and these are really very smart, if you did have a bit too much taken off. As for the rest, you are perfectly adorable. I don't know who your dressmaker is, but she certainly understands what you should wear."

Miss Graham flushed with pleasure. "It is quite a little trouble to have all one's things made so far away, but I really do like to feel properly dressed."

"You're perfect. And I love that fur-lined cape of yours; it's so dignified and becoming. I'll run and get it, and we'll go for just a bit of a freshening, shall we?"

IT WAS indeed pleasant to get out of doors in the evening, Miss Graham was thinking happily, as she walked down the graveled driveway with Mary's arm linked in hers and

Mary's voice in her ear. The night was mild; a thin crescent moon hung in the west; there was more than a suggestion of coming spring in the air.

"I shall see the lilacs come out," exulted Mary, straining her eyes down the dark lawn toward a thick row of small trees near the hedge. "I never saw lilacs anywhere like yours."

"I have a new blue one, a very rare species; and there is one which is almost pink."

Mary was looking now toward certain lighted windows just beyond the hedge.

(Continued on Page 59)

The real naphtha odor means sweet clean clothes

Clothes with the sweetness that tells they are clean through and through—hygienically clean! The real naphtha in Fels-Naptha goes through every thread, makes the dirt let go, carries away all odors, then vanishes.

Because of the great help of the real naphtha, less rubbing is needed with Fels-Naptha than with any other soap. After the little rubbing douse the clothes, and the Fels-Naptha soapy water flushes all the dirt away. Then what a delightful clean-clothes smell!

The combination of good soap and real naphtha gives Fels-Naptha a double cleaning-value—the cleaning-value of soap and the cleaning-value of real naphtha. The only way you can get this benefit in soap is to be sure you get Fels-Naptha—the original and genuine naphtha soap—of your grocer. The clean naphtha odor and the red-and-green wrapper are your guides.

FREE If you haven't seen or used Fels-Naptha lately send for free sample. Write "Fels-Naptha, Philadelphia."

What is Naphtha?

It is that powerful yet harmless dirt-loosener used by professional dry-cleaners to cleanse safely and to freshen dainty fabrics and delicate colors. Naphtha is good for clothes because it thoroughly cleanses. Real naphtha is perfectly combined with good soap in Fels-Naptha.

Useful all over the house!

Fels-Naptha not only washes anything washable, but safely cleans anything soap-and-water will clean. It takes spots out of rugs, carpets, cloth, draperies. Quickly brightens painted woodwork. Cleans enamel of bathtub, washstand, sink, refrigerator. Makes everything sweet and sanitary.

© 1922, Fels Co., Philadelphia

FELS-NAPHTHA

THE GOLDEN BAR WITH THE CLEAN NAPHTHA ODOR

Armour's

SIMON PURE LEAF LARD

For Deep Fat Frying, Use Pure Leaf Lard

THERE are three big reasons why "Simon Pure" Leaf Lard gives such wonderful results in deep frying doughnuts, codfish balls, croquettes and similar foods.

It adds a delicate flavor to foods fried in it; it has an unusually high burning point (much higher than necessary frying temperature); it contains no moisture, so it does not fry away in cooking.

Thousands of women still buy leaf fat at the market and "try it out" at home to get perfect leaf lard. But all these hours of work and uncertainty of results are saved by simply asking for "Armour's Simon Pure Leaf Lard," sold in pails and one-pound cartons. Its purity and richness make it economical for deep fat frying, for sautéing and for shortening.

Write our Department of Food Economics for a FREE copy of "Pastry Wrinkles."

ARMOUR AND COMPANY, CHICAGO

SIMON PURE LEAF LARD is guaranteed by the Armour Oval Label—the quality mark that takes the guesswork out of buying. Ask your dealer for these and other Oval Label Products:

Star Ham Star Bacon
Veribest Canned Meats
Armour's Dry Sausage
Armour's Fresh Sausage
Cloverbloom Butter
Veribest Evaporated Milk
Veribest Pork and Beans
Nut-ola Margarine

Foursquare

(Continued from Page 56)

farther down the hill, where the driveway swept close.

"The Fenns live there still, of course?" she inquired.

"Oh, yes, I'm very glad to say. I should hardly know how to live with any other neighbors in that house."

"Still teaching—Harriet in the high school and Mark in the college?"

"Just the same. They are very fine people and the best of neighbors. There is nobody in town whom I enjoy seeing more. They could hardly help being what they are, with Matthew Fenn for their father. Do you remember how fond your own father was of him?"

"Of course I remember. They were so different, so exactly opposite in type, one would hardly have thought they would have found so much to like in each other. Is that lighted front room below still the old study, crammed with books?"

"Yes; one can hardly turn about in it now, there are so many. And still Mark comes home with fresh armfuls. Harriet says it is his one dissipation."

"It seems a harmless one." The pair had turned into the street and were walking slowly past the Fenn house down the hill. Mary's eyes were still scanning the windows, through whose red curtains below the partly lowered shades the light glowed ruddily. "But he'll slowly fossilize among his books. Don't he and Harriet ever get away to the city, see a play or hear some music? Or do they just attend educational conferences and address meetings on sober subjects?"

MISS GRAHAM found herself resenting a little the mocking tone, even though it came from lips so beloved. "Mark Fenn will never become a fossil," she said quickly. "One feels, in contact with him, that he is alive, that he is thinking things through. I know he is considered, in the college, one of the most able of the younger men. President Wing told me personally, not long ago, that his courses are leading all the rest in the matter of interest and accomplishment."

In the dim light Mary was smiling, understanding that she had touched a sensitive spot in her aunt's consciousness and delighting in the little lady's warm defense. "Good!" she said warmly. "I'm mighty glad to hear it. Of course, you know, I shouldn't doubt for a moment that Mark would be a splendid teacher. It just seemed to me that he was still rather young to make books his only dissipation. Perhaps you didn't mean that literally. Just tell me that he and Harriet do go in town and riot a bit, now and then, and I shall be quite satisfied."

"We all went in"—the nearest city was fifty miles away, but Newcomb's inhabitants all claimed it as their own—"only a fortnight ago, to a musical convention which lasted three days. It was a very great treat."

"Did Mark take some girl, at least part of the time? Do tell me he did."

"He and Harriet and I went together," explained Miss Graham.

SHE couldn't see her niece's expressive face, but she could feel that Mary was laughing. "Oh, that was a riot! Forgive me, dearest, but it's going to take me a few days to adjust myself. I've been living in such a rush of engagements, you know. Don't fear; I shan't be sighing for New York. I can't tell you how I love walking along this quiet street, looking at all the lights in the houses and thinking that inside are homes, real homes. Sometimes it has seemed as if there weren't any real homes in New York. I suppose there are, but the sense of them is lost somehow. Here—why, each house looks like a family. You don't know how I've missed that, nor how glad I am to get back to it. Hark, what is that? Oh!"—she breathed it into Miss

Graham's ear—"how long it is since I've heard college boys sing in the night."

Coming back up the hill, by and by, when they had walked across the village green at the foot, past the white church, and so around a course of nearly a mile, they saw the door of the small brown house just below the large white-pillared one open and close. As they came nearer they discovered a figure tramping up and down the path from porch to street, hands clasped behind its back. The fragrance of tobacco smoke reached them as they came abreast, and as the figure turned at the porch again and came back down the path Miss Graham spoke softly:

"Good evening, Mark. Can you guess who is here with me?"

THE slow pacing turned at once into a rapid advance. A pipe had its glowing ashes knocked out of it on a lifted heel, and a voice said with a certain crisp inflection Mary Fletcher remembered well the minute she heard it again: "I certainly can. Only one guest could make you sound like that. How do you do, Mary Fletcher? Welcome back to Newcomb!"

"Thank you, Mark Fenn. It's perfectly splendid to be here."

"I'm glad to hear that." His hand closed over hers sturdily. "We knew you came to-day, but didn't venture to make any sign. Harriet reported—through the window curtains—that you didn't even glance toward the little brown house as you drove in. So she thought you'd forgotten the people who live there."

"Shame on Harriet! She should have opened the window and waved at me. I hope twenty-four hours more won't go by before you both come over."

"They shall not. I'll brush my best coat, Harriet will put on her white gloves, and we will come formally to call on the distinguished author. I wish I could see how you're looking. But your voice sounds like the voice of Mary, and I can guess that you're smiling."

"I surely am. And I'm so happy to be here. I had to drag Aunt Sara out to look at the town with me. It's so beautifully the same I could have wept for joy."

"You didn't want to find it grown out of recognition then?"

"Not a bit. I couldn't bear to hear that some new people live in the old Townsend house on the green. How dared they come in!"

"Up on the campus, however, we really have one fine new building. The architect cleverly planned it in keeping with the old-timers, and you'll find it doesn't destroy the general harmony."

"EVERYTHING'S all right then," admitted Mary. "It's the general harmony, the old-time atmosphere I want preserved, whatever else goes."

"Yes, I understand that authors are always looking for atmosphere. I hope you'll find it—quite as musty as you want it."

Genial though it was, Mary thought she recognized a certain dryness in his tone, which she remembered of old. Mark had always had a way of making her realize that she had been a trifle condescending.

"I'm no author now; I'm just a girl again, looking for the old landmarks in my beloved town," she hastened to assure him.

"Well, here's one before you, you see—or can't see. And like all landmarks, I'm a trifle weather-beaten, as you'll discover tomorrow night. But I think you'll find Harriet precisely the same person, in spite of her six years of teaching."

"Dear Harriet! Give her my love and tell her I shall shout at her from

(Continued on Page 60)

Safe-Efficient

Good Teeth—Good Health is a scientific fact.

See your dentist twice a year and use Colgate's twice a day—that is the best advice that science can give you about your teeth.

Colgate's is safe and efficient—it does all that a dentifrice can! It brings to your mouth and teeth the help of reliable ingredients only, which do much good and avoid all possible harm.

COLGATE & CO. Est. 1806 NEW YORK

Large size tubes at your favorite store 25¢

The New Shoe for Women

IMAGINE : : a shoe with moccasin comfort and metropolitan smartness.

IMAGINE : : a shoe with all the beauty which fashion demands and every requirement which the most exacting medical and surgical authority can suggest.

IMAGINE : : a shoe which satisfies your pride and makes your feet and ankles slender and shapely.

IMAGINE : : a shoe worn all day long, which leaves your feet rested and ready for dainty and elegant evening slippers—such as Sorosis.

There you have THE A. E. LITTLE SHOE The New Shoe for Women

TWENTY-FIVE years ago, a shoe was introduced that found immediate favor in this country and in Europe. It was the first shoe to be branded with the manufacturer's trade-mark, as proof of his confidence in his product. Because of its popularity, imitations appeared. The courts soon decided that the name Sorosis on a shoe was for the protection of the public, and any name resembling it could not be used.

Because the A. E. Little Company—makers of Sorosis Shoes—were the only shoe manufacturers who maintained an experimental laboratory and made their own lasts, America's most eminent surgeons requested this company to collaborate with them in designing a shoe for suffering feet. Their united efforts resulted in the development of the Sorosis Orthopedic. Twenty-two thousand prescriptions for this shoe were written by New York physicians and filled at the New York store, alone, in a period of less than two years.

The orthopedic Sorosis is not beautiful, as are the other Sorosis shoes and slippers. It has taken the manufacturers ten years to create a work-and-play shoe—beautiful, and at the same time one that the most conscientious surgeon would prescribe.

With the purpose of bestowing the greatest good among the greatest number, the sale of the A. E. Little Shoe will not be limited to Sorosis stores or departments, but will be opened to all shoe merchants who will carry a full range of sizes and widths to insure proper fitting; and the price is only $12.50. Consult your dealer or send for information direct to us.

NOTE ONE : : Although A. E. Little Shoes are made from all kinds of leathers, we recommend for many reasons our carefully selected and specially tanned and finished thoroughbred calf for the upper. Its soft velvety texture takes a wonderful polish and always looks well.

NOTE TWO : : Look in your local newspaper for the advertisements of merchants who carry the A. E. Little Shoe.

Catalog upon request

A. E. LITTLE CO.

Makers of

Sorosis Shoes for Men, Women and Children

Lynn, Mass.

449 Fifth Avenue, New York

Foursquare

(Continued from Page 59)

my bedroom window when she goes down the walk to start for school in the morning, just as I always did."

When they had reached the house Mary said she should be much interested to see the Fenns by a revealing light, and Miss Graham replied that they were worth looking at by any light.

"Mark must be about thirty-five by now," Mary considered; "no great age. And his voice is rather nice, but I'm afraid he's pretty staid. Harriet's my age; but she's probably staid too. There's something about the professorial attitude, the habit of instructing and disciplining, that gets left over after office hours. My blessed father was one of the few men who managed never to acquire it. Aunt Sara, do you remember his laugh?"

"Yes, dear; no one could forget it."

WHEN she was ready for bed, more than an hour later, Mary put out her light, raised her shades and laid her hand upon her windows to open them. Before she did so, however, she stood for a minute looking across to the small brown house beyond the hedge. From the lower front windows she could still see the ruddy light shining out upon the porch floor and posts where dead vines hung, though the rest of the house was dark.

When the next evening came she found herself making rather careful preparation for the expected guests, glibly while at herself that already in the new and quiet life the visit of two village teachers could be an event to be looked forward to. The Mary of the old days had from season to season, beginning in her childhood, been accustomed to dash in and out of the brown house next door. In the later years, however, she had seen less and less of them in her briefer and briefer stays with Aunt Sara. The last time she had been here she had only a distant and tragic recognition of Mark Fenn in black gloves acting as pallbearer for Dr. Arthur Fletcher's casket as it was carried out of the white church on the green, and afterwards of his bending over her to say a few grave words of sympathy and farewell. It was really at least seven years since she had seen either of the Fenns for more than a word of greeting.

She put on the dull blue frock again, and the high-heeled slippers and stockings which matched it, oversaw the making of a small silver potful of chocolate and some tiny thin sandwiches, and arranged the lighting in the drawing-room to suit herself—an important matter. She found herself wishing for flowers, but there were no desirable flowers to be had, though she telephoned the small village greenhouse.

THEN the Fenns arrived, and she forgot everything else in the interest of renewing old acquaintance. Harriet, with her smooth, fair hair and pleasant, fresh-colored face full of character, seemed to Mary just what she had expected, the type of an energetic and successful village teacher. She was becomingly if somewhat austere dressed, and her quiet, assured manner was much as Mary remembered it. Her deep blue eyes looked straight into Mary's, her firm hand took hold with almost the grip of a man's. Capable, clear-brained, independent, trustworthy—this was Harriet Fenn. Though she was younger by a year than Mary herself, she would have given any stranger the impression of being considerably older.

As for Mark, the instant Mary felt her hand in his and looked into his strong-featured, decidedly interesting face, with its clear gray observant eyes, she understood that here undoubtedly was a man whom she couldn't remember or classify and dispose of quite as she had expected to do. One thing was certain—her quite natural impression, carried over from the days when she had been a mere girl while he had reached young manhood, that he was already old and "staid," as she had characterized both the Fenns, was a mistake. In spite of a certain gravity of face, broken rather rarely by an extremely winning smile showing splendid white teeth, he had, as Miss Graham had said, the look of being very much alive and to be reckoned with.

MARY herself, this night, by the sheer suggestion of opposites might have been taken for no creature less imaginative than a poet. She was a study in coloring, in voice and manner, in the whole appeal of her personality. If she had been one of her own imaginary heroines she could hardly have filled the eye more satisfyingly. From the first moment of the encounter with the Fenns, she was on her mettle. Just what it was which suddenly rose up in her and made her eager to surprise and captivate afresh these two people who had known her so long she couldn't have told herself. Perhaps it was because her two quiet days and nights in the old house had already refreshed her; perhaps also it was because, to one for whom every hour had been full, those two quiet days had already begun to make her long for diversion. Certain it was that throughout that evening Mary sparkled as only Mary could when she was in the mood.

Sitting close by the fire, on that little mahogany-armed, cross-stitch-embroidered footstool of which she had written to Miss Graham, she held all eyes. Now deliciously gay and piquant, now sobering to thoughtfulness as some subject came uppermost which demanded serious consideration, again seeming to listen with an eager concentration to the remarks of others, whatever she did or said—or however silent she was—all through it she was delightful to watch. And every now and then she made some brilliantly clever little speech which set everybody's pulses tingling with pleasure and appreciation.

ALTOGETHER, Mary Fletcher that evening was the Mary Fletcher who, when in the same fettle, was accustomed to pour into her work the peculiar quality of enchantment which brought her back the enthusiastic approval of her editors and her public. Perhaps there is no better way to indicate the charm of her actual presence in such an hour than to say that it reminded one irresistibly of that other and allied charm of her work, whose market value had risen to such a high figure. Mary's own personal market value, to put it in sordid terms, was quite as high as that of her work; one found her companionship quite as entertaining and absorbing as any tale she had ever put upon paper.

Conversation and chocolate, firelight and Mary Fletcher—the evening passed swiftly for the guests. Just before it was over a clasp of the knocker sent Mary herself to the door. Miss Graham required no service from any member of her quiet household in the evening. A huge florist's box with a special-delivery tag upon it had been sent from the post office. Mary brought it in for the rest of them to see. She knew well enough from whom it must have come.

"Flowers!" exclaimed Harriet. Her tone was eloquent of past denial.

Great masses of yellow jonquils, pink tulips and blue forget-me-nots were disclosed, hardly touched in their careful packing by hint of fatigue after their journey. With swift fingers Mary sorted them, laying all that both hands could hold in Harriet's lap.

To Mark she held out one small cluster of jonquils. "Would you deign to soften the austerity of your scholarly desk with these?" she asked.

"Do you think the giver would be pleased to have any austerity of mine softened by

(Continued on Page 62)

20 MULE TEAM BORAX

GLASS
SILVER
—AND—
TABLE
WARE

Glassware, glasses, windows, mirrors cleaned clean until they sparkle with a wonderful lasting brilliancy—one tablespoonful of 20 Mule Team Borax to a gallon of warm water. (If water is hard, use larger quantity.) It can't scratch or mar, it's nature's greatest solvent. 20 Mule Team Borax is the universal household antiseptic cleanser for everything in the house—a water softener for washing clothes, a solvent for pots and pans—and it makes the skin white and smooth. 20 Mule Team Borax is in all clean kitchens and bathrooms. Is it in yours? At ALL Grocers'. Send for Magic Crystal Booklet giving 100 uses for 20 Mule Team Borax.

PACIFIC COAST BORAX COMPANY - - - 100 WILLIAM STREET, NEW YORK

NATURE'S GREATEST CLEANSER

YOU'LL wear it all spring and summer!

There's real economy in a spring suit which you may wear in coolness and comfort all summer long.

And such a suit is this one, fashioned of

Skinner's All-Silk Satin

One needs no high-priced tailor to make this little suit. A dressmaker, or the clever needlewoman herself, may fashion it at home from a simple suit pattern. If you choose a three-piece suit pattern, you have both frock and suit at a surprisingly low cost.

The trimming is of soutache braid, designs for which may be easily obtained in any art needlework department. Your collar may be the youthful Peter Pan or if worn with fur neckpiece the collarless suit is good.

Skinner quality insures you more than one season's wear, too! There are 108 shades of Skinner's All-Silk Satin to choose from, and you may secure contrast by braiding it in another color.

"Look for the Name in the Selvage"

None genuine without it

If unable to buy Skinner's Silks and Satins in your community, write to us and we will see that you are supplied. Please mention the name of your local Dry Goods store.

WILLIAM SKINNER & SONS
Established 1848
New York City

Chicago
Boston

Philadelphia
Mills
Holyoke, Mass.

"LOOK FOR THE NAME IN THE SELVAGE"

his gift?" he replied, with that somewhat rare smile which she hadn't been able to bring to his lips as often that evening as she had expected. She had remembered that Mark Fenn wasn't a smiling man; there always had to be a real reason for his laughter, though when it was fairly won it was apt to be of the heartiest. Only once or twice throughout the evening, though he had watched her closely, had she heard that really delightful laugh of his ring out. Its absence had slightly piqued her.

"Oh, he's a generous person," she answered. "It's one of my editors. He's so sure I'm going to find it unbearably dismal up here in the country, as he calls it, he feels it his duty to enliven the scene for me. If his flowers can enliven my friends also, he will indirectly accomplish his object. So isn't it logical that I should give some to you, since I myself can't do it alone?"

"Can't do what, please? Enliven us?"

"YOU in particular. Harriet gives me back smiles for all my little jests; you alarm me by your grave looks. Did you disapprove of 'And, Behold' so seriously, Professor Mark?"

"How do you know I've read it?"

She laughed. "Guessed it, by the way you've avoided the subject all evening. In my early days you used to be so ready to encourage me. Don't you think I need encouragement now?"

"Not along those lines."

"No? Why not?"

"You don't think so yourself."

"Oh, indeed! Why, I thought it great stuff." Her tone was the mocking one she often used with much effectiveness. Her eyes were sending shafts of challenge into his.

"No—pardon me—you didn't. But do you think we'd better discuss it? I should probably say something rude, and that would be a poor way to begin to be neighborly. You've gone beyond my tutoring these days, you know; you're a law unto yourself. I'm merely a backwoods teacher; no critic worth your considering."

"Oh, what humility! The only difference between days past and these is that I used to be dreadfully afraid of you and your opinion. And now—while I still care what you think of my work—I'm no longer afraid of you. So instead of listening in meekness to your words of wisdom, as I used to do, I should now probably—"

"You would probably come back with a line of defense that would make me wish I'd taken no shots at you."

"I'm not sure I should make any defense. What I should do would be, more likely, to attack."

"Would you? On what ground?"

"I'll tell you some day. As you say, we mustn't begin by being rude to each other to-night. But if you've something against me for being guilty of 'And, Behold,' I've something against you for—no, I will not tell you to-night. Mark Fenn; but it's a real count. Some day we'll have it out, I promise you."

IV

"AUNT SARA, I'm going to work." "So soon, dear? I thought you meant to do nothing but rest for the first three months at least."

"It's no use. The more I do nothing the less fit I am. The only thing for me is to get at something. It's always been so; it always will be."

"Have you a plan for your work?" Miss Graham asked. She sat at her desk, writing letters, a pleasant figure to look at.

"Not a shadow of a plan," Mary responded cheerfully. Her kilted brown-and-white-striped skirt, her rakish little brown hat pulled well down over her hair, proclaimed her intent to go for a long tramp. "But I'll get one. Not to-day probably, or to-morrow. But there's no way to begin except to begin. Unless one's a genius, which I'm not, one can wait till doomsday for the thing that's called inspiration; it'll never come. I've got to go out after it, looking up every crossroad behind every tree, chasing up every rabbit track, till at last I see a vague form emerging from somewhere in the dim distance. I'll dash after it, shouting madly to it to stop. But it won't stop; it'll go trailing away through the woods, only showing me a glimpse of itself from time to time, while I follow along, getting tired and more out of breath all the way. This will keep up for days, more than likely. Finally, some wonderful hour I'll be plodding along, almost out of hope ever to see the thing I'm following, when suddenly the figure will turn, stop, wait, and I'll rush up to it, panting. I'll see it growing clearer and clearer as I come near—a form, a face, an outstretched hand—"

Miss Graham was watching her niece in wonder. Mary's attitude, the expression on her face, spoke eloquently of something of which the elder woman knew nothing.

"She will be very, very beautiful," said Mary softly. "Even yet she won't show me more than the mere outlines of herself, and before I've done more than to fling myself at her to embrace her, crying 'Here you my brain somehow is the power to—to make that vision real. Oh, there'll be days when I'll almost think I've lost her again, forgotten even how she looked; but just when I'm most despairing, she'll appear to me once more, and she'll have grown so big and splendid that I can only fall on my face before her, crying 'Oh, I'm not fit to try to tell them about you. I never, never can do it. But it's the joy of my life to try.'" Mary slid down off the table, laughing and pulling the little brown hat farther over her eyes, as if in shame.

"I SOUND like a tipsy fool, don't I?" she said raggedly. "And all about some silly tale like 'And, Behold'! I'll admit there was nothing in that. The vision I had wasn't so big as I thought it. The work I did in France was ten times better. But I'm going to do something now that will redeem me in your eyes—and certain other people's. So I'm off on the beginning of the hunt. I've asked Eliza to put up some sandwiches for me, and I won't be back for lunch."

She left an airy kiss on Miss Graham's cheek, slipped out through the kitchen where she picked up her sandwiches, stowing them in a leather bag with a strap like a lawyer's brief case, which she slung over her shoulder—it already held notebook and fountain pen—and swung away down the drive.

It was just a week after, a week each morning of which saw Mary setting forth again upon her quest, each afternoon returning with a sober face which smiled when it met Miss Graham's questioning look. The morning mail of that eighth day, heavy as it always was with letters from both friends and strangers, brought one letter which Mary read twice over on her way along the road.

Dear Mary Fletcher: Two months have gone by and I have kept my promise. Not a word from me has broken in upon the solitude with which it was your purpose to surround yourself. What other sounds may have reached you from that bothersome outer world which you have forsworn I know not, but certain it is that no shoutings from my sanctum can be branded as intruders. Have I earned at least your tolerance for this first sign of my continued existence?

You told me of your purpose to rest for fully two months before so much as turning your thoughts toward work. But somehow I know that already you are of a will to break this vow. The tea parties have begun to pull, the weekly—I had all but written weakly—college lectures to which the general public are invited have lost their zest—if they ever had any; the quiet of the place is beginning to get upon your nerves—those delicately strung nerves upon which your whole future depends. In a word, you long to be at it.

Have you a theme? I wonder. In your walks up and down the lanes and between the hedges, have you encountered the thing you seek, the Great Idea, the Big Motive? Not yet, you answer impatiently. What is the man thinking of that he asks that question so soon? Of course you haven't!

Well, June must be coming on gloriously up your way. Must I keep away indefinitely? This is the question which disturbs my peace of mind. If I come with no hint about me of wishing to speed up your processes of thought, only as a friend who misses you very much and would be glad to set eyes upon you again—how about it? I rather like June in the country myself. May I have a glimpse of it—in your company?

(Continued in the April Home Journal)

Your House of Happiness

By B. Y. WILLIAMS

TAKE what God gives, O heart of mine,
And build your house of happiness.
Perchance some have been given more;
But many have been given less.
The treasure lying at your feet,
Whose value you but faintly guess,
Another builder, looking on,
Would barter heaven to possess.

Have you found work that you can do?
Is there a heart that loves you best?
Is there a spot somewhere called home
Where, spent and worn, your soul may rest?
A friendly tree? A book? A song?
A dog that loves your hand's caress?
A store of health to meet life's needs?
Oh, build your house of happiness!

Trust not to-morrow's dawn to bring
The dreamed-of joy for which you wait;
You have enough of pleasant things
To house your soul in goodly state;
To-morrow Time's relentless stream
May bear what now you have away;
Take what God gives, O heart, and build
Your house of happiness to-day!

are! I knew I'd find you!" she'll be gone again behind the trees. But I'll have seen her! And from that moment, I'll know I can find her again if only I'm willing to trudge and drudge and toil. And from that moment I'll be glad I'm alive, and that in processes of thought, only as a friend who misses you very much and would be glad to set eyes upon you again—how about it? I rather like June in the country myself. May I have a glimpse of it—in your company?

"Don't Envy Beauty — Use Pompeian"

You, too, can have the clear, warm tints of youth, the alluring beauty of lovely coloring, if you know the secret of instant beauty, the complete "Pompeian Beauty Toilette."

First, a touch of Pompeian DAY Cream (vanishing). It softens the skin and holds the powder. Then apply Pompeian BEAUTY Powder. It makes the skin beautifully fair and adds the charm of fragrance. Now a touch of Pompeian BLOOM for youthful color. Do you know that a bit of color in the cheeks makes the eyes sparkle? Presto! The face is beautified and youth-i-fied in an instant! (Above 3 articles may be used separately or together. At all druggists', 60c each.)

TRY NEW POWDER SHADES. The correct powder shade is more important than the color of dress you wear. Our new NATURELLE shade is a more delicate tone than our Flesh shade, and blends exquisitely with a medium complexion. Our new RACHEL shade is a rich cream tone for brunettes. See offer on coupon.

Pompeian BEAUTY Powder—naturelle, rachel, flesh, white. Pompeian BLOOM—light, dark, medium. Pompeian MAS-SAGE Cream (60c), for oily skins; Pompeian NIGHT Cream (50c), for dry skins; Pompeian FRAGRANCE (30c), a talcum with a real perfume odor.

Pompeian DAY CREAM

Get 1922 Panel—Five Samples Sent With It

"Honeymooning in Venice." What romance! The golden moonlit balcony! The blue lagoon! The swift-gliding gondolas! The serenading gondoliers! Tinkling mandolins! The sighing winds of evening! Ah, the memories of a thousand Venetian years! Such is the story revealed in the new 1922 Pompeian panel. Size 28 x 7 1/4 inches. In beautiful colors. Sent for only 10c. This is the most beautiful and expensive panel we have ever offered. Art store value 50c to $1. Money gladly refunded if not wholly satisfactory. With each order for an Art Panel we will send samples of Pompeian BEAUTY Powder, DAY Cream (vanishing), BLOOM, NIGHT Cream (an improved cold cream), and Pompeian FRAGRANCE (a talc). With these samples you can make many interesting beauty experiments. Please tear off coupon now and enclose a dime.

THE POMPEIAN COMPANY, 2001 Payne Avenue, Cleveland, Ohio
Also Made in Canada

GUARANTEE

The name Pompeian on any package is your guarantee of quality and safety. Should you not be completely satisfied, the purchase price will be gladly refunded by The Pompeian Co., at Cleveland, Ohio.

TEAR OFF NOW

To mail or to put in purse as shopping-reminder

THE POMPEIAN COMPANY
2001 Payne Avenue, Cleveland, O.
Gentlemen: I enclose 10c. (a dime preferred) for 1922 Art Panel. Also please send five samples named in offer.

Name _____
Address _____
City _____
State _____

Naturelle shade powder sent unless you write another below.

Genuine
Fuller Brushes
carry this tag in addition to the trade mark. Look for both!

Fuller

Immaculate Floors

UNDER radiators, into nooks and corners—nowhere can dust and dirt hide from the Fuller Wonder Mop. Its soft, fluffy strands gather and hold dirt until shaken out. It may be washed and put through the wringer—losing none of its dust-absorbing qualities. Both sides are always ready. It's light and convenient to handle.

We are the largest buyers of brush material in the world, therefore, get better quality at lower prices.—So do the users of Fuller Brushes. Genuine Fuller Brushes carry the Fuller Red Tip Tag and the Fuller trade mark on the handles.

They are never sold in stores. A staff of 2500 representatives demonstrates them in the home. Every Fuller Man is expert in household efficiency, courteous, worthy of the House behind him, welcomed everywhere. There is a Fuller Man living in your vicinity. If you want him to call, write us. May we send you "The Handy Brush Book"? It's free.

The Fuller Brush Company

Hartford, Connecticut

Fuller Brush Co., Ltd.

Hamilton, Canada

Branch Offices in over 150 cities —consult telephone directory.

FULLER BRUSHES

69 USES — HEAD TO FOOT — CELLAR TO ATTIC

The Right Kind of Public School Teachers Needed

(Continued from Page 8)

a normal school and that every high-school teacher should be a college graduate.

It is simpler to begin with the technical phase of the situation, and the point of departure there is that of the seven hundred thousand teachers in the country only one-fifth are adequately trained. That fact was emphasized in two previous articles in this series on public schools. It is one thing upon which there is agreement between Commissioner Tigert, of the United States Bureau of Education, and the National Educational Association. The teachers themselves admit lack of training and knowledge. Parents and taxpayers very slowly are beginning to wake up to the significance of it.

The situation was bad prior to 1917, although it attracted little attention. It is far worse now in 1922 than before the war, in spite of school salary increases and the work which has been done in the last two years. At the beginning of the present school year Commissioner Tigert intimated that the teacher shortage was over. The National Educational Association does not agree with him on that point. It finds the need for good teachers more grave and urgent than ever, and it deplors the effect which may come from any mistaken assurance on the part of the Government.

"The false cry that there is no teacher shortage must not go unchallenged," says the Journal of the National Educational Association. The business of school-teaching was shot to pieces by the war, like every other undertaking of peace, and has not recovered. Its losses in personnel were enormous and, as a rule, the teachers who left the schools were the best. They left to enter war service or because the increased cost of living made maintenance on teacher wages too difficult. Experienced women who stayed on in the lower schools received less money than the eighth-grade boys who quit school to do unskilled labor in war activities.

Plus the exodus from the trained teaching ranks there was, for a period of two years, almost complete cessation in the recruiting of good new stock. For that same period the vacancies all through the country were filled with makeshift candidates, untrained and unfitted in every way for school work. Thousands of these makeshifts are still in the schools. Thousands of good teachers who left in 1917 and 1918 have not returned. It is estimated that in the city of Washington alone there are to-day ten thousand former women school-teachers working in government departments. They were among the best who left the schools. But now they are taking stenographic notes for bureau chiefs and spending their days in fingering the cards of index boxes instead of working with the children who need them.

The Hope of the Future

THE hope of the future is not chiefly in the return of old teachers, nor in the possibility of improving the poor personnel that came into the service in the emergency of war. The hope is in the splendid nucleus of experienced, worthwhile teachers still in the service in each state, in the recruiting of the next five years, in raising of standards and in the weeding-out process. The very kernel of the hope is in the possibility that in the new stock there may be found everywhere an increasing number of the sort of young women who used to take to teaching as a matter of course, but who have been turning away from it for the last two generations. Realization of that hope would remedy both the defects of the situation attributable to the recent war and those of the preceding years. The schools need many thousands of educated teachers whose parents and grandparents were educated or wanted to be. As Oliver Wendell Holmes said, a man's education should begin with his grandfather.

A place on the teachers' salary list should not be given to a girl primarily to enable her to make a living or to please her father, who may have some influence in local politics. Mere desire to help the young woman to earn something, which might justify her employment in shop, store or factory, regardless of qualifications, is not sufficient in the matter of selecting a teacher. For every teacher thus selected thirty children have their right to receive proper instruction violated. It is not necessary to put up a warning against snobbishness. No snobs will enter the profession of teaching until it is far more fashionable than it is to-day.

There is no college president nor normal-school principal nor chairman of a board of education in the older American states on the Atlantic seaboard who will not tell you that there has been deterioration in the quality and personality of the stock from which teachers are drawn.

President J. A. C. Chandler, of William and Mary College, who has had to do with the training and selection of teachers all his professional life, admits this for the South. "After the Civil War," he told me, "when our families were impoverished, the women of those families, married and unmarried, were driven to teaching to make a living. They were not trained for the work, but they were cultivated women, women of education and breeding and loyalty to the work into which circumstances had forced them. And they had an inspiring and civilizing influence on the children of the public schools which was of great cultural value. Now women of their sort have for the most part disappeared from the schools. In their places we have many sincere, ambitious young women who are much better qualified for the work so far as technical training is concerned, but into that training we must learn to put the indispensable something which will bring back to our teaching force the cultural background."

Always the Question of Pay

IN THE Middle Atlantic and the New England States the story is substantially the same. Critics of the West put it a little differently.

As to the solution of this great teacher difficulty and the allied problems, there is agreement that much more money must be expended on schools in backward states; that the rich states, acting indirectly through the medium of the Federal Government, must help the states that cannot do enough for themselves. There is earnest effort everywhere to devise more effective methods for selling school bonds. Everybody admits that the teacher's pay and tenure of work must be put on a decent and safe basis. There is increasing and healthful vigor in the lasting controversy as to the methods of training.

The college advocates denounce the normal schools as teaching how to teach, but giving nothing to teach. The normal-school adherents, on the other hand, declare that we have gone far beyond the theory that anybody can teach what he or she has learned, without knowing a standardized method for imparting it. The controversy is now spreading beyond the professional groups who began it and attracting the attention of those who are interested primarily in results on twenty-five million boys and girls, rather than in methods. The dispute is far more useful than apathy, regardless of the merits of the case. In the meantime normal-school enrollment is increasing in nearly all states. A few states have abandoned or are contemplating the abandonment of their normal schools, which are to be replaced with teachers' colleges or

(Continued on Page 66)

The Diary of a Lonesome Girl

Dear Diary:

September 12

I promised to tell you everything, Dear Diary, and I'm going to keep my promise. But it's awfully hard sometimes to write down just how I feel. For I am so discouraged. Met Edith Williams today on the car. She was going somewhere with Jimmy. And her clothes were so becoming that I envied her. My hair is prettier than Edith's, isn't it? And my eyes—and my complexion? Then why am I always so lonesome—so much alone? Can't you help me, Diary? Bobbie's better today.

September 15

More trouble, Diary. Mother said today that the money she'd saved for my new dress would have to go to pay Bobbie's doctor bill. I'm trying to be brave, Diary, but I'm so disappointed. I wanted to go to a dance on the 26th. Shall I go, Diary? I wonder if I can fix up that white organdie from last season?

September 18

Went to church this morning. Walked home with Alice Browning. Saw Jimmy. He's always with Edith Williams. Oh, if I only had some pretty clothes—just a few of them, Diary, how happy I would be! Mother tries so hard to save, but Dad never earned a large salary. And everything I earn goes toward keeping house. But I can still smile, can't I, Diary?

September 23

I've decided to wear my organdie to the dance. I do hope none of the girls remember it from last year. That new sash may help. Do men ever remember dresses, Diary? Jimmy will be there with Edith. Always Edith Williams. Oh, if I only had some becoming clothes!

September 27

I couldn't write to you last night, Diary—I just couldn't. I cried myself to sleep when I got home from the dance. Every girl had a new dress but me. I think Edith Williams' was best of all. Do you think Jimmy will marry her? He hardly looked at me last night. Isn't there something I can do to get pretty clothes?

October 15

Met Mrs. Peters today, with her two children. Poor woman—she hasn't had a new dress in years. She can't afford those in the shops and she can scarcely sew at all. I wish I could sew, Diary—then I could make my own clothes. Saw Jimmy walking down the street today while I was buying a magazine, but he didn't see me. I guess he was thinking of Edith Williams.

October 16

Remember that magazine I bought yesterday? Well, I sat up late last night reading it. I just couldn't put it down. For in it I found the story of a girl just like myself. She couldn't afford pretty clothes, either, and she was, oh, so discouraged. And then she learned of a school that teaches you, right at home, to make your own clothes for a half or a third of what you would usually pay. Do you think I could learn, too, Diary? I'm going to find out, anyway.

October 19

Early today the postman brought me a good thick letter from the Woman's Institute. I fairly snatched it from his hand. Guess he thought it was a love-letter. Why, Diary, do you know the Institute is the most wonderful school I ever heard of? Think of it! While I've been so unhappy, thousands of other girls have been learning right at home to make just the kind of pretty clothes they've always wanted. If they can do it, why can't I? I can, Diary, and I'm going to!

November 16

I know I've forgotten you for some time, Diary, but I've been awfully busy since I enrolled with the Woman's Institute. Diary, I'm actually learning how to make the pretty clothes I have always wanted. I've finished the first three lessons, and already I've made the prettiest blouse. Just think of being able to have pretty things for just the cost of materials!

January 30

Well, it's happened, Diary. There was another dance last night and I wore my new dress. You should have seen the girls. They were so surprised. They all wanted to know where I bought it. And when I told them I had made it myself they would hardly believe me. And the men! Don't tell me they don't notice pretty things. My dance card was filled in five minutes. Jimmy and Edith aren't engaged yet, Diary. Jimmy's coming to see me on Wednesday night.

April 15

Here it is only the middle of April and already I have more pretty spring clothes than I ever had in my life. And altogether they have cost me no more than one really good dress or suit would have cost ready made. Oh, there's a world of difference in the cost of things, Diary, when you make them yourself and pay only for the materials. Besides, I've made over all my last year's clothes—they look as pretty as the new ones and the expense of new trimmings and findings was almost nothing at all.

May 8

Awfully busy, Diary. I've started to sew for other people. I made a silk dress for Mrs. Scott and a blouse for Mrs. Perry last week. Mrs. Scott paid me $10 and Mrs. Perry $5.25. Think of it, Diary—little me who couldn't sew a stitch a few months ago, making clothes for other people! Mother says I'm going to earn $30 a week soon.

May 20

The most wonderful, wonderful thing has happened, Diary. Jimmy has asked me to marry him. It's to be in the fall. And my trousseau will be the finest that any girl ever had. Because I'm going to make it all myself. Jimmy wanted to know what had caused the change in me, and I told him all about the Woman's Institute. He wouldn't believe it until I showed him my lessons. He looked them over and then said they were so easy that he thought he would take up dress-making himself. Imagine Jimmy sewing, Diary!

May 26

Gladys Graham came in to see me today. I think she had been crying. Said she was discouraged because she didn't have pretty clothes. Then I told her all about the Woman's Institute. I think she's going to find out about it. I hope so. Think where I would be if I hadn't seen that magazine. Good-bye, Diary—Jimmy's here and I can't neglect him even for you.

What this "Lonesome Girl" has done you can do, too. There is not the slightest doubt of it. More than 125,000 women and girls, in city, town and country, have proved by the clothes they have made and the dollars they have saved, that you can easily learn at home, through the Woman's Institute, to make all your own and your children's clothes or prepare for success in the dress-making or millinery profession.

It makes no difference where you live, because all the instruction is carried on by mail. And it is no disadvantage if you are employed during the day or have household duties that occupy most of your time, because you can devote as much or as little time to the course as you desire and just whenever it is convenient.

Send for Handsome 64-page Booklet

It tells all about the Woman's Institute. It describes the courses in detail, and explains how you, too, can learn easily and quickly, in spare time at home, to make your own clothes and hats, and dress better at less cost, or prepare for success in the dress-making or millinery profession.

Use the coupon below or write a letter or post card to the Woman's Institute, Dept. 38-C, Scranton, Penna. A copy of this handsome booklet will come to you, absolutely free, by return mail.

TEAR OUT HERE

WOMAN'S INSTITUTE
Dept. 38-C, Scranton, Penna.

Without cost or obligation, please send me one of your booklets and tell me how I can learn the subject which I have marked below:

☐ Home Dressmaking ☐ Millinery
☐ Professional Dressmaking ☐ Cooking

Name _____
(Please specify whether Mrs. or Miss)

Address _____

Walls that smile a Welcome

You can have walls which are beautifully tinted to harmonize with your rugs and furnishings. Walls clean, sanitary and artistic—exactly your taste in color, a pleasing background for your personality.

And, whether you do the work yourself or employ a decorator, walls which add charm and cheerfulness to your home will cost you little if you use

Alabastine

Instead of Kalsomine or Wall Paper

Just mix Alabastine—standard colors—with cold water—or intermix two or more to produce other colors—and apply with a suitable brush over any interior surface. But be sure the cross and circle, printed in red—the sign of genuine Alabastine—is on every package. You can get Alabastine at any good store selling paints.

Write for Free Booklet and Alabastine-
Opaline Samples

The latest style in home decoration and the new and beautiful three color harmony effects produced by the Alabastine-Opaline Process sent free. Ask for the advice of our experts on any special decorating problem.

PRICES

5-lb. package white Alabastine . . . 75c
5-lb. package tinted Alabastine . . . 80c
Special deep shades (No. 33 dark green,
No. 58 deep brown) . . . 95c

Alabastine Company
549 Grandville Avenue
Grand Rapids, Michigan

The Right Kind of Public School Teachers Needed

(Continued from Page 65)

teacher-training courses in universities and colleges already established.

The main thing for parents to know, and upon which they may base their hope with considerable assurance, is that there is a very deep movement now on to give this country more schools and more and better teachers. We lack both numbers and quality. This movement is deep rather than widespread. The parents must take hold everywhere to give it the support and the sympathy without which it cannot succeed.

Two great agencies which need and are worthy of their support, which already are in the thick of the fight and have been for several years, are the National Educational Association and the Parents-Teachers Association. The aims and spirit of these organizations cannot be overestimated, but too much may be expected of them unless parents, teachers, taxpayers, all men and women interested in the welfare of children help their work by participating in it. For the entire country the membership of the Parents-Teachers Association is about three hundred thousand. The affiliated membership of the National Education Association, through subsidiary bodies, is about four hundred thousand. But there should be millions of names on the rolls of these two associations. Remember, there are twenty-five million school children in America.

It is through the National Education Association that the teachers are creating for themselves a lofty standard of ethics and striving to put their calling on a plane which the public will admit is that of the highest profession. For example, the eighth article of the code of ethics of the Michigan Teachers is this: "It is unprofessional for the teacher to measure his duties and responsibilities to the pupils, to the school or the community in terms of financial rewards." Teachers of Pennsylvania in their enumeration of principles state: "Our purpose is the public good, the welfare of the child; not the personal interests of our members."

In every state the National Association is working for legislation that will make the teacher's place worthy of the best men and women in the country, and that will require that every teacher be worthy of the place. "The call to service," says Miss Charl Ormond Williams, president of the Association, "has never been clearer than now. There are important tasks ahead—big, challenging tasks that call for the best effort of the organized teachers of the nation. The call is to educators of all classes and ranks. Adequate elementary education must be provided for every American child, which means that there must be enormous improvement, particularly in rural education. Secondary education must eventually be made a vital, universal opportunity for every boy and girl."

Oh, for an Awakening!

THE work of the Parents-Teachers Association is an intimate, personal thing. It strives to give to every teacher the place in the social life of the community which belongs to her by right of the nature of her calling and it means to have her personality fit the calling. On the other hand it serves to give the parents an opportunity to know the work of the school and to participate actively in its improvement.

But in addition to all that such voluntary associations can do, in addition to all the state and local governments can do to improve conditions and raise standards and salaries, there still must be that something else which cannot come from school legislation but which the country must have if it is to raise the next generation of young men and women, equipped with something in addition to and fully as important as textbook school-workshop efficiency.

It is a large order. The element in the American population best fitted to fill it is that of the young men and women, particularly the young women of this generation who have much to give, but do not know that they have it and do not know how much it is needed. There would be no hesitation if these girls could be made to realize the far-reaching national value of the service they might render if they would. They would repeat the women's war record of 1917, one of the most splendid things in American history. There would be a few at first, here and there; and then a wave of interest and determination over the whole country, a new enthusiasm for teaching for the sake of teaching, if only the awakening could come, if the women already enrolled in the work could make more of those outside realize what an opportunity for true patriotism and service they are missing.

Miss Florence Purington, dean of Mount Holyoke College, asks every girl who enters the freshman class what work she hopes to do in the world after graduation. A majority of them, the dean told me, reply that they want to go into some sort of social-welfare service.

"When I tell them," continued Miss Purington, "that the greatest social service they can render is teaching school their faces fall. They are disappointed and lose interest. They don't know exactly what they mean when they say they want social service, but they have vague, pleasant ideas that it is something picturesque and romantic, something new, only recently discovered. They see no glamour in school teaching. It is prosaic, old fashioned, nothing that they could be keen and eager for, nothing that would give them pride and excitement. The girls are not wholly to blame. In many cases their parents are prejudiced against teaching, especially teaching in the grade schools, where the service of educated and cultivated young women is most needed."

America Needs its Young Women

NO DOUBT the dean of every other women's college in the country could tell the same story. It does not indicate the spirit of 1917. Once more service and sacrifice are demanded as when, five years ago, tens of thousands of American women were serving overseas and in the war work at home.

Again they should volunteer by the tens of thousands. Every graduating class of every women's college should send its quota into the service. These volunteers should become a great American sisterhood of teaching and learning, working from coast to coast, imbued with the spirit of sacrifice that all the children of America may have a chance to grow up with capacity for appreciation and understanding of the joy of living as well as with certainty that they must earn a living. It would mean sacrifice of course. But it's the only way. Why should it not be demanded of those who have to give?

There would be ample reward. There is not much difference between war service and school service when measured in the terms of obstacles and hardships and endurance, and these are the things that enter into both.

Suppose for a moment that there never before had been any rural or country schools in the United States, no attempt to educate anybody except the children of the rich in cities by private tutoring, and that suddenly there began a great crusade for teaching of children in every nook and corner of the country. There would be no lack of volunteers and missionaries. It would be again as in the war of 1917.

The present need is almost as urgent as if we had not tried all these years, after a fashion, to have schools everywhere.

The logic of the thing is simple. Those thousands of women who served in the war did so because they were convinced that their help was needed to save this nation. But it has been an American axiom from the beginning that the hope of this nation is in the schools of its children, the heart and soul of this nation is in the character and intelligence and education of the citizenship, the foundation for which must be laid in those schools. So to-day it is for the task of maintaining its hope of the future and in safeguarding its very soul that America needs the service of its young women.

A Beauty Secret 3,000 Years Old

The use of palm and olive oils to keep the skin fresh and smooth is nothing new, but a secret known to pretty girls since Cleopatra's time. Her Palmolive came in vessels and jars, and she had to do her own mixing. But the beautifying cleanser she achieved was the inspiration of the mild, soothing blend science produces today.

Take a lesson from Cleopatra, who kept her youthful beauty long after girlhood's days had passed. She used cosmetics to embellish and enhance her charm, just as women do today. But the foundation was a skin thoroughly and healthfully cleansed from all clogging and dangerous accumulations.

Perfected for washing faces

Palmolive is blended from the same palm and olive oils Cleopatra used—they are the mildest, most soothing ingredients science has been able to discover.

The scientific combination of these rare oils produces a smooth, creamy, lotion-like lather. Palmolive soothes and beautifies while it cleanses. It keeps the skin of the face and body beautifully soft and smooth.

The importance of thorough cleansing

It is absolutely essential to complexion beauty to wash your face thoroughly once a day. Palmolive makes this cleansing doubly beneficial by its mildness.

The profuse, creamy lather penetrates each tiny pore, removing the deposits of dirt, oil and perspiration which cause clogging and enlargement. Such cleansing is the secret of fresh, smooth skins, as results prove.

Don't neglect the body

Care of the complexion only begins with the face. Neck, arms and shoulders should be kept white and smooth.

Use Palmolive for bathing and these results are accomplished. It does for your body what it does for the face. If this seems an extravagance, remember the modest price. The firm, long-wearing cake of generous size costs but ten cents.

Our price secret

If Palmolive were made in small quantities it would be a very expensive soap. Palm and olive oils are costly soap ingredients, and come from overseas.

But the popularity which requires enormous production has reduced the price to that of ordinary soaps. 25-cent quality is offered for 10 cents.

THE PALMOLIVE COMPANY, Milwaukee, U. S. A.
THE PALMOLIVE COMPANY OF CANADA, Limited, Toronto, Ontario
Makers of a complete line of toilet articles

Volume and efficiency produce
25-cent quality for

10c

The famous N. B. C.
Trade Mark—
a guarantee of perfect baking.

Uneeda Biscuit,
the world's best soda cracker.

N. B. C.
Graham Crackers.
Golden brown squares of nourishment.

Zu Zu Ginger Snaps.
They keep all appetites young.

Better than Baking

Many a wise homekeeper finds that it is far easier, and far better, to stock the pantry shelf with a few varieties of National Biscuit Company products than to stand and bake for hours, with all the attendant uncertainties of baking day.

These women know that every food occasion is improved by some N. B. C. table aid. They know also that no matter when or where a package is purchased or opened, the contents are fresh, attractive to the eye, appealing to the palate, nourishing to the body.

Keep the N. B. C. pantry shelf idea working in your home. The many advantages will delight you.

NATIONAL BISCUIT COMPANY

The World's Needs Cry for Women's Work in Lent

DURING the Lenten season—the six weeks preceding Easter—many of the women's organizations of our churches combine with their devotional duties the greatest possible amount of service to others. In the past much good work has been done during this time. This year we must do even more, for a large part of the world is looking for help to the church women of America.

From the American Red Cross comes news of a special Lenten opportunity to obtain clothing for the children of Russia. During the winter hundreds of thousands of starving children in that great and terrible famine district of the Volga Valley have been fed by the American Relief Administration and clothed by the American Friends Service Committee—Quakers—the pioneers in this relief work. The part which the American Red Cross has taken in this combined program has been to provide medical aid. Now the Red Cross, through its chapters, is planning also to work with the American Friends Service Committee in providing clothing for the Russian children.

To comprehend at all the horrible conditions that exist in Russia and the vital need for outside help, it would be necessary to travel through the Volga Valley, formerly the overflowing granary for the whole country, but last summer a barren waste from the unprecedented drought and heat; to talk with the peasants who have lived through the winter on horse flesh and bread made from dried grasses; to visit the homes for abandoned children in Samara, the heart of the famine area, where the death rate among the babies is over 90 per cent.

We cannot fully realize these facts simply by reading them, but our imagination can be stirred and our sympathy quickened. There can be no cessation in the work of relief until such new crops as the peasants were able to plant last fall have been harvested, and, since the need for clothing is second only to that for food, no better Lenten activity could be undertaken than cooperation with the Red Cross in making the necessary garments.

WHETHER the sewing you do is for Russian children or for a local hospital or children's home, there are the same ways of securing the best results in the space of time allotted. As many new workers as possible should be recruited, the women of the community appealed to for left-over pieces of new material and odds and ends of no longer fashionable goods bought at reduced prices.

Have all plans completed before the first meeting. It is a good idea to have a preliminary meeting to cut out and make ready the material; then at the first regular meeting make a special effort for full attendance and have an interesting speaker to explain the cause for which you are working and what you hope to accomplish during the next six weeks. When practicable arrange both afternoon and evening meetings, that none may be debarred because of an inconvenient hour, and so far as is possible let each woman choose the work for which she feels herself best suited.

Short lengths of material, which are apt to be more numerous than long ones among your donations, can be put to splendid use in making children's clothes. Two yards of woolen material is enough for a child's coat, and odd lengths of a yard or more will make little slip-over sweaters that are warm and comfortable. Even half a yard of material will make a cap, and two twelve-inch circles of heavy cloth can be sewn together to form a practical and attractive tam-o'-shanter. Warm underwear, woolen mittens and mufflers also can be made from odds and ends.

Before starting this work in your church or clubs get in touch with your local Red Cross organization and see what they are planning to do. Many of them will be able and glad to give you advice and assistance. They will also advise you about packing and shipping the garments when completed.

To arouse interest in a call from India for surgical dressings, the women's organization of one church arranged an exhibition which could easily be adapted to the dramatizing of almost any appeal. On the night of the regular midweek service, when an attendance of more than a hundred could be counted upon, the floor of the social room of the church was covered with sheets pinned to the carpet, a small white bed with immaculate sheets and pillow cases was placed in the room and upon it was a man dummy borrowed from a local tailor to play the rôle of patient. A doctor and nurse, in uniform, both members of the church, explained the various surgical dressings, samples of which had been prepared, and told of the need for them in this mission hospital in India. When the evening was over seven bolts of muslin had been pledged and a large number of women had volunteered to make dressings.

THE young girls and the children of the church will prove among its best workers, once their interest and enthusiasm are aroused. Let the girls make dolls, for the many children in our hospitals and orphan asylums. A quaint, inexpensive and very attractive homemade rag doll has a body of discarded silk or lisle stockings stuffed with cotton, a smiling face painted on a white muslin head and a tight-fitting cap. Her clothes may be as simple or as elaborate as her maker wishes.

Children's hospitals are always clamoring for toys that are easy to handle. Cut-out puzzles are fine for children propped up in bed, since they are light in weight and will entertain for hours at a time. Take two pictures of the same size, choosing simple subjects that a child will understand and enjoy, and paste one on each side of a piece of cardboard. After applying the pictures to the board go over it with a wooden rolling-pin to prevent the existence of air spaces. Leave the covered board under a weight for twenty-four hours. Then with a sharp pair of scissors cut the picture into oddly shaped pieces, place in a manila envelope and write the names of the two pictures on the outside. Scrapbooks, paper dolls, doll houses made by pasting in a blank book furniture, pictures, food, and so on, cut from advertisements, and paper menageries are other toys that little boys and girls can make for less fortunate children.

EVEN more than any gifts that could be made to them, the old people in any near-by institution will appreciate a visit from the children themselves. A nice plan is to let the children raise potted bulbs, either as a group at the church or in their own homes, and take the blooms on the Saturday before Easter to these lonely old folks.

As for the confirmed invalids and shut-ins of the neighborhood, those at least who are able to use their hands should be visited, not in a spirit of sympathetic but obvious pity, but to ask their help in carrying out your work. There will be easy bits of sewing for them to do, faces to paint on the rag dolls—a hundred and one ways in which they can be of use and, through service to others, forget for a time their own helplessness.

WE ARE likely to think of yeast-made products as uninteresting. But, besides bread, all the wonderful glazed and embellished Danish pastry; gorgeously sticky cinnamon buns; sugarcoated and almond-garnished tea rings; and raisin and nut loaves, are products of the yeast cake. The recipes for these and for other simply made cakes and rolls are given below.

Good Things Made from Yeast

RUSKS. A cupful of light dough is reserved from your ordinary bread mixture, and one well-beaten egg, a tablespoonful of softened butter and two tablespoonfuls of sugar are added, with perhaps a very little more flour, to enable you to knead it easily. Make the sweetened dough into a ball, place in a greased bowl and let rise, pushing it down with the finger tips when it becomes very light. An hour before the rusks are needed make the dough into balls the size of large marbles, place in greased pans, and when very light bake about ten minutes. After the rusks are finished and before they become sufficiently brown, brush them over with a mixture of one tablespoonful of sugar, one of cream or rich milk and a few drops of vanilla; then return them to the oven to glaze.

COFFEE RINGS are made from a dough that is slightly richer than that used for rusks. To a heaping cupful of light dough add two well-beaten eggs, a quarter of a cupful of sugar, and two tablespoonfuls of softened butter, with whatever flour may be required for kneading. After this has become very light and puffy it is divided into equal parts and pulled into narrow strips no larger than a lead pencil. Then the strips are cut into pieces five or six inches long and plaited in three strands, the plaits afterward being formed into rings. Moisten the ends of the dough slightly before making the rings, then press them together firmly and they will adhere nicely. Place the rings two inches apart in a greased baking pan or on a baking sheet, and when light bake them a delicate brown, which will require about twenty minutes. Brush them over with the glaze described for rusks and, while still moist, sprinkle them with finely chopped almonds. If for a party, they may be iced with a confectioners' icing, in white or pink.

This icing is made by mixing smoothly three tablespoonfuls of four-X confectioners' sugar with one of cold or warm water and adding a few drops of vanilla, lemon or almond extract. Apply it to the rings and let them dry before serving. Pink-tinted icing is made of the fine confectioners' sugar mixed with fresh or canned strawberry or raspberry juice, or the white icing may be tinted a pale rose with a vegetable coloring and flavored with almond. Chopped pistachio nuts make a good finish to a pink-iced ring, but chopped almonds or pecans are quite as delicious.

BUTTER BUNS. Use at least half the bread dough for them. Make the mixture for rusks or, if for holiday occasions, that for cinnamon buns, and, when light for the last time, make it into balls the size of large walnuts; let them rise well, then in the center of each press a cube of sugar and a piece of butter about half the size of the sugar. Bake the buns ten to fifteen minutes, and brush them over with the glaze described for rusks.

DANISH PASTRY. The dough as prepared for the coffee rings previously described will make a fine imitation of the original at less expense of time and toil, for the usual manner of making Danish pastry is rather fussy and troublesome. Prepare the dough as usual, with butter, sugar and eggs, and when light knead it well and roll it out one-quarter of an inch thick. Then spread it plentifully with bits of butter. Fold it over so that the butter is all securely inclosed and roll it again; now fold it in three, and stand it in the refrigerator for several hours to chill, taking care, however, that the cold is not so intense as to kill the yeast plants.

When the chilling process is complete, place the dough on the molding board and roll it out once more. It is then ready to be made into any desired form.

RINGS are made by cutting the dough into strips an inch wide and five long, then twisting the ends of the strips in opposite directions and fastening together. Place in a greased pan to rise. Bowknots are also made of the twisted pastry; figure eights are popular favorites; crescents, braids and other forms are all made of the chilled, yeast-risen dough, and baked quickly when light.

The cakes are partly cooled and ornamented in a variety of ways. A glaze of melted jelly makes a delicious finish. The jelly, which may be any desired variety, is placed over the fire in hot water and stirred occasionally until it becomes liquid; then it is brushed over the cakes, which, while moist and sticky, are dipped in chopped nuts.

Confectioners' icing is sometimes spread over the cakes, and shredded almonds pressed into it before the icing is dry. Lemon honey, candied cherries, angelica, citron, raisins, and so on, are employed in fanciful ways to make these delicious things still more enticing.

CARAMEL BUNS are made from the rusk dough. Knead and let rise once or twice as directed, then roll the dough out one-quarter of an inch thick and cut it into strips six to eight inches long; meantime, cook together till well blended one tablespoonful of butter and a cupful of brown sugar; cool slightly and spread thinly on the strips of dough; roll these strips round and round, snail fashion, and place them in greased muffin pans; let rise till quite puffy and light, then bake ten to fifteen minutes. When finished, brush with a glaze of brown sugar and milk; sprinkle with chopped nuts and return to a cool oven until dry.

BELGIUM CAKE requires six or seven cupfuls of flour, half a pint of lukewarm milk, four egg yolks, half a yeast cake, a cupful of melted butter, half a pound of seeded and slightly chopped raisins, three-quarters of a cupful of sugar, a teaspoonful of salt, one-quarter of a pound of almonds blanched and chopped; also a few bits of candied orange peel.

Dissolve the yeast in a little tepid water and add all but one dessertspoonful to the milk; then stir in a portion of the flour, add the salt, beat well, and let rise in a warm place. Whip the egg yolks and sugar together and add them with the melted butter to the light dough; beat in the chopped almonds and the peel, together with the yeast which was reserved, and the remainder of the flour. Set the dough aside to rise again, then mold into a long narrow loaf and, after it has become light, bake about forty-five minutes.

When finished, cover with a glaze or confectioners' icing and decorate with cherries or pistachio nuts.

MOTHER can take her day off and turn this recipe and the kitchen over to the children. And she can rest assured that they will enjoy themselves—and enjoy their meal:

Scalloped Fish—Melt 2 tablespoonfuls butter. Add 2 tablespoonfuls flour and $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon salt. Mix well and add $\frac{1}{2}$ cups milk. Bring to boiling point, stirring constantly. Remove from heat, add $\frac{1}{2}$ cups flaked cooked fish and $\frac{1}{4}$ cup Premier Salad Dressing. Pour into greased ramekins, cover with crumbs, and dot with small pieces of butter. Bake until crumbs are brown and mixture is hot.

Here's a supper the youngsters can get

KISS them good-bye; you needn't worry about their supper.

Leave in the ice-box the few simple things for which the recipe calls.

And a bottle of Premier Salad Dressing—by the magic of its flavor it can transform even an ordinary dish into a party—a feast.

With the Premier book of "Salads, Suppers and Picnics" offered below, the youngsters can take care of themselves whenever you're away. Encourage them to do it.

They can make fifty good things with Premier; and in getting a meal without your help they develop self-reliance.

That's another good thing.

Without any cost to you, the Premier book "Salads, Suppers and Picnics" will be sent. It is full of helpful suggestions for the daily household problem of determining what to serve. Address below.

Premier Salad Dressing

FRANCIS H. LEGGETT & CO.

Dept. 5A
NEW YORK

Too Early

Babies don't need Pebeco, for they have no teeth. Neither do older persons whom "Acid-Mouth" has robbed of their teeth—it is then too late for Pebeco.

But for folks who have teeth and want to keep them, Pebeco is the right tooth paste. Cleans the teeth, keeps them firm, and counteracts "Acid-Mouth"—a condition that causes rapid tooth decay.

Too Late

How to tell if you have "Acid-Mouth"

First, send for Litmus Test Papers and generous trial tube of Pebeco

Then moisten a blue Litmus Test Paper on your tongue. If it turns pink, that indicates an acid condition in the mouth. Brush your teeth with Pebeco and make another test. The paper will not change color, thus demonstrating how Pebeco helps to counteract "Acid-Mouth."

Fill in the coupon now, enclose ten cents and mail to us at once. The Litmus Test Papers and big trial tube of Pebeco will be sent you immediately.

LEHN & FINK, INC.
635 Greenwich Street, New York

Enclosed find 10 cents, for which please send me your Litmus Test Papers and large Trial Tube of Pebeco.

Name _____
Street and No. _____
City and Town _____
State _____

LEHN & FINK, INC.
635 Greenwich Street, New York

Ask your Druggist for the Pebeco Tooth Brush—it cleans every part of every tooth

Harold F. Ritchie & Co., Canadian Agents, 10 McCaul Street, Toronto

The Sins of the Parents

(Continued from Page 28)

authorities of the school upon her father's business stationery, forged her father's signature, asking to be excused from her school attendance for the rest of the school year on account of illness.

This letter was accepted as a genuine document, and Olga stayed out of school four months without the parents' knowledge, leaving the house at the customary half past eight each morning and returning at the customary four in the afternoon. At the beginning of the new year Olga came to her father telling him she had failed in two subjects and therefore had to make up that work before she could enter the second year. This did not sound altogether clear to the father, and he decided to find out from the school direct the facts regarding his daughter's situation.

Only then did he learn of his daughter's absence from school, and only then did the school learn of the forgery. There was a tremendous scene, which has nothing to do with the point I wish to make; it is sufficient to state that the father was furious and dumfounded, and that the school, seeing only the crime which Olga had committed and refusing to see its cause, refused to take her back under any circumstances at any time.

The case has this bit of brightness to it. The crisis which the forgery led to opened the eyes of the parents to the truth. Pride is conquered, and they understand Olga's case; and at last, at eighteen, she is beginning to receive the treatment she should have had all these eighteen years.

Parents and Teachers at Fault

IT MAY be of value to any parents whose children are in any way sources of embarrassment to know that Olga is fundamentally of a fine nature. In contrast to her reprehensible conduct at school, she is naturally honorable, sensitive, thoughtful and delightfully sympathetic. What Olga had needed was as much attention to the care of her mental and emotional life as had been given to her physical life. If the parents had really considered Olga and not themselves, they would have known that this child at the age of six, looking twice her age, should not have been a member of a large class where she was always the center of the children's stares, the subject of their talk and the object of twitting torment. Even her teachers did not always remember that, though large, she was as young in age as the others; as a result they expected more of her than of the other children. All these irritations and demands of her school environment, plus her developed shame at her great size, served to make her abnormally self-conscious, sensitive, suspicious; she saw everyone as against her or ready to make fun of her. These unsympathetic circumstances forced her to center her entire mind upon herself, and she had no mind left to concentrate upon her studies. Olga is making rapid progress under the special training she now receives, but the effects of the years of suffering and retardation can never be wholly eradicated, and the years she has lost can never be restored to her.

We parents cannot bear to have our children criticized by others, to hear that they are in any sense imperfect. The result too frequently is that we, by covering our child's errors, defending his misdeeds and explaining away his shortcomings, are guilty of cultivating and nourishing our child's faults. We feel that this attitude in resenting unpleasant truths about our children is prompted by our love for them. As a parent I know this is only a small part of the truth. We defend, explain, gloss over our child's faults because of our own personal pride, because of our deep-rooted vanity. Our child's faults, if they are admitted, reflect our faults; we therefore plainly don't like them to be seen. We do not perceive that what we mean to be a kindness from our heart to serve and shield our child is more than likely to turn out to be deforming treatment of him. Thus unknowingly we practice vices, and in the end our child must pay the penalty, sometimes a heartbreaking penalty.

Our business as parents should be honestly to face the truth that our little child is not a completed human being, but a human being in the making. We must recognize with utter frankness that the human being at birth has only primitive instincts, ready to be the unthinking instrument of the most powerful of them all, the desire for having his own way to serve his own end. These primitive instincts were doubtless essential in the early history of man when civilized society did not exist to restrain these instincts and render them unnecessary, when neighbors were few and far between, when one's livelihood was the chief concern of life, when selfishness for the individual or the group was almost imperative, and when the ethics of existence were based on the survival of the fittest.

In our modern society where our neighbors must be considered, where we fare best when all are faring well, we no longer can claim any need of our primitive instincts for the purpose of seizing property, of killing and conquering. But we must recognize that the young child does possess many of these qualities that belonged to the human race in its youth. We must so discipline, cultivate and develop our children's primitive instincts that they may serve the child without interfering with the rights of others; more than that, so that they may also become forces for greater service to others. Unless these primitive instincts and forces are controlled and directed into constructive channels, they degenerate into perverted habits.

But there are many instances where the parents do not recognize this truth; or who still believe in encouraging these selfish instincts that may have had a real use in that far time when the race was young. Such attitudes are consciously or unconsciously vicious; and sooner or later the child pays the penalty for his parents' vices, and more than likely the parents suffer from their own wrong ideas and deeds.

Robbers of Experience

PARENTS are vices when they force their adult sense of pleasure of an experience, or their idea of what is good for a child, upon the young child without giving him a chance to test that pleasure through his own experience. The result of such an act might turn what could have been a joyous experience in the child's life into a nightmare, an agony. The parent, for example, who forcibly submerges a little one in the water at a beach instead of allowing him or her gradually to learn that the big open space of water is safe and cool, is in my opinion guilty of a criminal offense. "Throw a child in the water and he'll swim out." That too widely accepted maxim is an untruth. Few children learn to swim from such a method, and learn mighty few other more important activities from this method.

Parents are vices when they have one set of manners for their servants or for home life and another for company. I know a little girl, a perfect lady with me, a perfect little devil in the kitchen. She behaves in miniature like the lady of the house. It is just this double code of manners which leads to deception and hypocrisy in children. Good manners, like good health, come from practicing good habits daily.

Parents are vices when they are impatient over their child's slow performances. Rather than allow a few minutes longer for the little one's tiny fingers to perform a task and thus acquire skill and swiftness, mothers will snatch the task out of the children's hands, do it for them quickly, admonish them for their slowness, and these very parents complain and wonder why Mary and John, when grown, cannot do things for themselves and have no desire to do so.

Parents are vices when they chide, speak lightly of, poke fun at the attraction of the opposite sex among little children. Just such parents are responsible for sowing the first pernicious seed of sex relationship. It should be the most normal and natural thing in the world for boys and girls of all ages to play together. The life force which motivates every act in the adult is behind the child's life as well. Nothing is of greater importance than to recognize that the little child from the earliest day of his existence has an emotional life and that it is our business, our supreme obligation, to provide natural, normal, joyous outlets for him. Every child from his earliest days should be given an opportunity to work in color, to hear music and to have variety in his experiences. All these provide adventure for the little child. Here is the beginning of constructive outlets for the little child's emotional force, and there is no chance of its becoming an inverted and perverted expression.

Information Before Correction

BEFORE we try to correct our child's faults we must try to understand what is behind the faults: irritability, nervousness, restlessness may be merely symptoms of a deep-rooted trouble in our child. We must guard against palliating the symptom instead of curing the disease. In correcting a child we parents must not make too many criticisms. Make one correction at a time, and that at the psychological moment when the little child is ready to receive it.

If we parents wish to keep from being vices we must not make an unalterable mold of our method of handling our child, no matter how splendid the method is. We must at all times remember that the child is not a fixed substance; that he, like ourselves, is an ever-changing, ever-growing organism and we must make the method fit his needs.

In conclusion, I wish to say that we parents have the greatest chance in the world to serve our children and, by serving our children, to build a better and stronger human race. There is no work in the world that is more exacting, more demanding, than the work of being successful parents. If we would not be vices, would not be unconscious forces for the hampering or suppressing of our children's mental and spiritual growth, then we parents must realize that to be equal to meeting our obligations we must be equipped for them physically, mentally and spiritually.

Our first business as parents should be to realize that our love must be fortified with knowledge of the nature of our child before our love can contribute toward his development. From the earliest days of our child's life we must learn to study and observe him before we begin to mold him; and one of our first tasks is to learn to sit back and watch our child in action, give him a chance to experiment before we lay down the law as to what he can do and what he cannot do. Let us study the nature of our child: Is he shy? Is he responsive? Does he offer resistance? We must try to learn who is this new spirit that lives within the figure of our child. We must take our child's troubles and joys seriously. We must at all times be honest and direct and simple with our children, and always open-minded and humble.

NOTE—In the next article in Mrs. Scott's series, in an early issue of the Home Journal, she will discuss the question Why Children Lie.

She Knows What's Good

THE quality of Carnation Milk does not change. It has always that same creamy richness, that same simple purity. It will pay in every way to use it in your home. For cooking add an equal part of water to the Carnation you use. Add a little more water if you want thinner milk. Use Carnation undiluted or diluted, instead of cream, for coffee, desserts and cereals. It is delicious. Just cows' milk, evaporated and sterilized—that is what Carnation is. Buy it at your grocer's and write for the Carnation Cook Book.

CARNATION MILK PRODUCTS CO.
340 Consumers Building, Chicago
440 Stuart Building, Seattle

Carnation Milk

"From Contented Cows"

The label is red and white

Nut Bread—1 tsp. salt, 4 cups flour, 1/2 cup sugar, 6 tsp. baking powder, 2 eggs, 1 1/2 cups water, 7/8 cup Carnation Milk, 1 cup English walnuts. Mix and sift dry ingredients. Beat eggs well, add milk and mix with dry ingredients. Beat well, add nuts, put in two oiled bread pans and bake in moderate oven thirty to forty-five minutes. This recipe makes two loaves.

Baked Custard—2 eggs, 1 1/2 cups water, 7/8 cup Carnation Milk, 1/4 tsp. salt, 3 tsp. sugar, 1/4 tsp. vanilla. Beat eggs slightly; add sugar, salt, milk and flavoring. Pour into custard cups; sprinkle top with grated nutmeg, set in pan of boiling water and bake in a moderate oven until firm. This recipe serves six people.

The Carnation Cook Book contains more than 100 tested economical recipes. Send for this handy recipe book today.

When the Nation celebrated its One-Hundredth Birthday

In 1876 when all America journeyed to the Centennial, COLUMBIA YARNS already had a wide circle of friends among the nation's womenfolk.

Nearly half a century has elapsed since the Centennial. Many of the products that were exhibited there have been out-grown and have been placed away gently with the relics of the past.

But throughout all these years, COLUMBIA YARNS have widened the circle of their friends—have increased in favor with each new generation.

It is only natural, therefore, that American women of today should look for and find quality of the highest order in the yarns that have given complete satisfaction for nearly fifty years.

WM. H. HORSTMANN COMPANY

Established 1816

PHILADELPHIA

The new COLUMBIA "Book of Yarns" for 1922 has just been published. It contains 168 pages of advance styles in sweaters and other knitted articles, together with easily followed directions for making them. Charming illustrations throughout and complete in every detail, this twenty-third edition of the COLUMBIA "Book of Yarns" has been pronounced the very finest we have ever published. Get a copy from your dealer today; or, if he cannot supply you, send us 35 cents in stamps and the book will be forwarded to you postpaid.

COLUMBIA YARNS

In Strange Company

(Continued from Page 14)

him misjudge time or distance and he must be crushed to a pulp or ripped to ribbons.

Wherefore the master brought his rifle to his shoulder and his finger curled about the trigger. But it was no easy thing by that dim light to aim with any accuracy. Nor was there the slightest assurance that Lad, dancing in and out and everywhere and nowhere at once, might not come in line with the bullet. Thus, from a tolerable knowledge of bears and of their comparative mildness in the plump season of the year, he shouted at the top of his lungs and at the same time fired into the air.

The bluff sufficed. Even as Lad jumped back from close quarters and whirled about at sound of the voice and the shot, the bear dropped to all fours with ridiculous haste and shambled off at very creditable speed into the tangle of undergrowth.

ON THE day before camp was broken the mistress had spied from the eerie heights of the knoll a grim line of haze far to southward, and a lesser smoke smear to the west. And the night sky on two horizons had been faintly lurid. The usual autumn crop of forest fires was blooming through the drought-parched mountains.

"It's as well we're lighting out for civilization," said the master as he superintended the loading of the truck. "The woods are as dry as tinder. And if the wind should change and grow a bit fresher, the blaze over near Wildcat Mountain might come in this direction. If ever it does it'll travel faster than any gang of fire fighters can block it. This region is dead ripe for such a thing. Not a drop of rain in a month. No, no, Laddie," he broke off as the collie sought to leap aboard the truck in the wake of a roll of bedding; "you're going with us in the car."

Long usage and an uncanny intelligence had given Lad a more than tolerable understanding of the English language's simpler phrases. The term "You're going with us in the car" was as comprehensible to him as to any child. He had heard it spoken, with few variations, a thousand times in the past nine years. At once, on hearing the master's command, he jumped down from the truck; trotted off to the car, a hundred yards distant, and sprang into his wonted place in the luggage-cluttered tonneau.

HE CHANCED to jump aboard from one side just as the guide's hobbled boy son was hoisting a heavy and cumbersome portmanteau into the tonneau from the other. Lad's eighty pounds of nervous energy smote the portmanteau amidships as the boy was balancing it high in air preparatory to setting it down between two other bags. As a result, boy and portmanteau rolled backward in a tangled embrace, across several yards of stony ground.

Lad, who had not meant to cause any such catastrophe, stood looking down in keen enjoyment at the lively spectacle. But as the boy came to a halt against a sharp-pointed rock and sat up sniveling with pain, the great dog's aspect changed.

Seemingly to realize he was somehow to blame, he jumped lightly down from the car and went over to offer to the sufferer such comfort as patting forepaw and friendly licking tongue could afford.

"Here, you," called the guide, who had seen but a cross section of the collision, "take that collie over to the truck and ask his boss to look after him and to see he don't pester us while we're a-workin'. On the way back stop at the lean-to and catch me that bag of cookin' things I left there. The's just room for 'em under the seat. Chase!"

Woefully the boy limped off, his hand clinched in the fur of Lad's ruff. The dog ordinarily would have resented such familiarity. But, still seeking to comfort the victim's manifest unhappiness, he suffered himself to be led along. Which was Lad's way. The sight of sorrow or of pain always made him ridiculously gentle and sympathetic.

The boy's bruises hurt cruelly. The distance to the truck was a full hundred yards. The distance to the lean-to—a permanent shed, back of the camp site—was about the same, and in almost the opposite direction. The prospect of the double journey was not alluring. The youth hit on a scheme to shorten it. First glancing back to see that his father was not looking, he climbed the bare stony hillock toward the lean-to, Lad pacing courteously along beside him.

Arrived at the shed, he took from a nail a stout rope length, tied it around Lad's neck, fastened the dog to one of the uprights, shouldered the cooking-utensil bag and started back toward the car.

He had thus saved himself a longer walk and had obeyed his father's orders to take Lad away. He was certain the master or one of the others, missing the dog, would see him standing forlornly there just outside the lean-to's corner, or that another errand would bring some of the party to the shed to release him. At best the boy was sore of heart and of body at his own rough treatment and he had scant interest in anything else.

TWENTY minutes later the truck chugged bumpily off upon its trip down the hazardous mountain track. The guide's boy rode in triumph on the seat beside the truckman, a position of honor and of excitement.

"Where's Lad?" asked the mistress a minute afterward as she and the master and the guide made ready to get into the car and follow.

"Aboard the truck," responded Barret in entire good faith. "Him and my boy got a skylarkin' here. So I sent Bud over to the truck with him."

"That's queer," mused the mistress; "Laddie never condescends to play—or 'skylark,' as you call it—with anyone except my husband or myself!"

Her first question, when they reached the Place, was for Lad. Terror seized upon the guide's boy as he remembered where he had left the dog. He glanced obliquely at the truckman, who had unloaded and who was cranking.

"Now"—said the scared youth glibly, avoiding his father's unsuspecting eye, "now—now, Lad he was settin' 'twixt Simmons and me. And he hops down and runs off around the house towards—towards the lake soon as we stopped here. Most likely he was thirsty-like."

WHEN ten o'clock came and no Lad sought the shelter of his "cave" under the music-room piano for the night, there was real worry. The mistress went out on the veranda and sounded long and shrilly upon the silver whistle which hung from her belt.

There was no glad scurry of feet in reply. The mistress went back into the house, genuinely worried. Acting on a sudden idea she called up the Place's superintendent at the gate lodge.

"You were down here when the truck came to the house this afternoon, weren't you?" she asked.

"Yes, ma'am," he said. "I was waiting for it. Jim and I helped Simmons to unload."

"Did you see which way Lad went when he jumped out of the truck?" pursued the

(Continued on Page 74)

Your Husband is Right

"It's the finished effect that counts"

"I don't know much about corsets, but I do know that the best dressed woman is so trim and well-tailored that even when you try to analyze her charm, the thought of a corset never enters your head. I suppose that there is something about the fit of a corset that does the trick."

That's just the point! It's the fit. The corset that fits is the one that always gives perfect proportion with every natural movement of the body. That's the Thomson "Glove-Fitting" Corset—the corset that conforms to the subtle lines of the figure and preserves their youthful grace.

175 Models—so that you can choose the corset that just fits you.

GEORGE C. BATCHELLER & CO.
NEW YORK CHICAGO SAN FRANCISCO

THOMSON'S
"Glove-Fitting"
CORSETS

Mary Garden
as Carmen

Rigaud's Mary Garden

FACE POWDER and ROUGE
Fragrant with Parfum Mary Garden

A TOUCH of MARY GARDEN ROUGE—a puff of just the shade of MARY GARDEN POWDER that blends with your coloring—and yours is the bloom that vies with the petals of a rosebud.

Both MARY GARDEN ROUGE and MARY GARDEN FACE POWDER are delicately fragrant with exquisite PARFUM MARY GARDEN—the perfume of youth and beauty.

Send for a Bijou Box of MARY GARDEN
FACE POWDER for your handbag

GEO. BORGFELDT & CO., New York
Sole Distributors

GEO. BORGFELDT & CO., Distributors
V. Rigaud, 75 Barrow Street, New York
Enclosed is 10 cents for which please send me your Bijou Box of Mary Garden Face Powder.

In Strange Company

(Continued from Page 73)

mistress. "Or have any of you seen him since then?"

"Why, no, ma'am," came the puzzled answer. "I haven't seen him at all. I supposed he was in the car with you, and that maybe he'd been in the house ever since. He wasn't on the truck; that's one sure thing. I saw it stop and I stayed till they finished emptying it. Lad wasn't there."

There was a moment's pause. Then the mistress spoke again. Her voice slightly muffled, she said: "Please find out if there is plenty of gas in my car; enough to take it, say, forty miles. Thank you."

"What on earth—" began the master as his wife left the telephone and picked up an ulster.

"Laddie didn't come home on the truck," she made tremulous reply.

"HE IS up there," insisted the mistress, "and he can't get back. I know him well enough to be sure he'd have overtaken us when we stopped all those times to fix the tires, if he had been left behind. And I know something else: When we started on after that first puncture, we were about half a mile below the knoll. And as we went around the bend there was a gap in the trees. I was looking back. For a second I could see the lean-to, outlined ever so clearly against the sky. And alongside of it was standing some animal. It was so far away and we passed out of sight so suddenly that I couldn't see what it was, except that it was large and dark. And it seemed to be struggling to move. I was going to speak to you about it—I supposed it was that black bear of Laddie's—when we had the next puncture. And that made me forget all about it till now. Of course, it never occurred to me it could be Lad, because Barret had said he was in the truck. But—but oh, it was Laddie! He—he was fastened or caught in some way. I know he was. Why, I could see him struggle to —"

"Come on!" broke in the master, hustling into his mackinaw. "Unless you'll stay here while I —"

"No," she protested, "I'm going. And I'm going because I'm thinking of the same thing that's troubling you. I'm thinking of those forest fires and of what you said about the wind changing and —"

"Come on!" repeated the master, starting for the garage.

LAD had watched the preparations for departure with increasing worry. The abnormally sensitive old fellow was wretchedly unhappy. Then, to his dismay, truck and car had made off down the mountainside and he had been left alone in his imprisonment. Except for a single, unheard bark of protest, Lad made no effort to call back the departing humans. Never before had they forsaken him, and he had full trust that they would come back in a few minutes and set him free.

When the car halted a half mile below, Lad felt certain his faith was about to be justified. Then as it moved on again he sprang to the end of his short rope and tried to break free and follow. Then came the dying away of the chugging motor's echoes, and silence rolled up and engulfed the wilderness hilltop.

Lad was alone. They had gone off and left him. They had gone with never a word of good-by or a friendly command to watch camp until their return.

Yet it did not occur to him to seek freedom and to follow his gods to the home he loved. He had been tied here, presumably by their order, certainly with their knowledge. And it behooved him to wait until they could come to release him. He knew they would come back soon or late. They were his gods, his chums, his playmates. They would no more desert him than he would have deserted them. It was all right somehow. Only—the waiting was tedious!

The haze that had hovered over the farther hilltops and valleys was thickening, and it was creeping nearer. The breath of morning breeze was stiffening into a steady wind, a wind that blew strong from the west and carried on it the smell of forest fire.

Lad did not enjoy the ever stronger smoke scent. But he gave only half heed to it. His main attention was centered on that winding wagon track, whence the car and the truck had vanished into the lowlands. And through the solemnly silent hours he lay forlornly watching it.

But after sunset the smoke became too pervasive to be ignored longer. It was not only stinging his throat and lungs but it was making his eyes smart. And it had cut off the view of all save the nearer mountain peaks.

Lad got to his feet, whining softly under his breath. Ancestral instinct was fairly shouting to his brain that here was terrible peril. He strained at his thick rope and looked imploringly down the wagon road.

Then from out a screen of hazel and witch-elm, almost directly in front of the place where the truck that morning had been loaded, crashed a hideous object. By sight and by scent Lad knew the creature for his olden foe, the giant black bear.

GROWLING, squealing, a dozen stinging fiery sparks sizzling through his bushy coat, the bear tore his way from the hedge of thicket and out into the open. The fire had roused him from his snug lair and had driven him ahead of it with a myriad hornets of flame in a crazed search for safety.

At sight of the formidable monster Lad realized for the first time the full extent of his own helplessness. Tethered to a rope which gave him scarce twenty-five inches of leeway, he was in no fit condition to fend off the giant's assault. He wasted no time in futile struggles. All his race's uncanny powers of resource came rushing to his aid.

Without an instant's pause he wheeled about and drove his keen teeth into the rope that bound him to the post. He did not chew aimlessly at the thick tether nor throw away one ounce of useless energy. Seizing the hempen strands, he ground his teeth deeply and with scientific skill into their fraying recesses. Thus does a dog, addicted to cutting his leash, attack the bonds which hold him. But the task was not one to be achieved in a handful of seconds.

Fear did not enter the big dog's soul. Yet he grieved that the death battle should find him so pitifully ill prepared. Straight up the hillock the bear charged toward the lean-to. Abandoning the work of self-release, Lad flung himself ragingly at the advancing bear.

Then two things happened, two things on neither of which the dog could have counted:

The bear was within a handbreadth of him and was still charging headlong. But, looking neither to right nor to left, seemingly ignorant of Lad's presence, the huge brute tore past him, almost grazing the collie in his insane rush, and sped straight on toward the lake beyond.

THAT was one of the two unforeseen happenings. The other was the snapping of the rotted rope under the wrench of Lad's furious leap.

Free, and with the severed rope's loop still dangling uselessly from around his shaggy throat, the dog stood staring blankly after his former adversary. He saw the bear reach the margin of the icy lake and plunge nose deep into its sheltering waters.

(Continued on Page 76)

Keep Growing Children in Ruddy Health.
Look to their iron supply.

Stew the Raisins

—and spread over dry cereals. Mix in with oatmeal, cream of wheat and other cooked foods. Note the new charm and zest that children find in breakfast foods so much improved.

To Give Cereals An Almost Magical Attraction

for children, who should eat them every day

WE ask you to try a new way to make children like good cereals—a way to make them ask for foods which they now may push away.

A way to add more healthfulness to these body-building dishes, while giving them a new and almost magical appeal.

The Lure of Sweets

The way is through delicious raisins—a rare health-food in themselves, but regarded by the little folks like sweetmeats.

The raisins change the entire dish—from a duty to a treat.

Try it on your children. See how quickly they observe a new, delightful difference in that food.

Raisins should go with cereals for more than merely flavor.

Rich in food-iron, raisins help to form red corpuscles for the blood—to maintain vitality, and guard against disease. A child needs but a tiny bit of iron daily, yet that need is vital to real health.

Food-Iron and Mild Laxative Effect

Being mainly pure fruit-sugar, in practically predigested form, raisins place no burden on digestion. Their mildly laxative effect still further improves each dish.

So, in choosing your foods for children, don't forget these benefits.

Above all, the vital iron value of the raisin.

Raisins can save you the burden of the daily "forcing" of some foods—and greatly benefit the child.

How to Stew the Raisins

Cover Sun-Maid Seedless Raisins with cold water and add a slice of lemon or orange. Place on fire, bring to a boil and allow to simmer for one hour. Sugar may be added but is not necessary, as Sun-Maid Seedless Raisins contain 75 per cent natural fruit sugar.

A Dainty Luncheon

Hot fruited toast—delicious toasted raisin bread—is a dainty and nutritious food for tea or luncheon.

For His Dessert

Rice pudding with raisins is an almost universal favorite of the men. Let your men folks get their iron in this tasty dish.

SUN-MAID RAISINS

Sun-Maid Raisins are the finest California table grapes, dried in the sun.

Packed in a great, modern, glass-walled, sanitary plant in California. Clean, sweet, wholesome—the kind you know are good.

Seeded, Blue package (seeds removed), best for pies and bread; Seedless, Red package (grown without seeds), best for stewing; Clusters (on the stem), an ever ready dessert.

Raisins are 30 per cent cheaper than formerly—see that you get plenty in your foods.

100 Recipes Sent Free

Mail coupon for valuable free book containing 100 recipes for luscious raisin foods. Send for your copy now.

California Associated Raisin Company

Membership 13,000 Growers
DEPT. A-103, FRESNO, CALIFORNIA

Red package, Seedless Raisins, best for stewing

CUT THIS OUT AND SEND IT

California Associated Raisin Co.

Dept. A-103, Fresno, Calif.

Please send me copy of your free book, "Sun-Maid Recipes."

Name _____

Street _____

City _____ State _____

You'd be surprised how many women don't know this

WOULD you believe that we still have to tell and to prove to some women that the blue flame of kerosene gas is smokeless and odorless?

When this is proved to their satisfaction they are quick to see the convenience and desirability of a Florence Oil Cook Stove.

We don't have to tell them how nice it is to light a fire or put it out by the turn of a lever.

They know this means a cool kitchen and economy of fuel.

They are usually surprised, however, at the attractive appearance of the Florence, and are delighted to learn that it will bake and roast, boil and fry even better than a coal or wood range.

You see, the heat can be regulated perfectly by turning the lever. You can get any degree from an intense heat to a mere simmering temperature.

And the last doubt disappears when they see with their own eyes how easy it is to keep the Florence Oil Cook Stove clean and how simple it is to use.

Any store where Florence Oil Cook Stoves are sold has one filled with oil which you may light and operate yourself. Such an examination will convince you that the privilege of a cool kitchen is yours.

More Heat
Less Care

Note how the heat reaches up and is directed close up under the cooking by the powerful burner.

Write for Free Illustrated Booklet

CENTRAL OIL & GAS STOVE CO.

386 School Street, Gardner, Mass.

Makers of Florence Oil Cook Stoves (1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 burners),
Florence Portable Baking Ovens, Florence Tank
Water Heaters, Florence Oil Heaters

Made and Sold in Canada by McClary's, London, Canada

FLORENCE OIL COOK STOVES

Florence National Demonstration Week
April 17 to April 22
Watch for Your Dealer's Announcement

In Strange Company

(Continued from Page 74)

Lad turned again toward the slope. He was free now to follow the wagon track to the main road, and so homeward, guided perhaps by memory, perhaps by scent, most probably guided by the mystic sixth sense which has more than once enabled collies to find their way over hundreds of miles of strange territory back to their homes.

But in the last few minutes the fire's serpentlike course had taken a new twist. It had flung volleys of sparks across the upper reach of granite rock wall and had ignited dry wood and brier on the right-hand side of the track—this far up the mountain, almost at the very foot of the rock hillock.

The way to home was barred by a three-foot-high crackling fence of red-gold flame, a flame which nosed angrily against the barren rocks of the knoll foot, as if seeking in ravenous hunger the fuel their bare surfaces denied it.

And now the side of the hillock showed other signs of forest life. Up the steep slope thundered a six-point buck. Far more slowly, but with every tired muscle astrain, a fat porcupine was mounting the hill, its claws digging frantically for foothold among the slippery stones. It seemed to flow rather than to run. And as it hurried on it chuckled and scolded, like some idiot child.

ABEVY of squirrels scampered past it. A long snake, roused from its stony winter lair, writhed eerily up the slope, heedless of its fellow travelers' existence. A raccoon was breasting the steep from another angle. And behind it came clawing a round-paunched opossum, grinning from the pain of sparks that were stinging it to a hated activity.

Lad scarce saw or noted any of his companions. The road to home was barred. And again ancestral instinct and his own alert wit came to his aid. Turning about, and with no hint of fright in his gait or in the steady, dark eyes, he trotted toward the lake.

There, stooping not fifty feet away from bruin, he lapped thirstily until he had at last drunk his fill. Then, looking back once in the direction of the fire line, he lay down, very daintily indeed, in shallow water and prepared to enjoy his liberty. Scourged by none of the hideous fear which had goaded his fellow fugitives, he watched with grave interest the arrival of one after another of the refugees as they came scurrying wildly down to the water.

AN ODD rock formation had kept the wagon track clear up to the twist where it bore to leftward at the base of the knoll. And the mistress and the master were able to guide their car in safety up the trail from the main road far below. The set of the wind prevented them from being blinded or confused by smoke. Apart from a smarting of the eyes and a recurrent series of heat waves, they made the climb with no great discomfort until the final turn brought them to an abrupt halt at the spot where a wide swath of red coals and flaming ashes marked the burning of the hillock-foot bushes.

The master jumped to earth and stood confronting the lurid stretch of ash and ember with here and there a bush stump still crackling merrily. It was not a safe barrier to cross, this twenty-foot-wide, fiery stretch. Nor for many rods in either direction was there any way around it.

"There's one comfort," the master was saying as he began to explore for an opening in the red scarf of coals. "The fire hasn't got up to the camp site. He —"

"But the smoke has," said the mistress, who had been peering vainly through the haze curtain toward the summit. "And so has the heat. If only —"

She broke off with a catch in her voice. And, scarce realizing what she did, she put the silver whistle to her lips and blew a piercingly loud blast.

"What's that for?" asked the master crankily, worry over his beloved dog making his nerves raw. "If Lad's alive he's fastened there. You say you saw him struggling to get loose. He can't come when he hears that whistle. There's no sense in —"

"Hush!" begged the mistress, breaking in on his monologue. "Listen!"

OUT of the darkness beyond the knoll top came the sound of a bark, the clear, trumpeting welcome bark which Lad reserved for the mistress and the master alone on their return from any absence. Through the night it echoed gayly, defiantly again and again, ringing out above the hiss and crackle and roar of the forest fire. And at every repetition it was nearer and nearer the dumfounded listeners at the knoll foot.

"It's—it's Laddie! Look!" cried the mistress, pointing to the hither side of the knoll, lividly bright in the ember glow.

Down the steep was galloping at break-neck speed a great, tawny shape. Barking rapturously, even as he had barked when first the whistle's blast had roused him from his lazy repose in the lakeside shallows, Lad came whizzing toward the two humans who watched so incredulously his wild approach.

The master belatedly saw that the dog could not avoid crashing into the spread of embers, and he opened his mouth to order Lad back. But there was no time.

For once the wise dog took no heed of even the simplest caution. His lost and adored deities had called him and were awaiting him. That was all Lad knew or cared. They had come back for him. His horrible vigil and loneliness and his deadly peril were ended.

TOO insanely happy to note where he was treading, he sprang into the very center of the belt of smoldering coals. His tiny white forefeet did not remain among them long enough to feel pain. In two more bounds he had cleared the barrier and was dancing in crazy excitement around the mistress and the master, patting at them with his scorched feet, licking their eagerly caressing hands, "talking" in a dozen different keys of rapture—his whimpers and growls and gurgles running the entire gamut of long-pent-up emotions.

His coat and his feet had for hours been immersed in the cold water of the lake. And he had fled through the embers at express-train speed. Scarce a blister marked the hazardous passage. But Lad would not have cared for all the blisters and burns on earth. His dear gods had come back to him, even as he had known they would. Once more, and for the thousandth time, they had justified his faith in them. Nothing else mattered.

Elusive Charm

It is charm—elusive, captivating—that is the truest form of beauty. A charming woman commands admiration and lasting popularity, while a merely pretty face is soon forgotten.

Specially is this true when natural charm is delicately enhanced by just a touch of harmonizing perfume—such as Day Dream—a fleeting breath of luring sweetness, scarcely perceived but lingering in the memory.

Day Dream is the imprisoned fragrance of flowers from many lands. It has the rare of the Orient, the sweetness of the power fields of France, the exotic tang of rare plants from the Tropics.

Fourteen countries have contributed to the deliciously tantalizing perfume that is Day Dream. Yet the result is a distinctively American perfume, skillfully designed to blend with and subtly augment the charm of American women—so different from the charm of women of other lands.

The fragrance of Day Dream Perfume is also combined with skin-soothing powders of airy lightness to make Day Dream Face Powder—the final touch in a charming woman's toilette.

To you who may never have enjoyed the subtle sweetness of Day Dream we offer the Day Dream "Acquaintance Box," which contains a generous amount of Day Dream Perfume, Day Dream Soap and Day Dream Face Powder. Through the "Acquaintance Box" you can learn to know Day Dream and to appreciate its delicate charm. Send twenty-five cents in stamps or coin for one of these dainty packages.

Day Dream Boudoir Creations (Perfume, Face Powder, Talc, Poudre Creme, Soap and many others) are offered wherever good perfumes are sold.

The next time you visit a drug store or a shop where toilet goods are offered, ask for Day Dream.

STEARNS, PERFUMER
Detroit

Day Dream

TO satisfy yourself of the exquisite charm of Day Dream, send for the Day Dream "Acquaintance Box." This dainty packet contains Day Dream Perfume, Day Dream Soap and Day Dream Face Powder in miniature—a supply of each that will last for many happy days. Address an envelope to "Stearns, Perfumer, Detroit," write a brief note saying that you would like to get the "Acquaintance Box" and enclose twenty-five cents in stamps or coin. You can expect the "Acquaintance Box" as quickly as the mails can get it to you.

QUICK MAYONNAISE

1 egg
 $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoonful salt
 $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoonful dry mustard
 1 tablespoonful lemon juice or vinegar
 2 cupfuls Wesson Oil

Break the whole egg in a bowl. Put in the dry ingredients. Add the lemon juice or vinegar. Beat these together a few seconds with a Dover egg beater and add a small amount of Wesson Oil. Beat until the dressing begins to thicken. Then add the oil in larger amounts until the dressing is of the desired stiffness.

With mayonnaise on hand it is easy to make many delicious fancy dressings.

THOUSAND ISLAND DRESSING

1 cupful mayonnaise
 $\frac{1}{2}$ cupful chili sauce
 $\frac{1}{2}$ cupful whipped cream
 2 tablespoonfuls chopped, sour & sweet pickles, or chow chow
 1 chopped pimento

Combine the ingredients in the order given and serve at once.

Delicious with any green salad or with eggs, salmon, chicken, ham, tongue, celery, asparagus.

Let's Have Lamb for Dinner

By CAROLINE B. KING

ALTHOUGH it has been possible to buy spring lamb for the last two months, the real season for that delectable dinner, "spring lamb, green peas and mint sauce," does not begin for most of us until Easter, when it is as typical of the day and the time of the year as turkey at Thanksgiving or mince pie at Christmas. But lamb, delicious, wholesome, nourishing lamb, although not exactly of the kind we regard as spring lamb, is to be had at most every season of the year, and should be more popular with the housewife than it is, for it is highly recommended by physicians, dietitians and students of nutrition, and, in addition, is economical in every sense of the word.

I find, however, that many persons have a distinct distaste for lamb because, they say, it has a peculiar flavor, a "woolly" taste, as they express it, which is unpleasant. There really is no reason why this taste should exist, for it is due entirely to a portion of the meat which not only is easily removed but which should never be permitted to remain on any piece of lamb or mutton a moment after it is made ready for cooking. This portion is that reddish skin or membrane which covers the surface of the meat and is known as the caul, or fell, according to the section of the country. It is rather tough and oily, and will invariably cause a strong flavor to permeate the meat if it is permitted to remain on it during the process of cooking.

Usually the butcher sees to the removal of this membrane, but the housewife should examine the meat carefully when it is brought into her kitchen and remove every part of it that may cling to the roast, and all superfluous fat as well; for the fat also is responsible, though not in so large a degree, for the strong flavor. If the fell is entirely removed and the meat trimmed so that only a sufficient amount of fat to insure its being well roasted remains, the lamb will prove as tender and sweet and juicy as the most staid member of the household could desire.

A lamb, whether it be only two or three months old or a yearling, is divided in the same way. The carcass is first split through the center, then each side is again divided into fore and hind quarters, each weighing from ten pounds upward, according to the size and age of the lamb. The hindquarter, which is considered the choicer section, perhaps because it is more costly, is so cut that the leg may be used whole as a roast; or it may be divided into a roast and a few thick steaks. These steaks are very tender and juicy.

Selecting Meat in the Shop

THE loin, which is located next to the leg and along the back of the lamb, is sometimes cut from the lamb carcass before it is split; it is then called a saddle and is used as a roast. It is quite an aristocratic dish when so prepared and is suitable for a large dinner. This same loin, cut from a side of lamb, is only half the size of the saddle in breadth and makes a delicious roast also. Or it may be cut into chops if desired. These loin chops are more highly prized by Europeans than are our rib chops, especially if they are cut with bit of the kidney attached. When selecting a piece of loin for roasting remember there is a good end and a poor end, which are priced accordingly. The first is better for an oven roast, while the poor end, sometimes called the chump end, will do very well for a pot roast, but will require careful cooking to make it tender and delicate.

Next to the loin come the ribs, and below them the breast; the ribs furnish the rather expensive rib chops, with their little eye of tender, juicy meat. The breast is good for many purposes; it is rich in juices and streaked with delicate, fine-textured fat. The breast of a fair-sized lamb may be cut into fifteen to seventeen pieces for stewing, or it may be rolled into a compact piece suitable for a pot roast or for braising. Rich, fine broth, too, may be made from this portion, but it is well to reserve meat as useful as this for more important dishes, for the foreleg, or shank, will prove just the thing for either broth or soup stock.

Now we arrive at the shoulder, adjoining the neck and the rib section, and called by many the chuck of lamb. It also is a good piece of meat and when nicely and tastily cooked is almost as desirable as the leg. In fact it has a better flavor than any other cut of lamb, and as there is very little bone in it it is an economical piece to purchase. Shoulder of lamb, roasted to delicate brown and served with brown gravy and string beans or peas, is as tempting a dinner as one could wish. If desired the shoulder may be boned, when it will be suitable for stuffing, or cut whole, as seems preferable.

At the left above are the ribs, before being divided into rib chops. Between the ribs and the leg lies the loin; this is cut into the loin or kidney chops, shown at the right, which are highly prized by Europeans.

Leg of lamb, sold whole for boiling or roasting, appears above as it does in the butcher shop.

The neck of lamb might at first glance seem rather a hopeless piece of meat; indeed, some cookbooks refer to it as the scrag; but it is astonishing what a good meal it may furnish when nicely prepared. As a pot roast it is savory and good, or, cut into slices, it will form the foundation for a number of appetizing casserole dinners. Croquettes from the neck meat are also good, and so are meat cakes, patties and several other delicate little luncheon dishes.

The foreleg, or shank, of lamb will make the most excellent foundation for broth and soup stock. Scotch broth, that very tasty dish which is almost a meal in itself, is at its best when made from this same cheap piece of meat.

In selecting lamb the color of the meat should be regarded as the first consideration. Young lamb is of rather a pale-pink tint, with bones that are tinged with red, and very white fat. A yearling will be of a deeper shade of pink, and its bones will be much paler in hue, but still far from white, while in mutton, as meat from the sheep is termed when it is past a year old, the flesh is so deep a pink as to be almost red, though not the bright red of beef; the bones will be quite white, and the fat much whiter than that of beef.

When the weather is cold enough to warrant it, and the family includes several members, it is advisable from an economic standpoint to purchase lamb by the hind or fore quarter, for it will keep perfectly in cool weather and will cut to excellent advantage; besides, it is far cheaper to purchase in this way than by such small amounts as are usually ordered from the butcher, for one benefits by the price averaged for the whole carcass. The housewife herself with the aid of a meat saw and a sharp knife will find it an easy matter to divide the quarter into the sections I have named. The hind-quarter will not require a great deal of cutting after the loin is separated from the leg, except perhaps the removal of a few chops or steaks from the thick end of the leg.

It will be a somewhat more complex matter to divide the forequarter into sections, but by referring to the cuts on this page even this problem may be readily solved. Of course there are some elaborate cuts, such as a crown roast, or English lamb chop, or lamb chops Frenched, which will be too difficult for the home butcher; but these, being unusual and out of the ordinary, may well be left to the butcher in the market, whose business it is to cut any desired piece or portion exactly right.

A crown roast is so handsome and imposing a dish that one would scarcely believe it to be merely a section of the loin and ribs, which it is. In ordering such a roast ask the butcher to cut it from both loins rather than from a whole loin, as it will then be more attractive in appearance. After scraping the flesh from between the bones the butcher will shape each piece of loin in a half circle, with the ribs on the outside. Then he will fasten the two sections together, making a circle or crown. The ends of the bones he will trim neatly and evenly, and on each will place a cube of fat salt pork. This pork will not only protect the ends of the bones from burning during the roasting, but will add their juices to those of the lamb and so improve the flavor of the latter. Usually the center of the roast is filled with the trimmings, finely ground and decorated with strips of salt pork. It may, however, be left unfilled, a small cup being pressed into the center before cooking in order to keep it in shape. Rub the skin side of the roast with salt, then sprinkle it with flour and cook it like a leg of lamb, basting it frequently if a covered roaster is not used. Do not add water to the pan unless the meat seems dry, and even then it would be well to substitute in part the drippings from beef or pork. When finished, if a well in the center has been left, it may be filled with cooked green peas nicely seasoned, or sautéed mushrooms or chestnuts. Serve this roast with browned potatoes or candied sweet potatoes, baked stuffed tomatoes or macaroni with tomato sauce; diced turnips in Hollandaise sauce also make a tempting accompaniment to this roast.

The breast and neck piece is one of the cheapest cuts. It is used for broth, stew or fricassee, and is most savory as a pot roast or en casserole.

Frenched lamb chops are merely the rib chops with the bone shortened and scraped clean, almost down to the lean meat, leaving only a mouthful, to be sure, but a very tempting morsel, nevertheless. English chops have the bone removed before cutting; then the meat is rolled with a few strips of bacon inside and fastened securely; the chops are then cut, an inch and a half thick usually, each one resembling a miniature rolled roast of beef.

New Ways With Familiar Cuts

LAMB is usually preferred well done, though mutton is sometimes liked quite rare. There are reasons for this, as the immature meat is far more digestible if well cooked. Mutton is easily digested, whether well done or rare. As in cooking beef and pork, lamb should be subjected to intense heat when first put over the fire or in the oven to cook; and when the albumen on the outside of the meat has had an opportunity to coagulate well and there is little fear of the juices escaping, the temperature may be slightly lowered and kept stationary until the meat is done.

In making broth, when it is desirable to flavor the liquid rather than to keep the juices in the meat, quite a different method of procedure is followed. The meat is put into cold water, salt is added and the kettle is left to heat gradually to the boiling point. Then it is kept at the simmering stage for several hours, or until all of the juices have become a part of the broth. The meat will be tasteless and stringy, of course, but the broth will be rich and tempting, which is the result desired.

In making a stew a middle course must be followed, for here it is desirable to obtain both a fine, well-flavored gravy and to keep the meat juicy and delicate at the same time. To accomplish this the meat should be browned first, as when cooking a roast, to develop the flavor; then it must be covered with hot water and permitted to cook very slowly. In this way a delicious brown gravy will be obtained, but not at the expense of the meat, which will be as finely textured and savory as a chop or roast.

LAMB STEW. The neck and breast are portions best adapted to its making, a pound and a half of lean meat being sufficient for five persons, with perhaps a bit left over for luncheon the next day. The meat should be cut in pieces for serving, then dipped lightly in flour and browned in hot dripping. Two small onions finely chopped should also be browned with the lamb; then a pint of hot water is poured over meat and onions, and a sprig of parsley, one clove, a very small piece of bay leaf, and salt and pepper to taste should be added, then the kettle closed tightly and the contents permitted to simmer for an hour.

At the end of this time one large carrot cut in cubes, six button onions and a white turnip diced should be dropped into the kettle with additional water, if necessary, and the cooking continued for another hour; then the juice from half a Number Two can of tomatoes, with a teaspoonful of kitchen bouquet or sharp table

The shoulder of lamb, at left above, may be boned, stuffed, rolled and roasted, or may make excellent stews, ragouts, braised dishes, or become a pot roast. It is better adapted for slow moist cooking, though shoulder chops, cut from the rib end, are very good when broiled or made into cutlets. A shoulder chop appears at the right.

(Continued on Page 85)

“Personalized Style”

—the art of choosing lines that best become your figure

OUT of Paris every season come fresh fashions and new modes. Poiret, Callot, Paquin, Jenny, artist with cloth and silk, create modes to make fair women fairer still. But these great French designers never yet have said, “Here is a beautiful new costume. Let all women wear it who court style in dress.”

For though it may have beauty and richness and may observe the newest features of the mode, real Style cannot have unless it suits the individual figure.

You may happily possess a figure of average proportions—a figure that presents no special problem of size and contour. But even so, some styles become you more than others; certain lines set off your figure at its best.

Every figure has its possibilities and true style is merely playing up your possibilities. The French say “Style is style only when it suits the wearer.”

Designing for the type—the Printz technique of “Personalized Style”

This principle has been developed into a technique of design for the American woman—“Personalized Style.”

Printz designers have long recognized that different figures known as average have different needs. Thousands of figures have been studied and the possibilities of each figure type skillfully worked out. So among the many Printz models you will find a variety of interesting suits and coats which in line, proportion and fabric are becoming to your figure.

In this style conception, the extreme has no place. Dignity, beauty of line and fabric, perfection of tailoring detail—these are the groundwork of Printz designs.

Lines make the figure—and true style consists in wearing only that which is becoming to your own type and figure

The new Spring models for varying figure types

All that is beautiful, all that is chic in Spring and Summer designs will be found embodied in one form or another in Printz coats and suits for spring. They have that style leadership which goes with the ability to adapt the best that Paris gives to the needs of the American woman.

But further, in Printz coats and suits, the season's accepted styles have been adapted to widely varying figure types, that the individual silhouette may have correct and becoming lines.

The Printz shop in your city is prepared to help you apply the Printz technique of style in choosing the suit or coat best adapted to your individual requirements of type and figure.

You will find there a selection of charming models in many fabrics adapted for both street and sports wear. Particularly interesting are those developed in Trelaine—the new fabric which has enjoyed a remarkable New York premiere. Coats, suits, dresses, capes and knickers of Trelaine—exclusive Printz designs—are found only in Printz shops.

Printz models are on display in New York exclusively at James McCreery & Co., and by one leading store in practically every city. If you do not know which is the Printz shop in your city, write to us and we will send you the name together with a copy of the new Spring Style Book, featuring the Printz conception of "designing for the type".

THE PRINTZ-BIEDERMAN COMPANY
Paris · CLEVELAND, O. · New York

The models illustrated here are actual Printz models for spring and may be seen, together with many other Printz designs, at the Printz shop in your city

How to Select the Powder Your Skin Requires

This secret and many other helpful hints await you in this little booklet—write for it

Your skin—is it dry, or oily? What powder does it require? What treatment should precede the powder? How may you best accentuate your individual coloring and type?

These are important questions for every woman who values personal charm. They are answered authoritatively in "The Etiquette of the Powder Puff," an interesting booklet which we'd like to place on your dressing table.

In an intimate, chatty way, it tells you many helpful things about your complexion and its care. It tells, too, of Freeman's, a powder so exquisitely fine and pure, so soft and clinging, that for almost fifty years it has ideally answered every toilette requirement.

Simply mail the coupon below, with ten cents in stamps, and this booklet will be yours. With it, too, we'll send you four generous samples of Freeman's.

Since 1876
Freeman's

FACE POWDER Talc Rouge

Freeman's awaits you at any of the better beauty shops, drug stores, or department stores.

Clip and Mail Today

The Freeman Perfume Co.
2005 Norwood Avenue, Cincinnati, Ohio
Gentlemen: Enclosed is ten cents in stamps for your new beauty booklet, "The Etiquette of the Powder Puff," and four samples of Freeman's.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____

WHAT is it that you put in your dishes that makes them taste so different from English or American food? What is it that gives just the little delicate flavor which makes all the difference between the work of a French cook and that of one of any other nationality? This question came to me from overseas.

Naturally I asked Colette. And Colette laughed. "How am I going to answer a question like that? Sometimes it is one thing, sometimes it is another, according to the nature of the dish."

"Of course. But tell me, for instance, how it is that when I go to stay in England the greens taste of nothing but water, while your greens have all sorts of delicious little flavors?"

"Because the English drown their vegetables instead of cooking them. Tiens! I will give you a few standard French ways of doing things."

FRENCH SPICED CABBAGE. Wash the cabbage and boil it in the usual way, in plenty of salt and water. Drain it. Chop it well in the colander or, if you prefer, put it through the food chopper. Measure it, and return it to the pan. To each cupful of cabbage add a level saltspoonful of mixed spice, a level dessertspoonful of butter and a level teaspoonful of flour. Stir over the fire till the mixture has boiled for three minutes. Then taste it, and add salt as required, with the tiniest possible pinch of pepper. If the butter is salted, you will probably need no more salt. Go lightly on the pepper, as the spice has already a slightly heating taste. You will find that the flavor of the cabbage comes out to the full, and that it has nothing of that "greens water" taste which so many people dislike.

"There are those who don't care for spice," explains Colette, "and for them I should use a good pinch of grated nutmeg—about as much as would lie on my thumb nail to each cupful of cabbage."

SPROUTS AND SPRING GREENS. Prepare them and boil them in the usual way in salt and water. Drain them well. Leave the sprouts whole, but mash greens through the colander or chop them thoroughly with a knife. Cut an onion and rub your frying pan with it round and round, pressing rather hard so that you squeeze out a good part of the onion juice into the pan. Then add a large tablespoonful of butter or good dripping, heat it, and toss the greens in it till they are well buttered. Sprinkle them with salt before serving—not while they are in the frying pan, as salt makes the fat fly all about and your stove is spoiled. No one will be able to say that the greens exactly taste of onions; but they will know that something has been added which has made the sprouts taste warm and rich instead of thin and watery.

THE POTATO TASTE. When the potatoes are coming to the end of their season and are no longer very nice, you can make them quite delicious if you rub the pan in which they are to be boiled with a bead of garlic, and then cook a sprig of mint with them. Take the mint out before you send them to table. You will find that they are quite without that peculiarly heavy, stuffy sort of taste that old potatoes sometimes get.

CARROTS AT THEIR BEST. Lots of people don't like carrots, because they taste "faded." They are vegetables that can't stand alone; they need something to help them out. Here are two ways to prepare them: First, add a spoonful of vinegar and a spoonful of sugar to the water in which they are boiled. The vinegar serves to "tang" the carrots out of their faded taste, while the sugar softens down the vinegar and prevents it from being too noticeable. Second, boil them plain in salt and water and drain them well. Then melt a lump of butter or dripping in a frying pan, slice in an onion, and let it fry to a nice brown. The slices of onion are cut so thick that they don't go to pieces in the fat, and it is easy to take them out with a spoon before putting in the carrots and tossing them. It would not do to leave the pieces of onion; that would be too much; it is only just a hint of the flavor that is wanted to help out the carrots.

The French Flavor

By MARIE JACQUES

THE SPINACH SECRET. French spinach, dandelion greens and sorrel are never bitter and harsh, as they are in other countries. We always boil lettuce with them, one good handful of lettuce to each four handfuls of the other green. The outside leaves of lettuce will do quite well, while the hearts can be kept for salad. The one vegetable softens down the other, and then the addition of a little cream to the purée finishes the business. If you can't get cream, stir up a dessertspoonful of fresh butter in a teacupful of warm milk, and the result will be about the same.

SALAD SEASONINGS. When you make salad in America, I wonder if you use all the following seasonings. Every one of them is delicious.

1. Rub a dozen mint leaves in your fingers, to bruise them, and then soak them in four tablespoonfuls of vinegar. At the end of the hour, drain off the vinegar and use it for the dressing of an ordinary lettuce salad, with olive oil, salt, pepper and the tiniest possible touch of sugar.

2. Take green, freshly formed seeds of nasturtiums, chop them fine and use them for sprinkling the surface of a pale-colored salad, on which they will show up well. They have a hot, clean, mustard taste.

3. Do you put a little sugar into your mayonnaise, always? It is so important, and there are some people who forget it. The right amounts are a mustard spoonful each of sugar and mustard to one egg.

4. Do you know what a good plan it is to pick a bunch of mixed herbs—thyme, mint, sage, laurel and parsley—tie them up in a bit of muslin with two cloves, and simmer them gently in one pint of vinegar for an hour. Keep the lid on the pan. At the end of the hour strain the vinegar and bottle it for use. It is splendid for salads of any kind.

SOME MEAT SEASONINGS. Lard a piece of beef with slivers of cut onion, pour two tablespoonfuls of vinegar and the same amount of water into the baking tin and baste the beef often with this liquid during the time of roasting. The result is a flavor not unlike that of venison, but more delicate.

Beat a steak. Sprinkle it thickly with pepper, salt and chopped mint. Pour over it enough vinegar to soak it, and let it lie for one hour. Then drain it, shake off the herbs, and grill or stew it in the usual way. It will look just like an ordinary steak, but will taste different and much better.

As soon as a chicken or rabbit has been emptied, tie together a little bunch of sage, thyme, mint and parsley. Dip this bunch first in water and then in salt and pepper. Put it into the inside of the carcass and let it remain till the cooking is finished. The meat will be deliciously scented and fragrant, without having anything that could definitely be called a herb flavor.

When you are making a stew with onions, or a hash or anything of that kind, try the effect of first frying the onions and then sprinkling them with a pinch of powdered sugar before you mix them with the meat. This treatment takes away all their rather strong, coarse taste, and makes them the most delicate and delicious seasoning that any one could find.

When you cook a rabbit or hare, do you always take care to use a little fresh fat pork with it? English cooks generally put bacon with a hare, but the result is not at all the same. What you want is the taste of the fresh pig, and no amount of salt bacon will give that.

When you are making a mince of rather dry old meat or tinned meat—indeed, when you are doing hash, rissoles, cottage pie or anything of that sort—a very small piece of fresh liver is a most excellent addition. You don't need much; an ounce or two to one pound of other meat is quite sufficient; but it serves to make the whole dish taste fresh instead of cooked up.

If you are not using liver, you will find a good pinch of mixed spice an excellent thing to put into a hash. Use pepper and salt in the ordinary quantities and the spice in addition.

Colette is fond of putting it into cold pâtés and things of that sort. A cold mince with a little spice in it does not taste flat and dead, as a plain mince is apt to do.

Do you grate about half a bead of garlic into two tablespoonfuls of olive oil, and then paint a roast of veal over with it just when the skin is beginning to turn brown? It's an excellent thing to do, for the oil turns the skin a crisp bright gold, while the garlic almost cooks away to nothing, remaining only as the faintest possible savor when the joint is done.

You cook apples with your pork in America, I know. But do you ever stuff it with apples and chestnuts mixed? Boil the chestnuts, skin them and pass them through a sieve. Peel and core the apples and put them through the food chopper. Use sour apples; sweet ones won't do. Mix both together with just a touch of pepper and salt, and stuff the pork for roasting. The fat of the rather greasy joint goes into the dry chestnuts, with the result that when it is done your stuffing is good beyond all words.

SUGAR WITH EGGS. Nearly all delicate egg dishes, such as poached eggs, eggs sur le plat, eggs baked in milk, plain, unseasoned omelettes and scrambled eggs are improved by a very small pinch of sugar in addition to the pepper and salt. You must put so little sugar that there is no appreciable sweetness to be tasted. Its only object is to give to the egg a sort of nutty flavor, the taste which is sometimes to be found, by nature, in very rich brown eggs laid by hens who have a most liberal diet.

You know how you sometimes eat a boiled egg and say: "What a rich egg this is!" The same effect is produced on an ordinary specimen by the addition of that tiny pinch of sugar.

MINT IN THE SOUP. When you make a clear soup of mutton bones or lamb bones boil a couple of sprigs of mint with the meat. Strain the stock in the usual way, reboil it with the addition of Italian paste, tapioca or whatever other thickening you wish to use, and then add pepper, salt, a wee pinch of sugar and what we call "a thread" of vinegar—the merest possible thread; if you get too much, folks will say that your soup has gone sour. The best way to do the seasoning is to get the pepper and salt right first; then add alternately a wee pinch of sugar and a drop of vinegar, tasting each time. Don't let the soup boil again afterwards, or the quality of the flavor may alter a little. It is good! Try it once, and you will believe me.

COCOANUT MARSHMALLOW CAKE

Cream 5 tablespoons shortening; add 1 cup sugar and 2 beaten egg yolks; add 1 teaspoon each lemon juice and vanilla; mix well; add $\frac{1}{4}$ cup milk and 1 cup flour. Then add $\frac{1}{4}$ cup milk; add $\frac{1}{4}$ cup flour sifted with 3 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder and $\frac{1}{4}$ teaspoon salt, mixing well. Bake in 3 greased layer tins in moderate oven 15 to 20 minutes.

Filling and Icing—Boil 1 cup sugar and $\frac{1}{4}$ cup water until syrup spins a thread; add 5 marshmallows cut into small pieces but do not stir into syrup. Pour slowly over beaten whites of 2 eggs, stirring constantly; add 1 teaspoon lemon juice; beat until smooth and thick. Spread between layers and sprinkle

(Continued under Biscuits)

BISCUITS

Sift together 2 cups flour, 4 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder, and $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon salt; add 2 tablespoons shortening and rub in very lightly; add $\frac{1}{4}$ cup milk or half milk and half water slowly and with as little mixing as possible.

Roll or pat out lightly on floured board to about one inch in thickness (handle as little as possible); cut with biscuit cutter or Royal tin cover. Bake in hot oven 15 to 20 minutes.

Cocoanut Marshmallow Cake

(Continued)

with cocoanut and pieces of marshmallow. Cover cake with icing sprinkled with cocoanut; and pieces of marshmallow. It will take 1 cup cocoanut.

MAPLE LAYER CAKE

Cream $\frac{1}{2}$ cup shortening and 1 cup sugar; add 2 egg yolks and 1 teaspoon vanilla; mix well. Add $\frac{3}{4}$ cup milk slowly, stirring until smooth. Sift 2 cups flour, 3 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder and $\frac{1}{4}$ teaspoon salt together; add half to mixture, then half of 2 beaten egg whites; then remainder of flour (stirring after each addition); stir in balance of whites.

Bake in 2 greased layer tins, leaving $\frac{1}{2}$ batter in bowl. To this add 1 oz. melted chocolate for middle layer. Bake in moderate oven 15 minutes. Put together with icing made by boiling 1 cup maple syrup without stirring until it spins a thread, then adding slowly to stiffly beaten whites of 2 eggs. Beat with wire whip, preferably on platter, until stiff enough to spread.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER

CALIFORNIA NUT LAYER CAKE

Cream $\frac{1}{2}$ cup shortening well and add 1 cup sugar. Sift together $\frac{1}{4}$ teaspoon salt, 1 teaspoon nutmeg, 1 teaspoon cinnamon, 2 cups flour, and 4 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder, and add this alternately, a little at a time, with 1 cup milk. Add 1 cup nuts (walnuts and almonds) chopped fine.

Bake in three greased and floured layer tins in hot oven about 15 minutes. Cover top and sides of cake with the following filling and icing:—Cream 2 tablespoons butter with 2 cups confectioner's sugar; add 1 tablespoon cocoa and 3 tablespoons strong coffee and stir until smooth.

LUNCHEON CAKES

(with Chocolate Sauce)

Cream $\frac{1}{2}$ cup shortening; add 1 cup sugar gradually until well blended. Add 1 egg yolk and $\frac{1}{2}$ cup milk, then 1 cup flour. Mix well; add $\frac{1}{4}$ cup milk and $\frac{1}{4}$ cup flour sifted with 4 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder. Fold in 1 beaten egg white and 1 teaspoon ground cinnamon or vanilla. Bake in greased small tins in moderate oven about 20 minutes.

Serve hot with following sauce, topped with whipped cream:—Melt 1 ounce unsweetened chocolate in top of double boiler. Add 2 tablespoons butter and when mixed pour $\frac{1}{2}$ cup boiling water on slowly, stirring constantly; then add $\frac{1}{4}$ cup sugar. Bring to boiling point and boil 5 minutes without stirring; add $\frac{1}{4}$ teaspoon vanilla and few grains salt. Serve hot.

FEATHER COCOANUT CAKE

Sift together $1\frac{1}{2}$ cups flour, $\frac{3}{4}$ cup sugar, and 4 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder. Add 4 tablespoons melted shortening, 1 teaspoon lemon extract, $\frac{1}{2}$ cup fresh grated cocoanut and 1 beaten egg to $\frac{1}{4}$ cup milk and add to dry ingredients. Mix well and bake in small greased loaf pan in moderate oven 35 to 45 minutes. Sprinkle with powdered sugar, or ice with white icing as follows:—

Put 1 unbeaten egg white into shallow dish. Add a little at a time $1\frac{1}{4}$ cups confectioner's sugar, beating with wire whip until right consistency to spread. Add 1 teaspoon vanilla and spread on cake. Sprinkle with cocoanut.

Send for New Royal Cook Book-It's free

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO.

103 FULTON ST. NEW YORK

They Do Wear Longer

TOWELS of unknown manufacture may not wear well. The presence of the famous Martex label on a Turkish Towel, Bath Mat or Wash Cloth is positive assurance to you of good value, long wear, beauty and the highest absorptive qualities. Ask your favorite department store for Martex—standard of the world in Turkish Towels.

The Martex "Duplex" (Patented) Towel pleases both men and women. Friction weave on one side; soft weave on the other.

W. H. & A. E. MARGERISON & CO., Philadelphia

Why Martex Towels Do Wear Longer

Magnified underweave of Martex Towel. A firm, close-knit fabric that wears well and costs least in the long run. Compare with circle at right.

Why Martex Towels Do Wear Longer

Equally magnified underweave of a "cheap" Turkish towel. Note the loose, coarse, weak weave. Wears out fast. Compare this with circle at left.

Let's Have Lamb for Dinner

(Continued from Page 79)

sauce may be added to the stew and, if desired, four potatoes cut in halves. Simmer again until the potatoes are tender or, if they have not been added, for fifteen minutes. Then remove meat and vegetables to a hot platter, thicken the gravy and season it if necessary, strain and pour over them, garnish with a border of peas cooked till tender and nicely seasoned, or if dumplings or noodles are liked they may be cooked in the gravy and served with the stew, omitting the peas.

LAMB HAMBURG STEAKS. The neck is used for them also, and should be ground like ordinary Hamburg steak. A pound and a half will be ample for serving five or six persons. To the finely ground meat add a tablespoonful each of chopped onion and parsley, salt and pepper to taste and add a dash of paprika and mace. Form into balls lightly and deftly, so that the cakes will not become hard and compact; cook in hot drippings till well done. Make a brown gravy of the fat in the pan, and serve baked potatoes and string beans or lettuce salad with the lamb Hamburg. For variety, a tomato sauce may be liked with the meat cakes, and French-fried potatoes may also accompany them occasionally.

LAMB STEAKS WITH APPLES afford another method of making use of the neck of lamb. Cut the steaks neatly and flour each well, then sauté them in hot fat till nicely browned. Place them in a covered baking dish or casserole, season well and cover with sliced tart apples. Cover the dish and bake slowly for an hour. If a braised dish is preferred omit the apples and add a cupful of hot water, a teaspoonful of catchup or kitchen bouquet and a sliced onion; then bake as in the previous recipe and serve with peas. The shoulder of lamb, as already remarked, is one of the most valuable cuts in the whole lamb. Shoulder chops are very good, and as they contain more meat to the pound than either the loin or rib chops they are of course the most economical for the housewife to purchase.

ROAST SHOULDER OF LAMB is the dinner par excellence, and here are several ways of preparing it. Simply cooked without boning and served with brown gravy and mint sauce, it is delicious. To cook a shoulder of lamb perfectly, rub the skin with salt—never the flesh, for the salt would invariably draw out the juices—and shake enough flour over it to coat it well, then place it on a rack in a dripping pan and put it in a hot oven to become thoroughly seared. Never add water at first, and always be sure that the oven temperature is at least four hundred and fifty to five hundred degrees. After ten minutes turn the meat over and lower the temperature of the oven to three hundred and fifty to four hundred degrees; continue cooking until the meat is done. Eighteen to twenty minutes to the pound is the correct time to allow for the cooking of lamb, though a few minutes more will not harm the roast.

Ten minutes before serving, season the meat and turn it once more. Basting is necessary unless one has a covered roaster, which is self-basting. A six-pound roast will require basting four times. Potatoes browned with the meat are popular with lamb and are easily prepared. Parboil them first, then arrange them about the lamb.

Crown roast is a majestic dish, suitable for large dinners. Both loins with ribs are fastened together, the center being filled with dressing or vegetables.

MINT SAUCE, so important an accessory to roast lamb, is made by chopping enough fresh mint to make one tablespoonful, then adding a tablespoonful of sugar and two of vinegar or, if the latter is very strong, one of vinegar and one of water. Stir till the sugar is dissolved and serve in a small sauce boat.

STUFFED SHOULDER OF LAMB is fine also, especially if the savory stuffing is composed partly of nuts. The butcher will remove the bone and prepare the lamb for the filling; but be quite sure that he sends the bones home with the meat, for they may be used in making stock for the gravy or as the foundation for a few cupfuls of luncheon broth. Spread the stuffing, made in your favorite way, over the meat, then roll it up and tie it securely. Dredge with flour and cook in a hot oven according to directions for roasting a shoulder, allowing twenty minutes to the pound because of the compactness of the roll.

LAMB STEAKS, cut from the leg, deserve special mention. Trim each slice neatly and sprinkle with salt and pepper. Scatter a little chopped onion over each slice and roll up closely, wrap a slice of bacon about the roll and fasten with a toothpick. Dip in flour and brown in hot drippings. Then place in a casserole or baking pan and pour a little hot water about the rolls. Bake in a hot oven half an hour, basting twice. Serve with brown gravy made from the drippings.

COLD LAMB is really a delicious and tempting dish if it is sliced very thin and served with a green salad and baked or creamed potatoes; but there are persons who despise cold meat of any kind. So here is a hot dish, a simple one, but it dresses up the lamb left-overs most attractively:

BROILED LAMB SLICES. Cut the lamb in rather thick slices and marinate them for an hour in a dressing made of a tablespoonful of olive oil, one tablespoonful of vinegar and salt and pepper to season highly. Dip the marinated slices in fine bread crumbs and pan broil them a delicate brown. Serve with currant jelly or tartare sauce.

A word about the uses and treatment of lamb or mutton fat, for these important factors must be managed carefully, owing to the fact that they are likely to have the objectionable "woolly" taste. But they are useful and should never be wasted or disregarded. Measure the fat and add to it half its quantity of sweet milk, then place it over a slow fire and simmer gently until it is entirely melted. Set aside to cool; skim the cake of fat from the liquid and place it over the fire with cold water. Repeat the melting, cooling and skimming, and you will have a most excellent frying or shortening material which retains none of the taste of the meat whatever. Savory fats for frying are excellent when made of lamb or mutton fats. Mix the fat with an equal quantity of beef drippings or suet and cover with cold water. When melted add a sliced sour apple and half a teaspoonful each of marjoram and thyme, tied in muslin, to it and simmer half an hour. Then strain, cook and skim the fat from the water, and it will be most deliciously flavored, excellent for frying potatoes, fish or tomatoes.

The rolled roast above is an excellent means of using shapeless pieces, such as the shank, breast or neck, or a shoulder or leg may be boned, rolled and tied.

THE NEW WILLARD, in Washington, receives thousands of foreign representatives who visit our shores. It caters to the widely different tastes of every nation and pleases them all. The recipe on the right comes from its chef.

DROMEDARY COCOANUT COOKIES

CREAM 2 tablespoons butter and $\frac{1}{2}$ cup sugar. Add 1 well beaten egg and 1 cup Dromedary Cocoanut. Add $\frac{1}{2}$ cup flour, 1 teaspoon baking powder and $\frac{1}{4}$ teaspoon salt, sifted together. Mix well. Chill thoroughly. Drop on greased pans in small balls. Press with fork to $\frac{1}{2}$ -in. thickness. Bake in moderate oven.

How do they get surprises in their menus?

EVERY day as mealtime approaches, thousands of women in utter hopelessness ask themselves:

"What can I serve today that is different?"

The old family dishes are all so familiar, so outworn and tiresome.

But thousands of women have learned to give a chef's variety and surprise to even ordinary menus. The secret is varying the flavor—not the food. And they do it with Dromedary.

A few shreds of Dromedary Cocoanut spread over an old dish brings a surprise to the table. The usual muffins, cereals and desserts sprinkled with Cocoanut become unusual. Cocoanut flavor adds a subtle touch of distinction.

You must be sure it's Dromedary Cocoanut, of course—packed in the "Ever-Sealed" package that keeps it fresh and juicy. Cocoanut is cocoanut. But cocoanut with all its original rich flavor—that is Dromedary.

THE HILLS BROTHERS COMPANY
375 WASHINGTON STREET - NEW YORK
NEW YORK - LONDON - BUSSORAH
SAN JUAN - SMYRNA - PARÁ
THE OLDEST AND THE LARGEST BUSINESS OF ITS KIND IN THE WORLD

Send for the free Dromedary Booklet "One Hundred Delights." It tells how DROMEDARY COCOANUT, DROMEDARY TAPIoca and DROMEDARY DATES can bring to the commonest dishes a touch of tropical elegance. Address Department 25.

Dromedary Cocoanut

DROMEDARY PRODUCTS
TAPIoca that is ready in an instant; COCOANUT that keeps fresh to the last shred; GOLDEN DATES from the Garden of Eden.

Makers of silk underwear and stockings make tests and find safest way to wash them

SILK is not perishable when it is properly cared for. With the right laundering it will outwear cotton or even linen. Careless washings will quickly ruin it—weaken the fibre, yellow the silk and destroy its lustre.

It is as important to the manufacturer as to the wearer to find the safe way of laundering silks. For this reason the makers of McCallum Hosiery and Van Raalte Silk Underwear had thorough washing tests made.

Read the letters from these two companies. They tell many interesting things about washing and why, as a result of these tests, they are eager to have their customers wash silks in Lux.

Send today for booklet of expert laundering advice—it is free. Address Lever Bros. Co., Dept. A-3, Cambridge, Mass.

McCallum Hosiery Co. Northampton, Mass.

Lever Brothers Co.,
Cambridge, Mass.

Gentlemen:

We had street stockings in black, brown and grey, and evening stockings in carise, emerald, and pale blue washed in Lux, following very closely the directions given, being especially careful to cool the Lux solution.

It is important to wash colored silk stockings in lukewarm water. Very hot water may cause the color to bleed.

Each pair of stockings was given the number of laundings the average stockings receive.

The stockings were still in excellent condition at the end of the washings. The color changes were not noticeable and the silk was in good condition, strong, springy, and with no frayed or broken threads such as appear when rubbing is necessary or when a harsh soap is used.

Many people do not know that a strong soap not only fades silk, but it weakens it and destroys the lustre.

The excellent results we obtained with Lux were due only in part to the fact that it does away with rubbing; the main factor in our minds is its mildness and purity. If silk hose are washed, following the directions, with Lux after each wearing they will give longer service.

Very truly yours,
A. B. McCallum
President.

VAN RAALTE COMPANY
FIFTH AVE. 30TH & 31ST STREET
NEW YORK

Lever Brothers Co.
Cambridge, Mass.

Gentlemen:

No silk undergarment gets harder usage than a vest, so we had three flesh colored silk vests, of sheer, medium and heavy quality, laundered in Lux the average number of times an undergarment is washed before it wears out.

The vests lost astonishingly little color - there was practically no fading. In fact, at the end of the washings, they were about as soft and lustrous as when new.

We attribute our success with Lux especially to its purity. A very harsh soap or soap flake is ruinous to silk. The mild Lux lather cleanses so quickly and with such gentleness that it is impossible for it to injure the garment. We are glad to recommend it to the women who wear our silk underwear.

Very truly yours,
Benjamin Raalte
The Van Raalte Co.

LUX

Won't injure anything
pure water alone won't harm

To Save You Two Dollars or More at House-Cleaning Time

DO YOU want to finish an old soft-wood floor, to which no finish of any kind has ever been applied, so that rugs may be used instead of carpets? It can be done at little expense, if your family will pool its talents for the job.

First, have the man of the house make the floor as tight, level and smooth as possible, planing or sandpapering if necessary. Draw all tacks or drive them far below the surface with a nail set. Then scrub the wood clean with hot soapsuds, rinse with clear water and dry thoroughly. If there are any bad stains they may be bleached out in many cases with a solution made by dissolving one teaspoonful of oxalic acid in a cupful of hot water. This liquid, which is poisonous and must be carefully handled, is spread on the wood and allowed to remain overnight. In the morning all traces of the acid must be removed by scrubbing.

When the floor is thoroughly dry it may be stained and varnished, oiled or painted, as though it were new. After the first coat of finish has been allowed to dry, cracks and holes should be filled with crack filler, mixed with coloring to match the floor.

There are several good crack fillers on the market, but a simple and satisfactory one may be made of genuine whiting and linseed-oil putty, into which is thoroughly worked about ten per cent of dry white lead and coloring matter to match the floor. Another good filler may be made of cabinet glue melted with a little water in a double boiler, thickened with fine sawdust, and colored to match the wood. This must be used while hot, and worked smoothly into cracks with a small knife.

To Renovate Rugs

SMALL rugs will last longer if, when cleaned, they are placed right side down on dry grass or snow, beaten with a flat carpet beater, swept, turned over and swept again. Hanging rugs over a line while they are being cleaned, or shaking them by the corners, strains them badly; it may break the threads and cause the ends to ravel.

Practically all rugs, after thorough beating, may be cleaned with soap and water. Rag rugs may, of course, be washed in the machine, hung on a line and rinsed by means of the hose. Other rugs can be placed on a table and scrubbed with a brush and mild soapsuds; as each section is cleaned it should be rinsed thoroughly with a cloth wrung out of clear water. If Oriental rugs are cleaned in this way care should be taken to have them dry quickly, for if moisture remains long in the depth of the pile it may rot the threads.

After cleaning, a machine-made rug sometimes loses its shape or curls up, because the sizing has come off. You will find resizing will add much to its life and appearance. This can be done by a carpet dealer or at home.

The rug should be stretched tight and true, and tacked at frequent intervals face down upon some floor, where it can be left undisturbed. It should then be sprinkled generously with a solution made by dissolving one-quarter of a pound of flake glue in half a gallon of water, in a double boiler or a pail surrounded with hot water. If the rug is light weight, a smaller quantity of glue must be used, so that none penetrates to the right side. It should be allowed to dry for at least twenty-four hours.

To mend a pile carpet, as illustrated above, choose matching worsted yarn, run the needle under the proper number of backing threads and pull up, forming loops. These are then sheared off evenly with the pile.

Don't throw away the rug or carpet with worn spots or moth holes, for with a little care you can mend it so that it will look like new.

First, examine the rug carefully to see whether warp or filling threads, or both, need renewing, and choose materials for mending that match the old ones in color and texture as nearly as possible. If colors cannot be matched, neutral shades corresponding in tone may be used.

Mending a Carpet

FOR ingrain carpet the ordinary darning stitch that is used on stockings is correct, and the pattern may be worked in afterward. The pile carpetings, however, require more complicated treatment. The backing is first darned in, and then the pile is made with loops of colored worsted yarn, one against another, clipped or left uncut, according to the type of carpet. If you pull out a thread or two of the pile close to the hole you will see just how many threads of the backing to pass your needle under in making a loop. In the photograph the needle was passed under two each time, because the pile thread in the original weaving was applied in this way. Always be sure to anchor your stitch firmly. Designs can be reproduced so skillfully that mended places defy detection.

Seams in carpets are made on the wrong side, overhanding the two edges firmly together with strong linen thread. In commercial establishments the seam is sewn over a thick pole, to make it even. Special carpet needles, No. 00, may be bought.

The sewing machine may well be used in reinforcing small rugs with braid, binding rugs and carpets, and sewing on fringes. A selvage, much like that used on Oriental rugs, can be made by laying two or three rather heavy cords along the edge and darning them to the rug with over-and-under stitches set so close together that the cords are entirely covered, and a flat, narrow strip is formed. Black or neutral-colored wool and a strong needle with a large eye should be used. If the edge is very ragged, first reinforce by overcasting or whipping braid to underside.

If it is necessary to run an electric cord through a rug or carpet—in order, for instance, to connect a library-table lamp with a floor plug, or to bring within reach the push button of a dining-room buzzer—don't cut a hole in the rug. Don't even rip the rug on a seam, if there happens to be one. With a marlin spike, if you happen to have one, or a single-pointed ice pick, if you don't—a marlin spike is a sailor's implement made of iron, six or eight inches long, sharp pointed at one end and used in splicing rope and in disciplining a mutinous crew—carefully separate the heavy threads in the back of your rug at the place where the wire must go through. The sharp point will soon make a small hole, which may be enlarged as much as needed without breaking or cutting or tearing a single thread in the rug. The threads will close round your wire as long as it is in use, and when you eventually unhitch the combination of rug and wire you have only to rub the rug in your fingers to bring the weave back to its original condition.

For renewing selvages of rugs, two or three rather heavy cords are laid along the edge and darned to the rug with heavy yarn, completely covering the cords.

There's a nice new gown in your coal bill

Send for this free book

YOU might as well have that new gown instead of letting it be burned up by your old-fashioned furnace or stoves.

If your house is large the IDEAL TYPE A HEAT MACHINE will save one-third of what you're spending for coal. If your house is small ARCOLA will save in the same degree.

And think of the satisfaction of having every room hot-water warmed with its own American Radiator. No more hot rooms on one side of the house and cold rooms on the other. Fewer coughs and colds; more money for clothes and less for coal.

THE FREE BOOK offered here gives ten secrets for saving coal. It tells how your home can have the same perfect warmth which this Company's larger heating plants give to mansions, cathedrals and even the White House itself. Fill in the coupon and mail.

AMERICAN RADIATOR COMPANY

Makers of the famous IDEAL Boiler and AMERICAN Radiators

Dept. 32—104 West 42nd Street
NEW YORK

Dept. 32—816 So. Michigan Ave.
CHICAGO

American Radiator Company
New York or Chicago, Dept. 32

Without obligation, send me by mail your free booklet, "Better Warmth and Better Health."

Name _____

Street _____

City _____ State _____

If you plan to build put an X here ()

This Hat, Black or Colors, $3.22

The Label of Quality and Reputation

Priscilla Dean Hats

for Girls

Superior in Style, Beauty and Value

"The prettier the hat, the prettier the girl." Both the girls and their mothers appreciate that fact. That is why they prefer Priscilla Dean Hats—for in a Priscilla Dean Hat they find the individual touch of design, the smartness, the style that add to the charm and beauty of the wearer. And yet these cost no more than ordinary hats—often less.

From our Spring array of styles and colors you will find it easy to select the hat you want. Be sure to look for the Priscilla Dean Hat label—gold on the purple lining—it is your guarantee of value and superior quality.

The advertisements in your newspaper will tell you at which store you can purchase Priscilla Dean Hats. There you will get full value and satisfaction in girls' hats—hats that are stylish, beautifully made, yet inexpensive.

This attractive style book—free!

Be sure to write for it—it will please you—and with it comes the first of a series of charming story booklets for little ladies!

BAER BROS. MFG. CO.

906-910 WEST LAKE ST.
Chicago, Ill.

Salt Fish and Smoked Fish

Give Variety to Lenten Menus

By MARY WARREN

WHEN you have tasted a Sunday night supper dish of finnan haddie, prepared in some delectable manner, or a breakfast of codfish fritters, or a luncheon or dinner of scrambled eggs with smoked roe, or a mackerel prepared in true Maine style, you will not require to be told of the peculiar delights of smoked and salted fish. But if, on the other hand, fish to you means nothing more than a bit of fresh weakfish or butterfish or shad, you will need to be told something about the many delightful, appetizing dishes which are to be made only from those splendid products which the fishermen on our coasts are busy preparing for us all through the hot months of summer.

When we are informed by excellent authorities that most varieties of salt and smoked fish are of greater value as food products than they are when fresh, and that, salted or smoked, these same fish sell for a much lower sum than they would as fresh fish, the idea begins to look really interesting. It is quite true; for the curing extracts most of the water from the fish, leaving only the edible flesh. Statistics show that dry salt cod contains 22 per cent of protein as against 16 per cent when the same fish is fresh. The same is true of mackerel and of almost every other salt or smoked variety. Therefore, when one takes into consideration the fact that the fresh fish is at least 30 per cent higher in price than the smoked, the question of smoked and salt fish seems one well worth the housewife's attention.

The variety available in this class of food is large and pleasing. In addition to the salt mackerel and salmon, with which we are all familiar, there are also to be had in the dry salt state cod, pollack, haddock, whiting and several others less often shipped, because the demand for them is poor. Herring, mackerel and salmon may be purchased packed in brine in pails of several sizes and may be prepared in any number of ways.

Preparation for Cooking

OF THE smoked fish there is even greater variety. Halibut, finnan haddie, salmon, whitefish, sturgeon, bloaters and herring are just a few of the wonderful assortment of these good, economical foods. Smoked roe, either the sturgeon, mackerel or cod, will sometimes be found too.

Salt fish, if it is to be thoroughly satisfactory, must be carefully freshened before it is cooked. A casual soaking of twenty minutes or so will not answer; it must be given from twenty-four to forty-eight hours or it will be briny when served. Salmon in brine will require fully forty-eight hours soaking, and the water should be changed several times during that period. If possible this freshening should be followed by an additional five or six hours' soaking in milk and water, which will not only remove the superfluous salt but will give an added tenderness and delicacy to the flesh of the fish.

In soaking salt fish place it in a pan sufficiently large to hold it, and fill the pan with water, so that the fish will be fully immersed in it. Place the fish, meat side down, in the water with a rack beneath it to prevent its sinking to the bottom of the pan. If the fish is to be broiled it should be permitted a longer time in its cold water bath than if it is to be creamed or prepared with milk in some other fashion. When, as will sometimes happen, it is necessary to hasten the process of freshening, the meat of the fish may be cut deeply in several places before it is put to soak; then the water will permeate it more readily and the salt will be washed away.

The dry salt fish will also require freshening, but not for so long a period. Twelve hours should suffice for it, and often it will not require more than half that time. I have some few recipes of which I am rather fond, in which the salt fish is not soaked at all.

New Ways With Fish

FRESHENING or previous preparation of any kind, except in a few dishes, is entirely unnecessary with smoked fish; in fact, this style of preserved fish may be served even without heating, if it is so desired. And sliced in wafer-thin bits or cut in neat cubes, it is very good so eaten. But the fish is so tasty when it is prepared in some tempting fashion that most persons with whom it is popular prefer to cook it. In recipes calling for a period of soaking I have often found it possible to obtain the same results by placing the fish over the fire in cold water, permitting it to come slowly to boiling, and finally draining and rinsing it with fresh water.

BROILED MACKEREL. In selecting mackerel for broiling, choose the larger fish, as they are so meaty and juicy when cooked; their flavor, too, is better and more delicate than that of the small fish. After freshening according to the directions, wipe the mackerel thoroughly, for if water is present when it is cooked it will cause the fish to stew rather than to take on that deliciously crisp, brown appearance which is so desirable.

Heat the broiler and rub the bars with butter, margarine or bacon fat. Then lay the fish, flesh side down, on the broiler and place it under the flame of the gas range or over hot coals to cook to a nice, tempting brown. Then turn the broiler and brown the other side of the fish lightly. Serve on a hot platter and brush over with melted butter. Garnish the dish with a lemon cut lengthwise, or broiled bacon, with bits of curled parsley; serve very hot. This recipe may be used also in cooking smoked sturgeon, salmon, whitefish, finnan haddie or herring.

BOILED MACKEREL, with drawn butter, makes a good dinner dish, which potatoes in parsley butter should accompany, with some good sauce to spice and savor everything. Freshen the fish as usual, then place it in cold water and put it on the fire to simmer for twenty minutes; hard boiling will cause it to break. Drain the fish and serve it on a folded napkin, garnished with hard-boiled egg.

MACKEREL IN MAINE STYLE is delicious. The fish, after freshening, is wiped until every drop of water is removed; then it is placed in a large pan, skin side down, covered with cold milk, which is permitted to come only to the boiling point. Then the mackerel is drained and placed on a hot, buttered broiler and cooked a delicate brown. Slip it onto a warm platter spread generously with butter, and place it in the oven until the butter is melted. Serve with rashers of bacon and sliced lemon.

CUBAN MACKEREL. The fish should be soaked and dried well, then placed in a baking pan with one large onion chopped fine, one green pepper freed from seeds and also chopped, a canned pimiento cut in pieces and the liquid from a Number Two can of tomatoes, strained through a sieve; dot the fish with butter or margarine and bake in a moderate oven twenty-five minutes. Season the gravy to taste and, when the fish is arranged on a warm platter, pour this gravy around and over it. Garnish with strips of toast and serve with baked potatoes.

SALT SALMON SALAD may be served as the piece de resistance at a supper or luncheon and yet act the part of the salad as well. Soak the salmon forty-eight hours and place it over the fire in fresh cold water, bringing it merely to the boiling point. Then drain and rinse with cold water and wipe dry. Broil on a buttered gridiron, basting with a little melted butter occasionally; then cool it and break into pieces. Marinate for two hours with a French dressing made rather tart with lemon juice; then drain and arrange on lettuce leaves and serve with a good cooked salad dressing or mayonnaise.

SALT HERRING prepared in almost any one of the ways described for mackerel or salmon will add a new note to the menu.

The dry salt codfish, which is to be had in blocks weighing from one to two pounds each, is a well-known commodity, but new and attractive ways for preparing it are less familiar. Usually it is creamed or made into fish balls, the latter frequently leaving much to be desired.

CODFISH FRITTERS, prepared in the manner I am about to describe, are much more delicate and tempting and are also far easier to make than fish balls. Flake the fish without soaking it, but remove all hard, scaly or bony pieces. Measure one large cupful of the flaked fish and add to it two cupfuls of raw potatoes pared and cut into small pieces. Place fish and potatoes together in a saucepanful of cold water and cook till the potatoes are very tender; then drain and mash them with the fish till smooth. Add a tablespoonful of melted margarine or butter, a dash or two of paprika and pepper and one well-beaten egg. Now drop by spoonfuls into boiling-hot deep fat and cook to a golden brown, like crullers. Drain on paper and serve piping hot in a wreath of curly parsley, with chili sauce or catchup.

CODFISH HASH WITH BEETS is an old-time New England dinner. Cook the fish as for the fritters, with the potatoes, but chop them when the latter are tender instead of mashing them. Then mix with one-quarter cupful of salt-pork cubes diced and fried brown, and one-quarter cupful of pickled beets finely chopped. Place in a frying pan with the fat from the pork, press down firmly and cook slowly to permit the hash to brown. Turn with a spatula or fold like an omelet, and serve on a hot dish with catchup or chili sauce.

CODFISH SOUFFLÉ is made of the shredded or finely desiccated codfish; the ordinary variety may be used if it is soaked well and picked into fine shreds. The desiccated or shredded kind need be soaked only a few moments, and should then be squeezed very dry. Melt two tablespoonfuls of butter in a frying pan and stir in the same quantity of flour, cook till smooth, then add a cupful of cold milk and continue cooking till thick. Stir in the codfish, with paprika and pepper to taste, and whip in the well-beaten yolks of two eggs. Remove from the fire and fold in the egg whites, beaten to a smooth, dry froth. Pour into a buttered baking dish or ramekins, and bake ten minutes, if the small dishes have been selected; twenty will be required for the large. Serve at once, for a soufflé will not bear waiting.

FINNAN HADDIE À LA KING is a favorite dish wherever it is served. For a dish to serve six persons select a smoked haddock weighing from a pound and a half to two pounds and soak it in cold water for an hour. Then cover it with fresh water and bring to the boiling point. Drain, rinse and remove skin and bone. Flake into pieces of a convenient size to serve and set aside while the sauce is being prepared. Melt two tablespoonfuls of butter and add two tablespoonfuls of flour, cooking them together till smooth and thick, then add two cupfuls of cold milk and simmer till the sauce is well thickened. Now add one pimiento cut in pieces, one green pepper freed from its seeds and cut in small pieces, then sauté in a little margarine, and one hard-boiled egg cut in rings. Add the fish and let it simmer in the sauce gently for ten minutes; season to taste and serve on toast. If an especially nice dish is desired a few canned or fresh mushrooms sautéed in margarine or butter may be substituted for the hard-boiled eggs, but the finnan haddie will be good whichever embellishment is selected. Garnish with stuffed olives and parsley.

SMOKED HERRINGS, ENGLISH FASHION. Skin and bone three large-sized herrings and soak them twenty minutes in warm milk mixed with an equal quantity of water. Wipe dry and marinate in a mixture of two tablespoonfuls of melted butter, the yolk of one egg well beaten, and a teaspoonful each of finely chopped parsley and onion. Then sauté brown in hot margarine. Drain and place on a hot platter. Add a tablespoonful of flour to the liquid and brown it well, then add a cupful of water and simmer till smooth. Season highly and pour over the fish.

THE LITTLE BONELESS HERRINGS, which come in glass jars, make delectable sandwiches. They should be soaked for a moment or two in hot water, then drained well and dried. After being brushed with melted butter they should next be toasted. Meantime make a sufficient number of pieces of fresh toast, trim nicely, butter, and on each piece place a crisp lettuce leaf dipped in French dressing, arrange the toasted fish on the lettuce and top with a bit of tartar sauce.

CANAPÉS OF SMOKED STURGEON are also nice for late suppers, or they make delicious hors d'œuvres. From very thin slices of rather stale rye or wheat bread cut small rounds or squares. Toast a nice brown and butter. On each piece of toast place a waferlike bit of fish and dot with butter; then tuck the pan in the oven till butter has melted. Garnish with parsley and quartered lemon slices.

FROZEN FISH are also economical and good at this season of the year, for, like the smoked and salt fish, they are caught in the summer when exceedingly plentiful and frozen at once, then stored in a perfectly sanitary way for use when fishing is out of the question. No especial recipes are required for preparing frozen fish successfully, but some directions as to the treatment of it before it is cooked may be acceptable. Never soak frozen fish to thaw it, nor permit it to stand in a warm place. Keep it in the refrigerator or in some other cold spot where the thermometer does not register freezing and it will thaw slowly and correctly, as it should. Perhaps it may require several hours to come to the proper condition for cooking, but a frozen fish will taste very nearly like a fresh fish when this method is pursued.

TUNA FISH À LA MADRID. To a pound can of the fish cook together two tablespoonfuls each of butter and flour, add two cupfuls of strained tomato juice and one onion chopped fine. Cook till smooth, then add the fish flaked in large pieces, and simmer ten minutes. Serve in a border of boiled macaroni, over which a little grated cheese is sprinkled.

BAKED TUNA CROQUETTES are almost equal to chicken croquettes and perhaps more wholesome because they are cooked in the oven. Make a white sauce of two tablespoonfuls each of flour and butter and a cupful and a half of milk; add a pound can of tuna flaked in small pieces, and season to taste, adding a pinch of mace. Spread out in a flat dish to cool, then make into croquettes, roll in beaten egg and fine bread crumbs, and place in a greased pan. Bake in a hot oven fifteen minutes. Serve with a white or tomato sauce, or with peas.

Reduce or Increase Your Weight —to Music

NOW you can have the lessons by which I have reduced or built up the weight of over 100,000 women—in a new form—set to music on phonograph records. Every exercise is planned for women. And I know from over twenty years' study and work with women just what exercises are safe and beneficial for them.

No two women are exactly alike. My exercises are individual, adapted to your special needs with six personal lessons of directions for breathing, bathing, diet (when needed), etc. I study your case as a physician studies it. I give you exercises to help Nature restore your normal weight and health. Let me help you to

Get Well— In a Delightful New Way

Let me help to build up your vitality—to the inspiration of music—to stimulate your circulation, strengthen the muscles of vital organs, so that all sorts of nagging ailments depending on pure blood and strength and position of these organs disappear. I KNOW that you can do it, because I have accomplished these results for over 100,000 women. And what they have done without music, you can surely accomplish with it.

While I am giving you directions to follow in the privacy of your home, I am also writing you inspirational letters, holding your ideal before you until you realize it. You report to me each week and I direct your progress from these carefully studied reports.

Physicians are my best friends. Their wives and daughters are my pupils. My pupils say:

"I have gained 31 pounds and it is just four months today since I began your work."
"When I first took up your course I weighed 190 pounds. I have reduced myself to about 158 pounds. It is such a joy to know that I do not have to be fat."
"I am entirely cured of indigestion. My friends remark on my robust appearance and good health."
"I cannot realize that six months ago I was a physical wreck and under the doctor's care all the time; and now I feel perfectly well all the time. My friends all think my case nothing short of a miracle."

Try My Fascinating Walking Lessons To Music

Put life and buoyancy into your step. Send the blood tingling through your body. See how much this exercise animates and exhilarates you. If you want to have jolly good fun—to put new life into any entertainment—give a "WALKING PARTY" to this new phonograph record of mine.

Send for My First Lesson

Record A—for reducing weight

Record B—for increasing weight

Both records include my walking lesson. Be sure to specify which record you want.

Let me prove that I can reduce or build up your weight, improve your figure and your health. Let me send you my first exercises—set to music—with illustrated chart to guide you. It costs you nothing to try this lesson. I refund your money if you wish. Mail the coupon NOW. Be sure to tell me your faults of health and figure so that I can advise you individually. If you do not want the phonograph records, write me for information about my regular course. I will gladly send you my booklet, giving helpful hints to women.

Susanna Cocroft

Mail This Coupon for Trial Record

Miss Susanna Cocroft, Dept. 36, 1819 Broadway, New York

Please send me the record marked with an X below, together with complete information about your work. On delivery I will pay the postman $5. After five days' trial I will either keep the record or return it in good condition and you will immediately refund the $5.

☐ Record A—for reducing weight ☐ Record B—for increasing weight
Both records include walking lesson

My height is _____ My weight is _____ My age is _____
I wish to increase flesh _____ reduce flesh _____ and to correct the following ailments.

List your ailments here _____

Name _____

Street _____

Town _____

State _____

Orinoka

DRAPERIES & UPHOLSTERIES
COLORS GUARANTEED SUN & TUBFAST

IN THIS CHARMING BREAKFAST ROOM, window curtains are of Orinoka Toronto, a medium-weight, lustrous taffeta damask. French door curtains are Orinoka Raywick Gauze, bound with Satinella. Table runners are Orinoka Satinella; chairs upholstered with Orinoka Checkerboard Tapestry.

THE beauty of Orinoka Draperies is lasting. Neither years of exposure to sunlight nor any amount of washing can fade their colors in the slightest degree. Long service makes the use of Orinoka a real economy.

Orinoka Draperies may be had in all weights from sheer casement cloths for use against the glass to heavy materials for over-draperies, upholstery and portières. There are many beautiful weaves, plain and figured, in all the latest colorings.

The Orinoka Guarantee

To every bolt of Orinoka Sunfast and Tubfast Draperies is attached a tag bearing this printed guarantee: "These goods are guaranteed absolutely fadeless. If color changes from exposure to sunlight or from washing, the merchant is hereby authorized to replace them with new goods or to refund the purchase price." Look for the guarantee tag.

You Should Have This Booklet

Our new Booklet, "Color Harmony in Window Draperies," prepared by a New York decorator, will be sent postpaid for 20c. It contains many color illustrations, with practical directions for choosing materials, making and hanging draperies.

THE ORINOKA MILLS, 501 Clarendon Building, New York City

The Confessions of a Useless Wife

(Continued from Page 16)

Father gave me an odd look. Then he asked me a lot of things about this last year; about my parties and the men I knew and what I did all day long. You know, all the other girls used to think I was lucky because my father never made a fuss about the dances that ended with breakfast, and some of the other things we did. But honestly, father never knew about them; and Adele was amused.

It wasn't until I was nearly asleep that I thought of Doctor Gordon's funny little pause while he was talking with father about the hospitals in France and how they needed nurses and his finishing his sentence with: "But they bring up our girls so strangely these days. You'd think they'd tried to wreck their brains instead of build them. It shows in nursing or in anything that needs endurance or initiative."

I haven't any name for that voice. Perhaps it isn't the voice. Perhaps it's the way his eyes get luminous, for he doesn't talk much. But even when he says simple things, it's as if they came hot from the forge of his innermost self. The other day I wore a thin blue dress to the hospital. It was really no dress to wear there, but with Anna sick, nothing I had was pressed and I was walked to last year's seashore things. As we redressed down the hall the doctor kept looking at me.

"YOU are the very heart of all the blue flowers in the world," he said suddenly. "There aren't very many," I answered. "There are forget-me-nots and blue violets."

It's so singular to hear a man's voice crisp and clear when he is giving orders; quiet and grave with sick people; and then in a little sentence like this, sweet with a touch of dignity, as a woman's voice could never be.

I never wore a dark dress to the hospital again; and I found myself waiting for that thing, whatever it was, I had had a glimpse of as we walked down the corridor. For if he thought of these things as he went about his work, I thought of what he had said, thought of it night and day; and the other things that happened to me didn't matter in the least compared with it.

I don't know exactly how such things work, but if two people are both wanting to see each other, it comes about more easily than if only one wants it, and the reasons don't seem to matter much. There was hardly an inexpensive quarter in New York where I didn't take home convalescent patients. The little children worried me most.

"Can't you let them stay longer?" "We try. But the cases pass out of our hands and unless we make a definite effort we rarely hear of them again. I've got one case now that if I could get six dollars a week board for him, it would make a whole life over." "Why, I'll give you that. Father gives me all the money I want."

HE GAVE me a queer look, but all he said was: "Then you hold the power of life and death in your hands."

It was bargain time in New York. Every shop in town was almost giving things away and, because I didn't seem to manage my clothes right with Anna not there to look after them, I thought I wouldn't try to fix them up; I'd get new ones. And father gave me a couple of hundred dollars to get them. I was going out next day on an orgy of shopping. I was going to make that two hundred buy me five dresses instead of one. But all I thought of as I looked in the shop windows was that faintly mournful voice of one who was so sorry he could not hold such power, saying so simply: "You hold the power of life and death."

The cost of a few dresses in bargain time would make the difference in somebody's health for life. Such things are true, only one never knows. I came on home and went down to the laundry and got Mrs. O'Shaughnessy to press my clothes; and then I gave the two hundred dollars to the doctor. I had to do it; I never would have worn those dresses if I had bought them. I would always have thought of them as the price of somebody's life.

The doctor's look, when I gave him the money, made the tears come into my eyes. And then he insisted that I see the way the money was spent and watch its results; so we drove, one Sunday afternoon, to a little sunny beach on Long Island where I saw three little white-faced boys who were living in a band-box of a cottage on a boardwalk; not much in the cottage, the doctor said, just long enough to drink lots of milk and eat and sleep.

THE next Sunday we went in the morning, because the doctor had to work that afternoon. The doctor was whiter-faced than the boys from staying up all night several nights in succession. The boys were changed so in one week you wouldn't believe it could happen.

"Why," I cried excitedly, "I can get you plenty of money for this kind of thing. It's great. This is working with living material, isn't it?"

"Yes, Forget-me-not," he answered. "You do that all the time, don't you? But you don't get excited about it as I do?" "Oh, yes, I do; that and more. It's my work, you know."

"How you say that! Your work! Is a man's work so much to him, then?"

He didn't even smile. He just looked at me gravely. "Yes, it is that much to him," he said simply. "If he cares for it, it is him; and no matter what he may say, he never forgives the one who hurts it. And he never forgets the one who helps it. There are only two other things that are so much the man himself: The things he wants to do, even if they are too hard or too high or too great to do, and the things he feels, the woman he loves."

I looked away at the three children making sand banks and cutting canals for the sea water to flow into. These children, getting rosy, might well be the moving spirit of a man. I could understand that; but the rest, the way he felt, the woman he loved. . . .

Then I heard him say: "If I see you day after day like this, the time will come when I must tell you that you are becoming me—myself—a very part of the thing that is truly me. And I haven't one thing for you, Leila, not one; not even a home to take you to or money to buy you blue ruffles and cream lace."

WHEN I could get my breath—for my heart pounded so—I whispered: "What do homes and ruffles matter?"

He stood quite still, looking a little whiter than before. After a while he said: "Do they matter so little to you, dear—you with so much, you with your great opportunities and your power of life and death?"

"They mean nothing at all," I said.

"Oh, my dear, it is because you do not know what it means to have those you love die for lack of a sunshiny beach and a few hundred dollars, to be so tired you cannot rest because you have to work with your own hands to cook food and keep clean."

I smiled. If I hadn't known before, I knew now that these things were nothing, nothing at all compared with the thing that was pounding in my heart; nothing compared with the thing that was in his eyes as they looked at me; a thing so sweet, so priceless I would have worked night and day at any work just for the sight of it.

He put his hands lightly on my shoulders. "Yet I would try to work with you. Every breath I drew should be for you and our love and our work. It might not be hard for you, if you cared enough."

"If I cared enough —" I seemed to be pleading for my own life, for the very heart of my life, for something I must have, it did not matter at what cost or by what labor,

(Continued on Page 92)

HEINZ

57

Pure Food Products

© 1922 H. J. H. Co.

Your boy will eat almost anything that tastes good

BUT you know that you must satisfy his hungry appetite with food that means his health and happiness and future well-being.

We, as makers of foods, share your responsibility for the health of your youngsters. It is a sobering responsibility. It makes purity and goodness a matter of principle to us.

Every one of our loyal workers feels in honor bound to prepare Heinz foods just as carefully as you prepare things in your own kitchen for your own children to eat.

H. J. Heinz Company

Not a few people have been curious about the brand "Allen A." They know Black Cat so well in hosiery, that they wonder why the name "Allen A" was added to it.

You agree with us, we believe, that in these times the manufacturer should stand squarely behind every piece of goods he makes.

This is the meaning of the Allen A Brand added to the Black Cat name.

As a brand or trade mark, it doubly identifies the genuine Black Cat Hosiery.

More than this—it puts the responsibility for the Black Cat quality standards squarely where it belongs.

On every piece of Allen A Black Cat Hosiery, it says, in effect: "This is our personal pledge of Hosiery always full size, always full length, always the best of style, always money's worth beyond comparison."

Silk, Lisle, Wool, Cotton—for Men, Women and Children.

TRADE MARK
REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

Allen A Black Cat
Hosiery
For Children

For dress wear, school and street wear and Knockabout use. Silk, Lisle, Wool, Cotton.

Look for this Master Brand—Allen A.

It carries with it the personal pledge of the maker's responsibility for uniform high quality and money's worth.

Allen A is the maker's Mark of Identification on the genuine

BLACK CAT Hosiery

COOPER'S-BENNINGTON
Spring Needle Underwear

ALLEN A Summerwear

The Allen A Company
Kenosha, Wisconsin

Copyright, 1922, The Allen A Company

The Confessions of a Useless Wife

(Continued from Page 90)

a thing that, if I lost it, meant the loss of what I lived for. "What if it is hard?" I whispered. "What are hard things but things to work with? Isn't it better to make your hard things easy than to have nothing to work with in your life? Perhaps things have been too easy for me. Perhaps I ought to work."

His eyes got deeper. I put out my hand to steady myself, put it on his breast.

He let it stay there an instant, then very gravely he lifted it to his face. "I love you," he said.

II

IT IS a strange experience to have your whole world turning in a circle so full of joy that you can scarcely believe it, to find yourself so happy you couldn't hurt a living soul, and to want to fling this happiness all about you, and then to find yourself facing a cloud of misunderstanding and mistrust that threatens to turn all your happiness gray and to creep in and choke the breath you draw.

I did so much want father to feel it as I did. I wanted my lover to go to him with confidence in his friendship; I wanted—oh, I wanted to talk to him of all these lovely things I had not dreamed were in the world; I wanted it so! And I think if we had had only a day or two longer together I could have made father see.

I do not know if somebody else wrote Adele or if she divined something dangerous to her own supremacy in father's letters. But she came home unexpectedly the very hour that my doctor had appointed to ask my father if he might marry me in a little while. Ellen had come upstairs to tell me Doctor Gordon had come and that he was in father's study with him.

Ellen looked so queer, I asked her what was the matter.

"Oh, nothing at all, Miss Leila. But you've been so busy up here, maybe you don't know that Mrs. Laughlin has come."

"Mrs. Laughlin? Why I thought—"

"Yes'm. She's in the study too."

"Oh!" I was shockingly disappointed, out of all proportion to the simple fact of Adele's return. I knew instantly that I must hurry down to the study. And I had wanted father to have a nice long talk—

As I came in I heard Adele say: "But we do not even know your first name, Mr.—or are you a doctor?—Doctor Gordon." And the voice clouded the room with its mistrust.

HE LOOKED quite at ease, my nice young doctor. He must have been used to all kinds of queer people. He merely said "Of course." And he bent over the blotter on the desk before him and wrote, reading aloud as he wrote on the little prescription pad he carries: "MacNeal Gordon, son of Frances MacNeal and Alexander Gordon."

Adele spoke to father: "But, Franklin, he cannot possibly be serious in this matter. No medical student without a practice could be engaged to a girl like Leila. You haven't even started yet, Doctor Gordon, and you want— Well, of course, I don't believe you really want anything definite or serious."

"Mrs. Laughlin, I am asking permission to marry Mr. Laughlin's daughter. Of course I will wait as long as her father thinks I ought to, to make her comfortable in marriage. But perhaps I can persuade both of you that she will be happy with less than you now think she needs."

"Leila cannot keep her own room orderly, let alone a house," said Adele. "She can't boil an egg or make a cup of coffee."

They were looking so intently at each other that they did not see me come in. Neal now turned from father to Adele.

His voice was light, as if what Adele said was not to be taken seriously because she herself was not offering it seriously. "Cannot any intelligent girl, with a good cook book, learn to cook? We manage it out in the open with fires built among the rocks. It has never seemed to me it ought to be hard in a modern kitchen for a clever girl."

Apparently Adele was not won by this optimism. "Oh, a clever girl!" said Adele. "You must first find an intelligent girl, is it not so? And even cook books cost money."

Father interfered at once. "My wife only means, Doctor Gordon, that Leila is young yet and knows little about homemaking. If you need to take more time to provide for a wife, Leila needs to take more time to prepare herself to be a useful wife. A useless wife is a heavy burden for any man."

I came forward. Deep in my mind and heart was that other scene in this same study where father had seemed to have let go of me entirely that he might the better hold Adele. I wondered if it was so different now.

"Ah, Leila," said Adele, and her look at me was not changed after these years, "you have about proved what I said before I left about the folly of leaving you here. I only ran down for the week-end, and I'll take you back with me this time. So, Doctor Gordon, shall we not leave the settling of these little questions for another time? You see I have just arrived after quite an absence and there are so many things I want to talk to my husband about."

WHEN Neal had gone I went upstairs and sat in mother's big chair and tried to think what she would have liked me to do.

Late in the afternoon I went to see Anna. "Is it so hard, Anna," I asked, "to learn to run a house?"

She did not answer me for a moment. Then she said: "There's so much in the way one learns, Miss Leila. Some ways are easy and some hard. All that worries me about you is the way. It's harder than you think; for you—well, you'd have to learn so much in a lump. Learning it as you go along is easier."

"Why does everybody worry over a thing because it's hard to do? It must be far more interesting if it is hard."

Anna was pretty thin and white, but she got a little color in her face as she said shyly: "Miss Leila, when you work as I do, in somebody else's home, watchful of all the little things, you get so you know a good many more things about the people you are working for than they imagine you know. Miss Leila, do you care for him—much?"

"Care for him! Why, caring is just the beginning, isn't it, Anna? Anna, did you ever—love a man?"

She got white again, and a look came into her face that I had not seen before in any face except father's after mother died. It was a look of hunger. "Yes," said Anna, and was still for a long time. Then she added: "He married—after a while." She looked at me again with that bright, hungry look. "Miss Leila, if you really love him, and he is right, as a man, then don't let the little things get in the way. To miss love—real love with the right man—because he hasn't much money or because you can't keep a room orderly or cook a dinner is—oh, Miss Leila, it is a dreadful thing to do."

NEAL came in then. "Leila, when does Mrs. Laughlin go back to Lake Placid?"

"She says as soon as she can get me ready to go with her, Neal."

"As long a stay here as that?" Neal's gray eyes were whimsical. "I want to keep Anna here until after she goes, but I hadn't counted on its being that long. I thought Anna might go home with you in a few days."

"Maybe it will get hot; then not even her interest in me will keep Adele here."

But it stayed cool and all I could say was "Adele, I don't see how I can leave now." I couldn't quarrel with her.

She came into my room next day. "What a mess," she said, looking about. "You've no more sense of order than your father."

"He runs a pretty orderly business."

"That's system, not order."

"Maybe I have that."

(Continued on Page 95)

"One afternoon I told the secret of my transformation to some friends who had dropped in. Within three weeks one of them removed twenty pounds the same way, and another has made an enthusiastic start," says Mrs. Horchler, who is seen standing in the above photograph

PLAYING OFF POUNDS

THE AMAZING STORY OF A WOMAN WHO GOT THIN TO MUSIC

If—

—you had for years been bulky of body and heavy of heart.

—weighing 234 pounds and compelled to play spectator to life's activities and pleasures.

—then, in four months were reduced to 164 pounds with a good figure and energies equal to the most strenuous day—

IF that happened to you, would you feel you should tell the world what caused it? Grace Horchler did and this is her story.

I HOPE readers of THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL will overlook my lack of literary ability in view of the important facts my stout sisters will find in what I say. If anyone had said four short months ago I would look and feel as I do today, I would have called it a wild dream of the imagination. Because I was terribly stout. I wasn't "obese" or "fleshy"—I was uncompromisingly, humorously fat. I am 5 feet 6 inches tall, and I weighed 234 pounds.

THE snapshot is a fair idea of how I used to be. There is no diet I didn't try. I lived on milk a whole month—and gained eleven pounds. I tried walking enormous distances, until my feet called a halt. Still I remained heavy; it was really a task just to get around. Then—

I READ an account of Wallace's course. The novelty of it appealed to me, for he used phonograph records. But it was probably the fact he did not make people starve that decided me to try his way. My husband jokingly called his records "reducing wafers" and we had a lot of fun the first week. I must have been a sight doing as the voice commanded, but the music gave it all such a thrill—I felt as if I was in a play, and must do my part as directed. At the end of a week we stopped laughing, for I had lost nine pounds! The second week I lost eight pounds more. From then on it was slower. But I steadily lost, week after week. The day a scales told me I had removed fifty whole pounds, I danced for joy—and by that time I could dance! Finally, after four months, I was down to 164 lbs.

ONE afternoon, I told the secret of my transformation to some friends who dropped in for tea. Within three weeks, one of them (she is Mrs. Wossner, at the left in the group picture) removed twenty pounds the same way, and another has made an enthusiastic start. I have told my friends all this many times. Why should I hesitate to tell it where perhaps thousands of women burdened with flesh will benefit? Credit for my new figure and new lease on life is due Wallace, whose reducing records have done so much for my appearance, physical condition and altogether new interest in living.

MRS. HORCHLER resides in Chicago, at 4625 Indiana Avenue, but the great change which her two small pictures show was accomplished solely by mail. The Wallace course on phonograph records—set to music—has succeeded in a hundred similar instances; while loss of fifteen, twenty, or thirty pounds is mere play; innumerable women have reported reductions of these amounts. Wallace methods are sure, because founded on the discovery that food does not cause fat. His system lets you eat, but causes all of what you do eat to be used for blood, bone and sinew. Nothing is left for making fat.

YOU may test this remarkable method of reducing without paying a penny. You don't have to send any money, nor promise to take his course. He will send postpaid, plainly wrapped, a full-sized regular reducing record and instructions. All he asks is for you to try it for five days. It will then be very easy to decide whether you wish to receive the remaining lessons in this fascinating course which really reduces people to normal weight. Use the convenient coupon below.

WALLACE, 630 S. Wabash Avenue, Chicago:

Please send record for first reducing lesson, free and prepaid. I will either enroll or mail back your record at the end of a five-day trial. (142)

(Miss or Mrs.)

(Address)

Here is a healthful laxative from Nature's own pharmacy

You can't beat Nature at her own game. Nature creates. Nature regulates. All the health-wisdom of the ages can be summed up in five words: Nature's way is always best.

Why has Nature singled out prunes as the fruit-food that keeps you fit through natural means? Is it because their natural fruit sugar gives you quick-to-use energy? Is it because they are rich in tonic iron and other mineral and "vitamine" elements? Is it because their salts and acids improve the quality of the blood and help to "balance" the diet?

Yes—all this and more: it is because prunes are a natural corrective—a healthful laxative made in Nature's own pharmacy. The oftener you use them the better your household-health will be. Our new Sunsweet Recipe Packet shows you how and why—and it's free. California Prune and Apricot Growers Inc., 390 Market Street, San Jose, California.

SUNSWEET
CALIFORNIA'S NATURE-FLAVORED

prunes

This way:

PRUNES STEWED OR BAKED—Wash and cover Sunsweet Prunes with warm water; soak over night. To stew, heat slowly in same water keeping under boiling point. Cook until tender. Slow cooking develops flavor and the natural fruit sugars so that little if any sugar is needed. A fireless cooker is excellent for cooking prunes. To bake, pour soaked prunes and water in which they were soaked in an earthen bean pot. Bake in a slow oven until tender. Serve baked with custard sauce or whipped cream.

—or this way:

PRUNE JUICE—Wash Sunsweet Prunes, cover with warm water; soak over night. Heat slowly (in water in which they were soaked) to simmering point; cook until fruit is tender and somewhat broken. Keep under boiling point during entire cooking period; no sugar required. When cooked, pour off juice, strain through a fine sieve. The prunes remaining can be pitted and used for prune desserts requiring prune pulp, such as prune whip, prune custard, prune soufflé pie, steamed prune pudding, etc.

—or this way:

MASHED STEWED PRUNES [with or without cereal] Cover Sunsweet Prunes with warm water; soak over night. Heat slowly in same water, keeping under boiling point. Cook until tender. No sugar required. Cool, drain, pit and rub through a coarse sieve. Allow 1 tablespoon of mashed prunes to each bowl of cereal. With buttered graham toast, milk or chocolate, it makes a wholesome, well-balanced breakfast for children. Or serve plain, with cream, top milk or custard sauce. Makes a novel sandwich-filler, too!

Send for the complete Sunsweet Recipe Packet—it's free! California Prune & Apricot Growers Inc., 390 Market Street, San Jose, California—11,000 grower-members

The Confessions of a Useless Wife

(Continued from Page 92)

"Nonsense! Your clothes are a mess. You have to be dressed properly at Lake Placid. You'll have to get more money from your father."

"I don't believe he'll give me more for a while. He gave me two hundred dollars two weeks ago and a hundred last week."

"You certainly didn't spend it on these rags. What did you do with it?"

"Oh, I spent it."

"You spent it," she repeated. "I asked you on what." When I did not answer she went straight to the drawer of my desk where I keep my check book, so straight that it looked as if she had done it before, and ran over the stubs of my check book. "Two hundred dollars to MacNeal Gordon. Forty-eight dollars to MacNeal G. Fifty dollars to MacNeal G.; no date. Who is MacNeal Gordon?"

I tried not to be angry. "Adele, help yourself to my private affairs, but don't expect me to help you. Maybe you'll find a diary there."

I left her at my desk and went straight to the hospital. It wasn't difficult to make Neal understand about Adele. All that he said was: "I'll telephone your father about the checks. He'll understand."

BUT Neal hadn't reckoned with Adele. She had already telephoned father, and he would not speak to Neal over the telephone.

You wouldn't have known father when he came home to dinner. "Leila," he said, and his voice sounded as if he meant to hurt, "have you been giving money to that young medical student?" He looked across the dinner table at Adele, and he said in a tone I had never heard him use to her before: "I told you you ought not to leave her here alone."

"I left her with you, Franklin. She was no more alone than when I married you."

Ordinarily I never had the courage to interfere between father and Adele. But this was different. "What can be in your minds about that money," I asked. "Do you think a man like MacNeal Gordon would take money from a woman for himself?"

"What do you know about him?" asked Adele.

"Father knows more about him than about any of the men I saw all winter."

"Well, what did you do with the money, Leila?" said father.

"I sent three sick children to the seashore with some of it, and the rest is keeping two crippled soldiers from starving until the Government can look after them."

"That's a likely story," said Adele.

I said hotly: "Father, you gave me this money, didn't you? It was mine, not Adele's or yours?"

"I suppose so."

"Well, then, if I spent it this way, why do you mind?"

"Especially," said Adele, "when you haven't a rag to wear and your father will have to give you more money to fit you to go away with me. That's what comes of hanging around hospitals. What's the use of talking to her, Franklin? You'd better talk to the young man. Perhaps you can recover some of the money."

"Father," I cried, "you don't seem like my father these days. I am going to marry Doctor Gordon."

THERE was a brief silence. Then Adele said: "How can you marry him? He has no money."

"He can earn a living."

Adele laughed. "For you? Your quarterly allowance is more than he could make in a year with good luck and hard work."

I saw father look at Adele with a worried look. She saw it too. She smiled across the table at him, and her voice was quite soft as she said: "Oh, what's the use of prolonging this? You get the three hundred back, Franklin, and I'll take Leila to Lake Placid to-morrow. She can go without new clothes."

"I'm afraid I can't move so quickly, Adele," I answered, and I left them to finish their dinner.

As I closed the door I heard father tell Adele that Neal had a little money saved; he had said so—enough to furnish a house for us and to get started. And Adele answered that in that case he could recover the three hundred dollars and that, if he didn't care to attend to it, she'd have their lawyer do it.

Adele never lets anything go. It was when I found that she really had spoken to father's lawyer that I told father that was the end.

Adele and father had some kind of a quarrel, and she went down to the Long Island house for the Horse Show. And that afternoon Neal brought Anna home, and I promised to marry him in three days. Ellen and Mrs. O'Shaughnessy pressed my clothes and mended them.

"TAKE everything, Miss Leila," said Ellen; "all your old shoes and hats. They'll look new where you're going. There's girls who'd give their eyes for clothes like these. Take your furs and your winter clothes, Miss Leila. What do you care how many trunks it takes? The attic is full of trunks. Sure you can send them by freight. Just get them out of the house now, that's a lamb."

"I say, Ellen," said Mrs. O'Shaughnessy, "she'd ought to have some linens; no bride from the Laughlin family ought to go away without linens. Have ye not the key to the guest-linen closet?"

"I'll run to the top floor and ask Anna." For Anna was not allowed to take the stairs. "Anna says," said Ellen later, "that the guest-room linen cupboard is full of linens that belonged to Miss Leila's own mother, and down at the bottom of the cupboard is Miss Leila's white lace coming-out gown and her mother's wedding veil."

"Miss Leila, dear," said Mrs. O'Shaughnessy, "you go out with your young man, and we'll pack your linen trunk and your own blankets and eiderdowns. There'll be no talk about it at all. Herself won't know they've gone. And, Miss Leila, dear, you'll be married in a veil, won't you—in your mother's veil? Sure, she'd like it that way, and it's your only chance of being married in white. It's the lonely house it will be without you, Miss Leila."

"Miss Leila," said Ellen, "let me and Anna call up some of your friends. What's the use of going to church alone? There's enough of them near that, if we telephone them to-day, could get here. Anna knows who they are."

IT WAS the gayest little wedding. Anna asked thirty people for a wedding breakfast after my noon wedding in our own church. Lots more than that were at the church; all Neal's hospital friends, the nurses and the other doctors and internes. They said the whole hospital was celebrating.

Anna ordered the wedding breakfast from the caterer we always used. She even thought of flowers for the church and the house. And our party wasn't at all like the stupid ones where I've been bridesmaid so often, where the bride looked white and the bridegroom half asleep from his bachelor dinner of the night before. I wasn't white. I dressed in mother's room and talked to her just as if she was there, after Anna had pinned on my veil and left me there alone. I told her that I was gorgeously happy, and that I was sure she would like Neal, and that I would expect her to come to my wedding.

When I opened the door I heard Anna telephoning father that I had never looked more like my mother than I did in her wedding veil, and I suppose that was the reason father came to the wedding at the church, though he didn't come to the house. Anna was glad he didn't. She wanted nothing but

(Continued on Page 96)

"Welcome" and "Goodbye"

You are setting the stage for much of life's drama when you select an entrance for your home. We agree that you can not give too great a consideration to its quality and design.

Curtis doors and entrances are made to fulfill your demands for both strength and beauty. Curtis doors are made of selected materials by skilled workmen. Features in their construction insure their durability against use and weather. The designs are by architects of high standing and are along lines approved by leaders in good taste.

The same excellence is common to all Curtis Woodwork—some 250 items of windows, stairs, mantels, moldings, frames, and built-in furniture. It is all skilfully made in widely accepted designs from the best of materials.

You will find Curtis Woodwork low in price when you consider its quality. That's because we give you the advantages of the economies of large production and of standardized manufacturing.

Curtis Woodwork is sold only through retail lumber merchants. You can tell Curtis Woodwork by our name on every piece.

If you do not know where you can see Curtis Woodwork, write us for the name of a nearby dealer and for beautifully illustrated literature.

CURTIS
WOODWORK
"The Permanent Furniture for Your Home"

THE CURTIS COMPANIES' SERVICE BUREAU

Dept. A Clinton, Iowa

Maintained by the following Curtis manufacturing and distributing plants:

Curtis Bros. & Co., Clinton, Iowa	Curtis, Towle & Paine Co., Topeka, Kansas
Curtis & Yale Co., Wausau, Wisconsin	Curtis & Bentley Co., Oklahoma City, Okla.
Curtis-Yale-Holland Co., Minneapolis, Minn.	Curtis Door & Sash Co., Chicago, Illinois
Curtis Sash & Door Co., Sioux City, Iowa	Curtis Detroit Co., Detroit, Michigan
Curtis, Towle & Paine Co., Lincoln, Nebraska

Sales offices at Pittsburgh, New York and Baltimore

The makers of Curtis Woodwork guarantee complete satisfaction to its users. "We're not satisfied unless you are"

If your home plans have not taken shape you will find our "Better Built Homes" of great help to you. Each volume contains floor plans of at least 32 homes, with both exterior and interior views. Use the coupon for convenience.

THE CURTIS COMPANIES' SERVICE BUREAU

Department A Clinton, Iowa

Enclosed please find in stamps for which please send me "Better Built Homes," Vol. VI (3, 4 and 5 room houses), 50c; Vol. VII (6, 7 and 8 room houses), 50c; Vol. IX (50 bungalows, story-and-a-half and two-story houses), 50c. Check the one or ones you want. ☐ Vol. VI, ☐ Vol. VII, ☐ Vol. IX.

Name _____

Street or R. F. D. _____

Town _____ State _____

For that fresh summer touch in winter menus ~ serve SPINACH

SPINACH WITH ROAST LAMB—Roast a crown of lamb and when done remove to a hot platter. Garnish with strips of pineapple and heap the center with hot well-seasoned DEL MONTE spinach to which one tablespoon of lemon juice and a little nutmeg have been added. Arrange brown potatoes around the roast and garnish ends of platter with lettuce or parsley.

What could be more healthful and satisfying at this season of the year than a well-prepared dish of spinach? Del Monte offers you this delicacy whenever you want it—delicious as if picked fresh from the garden—and cooked, ready to serve most conveniently and economically, in any way your fancy dictates.

Prove it by trying the recipe above. It illustrates just one of the countless simple, inexpensive yet thoroughly wholesome and tempting dishes that are available to you all the year round with more than a hundred varieties of Del Monte Canned Fruits, Vegetables and Food Specialties—peaches, apricots, pears, pineapple, cherries, plums, jellies, jams, preserves, catsup, asparagus and many other kinds of vegetables.

Luscious foods—every one of them—from the world's finest orchards and gardens. Packed with all their natural flavor and delicacy—and always ready to add the lighter, fresher elements so necessary in the winter menu.

500 recipes in this book

Learn the many easy, economical ways to serve canned fruits and vegetables in new combinations. Send for a free copy of "Del Monte Recipes of Flavor." It is filled with tempting, thrifty menu suggestions.

Address Department A
CALIFORNIA PACKING CORPORATION
San Francisco, California

The Confessions of a Useless Wife

(Continued from Page 95)

gay young people, and she certainly had them. I cut the cake with the sword Gordon City had given Neal when he went to the war. He didn't use the sword, of course, but they gave him one, and his best man unearthed it from his army trunk.

We got away just in time. It was three o'clock when I threw my bouquet over the banister and ran up to change my clothes. And it was four when Adele came home. She slipped on the rice going up the steps. Anna wrote me.

III

I SUPPOSE there is scarcely a girl who hasn't begun to plan a wedding trip when she first began to think of the bridegroom. I had a perfectly charming two weeks; and so near New York you couldn't have believed it would seem as different to me as if I had gone abroad. Neal planned it overnight. He had to be near New York to bring to a conclusion all the details of his hospital work that his hurried marriage had interrupted.

So, of all places in the world, we went to West Point, and down over the pages of my honeymoon whirled the girls dancing with cadets whose pictures in a school catalogue had first tempted me to leave father alone and go away to school.

"Leila," said Neal one night, "I've saved only a thousand dollars. I count on its getting us to Gordon City and starting us. It's a pretty small margin for a beginner, and I don't know whether I ought to spend five hundred on Mason's car or not. I think you and I can drive to Michigan in it and save a hundred that way, even counting in gasoline and tires; but if I didn't buy it, you might have a girl to do the cooking."

I had a funny feeling in my brain. "Neal," I said, "I never cooked a thing in my life. I even let the other girls cook the fudge at school. But if I'm to learn myself to cook, why do I need a cook?"

"I think maybe I'll need her more than you," Neal grinned.

The result of his hesitation about the car was that Captain Mason, who honestly wanted to sell it because he was ordered to the Philippines, took another hundred off the price; and Neal bought it, and we drove to Gordon City for only fifty dollars.

We reached Gordon City late at night and went to the funniest little hotel, with long verandas overlooking the street and corridors of unused rooms full of old-fashioned walnut beds and bureaus. The clerk knew Neal and the men in the office knew him, and in about five minutes we were one big sensation. Next morning we were in the papers, and our telephone rang every half hour.

"THEY were wonderful when we came home from the war," Neal said. "They could not do enough for us."

"Will they employ you, Neal, when they get sick?"

"I don't know, dear. I'm just a boy to many of them; and there are some good doctors here, men who go all over the country on every kind of case, sometimes driving miles to operate with no conveniences and no help, driving through rain and snow and staying up all night. A doctor's practice in a place like this is quite different from his work in a big city. My father and grandfather were doctors here."

"Will your father's patients engage his son?"

"My father died many years ago, dear, in a diphtheria epidemic, before we had antitoxin, and my mother died two days after him. But the place is full of their friends, who will want to be nice to us. Don't fear. You have come home."

Indeed, it was so full of friends, young friends of Neal and older ones of his father and mother, that it was days before we had time to look for a house. Our callers rocked with us on the veranda or sat in the hotel drawing-room, with its flowered carpet and its long mirrors, and they gave us little afternoon teas and larger evening parties. The first tea was at the Country Club, high up on a hill, with the golf links, like Rome, spread out over seven hills. Mrs. McIntyre gave it "to meet the new bride." She was a friend of Neal's mother.

Her daughter Sally grabbed Neal by the shoulders and shook him with: "Why, you darling old thing you! What do you mean by coming home with a bride this way and plunging into despair thirty girls who have been waiting for you for years?"

Neal's manner with my girl friends had been perfection. With the nurses at the hospital it had been pleasant and companionable. But he was quite different with Sally McIntyre. His voice got as merry as his eyes. It wasn't the look he gave me, but it was an arresting look. "Sally," he said, "it was always a grief to me that you weren't one of that thirty."

"You conceited old thing! You know the reason you're so fond of me is that I'm not one of them. You never did like a sure thing. All the same I thought you were going abroad to study. We all thought so. And all you do is to get married."

We looked and looked for a house. There were hardly any for rent, and the few there were cost too much. Gordon City is on Traverse Bay, and there are a lot of summer places just out of town on the great stretch of beach ribbed with rocky peninsulas that extends several miles beyond the city, lovely places set in groves of evergreens, with the lake almost at their doors. The city is a little one, with level streets shaded by old trees with long lawns stretching to pleasant porches; and among them all not a place for us.

THE days stretched into weeks, while our hotel bill mounted and Neal ran the risk of losing the chance to use his social popularity, because he had no settled place of residence, not even an office. He wanted his office in his house. He said it was the thing to do in a small city.

One morning, almost two weeks after Mrs. McIntyre's tea, Neal and I were breakfasting. Our trunks had not come yet, and I was looking downright mussy. I was wondering what I could do about it, when in came Sally in the loveliest fresh organdie frock, with a pink hat that made her gold hair glow like a morning cloud.

I saw Neal's eyes lighten. "Hello, Pink-Rose," he said; "why so breathless?"

"Oh, Mac, a boy has just been dragged out of the water at the Symmes place, and they can't get a doctor. I drove for you, while one of the men went to the fire department for a pulmotor. No, you can't wait for your car. Hurry up."

Neal didn't wait for anything. They drove off like mad. I did the waiting. I waited all morning, and it wasn't until it looked as if I might have to wait the rest of the day that it occurred to me to ask where the Symmes place was.

"It's on the shore, Mrs. Gordon, just on the edge of the town on the road that goes to the Country Club, a big white frame house with pillars," said the clerk at the desk. "But it's all boarded up. Mr. Symmes hasn't used it since his wife died. He lives over here in town near his factory with Tommy. Tommy's his boy."

At the edge of the town I took a path along the sandy road. The house was easy to find. Sally's car was in the drive and the front door open. I strolled in. There wasn't a sound. The sun was shining on Lake Michigan with a noonday glare, and so it was a moment before I could see after I had stepped inside the dim hall.

In that moment I heard Sally's voice upstairs. "Oh, Mac, it's the very thing for you, a house like this. It's dignified and not too far out for your city patients and just far enough for your country ones. Everybody you know goes by here on their way to the club. Even the Yacht Club is near."

"Sally, you goose, my practice isn't going to begin among these country estates, but among the workmen at the factory end of the town."

"WHO put that notion in your head? Somebody who knew nothing about a small town. You know better than that yourself. You know you've got to make your start right where you want to stay, among your own kind."

I heard Neal laugh. "That wouldn't be a start, Pink-Rose—staying right where I started."

"Oh, don't be so Irish; I'm serious about this. If you take a house like this everybody in town will stop in for tea as they come back from the links."

He laughed again. "Since when has Gordon City taken to tea? It used to be a six-o'clock supper town, with dinner in the middle of the day."

"We are changing since the lack of cooks makes it unnecessary for us to hurry our dinners on their account. Think how you can entertain here, Mac."

"Why, you little organizer, don't you know Leila and I are poor? We can't afford to give the town tea even to build a practice."

"Poor! Why, the New York papers I sent for speak of Leila Laughlin as one of the wealthy marriageable girls. Her father could buy you this house."

"Well, he won't. No father shall buy me my house, and I do assure you, Leila is not a marriageable girl, wealthy or otherwise."

"Oh, Mac, you are just the same! I never could do anything with you."

"You never tried."

"You never gave me a chance. All the same, your success is of importance to me. Here's a house offered to you free of charge for a year by an old friend of your father's who wants it kept open; a man whose son's life you have just saved."

"This would be a good deal to ask Leila to take on as a first attempt."

"Oh, pshaw, what's the matter with your Leila, if she couldn't run a place like this with only two people in it?"

They were coming down the stairs as she said this, and I saw Neal turn sharply to look at Sally.

"How impatient you are with other people's differences, Sally. You've run a house for five years; but it's new to Leila."

I SUPPOSE I was in the shadow and I know I was angry, all the more angry because I had no reason for it, and I didn't want to say anything. So I just stood still, looking at them. And Sally turned her head a moment, caught a glimpse of a shadowy figure, and let out the worst scream I ever heard. Running a house may be new to me, but I don't have hysterics in an emergency. Sally grabbed at Neal and fell back against him.

"Steady, Sally," he said in the voice he uses for his patients. Then he looked over her head at me. "Leila!" he said. "Why didn't you call out to us?"

"I didn't want to interrupt your discussion."

They had reached the foot of the stairs, and Sally, who was no fool, had recovered. "Heavens, Mrs. Gordon, you gave me a start. I thought the house was haunted. You've no idea what an exciting morning we've had. Your bridegroom has been advertised all over the city. There were hundreds here before we finished."

"We!" was all I could find to say.

(Continued on Page 99)

If you will follow these simple directions you will not have "too much light". On the contrary, you will have, at low cost, a light that is agreeable in color, brightness and evenness, and that will very definitely make your work faster and easier! More complete directions, if desired, will be mailed on request. National Lamp Works of General Electric Company, 313 Nela Park, Cleveland, Ohio.

Digitized by Google

What best authorities say about homemade bread

Home baking does pay! When you are cooking it is but little extra trouble to bake your own bread.

By baking bread at home housewives should be able to reduce expenditures for food.—U. S. Dept. of Agriculture.

Homemade bread has a flavor and nourishment all its own.—Good House-keeping.

If your children do not possess a very keen appetite for baker's bread try homemade bread and note the sudden increase in the youngsters' bread consumption.—Dr. Philip B. Hawk.

Every ten-year-old girl should learn how to make good bread. It should be the starting point in her home cookery training.

An important new discovery about Yeast Foam

People do not eat Yeast Foam. They need it, however, they create it—help you to eat better. Thousands are benefiting from the energy making qualities of Yeast Foam, one of the richest sources of the remarkable element in food called vitamins.

Send for instructive booklet, "Dry Yeast as an aid to Health"

Did you ever notice the expression of eager delight when homemade bread is served?

12,000,000 families bake all or part of their bread

Because no bread equals the flavor of the home loaf

What is the secret of the rich nutty flavor that the home loaf alone possesses? First, it is made from only the best flour and yeast, plenty of rich shortening, and often milk—every woman knows that better ingredients make better bread. Next, like the homemade cake, the homemade, home-kneaded dough seems to yield its exquisite flavor generously to the home loaf.

Northwestern Yeast Co., 1751 N. Ashland Ave., Chicago

"Aw, gimme some homemade bread!"

Send for free booklet

Magic Yeast Yeast Foam

—just the same except in name

Package of 5 cakes—at your grocer—10¢

The Confessions of a Useless Wife

(Continued from Page 96)

She laughed, her excitement still holding her. "Well, I was head nurse. It was little Tommy Symmes, and he's all his father has left. While we thought Tommy was dying his father needed help, too, and all the neighbors kept up a moaning chorus. You never heard anything so dreadful; and Mac kept right on. He wouldn't give up working long after even Mr. Symmes thought it was hopeless. Somebody opened the house and we got blankets, and Mac pulled him through. He's with his father now, alive and kicking. You never saw such an ovation as Mac got."

"I am so glad, Neal," I said simply.

"Listen to her!" Sally's excitement kept her talking. "Her husband is the hero of the hour, and all she can find to say is that she is 'so glad.' Mr. Symmes came back, Mrs. Gordon, after he had Tommy in bed at his other house, to thank Mac. And he said he heard Mac was hunting for a house and wouldn't this one do? It was going to pieces being shut up so close to the water. It's all furnished, Mrs. Gordon. Mac couldn't see it at all. I have tried to get him to like it. I kept wishing you were here."

"Here I am," I said.

"Do you like the place, Mrs. Gordon?"

"The outside is most pleasant. I haven't seen the inside."

"Oh, you must look. Mac won't need me now. I'll leave you both to look around."

"I'll put you in your car, Sally. You have been a great help to me." Presently he came back and stood looking at me silently.

"Well," I said, "shall we go?"

"Don't you want to see the house? It is a solution."

"I thought you and Sally had decided the matter."

HE SMILED down on me softly. "Dear," he said, "if I hadn't taken myself out on the porch in perfect misery one night at West Point, when every man in the place wanted to dance with you and did it, I wouldn't know what was the matter with you now; and I wouldn't know its cure." He took me in his arms.

He opened some of the shutters, and I went with him, holding the corner of his coat. It was a pleasant place. There was a funny formal reception room on one side of the center hall; and a library on the other side opening with French windows on a terrace, with the lake shining beyond the road and a shield of spruce trees between. Upstairs there were four bedrooms and two baths.

"Is it really too far out for you, Neal?"

"No; but it is a large proposition for you."

It didn't seem like a very large house to me. It would have gone into a corner of father's Long Island house.

"We needn't use what we don't want of it. Will Mr. Symmes really lend it to you?"

"He will. But I told him I'd rather pay rent, and he asked me to send him a bill for the morning's service to Tommy that would amount to a year's rent. It has everything except the linen and silver."

"I have linen," I said. "And we can buy plated silver with the money you will save, having a garage of your own."

IV

I DON'T know what I did to Sally McIntyre the day I frightened her. I thought I was just natural, but maybe you can be that with some people and get away with it. The day we moved in Mr. Symmes' house Neal and I went to the country club for dinner. We hadn't any food in the house, and I was almost dead getting the place ready to sleep in. All the McIntyres were at the club, and they asked us to dine at their table. You could tell by Sally's voice that something was the matter with her.

"So you took the big house," she said.

"Why, it doesn't seem so big! I'm afraid I hate being cramped."

She gave me a queer look. I believe she would have liked it better if I had refused to undertake the house.

"You'll think it larger when you have to mop all the floors," said Sally.

"Maybe I'll get to be a champion mopper," I answered.

"Maybe she'll get someone to mop for her, Sarah," said Sally's father. He was a canny Scotchman and they called him judge.

"She'll have to take her away from Mr. Symmes' factory then. He gets all the girls. Can you cook, Mrs. Gordon?"

I saw Neal give me a quick look. I don't think he wanted me to give away my uselessness. "I can cook for Neal," I said.

"Surely, MacNeal," said Mrs. McIntyre, "you can get a cook."

"Give me time, dear lady. I only got a wife a couple of months ago, and I only got a house to-day. I may need a longer time to get a cook."

"He has to get patients, too," grinned Judge McIntyre.

"He has already begun," said Sally. "One held him up at the station to-day when he was seeing about his trunks. Mac took her in the waiting room and then went to the drug store across the street for medicine, all before the Wequetonsing train came in." "Where did you see so much, Sally?" asked her mother. And I was glad she asked it, because it was all news to me.

"Oh, I was hanging around. I had taken the patient to the train. It was Susy Landis, and she was going to meet Stephen and go on up to Wequet for a week-end party. Susy always gets train-sick, and Stephen hates that kind of thing. I told her this was her chance. I guess Mac fixed her up. Stephen is Susy's brother, Mrs. Gordon, and he lives at Grand Rapids, not here."

IF HE'D fixed up Stephen instead of Susy," said the judge, "we'd all pay his bill. Don't forget to send Mrs. Landis a bill, MacNeal."

"I don't see how I could charge for that, judge," said Neal.

The Scotch in the judge protested. "If you do this with every girl who wants to talk to you in this town, they'll all be coming with some ailment or other."

Sally went off into a gale of laughter over Neal's flush.

"Just wait, Mrs. Gordon, until your telephone is put in!"

"Charge them, MacNeal," boomed the judge. "If they call you up, charge them for an office visit."

"How about me, father? Will you pay the bill if I talk to Mac by phone?"

"I will not. You're a well woman."

"And that's the way, judge," said Neal, "all the other fathers would feel."

"Do you mean," said the judge, "that a doctor has to stand that kind of thing and get no pay for it?"

"Isn't that the advertising side of his business?" I offered. It was one of the things I had heard father talk about. He charged the week-ends at Washington to the advertising side of his business.

THE judge looked at me with interest. "Well, if MacNeal is the whole works, he oughtn't to have to attend to the advertising."

"Sometimes my friends help," said Neal. "Look at Sally! She came after me when Tommy Symmes was fished out of the lake, and was the architect of my fortune."

"Of your house, anyhow," laughed Sally with a touch of triumph.

I'm ashamed to tell you how it irritated me. As we went back home I said to Neal: "You didn't tell me about Susy Landis and Sally this morning."

"I forgot all about it, dear. Sue Landis has a leaking heart valve: it helps make her train-sick."

"Did you tell her?"

"Certainly not. She's not the kind you could tell such a thing to."

"Why don't you tell her mother?"

"You don't know her mother. They have employed Doctor Garland for years. I'd have to tell her socially and not professionally, if I did tell her."

(Continued on Page 100)

"Yes, the one rod extends the entire width of the window. Isn't the effect wonderful?"

Kirsch CURTAIN RODS

Simplify the draping of elaborate windows

Dignify the most simple window

The Kirsch FLAT construction makes Kirsch Curtain Rods artistic and graceful, yet strong and durable. They bring out every charm of your curtains and drapes, holding them smoothly and neatly, with headings erect. The curving ends permit draping to casings, shutting out side glare.

Flat in shape—no sag, rust, tarnish

The beautiful finish—in white or velvet brass—stays like new for years. Kirsch Flat Rods come single, double, or triple; fit any window, give any effect. Extension style or cut-to-fit. Sold by better dealers everywhere.

Why Don't You Let Us Send This Book?

WRITE NOW—it devotes a few pages to Kirsch Flat Curtain Rods and other Kirsch Products, but mostly it's a book of pictures of window drapings for every room, with detailed suggestions as to materials, color schemes, etc. Free for the asking.

KIRSCH MFG. COMPANY

110 Prospect Ave., Sturgis, Mich., U. S. A.

Kirsch Mfg. Co. of Canada, Ltd.
550 Tecumseh St. Woodstock, Ontario

The patented Kirsch bracket is simple and strong. Rod easily attached by tilting. Can't come off accidentally.

Illustrated above are bracket and end of the double rod for curtain and valance—for curtains and side drapes, or for side drapes and valance.

Above illustrates bracket and end of triple rod for curtains, side drapes and valance.

Remember to ask for Kirsch The Original Flat Curtain Rod

ONE TASTE of your home-made cake—or cookies, erul-ers, quick breads—made the Rumford-way, will convince you and every member of your family how satisfactory in every way is home-made food.

Even the children know the difference in goodness—the difference in health soon shows in rosier cheeks and brighter eyes, speaking volumes!

Which shall it be for your family?

There is good reason why home-made food is more delicious and wholesome.

Your materials are fresh and pure—leavened with Rumford, the good things you bake are always light, moist, even-textured, easy to digest and made more wholesome with Rumford phosphates.

Try a RUMFORD LAYER CAKE:—½ cup butter; 1½ cups sugar; 3 eggs; 2 cups flour; 2 level teaspoons Rumford Baking Powder; ¾ cup milk; 1 teaspoon vanilla. Cream butter and sugar. Add well beaten egg yolks. Add flour in which baking powder has been sifted. Add milk. Stir until smooth. Flavor and fold in stiffly beaten egg whites. Bake in 3 layers in quick oven and put together with boiled frosting. Sliced cherries and marshmallows may be added to frosting between layers. Many other helpful suggestions are contained in our new book, "The Rumford Modern Methods of Cooking"—sent free.

RUMFORD COMPANY
Dept. 22
Providence, R. I.

The Confessions of a Useless Wife

(Continued from Page 99)

"More advertising? If it's social, Neal, why don't you turn it over to me? Let me attend to the social advertising of your business."

He was unlocking our front door. He turned and patted my face. "A doctor isn't supposed to talk to his wife about his patients."

"This isn't a patient, but a girl who held you up for free advice in a railroad station. Why not divide things this way: Turn this kind over to me—the people who talk just to be talking—and keep the patients to yourself? I'll bet I could tell your Mrs. Landis about Susy. The worst she could say would be that I was an intruder."

He stared at me with quite a new look. "All right, you can try it."

It's a funny thing, but I wanted an immediate place in Neal's work. I thought it was Sally at the time, until I found out that it was not wanting him to have such a big part of his life that did not include me.

The things I had to do next day! It sounds silly, but I didn't know one thing about a gas stove. I didn't even know the gas wasn't turned on in the house until I had burned up a half box of matches and turned every bolt in the stove. The electricity was turned on. I couldn't help knowing that. So I turned the electric iron upside down and made tea and boiled eggs for breakfast. Then I worked like a dog, cleaning.

THE man who brought our trunks wouldn't take them upstairs. So there they were in the downstairs hall, and of course they got mused up in no time. If you haven't the time to unpack your trunks and yet have to have things out of them, what else can you do? There were piles of linen on chairs and my hats on top of my wardrobe trunk; and my shoes, where I'd taken them from the shoe division, were on the stairs.

"Leila, we must do something about this," said Neal. He had been out, seeing about a sign, when the trunks came. "Somebody may come in."

"You mean patients?"

I saw his face flush a little. "No, I mean callers. There are a lot of people who will think they must come at once now that we are in a house."

"Why, they've all called by this time, while we were in the hotel."

"Not on your life! There's a bunch of them yet."

I laughed. "You didn't tell me about this social prominence when we were in New York. What do you want me to do with these things, Belle of Gordon City?"

"I'll carry the trays upstairs and you bring up the things piled on the chairs, and we'll close up the trunks until we can unpack them."

It certainly did look better in the downstairs hall when we had done this, but it didn't look any better in the upstairs hall, and of course that was where Sally McIntyre had to go when she came in about five o'clock, with Mrs. Landis and Susy. Sally had left her driving gloves somewhere about the house and asked if she might look for them upstairs. When she started upstairs I thought it would be a good time to talk to Mrs. Landis about Susy, so I told her to look on the hall bench under the linen and Susy went along to help her. I knew that would take them both some time.

"Was Susy all right after her week-end at Weque?" I asked her mother.

"OH, YES, why not?" Mrs. Landis was what Adele would call "a large, fine-looking woman." She had prominent eyes and a way of holding back her head that would have fitted a lorgnette perfectly.

"Why, Neal hoped she wouldn't swim or dance much."

"She didn't because she was too tired; but how did Doctor Gordon know?"

"Why, he said it was her heart, Mrs. Landis, that made her train-sick."

Mrs. Landis leaned forward, her prominent eyes snapping. "Her heart!" By the tone of her voice you would have thought I had just told a whopping big lie.

I took a long breath and remembered that I was a doctor's wife, attending to the advertising end of his business. "Maybe I've said more than I should, Mrs. Landis. You know doctors won't tell their wives a thing about their patients. You see Susy is not a regular patient of Neal's. She just got a prescription from him because he is a friend of hers. I get train-sick myself. So I asked Neal what he gave her. But he said it wouldn't do for me, as my heart was all right."

MRS. LANDIS thought this over. "I'm quite sure Doctor Garland knows nothing about it. Is your husband here now?"

"No, he isn't, Mrs. Landis. Would you like him to make you a professional visit?"

She hesitated a moment over the form of the request.

I don't think it was what she wanted, but just then she heard Susy coming down the stairs.

"Yes, I suppose I had better see him, Mrs. Gordon."

Something gave me the sense to get a pencil and put down the engagement. "This afternoon at five-thirty, Mrs. Landis? Neal is at the candy factory now."

"Yes; we'll be home by then. I don't want Susy frightened. I'd rather have your husband stop in as if it were a friendly call, though, of course, I will regard it as professional. Is Mr. Symmes going to have Doctor Gordon look after his factory men?"

"I don't know, Mrs. Landis. He tells me so very little."

The two girls came in then. Sally was laughing. "You ought to see that hall. You'd think an earthquake had struck it. Mrs. Symmes herself couldn't have left it as bad."

"Mrs. Symmes?" I asked politely.

"Mrs. Symmes didn't like housekeeping," Sally explained. "Did you find the ice chest with year-old food in it?"

"I haven't seen the ice chest yet. I don't know where it is."

"Well, what have you eaten," asked Mrs. Landis—"not to need an ice chest?"

"We got breakfast on the electric iron Anna packed in my trunk the last thing. It was the first to fall out of the trunk."

"Anna?"

"Anna was my maid."

"Oh—your maid; your housemaid?"

"No, just my maid. I shared her with Adele, my stepmother; but she was such a good maid she managed to look after both of us."

The girls exchanged a look. "You'll miss her by the looks of the hall."

SALLY had a musical laugh, and I began to see that she got away with a good deal, putting words to that music. But I didn't see what it was in Sally's life that those trunks had just come that morning and that my hands were already blistered and my back aching from what I had done, and that I didn't intend to unpack them until I was rested.

"Are you coming to the club again for dinner?" asked Sally.

I knew exactly what she meant, and I wouldn't have gone there for anything. "No, if the gas gets turned on, I'm getting dinner here myself."

I was so dead tired when they had gone I could hardly stand up, but the telephone had been put in that day and my first call on it was to Mr. Symmes' private office, to see if I could catch Neal. I certainly liked that man. He had the nicest voice; you would have told him anything. I did.

"Mr. Symmes, it's Neal's first professional call. Won't you try to get him?"

"Yes, I will, Mrs. Gordon. Shall I send him home, or will you leave the call?"

"Oh, send him home, please. I want to tell him about it."

"Fine! I hope you'll have so many to tell him it will soon be no novelty."

(Continued on Page 101)

The Remarkable Story of "Eva Dean"

NOTE—This is a story of "Eva Dean." In its brief way it presents the story of hundreds of other women who, in the fascinating way described, have been able to provide themselves with the extra money which slender incomes so often cannot afford. If it shall have shown the way to happiness to but one woman, instead of hundreds who will respond, it will have served its purpose.

How One Woman Solved the Money Problem

Was this Eva Dean? I could scarcely believe my eyes. A miracle had happened in only a few short months. The prosperous looking, handsomely gowned woman before me was indeed my friend, Eva Dean. But what a transformation!

I knew that she had been very hard up and with only her husband's limited earnings on which to depend. Then, too, I had heard about some serious financial trouble the Deans had while I was away. Yet, here she was, at a time when work was scarce and wages getting lower and lower, well dressed, happy as a lark, and with a smile of contentment on a face which showed not a trace of the hardship I knew she had endured.

She must have read the question in my eyes and, as we entered her beautifully furnished home, she told me the whole story.

"This is it," she said with pride, "the Gearhart Knitter which has helped me out of my trouble and made me one of the happiest women on earth. Every day I devote a little of my time to knitting the Famous Allwear Standard Hosiery."

You know my circumstances a few months back. I was almost desperate. I thought of sewing, washing, working out—anything to overcome that terrible need for money. Finally I learned that the Gearhart Company of Clearfield, Pa., wanted women to do machine knitting at home. They said the work was easy and that they would pay me generously for every pair of Standard Allwear Hosiery I could send them. They offered me a three year contract and as I found them to be a very reliable, long established company with bank references and hundreds of satisfied home workers, I promptly decided to send the moderate amount required to secure the knitter and start in making money.

It has proved a really delightful and restful occupation for me. It has turned my spare moments into golden hours. You see for yourself what I have gained, happiness at home, new clothes, things for the children, and money in the bank.

The Gearhart Knitter and the wool to make the hosiery came together and I got busy right away. After a little practice I found nothing difficult about it. In fact, my husband learned to operate it, and he and the children often help me.

Let me tell you, those checks from the Gearhart people came in mighty handy—and, one after another they arrived, as fast as I could send them the beautiful knitted Allwear Hosiery."

The story of Eva Dean was finished, and then I was treated to the surprise of my life. With a few simple movements she had the Gearhart Knitter started, and at the bottom there appeared a lovely knitted sock of wonderful quality.

No wonder the Gearhart Knitter is said by many to be the standard knitter, the fastest, most complete and reliable knitter made! No wonder the Gearhart home industry has so many happy, contented women!

My heart goes out to the woman struggling to make ends meet and to her I say, "Write to the Gearhart Knitting Machine Company of Clearfield, Pa., right away. Get a Gearhart Knitter, knit all the Allwear Hosiery you have time for and accept the liberal pay checks which they will send you for the pleasantest, nicest home work imaginable."

$1000 PROFIT GUIDE FREE

Free Booklet

Particulars of the Gearhart Knitting Company's Allwear Hosiery Home Industry Plan will be sent on request. Write for their Profit Guide Book and samples of Knitting free.

GEARHART KNITTING MACHINE CO.
Home Dept. E, Clearfield, Pa.

Table talks

By Mrs. Knox

Speaking of Prunes—

LET me tell you of an interesting table talk that I recently had at a club meeting. One of our members told me how each Monday she planned her menus for the following week. Then from her original ideas, cook books and magazine recipes she studied how to make and serve many old familiar dishes in entirely new and different ways, saying that my cook books had been most helpful in teaching her new ways of serving rice, fresh and canned fruits, left-over meats and vegetables, etc., which naturally was pleasing to me.

She gave me her original recipe for serving the old standby—Prunes—in a whip, by combining them with Knox Sparkling Gelatine. It is so good that I am giving the recipe below.

PRUNE WHIP

3/4 envelope Knox Sparkling Gelatine
1/2 cup cold water 1/2 cup sugar
1 cup prune pulp Whites of two eggs
2 tablespoons lemon juice 1 doz. chopped nuts

Soak gelatine in cold water five minutes. Put prune pulp, lemon juice and sugar in saucepan, and bring to the boiling point, stirring constantly. Add soaked gelatine, stir until cool. When mixture begins to thicken, fold in whites of eggs beaten until stiff, turn into wet mold or paper cases, sprinkle with chopped nuts.

Send for My Recipe Book

In my booklet "Dainty Desserts" you will find other prune recipes such as "Oriental Cream," "Prune Jelly" and numberless other recipes that are easy and economical to make—yet each with some individual touch that makes it different and new. There are also recipes for meat and fish molds, relishes, salads, desserts of all kinds, candies and invalid dishes. Write to me for it. Just enclose 4c in stamps to cover postage and mention your grocer's name.

KNOX

SPARKLING GELATINE

113 Knox Avenue Johnstown, N. Y.

"Wherever a recipe calls for gelatine—think of KNOX."

The Confessions of a Useless Wife

(Continued from Page 100)

Neal came in ten minutes. I know now why the Symmes factory makes money. He laughed when I told him about Mrs. Landis, but he packed his stethoscope in his bag while he laughed.

"Neal, I'm going to convert that reception room into an office to-morrow. There's a lavatory, and a side porch for people who don't want to use the front door. All it needs is initialed towels and some comfortable chairs."

"We have them both, Day Dreamer." He kissed me merrily and went to Susy's.

I confronted the matter of dinner. The gas man had not come, and there wasn't any food in the house. There was a tiny grocery store five squares away, but I hadn't any money and I had forgotten to ask Neal what he wanted me to do about buying food. So I went into the library and read a good novel. It was the longest time before Neal got back, and he didn't look hungry.

"Well," he said, "I put the fear of destruction into the whole Landis family. I imagine Susy's had this trouble ever since her last year's tonsillitis."

BUT I was starving, and neither Susy's tonsils nor heart interested me. "Listen, Neal, the gas man hasn't come and —"

"Why, you poor thing," he said condescendingly, "you haven't had any dinner!"

"Have you?"
"Why, yes, dinner was being served just as I finished with Susy, and they insisted on my having coffee that wasn't made on an electric iron. You know how that ended. They heaped up a whole plate for me, and there I was."

"And there I wasn't," I said ruefully.
"Well, I'll take you right out to the club and feed you, Dryad."

"You will not. Your kind friends are all waiting for me to fall down on dinner tonight and come out there."

"Well, what will you do?"
"You'll go to the nearest grocery and get me some boiled ham. Honestly, Neal, I'd learn to cook for no other reason than never to see boiled ham again."

"The groceries are all closed now, honey. Can I take you to a hotel?"

"No, you can't. I won't be seen dining out to-night."

"Nobody would see you."
"Won't they! They see everything here. They saw our upstairs hall to-day."

"Well, I'll run down and buy you a sandwich at one of the hand-me-out places."

"Don't you bring me a ham sandwich."

When he left me I sat in my colonial house, all alone, with the lake pounding upon the shore with a lonely swish, and the wind in the pines making a lonely moan, and two hundred strange noises all through the house; and I wondered where Adele was eating mushrooms under glass, and what kind of music was being played for her dancing. I fell asleep in my chair, as I was saying to myself that if I was going to be a doctor's wife I'd better not begin being afraid of the dark.

THE next morning we breakfasted on the sandwiches Neal had brought home the night before, and it affected Neal so that he went to town himself to see why the gas man hadn't come. Some of the girls came for me before I had time to open the downstairs windows. It was a morning party at the church, and I told them to go on ahead and I'd come as soon as I had the house opened up.

The church is in a big yard, and if you go in the side door to the Sunday-school room there is a little hall that was built in long after the church was built and is only canvas covered with wall paper.

As I stopped inside the hall I heard Sally McIntyre's voice. "Well, I know I saw Mac coming out of a bum restaurant last night with a package of food. So you know what he's keeping soul and body together with. And their house! Honestly girls, I don't see how Mac stands it. You know he's an orderly man. You can hardly move about without stepping on a towel or a hat, and you're lucky when you sit down if you don't land on a shoe. Poor Mac has a wife that's about as much use to him as a tin ear."

"Well," said Marian Bellows, "why didn't Mac pick out our Sally, who is the best housekeeper in Michigan and whom he has known from babyhood?"

ONE of the young matrons laughed in a way that would rile Sally. "That's why," she said. "Give your successful opponent time to clean up, Sally."

"Time! It'll be the same next week, I'll bet."

"I'll take that bet," said Marian Bellows.

"How'll you decide it?" asked Susy.

"We'll go and see her next week."

"You can't see the upstairs."

"Oh, yes, we can. We'll have something the matter and have to lie down."

I turned around and left the place softly, and something hurt me inside pretty badly. Somehow I wasn't making a success in this new community. They might have waited. They might have suspended their judgment for a few days. I didn't know then that people never do wait when a stranger invades their circle.

I stopped in my drive and looked at my charming white house so nice and orderly on the outside, and I thought of those unkind voices that had driven me away. Then I laughed softly to myself. "All right," I said, "if they get something the matter with them and have to go upstairs, I'll get Neal to look after them and see that a bill is sent."

I went upstairs and tried to look at the muss there with Sally McIntyre's eyes. I did not know where to begin first. At home when my room was a sight I went out and Anna fixed it up for me.

I hunted up a closet in the hall, but I found it so full of things I locked it up again. There was an old mahogany chiffonier in the back hall that was nearly empty, and I put my linen in that—all that would go there. The rest I piled on top.

RIGHT in the midst of this a woman came in with a baby and Neal called me. He said she had come from one of the cottages on the lake a little way down the road, and would I hold the baby while he looked after her. He had finished with the baby and found nothing the matter with it. So the baby and I sat on the kitchen floor until the mother came out with Neal, and when they went Neal proudly displayed a greenback that had every appearance of being real money.

"She has a maid," he told me, "but the maid is ill. She's afraid it's measles. That's why she brought the baby, and I'm to see the maid in an hour."

"Why not at once?"
He smiled gayly. "Maybe she had to clean up the house before I came."

I knew just how she felt, and it came to me that it was a brand-new knowledge.

"Neal," I said, "what about lunch?"

"Well," he laughed, "what about it?"

"Say, Neal Gordon, do you think food hops over from the grocery store onto the stove and then onto the table without anybody taking any trouble about it? I used to think it did that, but I've found it doesn't. We'll have to make some plan about this

(Continued on Page 102)

SLIPOVA CLOTHES for CHILDREN

Here's a blouse any mother can buy!

The price is so reasonable that it's almost extravagance not to dress your boy in a "SLIPOVA" Blouse.

There is nothing fancy about this sturdy, comfortable garment. It is nice-looking, roomy and full-sized, made to withstand the rough wear and tear of live, active boys. A new waist adjustment does away with the old uncomfortable strings.

Double seams fast colors full sizes

Built for boys from 8 to 14 years old.

Ask your dealer to show you the inexpensive and economical "SLIPOVA Clothes for Children," including Middies, Boys' Blouses and Suits, Rompers and Creepers. If your dealer hasn't them, write to Dept. C.

McCawley & Co. Inc.

M. W. S. Building Baltimore, Md.
Sales & Export Office, 253 Church St., New York City

Look for the label.

Pride of Possession

The Premier
FIRST AMONG CLEANERS

Possession of The Premier produces not merely perfect housecleaning but the pride that comes from having in your home an electric vacuum cleaner of unquestioned quality and reliability.

MAIL THIS COUPON TODAY

ELECTRIC VACUUM CLEANER CO., Dept. 103, L. H. J., Cleveland, O.

- ☐ Please have nearest dealer call or 'phone for appointment to demonstrate The Premier in my home without obligation to me, or
- ☐ Please send me free color booklet, price, convenient terms and nearest dealer's name.

(Check your preference)

Name _____

Street Address _____ City _____

R. F. D. _____ State _____ Telephone Number _____

The Confessions of a Useless Wife

(Continued from Page 101)

food business, if we can't both leave the house at once."

"Why don't you buy it while I'm in the office?"

"What if you need me to take care of a baby or to answer the door bell?"

"That's true. I'm afraid you'll have to use the telephone if you can get what you want that way."

But you don't get what you want that way, especially if you don't know what you want. The little grocery, five squares away, was glad to telephone me and so was the big meat shop on the main street, but the moment I heard either of their voices over the telephone my mind went absolutely blank about food and I had no more idea what to eat than if I was getting modified milk every two hours.

THE butcher said he was the only man in town who had Chicago meat, and when I asked Neal what difference that made he laughed and said: "It made a difference of several cents a pound." But since they charged it I didn't even ask how much difference it made. Only when I told them to send me some kind of meat I wouldn't have to cook for luncheon and they sent me boiled ham, I knew telephoning my meat order would never do for me permanently.

"Neal," I said over the luncheon table, "if you miss every sick call in Gordon City, I am going downtown to the butcher shop and the grocery and buy myself some chops and some vegetables and the best cookbook in the world."

"For heaven's sake, Leila, get some lettuce and some spinach and some apples. I feel like a bear who has been hibernating."

I got a new novel with my cookbook, and I was certainly glad to have it after the dishes, for they sent for Neal for the sick maid at the cottage down the road and I had to sit all alone again at night, with all those thousand noises squeaking about me. I had forgotten to get any soap and I had to wash my dishes with a perfumed soap from my satchel, which was one blessing, for you'd never guess I had been dishwashing.

Neal came in as tired as could be. "I've had to be nurse as well as doctor. They have no conveniences in those cottages at all. They look pretentious, but they are just shells without even bathrooms. I've got to telegraph for some serum for the baby's mother. The maid has typhoid, though there are no rose spots yet. She hasn't had much care."

"How could she if she's the maid and the mother has to look after that baby? Can't you send her home?"

"SHE doesn't come from Grand Rapids; she comes from some place around here, but I can't send her any place. If I moved her she might die of it—not right away; but she might. It's serious. I don't know what I'll do about it."

I forgot all about it and about all the other sick people in the world in the excitement of my next day's housekeeping. I actually cooked eggs and bacon for breakfast, though the eggs certainly fried blacker than I ever saw eggs before. Neal said it was the bacon grease I used, but they tasted all right. They were better than the coffee. I used up all the eggs for frying and only had a little bit of yolk left to clear the coffee, and I didn't put that in until after the coffee began to boil. Besides, we had no cream. Nobody had notified any milkman that we wanted any. The little grocery sent us some milk, but coffee is one thing that needs cream.

Neal went to see the maid after breakfast, and I ran to the grocery for bread for luncheon after they had said they couldn't send it. I couldn't help if somebody did call Neal up while I was gone. We had to have bread. If the grocery man hadn't suggested butter I'd have forgotten it and had to go again.

"Say," he said, "why don't you write out what you want? Make a list."

"If I knew what I wanted I wouldn't have to write it," I retorted; "and if I could find a paper and a pencil in my house it would probably be upstairs in the bedroom and not downstairs by the telephone, and I wouldn't think of what I wanted at the same time that I had the paper and the pencil."

He looked at me as if I were some new kind of animal with a fur that needed brushing. But I had found something that I thought would help. It was a pile of cutie little red-bordered slates that he kept for the school children.

"I'll tell you what I'll do," I said. "I'll tie a string to that slate and hang it by the telephone, and I'll put another string on the pencil; no, not a wooden pencil—the point would be broken just when I had a thought; haven't you a slate pencil?"

"It will sure keep you from running out of things at meal time."

"Listen," I said; "you ought to have some little slates made with a hole in them and a book to hang them on and your name and telephone number painted on the wooded frame. It would be a fine advertisement."

He stared at me a moment. "Well, you've said a mouthful. I can get little slates with wood frames for seventy-five cents a dozen."

"You ought to give me this slate in exchange for my idea."

"I'll give you one of the new ones. You'll like writing down what you want."

WHEN I came back with my slate in my hand I found Sally and Susy Landis had been there. Sally wrote it in the dust of the hall table. If she wanted Neal to see it she got left, for I wiped it off with my petticoat as soon as I had read it.

Lunch was better than breakfast, for the grocer had suggested wienerwurst, that I could boil when I told him I wasn't keen on frying, and rye bread and Saratoga chips. Neal filled up on the rye bread, and I filled up on the chips. But it's funny about Saratoga chips; if you eat enough of them you can't eat anything else, but you don't seem to be full. I told Neal some of the people I was meeting were like that. And Neal said they were picnic food—all right for an occasion, but not for a steady diet.

"Neal," I said, "let's have a picnic, just you and me. You get the stuff yourself, so that I don't know what it is. Let's drive to some place on the lake I don't know about."

"Right. We'll do it to-night. I'll make a fire and we'll boil coffee."

I had intended, after Sally's writing in the dust, to dust the whole house; but I couldn't find a rag. Besides, I'd stood on my feet from seven that morning until two, and they hurt like everything. So I got into the hammock on the front terrace and read my novel while Neal sat in his office—or I read it as well as I could for watching every automobile that came down the road, hoping it would be a patient for Neal.

I must have fallen asleep in the hammock, for I didn't hear anybody coming up the drive until a whole bevy of the girls, who had been at the church the morning I had been driven away, trooped onto the terrace.

"Oh," I said, "I thought everybody was at the tournament to-day."

"WE'RE on our way, Mrs. Gordon. But Marian Bellows' face looks so spotted. May she run upstairs and plaster some powder on it so it won't look so bad when she gets to the club?" Marian evidently didn't have the nerve to make the speech herself.

"There's powder in the lavatory in the doctor's office," I said. "I hope you haven't ivy poisoning on your face, Marian. It makes it swell up so. Neal's in the office. He'll look at it for you."

I ushered the girls in and closed the door after them. Neal would not have waited for

(Continued on Page 105)

Orange Shortcake

Orange Shortcake
The Year-round Shortcake

2 cups flour
1 teaspoon salt
4 teaspoons baking powder
4 tablespoons sugar
4 tablespoons shortening
 $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{3}{4}$ cup milk

Sift the dry materials until well blended. Rub in the shortening, using a fork. Cut in just enough milk to make a soft dough. Put in greased cake pan, press with back of hand to shape of pan and bake twelve to fifteen minutes in hot oven.

Filling

6 Sunkist oranges
 $\frac{1}{2}$ cup sugar

Wash the oranges, remove the skin, cutting off all white membrane. Cut the orange in half and cut in cubes of uniform size. Sprinkle with sugar, then spread between the prepared crusts. Serve with a sauce made with the juice of two oranges and three-fourths cup sugar.

Oranges and Coconut
a delicious dessert

The New Classic Among Foods

Like an "out-of-season dainty"—a real surprise!

TRY the recipe printed here. A new one, just perfected. It makes a new, delicious treat that you are missing—you who think of shortcake only in strawberry time.

Here's the same tang—but with orange flavor! Real biscuit; tender, fresh, ripe fruit; and a luscious sauce formed by the juice—a morsel to tempt any appetite.

Every quality that makes shortcake attractive, plus the alluring difference of the orange!

Ten judges chose this shortcake from the prize recipes of two domestic science experts and three practical home-cooks. They selected it for its simplicity and economy as well as its deliciousness.

Here it is, so try it now—"Shortcake in March! And one of the finest you have ever tasted"—a classic among foods.

Hear what folks say when you bring it on, and when they learn how good it is.

For Vitamines

Remember this—in serving an orange salad or dessert with any meal you add fresh vitamines—a vital element in food that all meals should include. Oranges are rich in vitamines. If ordinary cooking destroys vitamines in many foods, as many scientists now claim, an orange dish is good insurance against this important lack.

Sunkist

Uniformly Good Oranges

Sunkist oranges are always in season—sweet, tender, juicy, and practically seedless. Get them in the tissue wrappers stamped "Sunkist."

Lemons and oranges, although known as "acid fruits," have an alkaline reaction when taken into the system and are, therefore, valuable in offsetting excess acidity due to acid-producing foods.

California Fruit Growers Exchange

A Non-Profit Co-operative Organization of 10,500 Growers
DEPT. 264, LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA

Our Offer to Women

Mail This Send 10c with this coupon and we will send you a set of 24 beautifully illustrated Sunkist recipe cards. Each dish pictured in colors. Shows how to serve oranges and lemons in the most attractive ways. Just right size for recipe-card box.

For 75c we will send the set of Sunkist recipe cards, neat oak box without any advertising on it, 100 blank cards and 25 index cards, all prepaid.

This set would cost $1.25 in retail stores.

Check the offer you wish to accept and forward with stamps or coins. Offer is good at these prices in both United States and Canada.

☐ 24 Sunkist Recipe Cards—10c

☐ Complete Box and File—75c (Including above 24 cards)

Address: California Fruit Growers Exchange
Dept. 264, Los Angeles, Calif.

Name _____
Address _____

Beech-Nut Macaroni and Spaghetti

Of course she likes them! Everybody likes Beech-Nut Macaroni and Spaghetti. They have that superior flavor characteristic of all Beech-Nut foods. And then they are made in the airy, sun-flooded Beech-Nut plant in the Mohawk Valley under expert direction—full warranty of their wholesomeness and purity.

If your grocer does not carry Beech-Nut Macaroni or Spaghetti, we will gladly mail you full-sized package of either if you will send us 15 cents in stamps with your grocer's name and address.

BEECH-NUT PACKING CO.
Canajoharie, N. Y.

"© 1921 B-N. P. Co."

Beech-Nut "foods of finest flavor"

Bacon
Pork and Beans
Macaroni
Spaghetti
Tomato Catsup
Chili Sauce
Oscar's Sauce
Prepared Mustard
Cider Vinegar
Jams and Jellies
Marmalades and Preserves
Jellied Fruits
Ginger Ale

The Confessions of a Useless Wife

(Continued from Page 102)

patients in vain that afternoon. I could see their heads together as they left, and I got ready for my picnic with a grin. Neal himself was quite gay as we set out.

"But I've got to stop in, Leila, and see my typhoid girl. She's sick enough for some of her own people to be sent for, if she'll only tell me who they are."

As he got out of the car at the cottage a man who seemed to have been waiting accosted him. "Are you the doctor in there?"

"I'm Gordon, yes."

"I'm Adam Fleming. I'm that girl's husband in there, and I've come to take her home."

"WHERE do you live? You run a dairy, don't you?"

"Two miles farther down the road. I have a farm. I sell milk too."

"Have you anybody to take care of her?"

"I'll take care of her."

"All right. But she can't be moved now."

"Why not? She's not so sick as all that."

"She has typhoid fever. I'd have moved her to the hospital if she could have stood it. She can't be moved."

"Well, I'm going to take her home. She's no business here, leaving home to go to work. You doctors don't know everything."

"You'd better see if you can't help take care of her where she is. Haven't you any women in your family who could come and help?"

"They'll help at our own house."

"But you can't move her. She wouldn't live two days if you did."

"She's gotta come home. I won't hurt her moving her."

"If you take her away in this condition, and she dies, I'll have you arrested for manslaughter."

The man's right hand shot out like lightning; I don't know how Neal kept it from smashing his face. But Neal seemed to catch the man's wrist somehow and wring it. Then he said: "I'll give you just five minutes to clear out of here, and I'll sit here and watch you do it."

The man halted with a volley of oaths.

"Get on," said Neal. "My wife can go in and telephone for a policeman while I wait."

The man looked at the cottage and then at Neal. "You'll have to do some waiting." He walked down the road to a milk wagon there and drove away.

"I'll see how Mrs. Fleming is and tell them she must not be moved," said Neal to me. "It won't take me long. Then it's time we got our coffee to boiling."

We found the loveliest place. Neal made a fire between two boulders out of little twigs he cut with his knife; then he put bigger ones on it and finally little branches. He didn't let me know what was in his packages, but when I smelled sausage meat cooking and when the coffee came out of that pot as clear as it used to be on our table at home, I wondered why I hadn't received Neal's patients while he did the cooking.

When our dinner was done Neal cleaned up and burned all the papers. "No decent camper leaves a mess," he said.

AND I looked out at the lake and thought about my upstairs hall and wondered what kind of a camper I was.

"This is our dining room," Neal continued. "Our library is over there on that bluff. Let's have our after-dinner coffee there. I'll read to you."

He hadn't any book with him, but he found me a seat among the pine needles and pretended to read to me. Until that moment I had not even known he liked poetry:

*Arc upon arc, from shade to shine,
The World went thundering free;
And what was his errand but hers and mine,
The lords of him, I and she?
Oh, it's die we must, but it's live we can,
And the marvel of earth and sun
Is all for the joy of woman and man,
And the longing that makes them one.*

The moon on the water, when you are watching it with the man you love, shines in a very different way from what it does when you are alone. I never liked the moon on the water before; it had always seemed to me full of the wasted, lonely romance of the world.

"Sometimes," said Neal as we strolled back to the car, "in your elfin moods you are like that path of silver dancing off to the horizon, only you are not a dusk-elf, but the elf of the dawn."

As we drove down the sandy road on the edge of the lake, the moonlight made a fairy-land of the evergreens and the jagged rocks, and it seemed a pity that there should be anything in the world except beauty and happiness. I was glad I had come to live in the little city where there was moonlight and a silver lake and trees where I could steal away with the one I loved most. I tried to find words to tell him so and gave it up, slipping my hand underneath his arm as he drove instead. And as I did so I felt his arm quiver and he brought the automobile to a stop.

"What's the matter, Neal?" I looked on ahead and saw a yellow milk wagon moving slowly toward us with a man walking beside it.

"SIT here," said Neal, and sprang out of the car.

The wagon turned up a drive and began to climb a hill toward a dark brick house at the top. It stopped when Neal caught up with it, and I heard the sound of sharp, angry voices. I heard Neal say: "You won't get another doctor in time. I'll stay right here with her." Then he called to me: "Leila, drive the car slowly after me."

The man who had quarreled with Neal out in the road before we started on our picnic got out of the wagon, staggering under his burden. Even so, he was able to push Neal aside, while the other man helped him. But inside the door as he paused for breath he caught sight of his wife's face, and his strength seemed to seep out of him. He looked at Neal with a strange look. I heard Neal curse under his breath.

"Here!" he said sharply. "Here, on this sofa. Get a hot blanket. . . . Do? There is nothing further to do. She is dying."

The two men stood watching Neal with sullen, unbelieving eyes. Presently he looked up at them. "Have you no women in the family?" he said.

Fleming backed away. "Get Elsa," he said thickly to the other man.

The thin, white face on the pillow, with its look of a girl's face, took on a strange, strained look. Her breath was coming with short, gasping sounds that jerked her head from her shoulders.

"Oh, Neal," I sobbed, "can't we do something?"

"THERE'S nothing we can do now, Leila. In a hospital, fifteen minutes ago, we might have done something. Take hold of her hand, in case she has a moment's consciousness."

I had never seen anybody die. I don't know how doctors and nurses can bear it. And a needless death seems such a terrible thing.

"Neal!" I gasped as that dreadful breathing grew slower and finally quieted.

Very slowly all the pain and anguish in the drawn face seemed to slip out of it. It lay very quiet and peaceful, as if she slept. Neal drew my hand away and stood looking at the face for some seconds. Then he took me out into the hall, leaving her with her husband.

As we stood there, the other man returned with a young girl, a girl with great, mournful, dark eyes that rested on Neal with a dread that was like a sharp pain. Involuntarily Neal put out a hand toward her. Her face whitened. She gave Neal another look and then slipped by him into the room we had left.

Neal stood still, looking at the man. "Who are you?" he said at length.

"I am Jim Fleming."

"I'll send Doctor Poyntz out," Neal's voice was curt.

"It's no case for Sam Poyntz," said Fleming.

"It's a case for the Grand Jury," said Neal.

(Continued in the April Home Journal)

Cashmere Bouquet

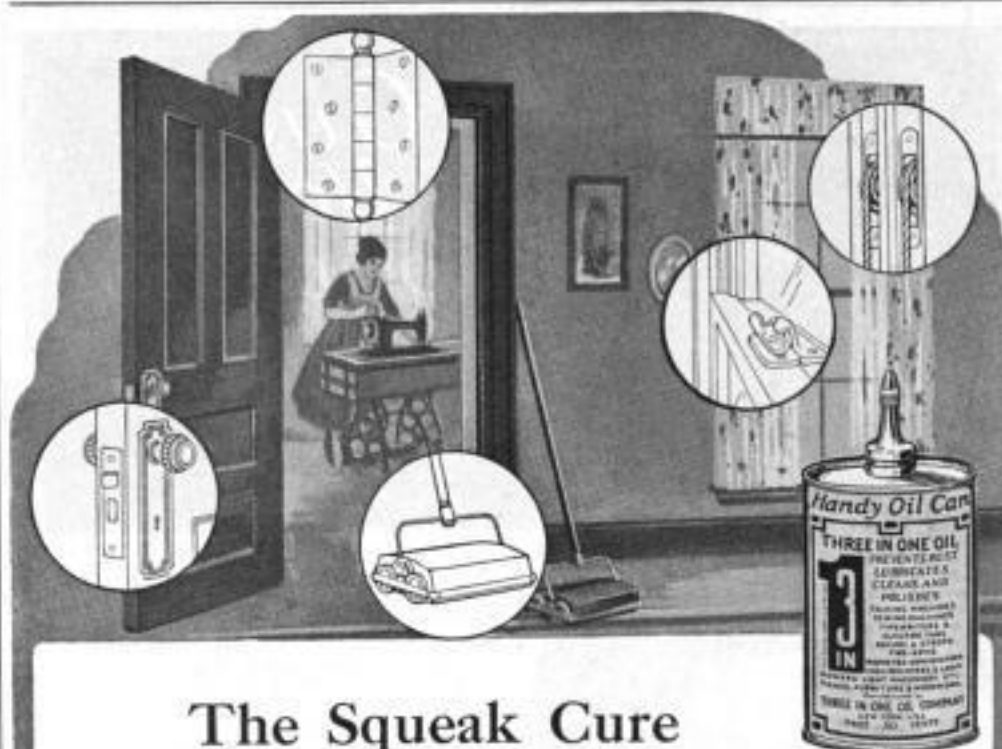

A toilet soap that is the favorite now—as it has been for three generations.

Luxurious Lasting Refined

COLGATE & CO. NEW YORK
Established 1806

Large size cake 25c, medium size 10c by the cake,
55c by the box of 6

Sold at your neighborhood store.

The Squeak Cure

Don't tolerate a squeaking hinge or lock; a sash pulley that tells the neighbors when you raise the window; or a carpet sweeper that cries when used.

3-in-One

The High Quality Household Oil

banishes squeaks as certainly and effectively as light banishes darkness. A drop or two in the offending bearing and the squeak is gone. 3-in-One is a great lubricant for all light mechanisms, such as sewing machines, vacuum cleaners, talking machines, etc.

3-in-One is wonderfully penetrating—and it's all purest oil. No grease to collect dirt or become caked. Won't dry out.

Read the Dictionary which is wrapped around every bottle. It explains 79 uses for 3-in-One in the home, alone, and hundreds of other uses elsewhere.

3-in-One is sold at all good stores in 1-oz., 3-oz. and 8-oz. bottles and in 3-oz. Handy Oil Cans.

THREE-IN-ONE OIL CO., 165 O Broadway, New York City

FREE Generous sample and Dictionary of Uses. Write for both on a postal.

REMEMBER coming home from school, cold and hungry, and getting to the kitchen just as the roast was being taken from the oven? Doesn't your mouth water even now at the very thought of that delightful whiff?

Let the TITE-TOP BASTER help you

DO you realize that less than a third of a whole side of beef consists of tender steaks and roasts suitable for quick cooking? But the remainder is just as nourishing, and if the less expensive neck and shoulder cuts, and the brisket or chuck, are given the right treatment, they can be made equally delicious!

Slow cooking in the Tite-Top Baster is the secret of many tender, wonderfully flavored, juicy roasts. The rings on the inside of the cover collect the moisture and baste the meat all over continuously. So tightly does the cover fit that almost no steam escapes, and thus the Tite-Top Baster gives practically the same service as a pressure cooker.

Send for our booklet "Cheaper Cuts of Meat and How to Prepare Them." It will give you helpful suggestions for all kinds of good meat dishes.

THE GRISWOLD MFG. CO., Dept. H 2, Erie, Pa., U. S. A.

Makers of the Bolo Oven, Extra Finished Iron Kitchen Ware, Heart-Star Waffle Irons, Cast Aluminum Cooking Utensils, Food Choppers, Reversible Dampers, Steel Damper Clips and Gas Hot Plates.

Trade Mark
Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

THE TITE-TOP BASTER is the old-fashioned cast iron Dutch Oven, improved and up-to-date. Use it for boiling, baking, roasting or frying. Cast iron is the only cooking utensil material which improves with age and lasts a lifetime.

Guard Your Complexion

A perfect complexion contributes more than anything else to the unified beauty of your face. Protect that, and the rest of your features will take on added charm. D. & R. Perfect Cold Cream will give to your skin the rich softness of velvet. The biting winds of winter have no fear for the woman who knows her skin is safe. D. & R. Perfect Cold Cream stands guard over your skin. It does, however, much more than that, for it contains elements which beautify as well as protect. You will be delighted with the quick results you obtain from its use.

Now sold at pre-war prices. Tubes, 10c, 25c, 50c. Jars, 35c, 50c, 85c, $1.50.

TRY IT FREE—Write for free tube of this perfect skin cleanser and beautifier. Address: Daggett & Ramsdell, Dept. 926, D. & R. Building, New York.

DAGGETT & RAMSDELL'S
PERFECT COLD CREAM
"The Kind That Keeps"

Your Garden in 1922

By J. HORACE MCFARLAND

AS THE March winds blow and winter weakens its grip on the soil the garden comes to mind. What is yours to be in 1922—a haphazard, incidental, random sort of affair, or a carefully planned attempt to get the most of health, food and pleasure out of your bit of land? You will decide this question, either with a definite determination to have a good garden, or with the procrastinating lack of planning which almost assures a poor reward. Just now I want to propose planning for the 1922 garden, however small it may be. Plant it first on paper, have it grow now in your imagination, and the possibilities as well as the pleasures will be at the least doubled.

Flowers, vegetables, fruits, these three; but the best of these is—whatever you prefer, or can have and will work for. So the first item in the planning, after you have made to scale a little map of the garden with which to plan intelligently, is to decide which of the three, or what portion of ground for each, you prefer.

About the map, the plan, upon which to develop the geography of the garden, let me suggest a simple means of production. A scale of one inch of plan to each four feet of garden will do nicely for a small place, though it will look larger on paper and feel smaller on the land if a scale of a half inch to a foot is used. Measure the garden space carefully, noting complications of walks, trees, fences, walls, hydrants, ash barrels, outhouses, garages, and so on. Note also the compass indications, for it makes much difference to have a north or a south exposure for some things, and there are plants that will agreeably adorn a shady corner but merely exist in full sun.

Flowers, Fruits or Vegetables?

NEXT consider your possibilities and your preferences. Is your greatest liking for flowers? Are the charms of homemade peas and radishes and beets, or lettuce and cabbage and corn and tomatoes dominant? Do you dream of your own grapevine, of strawberries picked before breakfast, of currants and raspberries on bushes and not in boxes? I know a woman in Washington who has a back yard eighteen by twenty-four feet, from which she gathers Niagara grapes, enjoys lettuce and Lima beans, chard and carrots, tomatoes and parsley, while a fine lilac scents the air in early spring, followed by an even finer Radiance rose and by other roses.

I know another woman in Springfield, Massachusetts, who has two city back lots, with a total of about sixty by seventy feet of open ground. She has no vegetables because she prefers flowers and ferns and rare plants, and as a result of her skill and love and work, this little space is a miniature botanical garden of the utmost interest and of rare beauty.

Fortunately, even if unconventionally, all three garden objects may be combined. A grapevine will climb to shade the kitchen porch, and its clusters of fruit hang attractively overhead. Current bushes are thoroughly ornamental, and I find the strawberry patch in my own west garden at Breeze Hill pleases visitors. A division line of Lima beans on six-foot poles connected by twine loops is good to look at, and a more pleasing border plant than the carrot is hard to find. With large enough area, so that corn, the most beautiful of native American plants, grown in its Golden Bantam form, may be in blocks rather than in thin rows, there is opportunity for rare moments on summer nights.

I have found a row of "cat" peas in bloom as beautiful as sweet peas, and when on Thanksgiving day the family exclaimed over the delightful Blue Bantam peas which had been cold packed against the turkey festival, the satisfaction was more than doubled. With planning, the home garden may have a sane combination of fruits, flowers and vegetables that will be well worth while.

A main point to consider in this preliminary planning is the actual needs of the family. All too often there is too much of a good thing, and waste results. I have been literally tired of cherries and fed up on peas and satiated with beans, because I have too many cherry trees and because the ease of planting has made the rows of vegetables too long. Better far have enough than too much, for scanty planting may mean more room for other things and a steady supply the season through. I hope, as these notes continue, to suggest details in this respect, as, for example, a unit of five feet of row for each adult in the family in planning for peas and beans.

Then another reason for thoughtful gardening on paper in March is the opportunity afforded, in both the flower garden and the vegetable garden, to have two complete crops in each season. My place had a riotous glory of Shirley poppies along a border which carried zinnias and African marigolds from the end of poppy time right to the frost shut-off. Celery follows early peas, and late beans and spinach take the land vacated by the sweet corn we have in rich perfection in July. The long-season crops are placed properly, in a planned garden, so that Lima beans stay where they will look and do best, and salsify and chicory have time to grow. The land is always improving, if it is being used and worked and enriched; at Breeze Hill we even sow sweet clover in latest fall to get a "ground cover" over winter, and to add humus and nitrogen without cost.

The Catalogue Crop Ripens Early

SUCCESSION plantings of both flowers and vegetables are essential to garden continuity. Is it not better to see pansies in fall as well as in spring? Won't you prefer gladioli from August to October? How many times we have had regretfully to lose lettuce we could not use, only to want lettuce a few weeks later when the succession crop should have been coming on. Sweet corn from July nineteenth to November tenth is the proud Breeze Hill record, following seven successive plantings of Golden Bantam. Tomatoes from early July until long after frost easily can be provided.

In the Middle States these words will be read before the ground is workable, and the planning I am proposing can occur during home evenings. The catalogue crop ripens early, and these aids to expenditure ought to be convenient as one plans. A seed is a promise, and promises that are too lavish only evoke a smile. A good seed represents more than the plant it is to germinate into; it carries the honor, the experience, the forethought, the keen judgment of the man who sells it to me. I buy that seed plus what is called "good will," but is really reputation, and so I buy only of seedsmen who either have or seem to deserve the jewel decoration of good reputation.

Other catalogue items are in thought during the early March garden planning. Those strawberry plants of the "everbearing" type may be ordered, and if there are to be grapevines and blackberries, raspberries and currants, now is the time to bespeak them. The nurseryman will also have the permanent shrubs and the fruit trees, and there are roses and hardy plants to prepare for. My mail proves that several thousands of the members of the American Rose Society are thinking roses all winter long. So I suggest the reading of the catalogues, and the garden books, and the making of a preliminary list, to be later cut down to the actual needs for the 1922 garden, and then be the subject of early orders in the interest of good service.

Garden prosperity rests primarily on the fertility and tilth—that's a nice word, meaning preparation and good order and other qualities—of the soil. If the ground is in loose, friable condition it is ready to work for you. If it is hard and rough it needs your work in and for it. All soils are better for deep digging and for fertilization, and rotted stable manure is the best substance. Let me propose that as early as possible after frost has left the ground it be turned over with a good spade, beaten and raked to fineness, with the use of manure if possible, and if not, of commercial fertilizers; bone dust and pulverized sheep manure are excellent.

Dealers Fitting "La Camille" Corsets Offer You More Value for Your Money

TWO women made purchases of corsets. One had only a few minutes to spare; most of her day had been consumed in buying a pair of shoes. So she ordered her corset "charge and send." It always hurt her back, it chafed the hips, it dug in at the top, and spoiled the effect of her dresses. Yet she blamed corset and store for failure to get satisfaction.

The other woman visited a dealer selling "La Camille." The corsetiere assisted her in choosing the right model for her figure; then dissuaded her from rushing away without having the garment fitted.

In a few moments the new corset was skillfully adjusted. It allowed perfect freedom to the organs, restrained the thighs, and greatly improved the silhouette. Possessing the patented "Ventilo" Back it caused no pressure on the spine; the "Bendilo" flexible-front top did not press into the flesh; the "Ventilo" Front Shield under the lacers prevented scoring; the "Lox-It" clasp never permitted gaping or pinching.

Was the second woman satisfied? We will quote her very words: "I never before knew such corset comfort. I can sleep in it. No one knows I am wearing it (not even the men I dance with). I know it myself only from the restful support it gives to my back, the slendering lines it has given my figure, and the compliments I receive on the fit of my gowns."

The combination of "La Camille" expertly fitted gives a new meaning to corset service and satisfaction. It costs nothing extra to secure fitting service—why not get it?

If you don't know the "La Camille" dealer in your city or neighborhood let us tell you—also send you our leaflet telling why every corset should be fitted.

"La Camille" dealers, as a group, are keenly interested in the fitting of corsets. Through our International School of Scientific Corsetry, we have trained a large number of their Corsetieres. Expert fitting is a valuable professional service that adds greatly to the worth of a corset—yet it is gladly given, for it makes satisfied customers.

Particulars regarding our school gladly furnished to dealers and corsetieres.

INTERNATIONAL CORSET COMPANY
112-130 UNION STREET :: AURORA, ILLINOIS

Sold in New York at "La Camille" Corset Studio, 543 Fifth Ave., near 43rd St.

The Four Great "La Camille" Features

Model illustrated is No. 4229.

A sport corset for slender and average figures. A favorite with women who go in for tennis, golf, dancing, motoring, etc. Also a good house corset.

Made of pink brocade batiste. 7½-in. clasp. Sizes 19 to 26. $6.50

When it's time to unmask

CAN you meet appraising glances with the happy consciousness that your complexion is above criticism? Or, are you filled with dread because of an ugly blemished skin?

One cannot always hide behind a mask, however. There are times when even the most subtle aids to beauty fail to conceal a faulty complexion and it is revealed in all its blotchy redness, oiliness, or otherwise unwholesome condition.

But for the woman who is really anxious to improve her skin there is no need to suffer such humiliation. Resinol Soap is a positive aid to a fresher, healthier complexion.

Use it night and morning,—gently working its creamy lather well into the pores with the finger tips. It rinses easily, and leaves the face smoother, softer, and tingling with that freshened feeling which indicates returning skin health. Try it today,—and see!

Sold by all druggists and toilet goods dealers

Dainty trial size cake free on request.
Dept. 1-D, Resinol, Baltimore, Md.

Resinol Soap

Dining-Room Lights

(Continued from Page 40)

There are two distinct methods of correctly lighting the dining room, though many times these may be combined in one room so that one has, at the turn of a switch, either method at one's finger tips, so to speak. The first method includes an adequate number of sconce fixtures on the walls of the room, with table candles for mealtime; the second makes use of the hanging light placed over the table. In the room with the hanging light one may of course use wall sconces also; or wall sconces may constitute the only method of lighting, doing away with the necessity of either hanging light or candles. But the type of light, the color and type of shades, if these are used, the sort of candlesticks—the choice of these is laid down by the general rules of good taste, though there will be found infinite variety within the pale, whether one's problem is simplified by the joy of electricity or complicated by the difficulty of gas.

Every day sees new and delightful arrivals in the world of wall sconces. In these electric wall brackets the finish is of first importance; one considers the advantages of antique gold, colonial brass, polished old silver, polychrome, enamels of various colors, old bronze, weathered old brass and colonial pewter. The newest offerings are old silver and enamels, it seems, and there is a distinct trend toward the use of mirrors and small drop crystals. Many of the fixtures may be had in any number of finishes, but if a certain fixture is desired and it is found that the wanted finish is not made up in stock, it can usually be ordered at a small additional charge. There is a great range of price, but one can get the better wall brackets, designed to wear well and not to go out of style, from about $13.50 for the two-light colonial brass bracket shown at the extreme right of the row of sconces illustrated on page 40, and $20 for the crystal drop, single light, silver-finished bracket shown at the extreme left of the row, to the high price of $82 for something especially fine in old ivory and polychrome finish, including the antique glass mirror, old-ivory metal candles and candelabra pull sockets, the design of which fixture is shown next to the end at the left. A middle price of around $30 will buy the silver-finished Adam fixture fourth from the end at the left, the enameled flower-basket fixture next to the end at the right, or the enameled, two-light fixture showing small drop crystals, seen at the middle right. The smart hanging lights for use over the table include the unshaded fixture composed of bulb-tipped candle lights arranged in an attractive design and suspended on one central chain; the same sort of fixture provided with a large silk shade, the lower edge of which hides the bulbs from sight, but allows the candle cases to show; the large shade of vellum or silk, open or closed at the bottom and suspended on a heavy silk-tasseled cord; and the candle-group fixture supplied with small shades. The first of these might be any one of the hanging candle-group fixtures shown in the illustration on page 40 minus the shade. The hanging fixture with the blue shade is in old bronze and polychrome or colonial pewter; it has three lights, and costs $40 without the shade, or $70 with it. The shade is 20-inch size and comes in old blue or old gold.

Many people are quite adept at shade making themselves, and if so, there are limitless possibilities opened up for practicing economy while having good-looking lights. The hanging light above the table has many times been successfully shaded by inexperienced fingers; and a "real" fixture is not needed for this if the shade is beautiful enough in itself, one or two bulb lights being sufficient, and if suspended on a silk cord all the better. Shades that may well be the making of the homemade fixture are shown in the illustrations on page 40, all of them being quite possible of achievement.

The shades used on lighting fixtures are usually in tones of rose or yellow, since the glow reflected from these is more becoming and restful. If another color such as blue is desired it should be lined with yellow or rose so that the light will still be pleasant. A shade that compromises and enhances all room color schemes will be found in the choice of vellum or parchment; this has a delightful translucence; the inside may be left the yellowish color of the material itself, and the outer side may be decorated in any color combination, with the addition of black, or even black grounded, like the parchment shade shown in the illustration on page 40.

Rose-colored lights are always popular and effective, as is proved by their use in this dining room on page 40, featuring the knife-boxes with the Heppelwhite sideboard. There are plenty of blue notes in the color scheme of the room, though the rose lights augment the scheme charmingly, with the result that the room is very much more attractive than if it were entirely rose-hued to match the lights.

Helpful Ladies' Home Journal Books

Order the following booklets from the Service Bureau, The Ladies' Home Journal, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania:

NEW JOURNAL BUNGALOWS. Price, 50 cents.
NEW JOURNAL HOUSES. Price, 50 cents.
YOUR FIREPLACE AND HOW TO BUILD IT. Price, 5 cents.
HOW TO BUY YOUR HOME. Price, 15 cents.
WHAT YOU SHOULD KNOW WHEN BUILDING A LITTLE HOUSE. Price, 10 cents.
PLANNING THE LITTLE HOUSE GARDEN. Price, 10 cents.
JOURNAL BIRD HOUSES. Price, 25 cents.
WEAVING THE NEW BASKETS. Price, 25 cents.
BASKETS FOR GIFTS AND BAZAARS. Instructions for Fine Needle Work are included. Price, 25 cents.
HOW TO SEW FOR THE CHILDREN. Hints on saving time and money. Price, 10 cents.
CHILDREN'S PARTIES AND BIRTHDAY CELEBRATIONS. Price, 15 cents.
HOW TO DRY FRUITS AND VEGETABLES. Price, 10 cents.
THE COMPLETE FURNISHING OF THE LITTLE HOUSE. Reprints of the articles comprising this series may be had for ten cents each from the Interior Decoration Department, THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL.
THE BOOK OF SWEATERS AND KNITTING. Containing the latest designs. Price, 15 cents.

Order the following booklets directly from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City:

FASHION SELECTIONS FOR SPRING AND SUMMER. A thirty-two-page booklet containing over 250 attractive and popular designs for all occasions. Send 2 two-cent stamps for postage.

MASQUERADE COSTUMES. A twenty-four-page booklet of novel designs for party, play or pageant. Price, 15 cents.

THE BRIDE'S BOOK. Charming illustrations designs for the entire trousseau, and many valuable suggestions for the wedding arrangements. Price, 15 cents.

YOUR CHILDREN'S CLOTHES. Twenty-four pages of simple and easily made garments for children, with complete instructions for cutting and making. Price, 15 cents.

THE MATERNITY BOOK. Illustrates attractive, sensible clothes for maternity wear, as well as all the necessary garments for the layette. Patterns supplied for all designs shown. Price, 15 cents.

SIMPLIFIED SMOCKING. Teaches the one-process method of smocking, and shows 27 new designs, with many delightful suggestions for their application. Price, 25 cents.

Patterns may be had from any store selling Home Patterns by mail, postage prepaid, or from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City, at the following prices:

Dresses	35 cents
Coats	35 cents
Skirts	30 cents
Blouses	30 cents
Children's	25 cents
Lingerie	25 cents
Embroidery Transfer	25 cents to 75 cents

KOTEX

Lessens the Laundry Problem

KOTEX are cheap enough to throw away, and easy to dispose of instantly by following directions found in every box.

Kotex is so easy to obtain at drug, drygoods and department stores. No unnecessary counter conversation. Simply say, "A box of Kotex, please". They come in Regular size and Hospital size. The Hospital size is extra large.

Kotex, once used, form a new sanitary habit. They are unsurpassed at business, when traveling, or at home, and a supply should always be kept on the shelf or in a dresser drawer.

Kotex are very well made, of Cellucotton—a wonderful sanitary absorbent, now used in leading hospitals—and fine gauze. Extra long tabs for secure and comfortable pinning. There is no descriptive printing on the blue box, merely the name Kotex.

Kotex solves a difficult laundry and hygienic problem.

Cellucotton Products Co.,
208 S. LaSalle St., Chicago

51 Chambers St., New York
Factories: Neenah, Wis.

Regular Size
12 in box for 60c
in Canada, $1.00

Hospital Size
6 in box for 45c
in Canada, 60c

Sample of either size mailed in plain wrapper for 10c

Kotex cabinets are being installed in women's rest rooms everywhere—hotels, office buildings, restaurants, theatres and other places—from which may be obtained one Kotex with two safety pins, in plain wrapper, for 10 cents.

INEXPENSIVE, COMFORTABLE, HYGIENIC and SAFE — KOTEX

If You Seek Colors That Flatter and Styles That Charm, Wear—
Mina Taylor Dresses

THIS, you know, is the day of "flattering" clothes. It is no longer enough that a dress be a dress; the clever woman asks, too, that it enhance her appearance—make her look pretty.

Mina Taylor Dresses do more than fulfil such expectations. They are always conspicuously lovely. Styles are smarter, more advanced; workmanship is finer, more painstaking.

In the Wash Dress departments where they are sold, you turn naturally to Mina Taylors. You can identify them by their crispness—their clear, vivid colorings—their fine fabrics. They are made in styles suited for home, morning, porch, calling and day-time dress occasions, in sizes from misses' 16 to large women's 52.

Offices: NEW YORK, CHICAGO, OMAHA, LOS ANGELES, PORTLAND, SEATTLE

Stores that sell Mina Taylor Dresses will tell you about them in the newspapers. If there is no Mina Taylor merchant in your city, please write our Omaha office and we will be glad to quote prices and see that your order is filled—promptly and carefully.

Which Will You Choose?

The young lady on the window seat is proud of her plain-and-plaid gingham Frock with its ruffled organdie trimmings and long slender skirt panels. Style No. 34,703, sizes 36 to 46.

The girl in pink likes the slim patent leather belt of her checked-and-plain gingham Frock so well she takes pleasure in showing it off. Sleeve ruffles and a bouffant hip line emphasize youth. Style No. 34,807M, sizes 16, 18 and 20.

The young woman seated at the refectory table is delighted with the slenderizing, full-length panel of tinted organdie on her Frock of checked gingham. Appliqued gingham motifs enhance its original effect. Style No. 34,705, sizes 36 to 46.

Each of these models comes in a variety of color combination. The label—"Mina Taylor"—is a mark of smart style. Look for it whenever you are buying wash dresses for any purpose.

Mina Taylor Dresses Made only by M. E. SMITH & COMPANY, INC., Master Garment Makers, Omaha, Nebraska

Bumbleton Folks

By CLAUDE CALLAN

THE Bumbleton city council recently caused a stir by renaming the north and south streets. Before the renaming nobody except the old-timers knew that the streets had ever been named, but they really had been called after the game of the country. Antelope was the principal residence street, and Turkey street and Deer street were both very good. The city council changed the name of Antelope to Condor, after a distinguished family that lives on the street. The two next best streets were called Pepper and Maybank, and while both of these men and their families might have thought that they should have been put ahead of the Condors they didn't complain. They had such good streets named for them that they openly approved of the council's act. But a number of people were angry, and every one of them was unselfish in his anger. Mr. Applecrab was not offended because Snipe street, that lies next to the hill and is impassable, was changed to Applecrab street. That, he said, didn't worry him. "What makes me mad," he continued, "is the way they treated Dave Darner. Dave was here twenty years before the Condors came, and they should have named Antelope street for him if they were going to change it at all." And Dave Darner was angry because the Potters were left out entirely. "Old man Potter helped lay off the town," Mr. Darner said; "but just because he has no pull there was no street named for him. So far as I am concerned, I don't want any street named for me, but I think they did a little piece of business when they left out Potter." Mr. Condor, who drew the best street, was seen throwing sticks out of it while on his way home the afternoon of the change, and Mr. Pepper placed his eye near a picket on his front fence and sighted both ways to see if all fences on his street were in line. Most people think that the new names will stand just as they are, but Judge Bumble, who had no street named for him, is threatening to bring some kind of action to have the old names restored, just for the sake of sentiment.

MRS. COBBLER believes in dieting against divorce. "I will admit that there was a time in my life when I thought I ought to pick up and leave Mr. Cobbler, and I believe that a great deal of the trouble was due to the fact that we weren't eating the proper things. I had been getting up meals hastily, so I decided to make an experiment. One day I bought some spareribs and sweet potatoes and, after boiling the potatoes, I peeled them and put them in with the spareribs and allowed them to bake for about twenty minutes. Well, you would have been surprised if you had seen the change these ribs and potatoes made in Mr. Cobbler. He began smiling as soon as he saw them and he was in a good humor all evening. And I must confess that there was a change in me. I was directly benefited by the spareribs and sweet potatoes, and I was proud to have cooked something that brought about a change in my husband. The following day I bought a fat hen and put her on to stew a short time after Mr. Cobbler went downtown. Later in the day I made dumplings, and when Mr. Cobbler came home I invited him to the kitchen to take a look into the big pot that had not been used before in months. He took off the lid and saw two or three small yolks of eggs dancing about on the top. The sight of these made him know what the pot contained, and he was so happy that he actually began telling me of some things that had taken place downtown. Within a few minutes after he sat down at the table I had dinner ready and he ate chicken and dumplings until I thought he would burst. When dinner was over he brought up the subject of the addition I had been wanting built to the house, and from that day to this Mr. Cobbler and I haven't had any trouble. When I feel a little blue or see that he isn't as cheerful as he might be, I don't go to the neighbors and tell them my troubles. I go straight to my cookbook."

IT IS queer that Mr. Litchfield doesn't profit by Mrs. Litchfield's advice. Even the children can see that she is right, but Mr. Litchfield stubbornly pursues a course that never will lead to prosperity. When the family is in a little harder shape than usual, Mrs. Litchfield decides that it is time for her to say something to her husband. She begins by telling him that she is a woman. Although Mrs. Litchfield has splendid business ability, she has never denied being a woman. "I am a woman," she begins, "but I didn't look on to no purpose when my brother, Walter Whitside, was making his start in the world. Walter's plan was to lay aside something every month, and by doing that he soon had his money working for him. Now I don't say that I regret having married you, or that I have ever worried because of the opportunities that people said I threw away; but I do say that you ought to specify a certain sum or amount and lay it aside every month. That was Walter's way, and the result is that he doesn't have to ask odds of anybody." While Mrs. Litchfield is talking, the children look at their papa. The young children especially are very proud of him, but they have heard so much about the objections their mamma's people made to the match that they can't keep from speculating on the kind of papa they would have preferred if their mamma hadn't taken Mr. Litchfield. One of the boys thinks he might have been better pleased with a papa who had larger muscles and who had once been a prize fighter, and the little girl thinks she would prefer a papa with long black hair, who could make big speeches, or a short, fat papa who could sing funny songs. But most of the children are wondering if he is going to follow their mamma's advice.

TWO weeks ago a sewing-machine agent knocked at the Gristhopper door, and Mr. Gristhopper told his wife not to let the agent in. "If there is anything we don't need," he said, "it is a new sewing machine." Mrs. Gristhopper said she wasn't thinking of buying a new one, but that she didn't want to be rude to the man. After bringing in the machine and showing all the good points and the new features that are not on the old machine, the agent looked at little Jenny and said to Mrs. Gristhopper: "Is that your daughter?" Mrs. Gristhopper confessed that Jenny was her granddaughter, and the agent was surprised to hear that she was old enough to have a grandchild. Mrs. Gristhopper then admitted that she had three grown children, but the agent refused to believe it. Poor Mr. Gristhopper knew his wife's weakness, and he felt sure she would buy a machine unless he did something to prevent it. "You don't want a new machine, mamma," he said to his wife, "and if I were you I wouldn't take up the man's time." Instead of getting ready to leave, the agent tried to remember having seen Mr. Gristhopper before, but Mr. Gristhopper was sure they hadn't met. "Well, I have seen somebody who looks just like you," the agent said. "Are you related to Judge Gristhopper of Grand City?" Mr. Gristhopper put down his paper and said: "Well, only distantly." The agent said that he and Judge Gristhopper looked enough alike to be brothers. "Well, I'll tell you," said Mr. Gristhopper: "there were two sets of the Gristhoppers who used to live in Jasper County and I think one set of them moved to Grand City, or into that country somewhere, but I didn't keep track of them. I have talked to a number of people who knew Frank Gristhopper—that is the judge—and they tell me that he says we are cousins." Finally Mrs. Gristhopper said the new machine was all right, but that she would make out with her old one. "Well, if you are going to need a machine any time soon," Mr. Gristhopper said, "you might just as well go ahead and trade with this man while he is here."

Mr. Ripple is not a successful man because he sees too many opportunities. Almost every week he sees a new opportunity, and it looks so good to him that he decides to abandon the opportunity he was so enthusiastic about the week before.

Nothing gives Mrs. Poplin more genuine satisfaction than the fact that she is ten years younger than Mr. Poplin. She doesn't especially care to outlive him, but she doesn't want to risk his outliving her.

Dolly Buttercup has never written a letter under favorable circumstances. She always has to ask the young man to excuse writing and spelling for some reason.

Next to being in the house with your wife just after you have hurt her feelings, the most lonesome thing is to be in the house alone.

When Mrs. Whitside is thinking of buying a certain thing she asks herself the question, "Can my husband afford it?" If he can, she wants something better.

Dad Darner has the best children in Bumbleton. He taught them how to earn a living by starting them out early to earn one for him.

White!
Flaky! Delicious!

That's how Comet Rice comes to your table.

Comet Rice is the pick of the crop—selected with the utmost care. Sold only in sealed dust-proof packages.

Do you know the right way to boil rice to make it flaky? On the Comet package you'll find directions. Follow them and find out how rice can be transformed.

Get a package from your grocer today. Look for the Comet on the yellow package with the diagonal red band.

COOK RICE RIGHT—the Comet way

HEAUT 6 cups water, with pinch of salt, in large saucepan. When boiling violently, add slowly 1 cup Comet Rice. Continue boiling 20 minutes—or until grains are soft. Drain in colander, set on back of stove until grains fall apart. Do not cover—that makes rice heavy and soggy.

EVER EAT BROWN RICE? Doctors recommend WHOLE rice with the natural outside coating and vitamins retained. Highly nourishing. Try COMET NATURAL BROWN RICE.

Seaboard Rice Milling Co.
Galveston and New York

Don't wait for a "pink tooth-brush"

A DISCOLORED tooth-brush is an order from Nature. "Take care of your gums as well as your teeth" she says.

Ipana Tooth Paste does just that. It makes firm, healthy gums that can resist danger, and cleans the teeth as well.

And this is the reason. Ipana is the only tooth paste which contains Ziratol, a healing agent. More than 2,000 dentists have told us that they prescribe Ipana for its beneficial effect on the gums.

Ipana does everything that a good pure tooth paste can do and its smooth, snappy and delightful flavor is something you will think of as a treat.

IPANA
TOOTH PASTE

Your druggist has it in generous tubes at 50 cents. A sample, enough for a week, may be had for ten cents from Bristol-Myers Co., 44 Rector St., New York City.

Human Nature in the Bible

(Continued from Page 21)

indoor furniture—and the next morning Samuel anointed him as the first King of Israel. A peaceful but permanent change took place in the government of the nation.

Samuel made a curious prediction which came to pass that day. As young Saul drew near to a hill he met a company of prophets descending; they were following musicians who were playing on the psaltery, tabret, pipe and harp, while mystic speech filled the air. Saul was particularly affected by music; his spirit was caught up in a strange exaltation, and he, too, shouted in ecstasy and prophesied with the rest. When his former friends saw this they marveled. They were as much astonished as college students would be to see their champion athlete suddenly break out in poetry. Saul's utterance sounded like tall talk for a young cattleman, and they wondered what was the matter with him. They expressed their quite natural amazement in words that have become a proverb:

What is this that has come unto the son of Kish? Is Saul also among the prophets?

Saul became his natural self after this experience, for when Samuel was on the point of introducing him to the people and, like a convention speaker, was just about to mention the name of the candidate Saul could not be found; his shyness had got the better of him and he had hid himself. But when he was found and presented to the congregation they were delighted with his magnificent appearance, and they shouted together, "God save the king!" Samuel then wrote out a constitution, placed it in a book of records and dismissed the people.

It is always easy to accustom oneself to an advance in the scale of living; luxuries soon become a matter of course. The big country lad, so shy and modest at first, quickly became used to the pleasures of authority. It was a bad thing for Israel to have a king, but it was even worse for the king. We see the old, familiar, melancholy story of pride, egotism, and an abuse of power, leading to degeneration and ruin. The personal history of Saul is one of the most tragic in the Bible. Like Macbeth, he was a good fellow ruined by promotion. When we first meet Saul we see a kindly, modest country boy of superb physique, contented with his work and happy in his exuberant health and strength; as soon as he became king he exchanged comfort for splendor, cheerfulness for majesty, outdoor life for councils of state, peace of mind for chronic anxiety.

Jonathan, the Loyal Friend

FURTHERMORE, his moral nature had never been tried, and it failed to meet the tests of kingship. As his royal power increased, the wholesomeness of his character diminished. Men are not made for unchecked dominion, and almost invariably deteriorate with supreme power in their hands. The instance of Napoleon is simply a revelation of human nature; one sees the degeneration of the man steadily and insidiously accompanying the increase in authority. There are not many characters in history like Abraham Lincoln; whereas Napoleon, minus genius, is such a familiar example, so true to form, that Emerson took him as the representative of the common man.

It is depressing to contemplate the wretched figure of King Saul talking with the ghost of Samuel and to compare that colloquy with their first conversation. On this last fateful interview the same thing had really happened to both men; Samuel was an actual ghost, but in reality no more so than Saul, for he was only the ghost of his former self.

The deterioration of any man or woman is a shocking spectacle; but how much more so when the individual has been intrusted with enormous power and unbounded opportunities, only to make a wreck, involving his final ruin in the general downfall. Saul's youth was like a sunny spring morning that changes into the darkness of clouds and tempest. His fate hurts us, because there is something about him that we love.

One of the most splendid and lovable young men in the Bible is the crown prince Jonathan; he was mighty and valiant, bold as a lion, fearless in danger, a good son and good patriot, and so loyal to his friend David that he was willing to lose his own rights rather than have David suffer. He was a born soldier, who fought with wisdom and courage, and who died on the field of battle.

The Philistines had left a garrison in Geba, and, as frequently happens, the alien soldiers had corrupted the natives. Young Jonathan went forth to war and smote this garrison, revealing at the same time the apostasy and abominable practices of the Israelites there dwelling. The Philistine host came out from their country, hot for revenge, and the Hebrews hid "in caves, and in thickets, and in rocks, and in high places, and in pits." While the unarmed population were in this state of terror and apprehension Jonathan, without telling his father, took his armor-bearer, who seems to have been a youth after his own heart, loving adventure more than life, and the two, climbing up the face of the rock with their hands and feet, rushed upon the army like a pair of hounds into a herd. They slew man after man.

Afar off the watchmen of Saul observed the confusion in the enemy's ranks, and reported it; Saul gave the word, the Israelites advanced, and all the people came out of their hiding places and fell upon the Philistines, while the natives rose against the garrisons; there was a terrific slaughter. But a curious thing happened, which is of deep significance, for it proved to Saul that he was a constitutional monarch, when he had fondly believed himself to be absolute and irresponsible. He had forbidden every man to eat until night came and their revenge should be complete.

Public Sentiment

NATURALLY Jonathan had not heard the king's command and, being almost faint with the heat of his exertions, and seeing honey in a wood, he ate of it; the relief he felt could not have been better expressed than by the Bible phrase: "his eyes were enlightened." Then the people, in horror, told him of his father's words, but the sensible Jonathan declared his father to be in error, and that it would have been better for all the people to eat and so be more efficient in the fight. On that night Saul, seeing that something was wrong, had lots drawn, and Jonathan was taken. Then came the first clash between the prince and his father; Jonathan saying ironically, "I did but taste a little honey . . . and lo, I must die." The willful king replied, "Thou shalt surely die, Jonathan."

Saul immediately discovered that there was such a thing as public sentiment and that it was stronger than the royal power. Many kings after his day were to ascertain the same fact. What a pity that there were not more instances! We do not know who the spokesman was on this occasion; perhaps angry resentment found many voices. The people said that not one hair of Jonathan's head should fall to the ground, and the king found it advisable not to press the matter. This is one of the first cases in history when public sentiment manifested itself successfully against the ruling authority, and, as such, deserves this especial mention.

Saul was an able military leader, and the Israelites were frequently victorious under his leadership. When he defeated the Amalekites he did not fulfill to the letter the stern directions of the voice of the Lord, who through Samuel told him to kill the women, the babies, the sucklings in their mothers' arms and all the valuable cattle. Poor, wicked Amalekite babies! I suppose they were like the nonsect infants of the Westminster Catechism. Unfortunately Saul was not moved by any pity, for the children were slaughtered; King Agag was spared out of senatorial courtesy, and the best of the cattle were saved, ostensibly to offer up to Jehovah, but probably for more practical purposes. Saul was always afraid of Samuel; he had the attitude of a bad boy toward a severe private tutor; but the reason he gave

(Continued on Page 113)

CONCERNING WOMEN ONLY

BY Natalie Morris

ONCE upon a time, very, very long ago, in the mid-Victorian days, Madame Grundy raised her pious hands in horror at the mere mention of the word leg. Then, one always said limb, and blushed becomingly.

But, thank heaven, those false modesties have gone the way of the old strait-jacket corset and the hoop skirt. Today, women call a leg a leg and display them frankly, even proudly.

Why mince matters? Shapely ankles are universally observed with approval. And correct stockings have ever so much to do with setting ankles off to advantage.

Come with me for a walk down any city boulevard when the wind is playful and you will observe there are two kinds of stockings most in evidence: stockings with old-fashioned seams up the back and,—Burson.

If your eye is critical it will tell you that stocking seams are frequently crooked. Just notice next time you are on the street. Wind-whipped skirts catch seams and pull them all awry until they run every-which-way in most unseemly disorder.

Once seams were necessary in shaped stockings and used in them exclusively. But now, mock seams are sewed into tubular stockings, imitating real fashioning. Therefore, to assure fit, women are buying Bursons that are fashioned in the knitting. So, you see, really there is no longer any need for unsightly seams. Burson Hosiery follow the graceful contour of the leg perfectly. They have no ungraceful seams to pull awry. Consequently, they set off feminine ankles in a dainty, graceful fashion.

Be sure you ask for Burson Hosiery.

SILK • MERCEUR • COTTON • LACE
BURSON KNITTING COMPANY
ROCKFORD, ILLINOIS

BURSON
Fashioned Hosiery

Lacing Hooks
for boys' and girls' shoes—just about as natural and necessary as the lace itself! Quick and easy in every-day use, they are most convenient for mother or child.

Every dealer can secure footwear with the handy shoe hooks. Insist on having what you want!

LACING-HOOKS-FOR MEN'S, WOMEN'S AND CHILDREN'S SHOES

Human Nature in the Bible

(Continued from Page 112)

Samuel for sparing the cattle is significant, coming so soon after the demonstration about Jonathan. "I feared the people, and obeyed their voice," Saul could not bear to see Samuel leaving him, and with his powerful hand he clutched the robe of the prophet, which tore in his grasp, Samuel using the rent as an allegory of the rending of Saul's kingdom.

Samuel relented at Saul's despairing plea, but it was an unfortunate decision for Agag. It is a vivid scene, when the king of the Amalekites, who now believed in his reprieve, came toward Samuel, walking delicately, saying, "Surely the bitterness of death is passed." They were his last words, for Samuel immediately vivisected him.

There is no other word to describe the gait and manner of Agag so dramatically as the word used in the authorized version, "delicately"; but scholars are not agreed as to exactly what happened on this occasion or as to how the Hebrew should be translated. Many think that the passage means that Agag appeared in chains, hence he walked "with difficulty," being fettered. Others think that it means he entered proudly, even superciliously, with royal self-confidence, ready either to live or to die like a king. But whatever may be the original intention, the authorized translation gives us the most interesting picture. Agag came in walking "delicately," with self-conscious, embarrassed and mincing steps, trying to behave like a king, but unable wholly to overcome a natural nervousness. If this is what the Hebrew means there is no better English word than "delicately."

An Authentic Ghost

SAMUEL was an incorruptible judge; and the fact that he took pride in what we regard to-day as a matter of course would seem to indicate that high officials in Israel were not always what they should be, probably on the whole decidedly inferior to court officials in the twentieth century. Samuel said to the people:

I am old and grayheaded . . . and I have walked before you from my childhood unto this day.

Behold, here I am . . . whom have I defrauded? whom have I oppressed? or of whose hand have I received any bribe to blind mine eyes therewith? and I will restore it to you.

After a number of chapters dealing with the adventures of Saul and of David, one forgets Samuel, and it is with a shock that the twenty-fifth chapter opens with the words, "And Samuel died." One feels that a pillar of the house is fallen and that calamity will visit Israel in his absence.

Samuel is the only authentic ghost in the Bible; the only spirit who rose from the grave in palpable form, spoke definite words, and returned to his slumber. King Saul's visit to the medium has a strangely modern air. It was the last night of his life; he had well-founded fears that on the morrow he would be defeated by the Philistines. He missed sadly the counsel of his old tutor; and he inquired of God by dreams, by casting lots and by prophets; all in vain. As a last resort he visited a medium, the witch of Endor; once more his story reminds us of Macbeth.

The mediums were strictly forbidden by law; it was a capital offense to practice the art. But the desire of human nature to communicate with the spirits was then and is now so strong that no legal measures or power of reasoning can stop the traffic. Saul went in the darkness of the night, and in disguise, and when the woman asked him with whom he would like to speak he said in a voice of authority, which betrayed his identity: "Bring me up Samuel." To the amazement of the old witch, who had hitherto relied on hocus-pocus, Samuel actually appeared. She cried out, "An old man cometh up; and he is covered with a mantle." Death had not changed the character of the old prophet; he that was holy was holy still.

He asked sternly why Saul had broken into his quiet sleep. Saul replied pathetically—and our hearts go out to him: "I am sore distressed; for the Philistines make war against me, and God is departed from me." Samuel informed him that everything had happened as he had predicted—"I told you so"—and then added grimly: "Tomorrow shalt thou and thy sons be with me."

Saul fainted, for he knew his doom was at hand. The next day the battle went sore against him. The loyal Jonathan fell, fighting for his father's kingdom. Saul himself was cruelly wounded by the Philistine archers, and asked his armor-bearer to put an end to his sufferings; the boy was afraid, so Saul, like a Roman, fell on his own sword.

Kingly Only in Appearance

THE character of the first king is not impeccable; he was very human and had the faults that mark the natural man. The happiest years of his life came in his careless youth, riding over the hills after the herds; there was nothing kingly about him except his appearance.

His jealousy of David is quite natural; the girls sang: "Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands." He could hardly be expected to hear that song with enthusiasm. I suppose there are some ministers of the gospel who, if they should hear a thousand souls while their successors in the pastorate had saved ten thousand, might, in their glad rejoicing over the additions to the elect, feel some tincture of pique. Saul's jealousy of young David was further inflamed by the fact that his own children were mad about his rival; Jonathan loved him to distraction, and Saul's daughter Michal fell in love with him. Saul was no more vain and no more jealous than the average American.

He had no genius for government; he was more captain than statesman; he was rash and impulsive, given to outbursts of passion, followed by hearty repentance. He was subject to terrible fits of depression, nervous melancholia, so severe and so prolonged that he lay as if in a stupor. The only thing that could help him then was music, of which he was inordinately fond. We have seen how, when he heard the orchestra playing with the prophets, he went into an ecstasy; so when this cloud of despondency darkened his mind David came and played music—perhaps the old cowboy tunes—and he was refreshed and took up his work again. No one has ever understood this peculiar melancholy either then or now; the Bible diagnoses it as possession by an evil spirit, which well describes its effects; this evil spirit could be banished only by music; the method so familiar to-day in the treatment of nervous diseases. Browning has practically recreated the effect on Saul of David's music.

Looking back on Saul's life and career, it does not appear that he was either sensual or vindictive, the two most common vices of monarchs.

Indeed, he was rather like a big, grown-up temperamental boy, incapable of dealing with problems of state.

In comparison with the average character of kings, both in ancient and in modern history, Saul meets the test rather well.

NOTE—In the next, the sixth, article in this series Professor Phelps will tell of King David, the shepherd, musician, athlete, poet, man of war, statesman, father, friend—his virtues and his vices.

60 YEARS OF CHANGING STYLES
but always the same
wonderful Gingham

When Mother was a Girl

When your mother was a girl, practically all women were experts on textiles. They were shrewd, careful buyers and they bought only those fabrics which examination proved good value for the money.

Those were the days when Wm. Anderson Zephyrs first earned the appreciation and good-will of critical women. Today, after four generations of service to women and children, these famous Scotch ginghams are known throughout the world.

Their fresh, youthful designs, their soft, glovelike texture, their fast colors, their wonderful wearing qualities have all contributed to a reputation which may well be called leadership in the world of ginghams.

It has been possible to transplant in America the skill and experience acquired by four generations of Scotch makers of fine wash fabrics. An American-made Wm. Anderson Gingham is called IVANHOE, which comes in hundreds of lovely checks, plaids and stripes. Voile, Organdie and Dotted Swiss of exquisite quality are also included among the family of fabrics which are protected by "Wm. Anderson" on bolt end or selvage.

Sold only through retail merchants.

Wm. Anderson
Textile Manufacturing Co., Inc.
48-50 White Street, New York
Glasgow, Scotland

THE
Wm. Anderson
FAMILY OF FABRICS
WM. ANDERSON Zephyr
WM. ANDERSON
Ivanhoe Zephyr
VOILES ORGANDIES
DOTTED SWISSES
SATEENS RATINES
LAWNS TISSUES
SHIRTINGS

Eat Your Cake and Have it Too

By ALICE VAN LEER CARRICK

The rose is red,
The leaves are green;
The days are past
Which I have seen.
—Verse from an old Pennsylvania
Dutch hand towel.

The fine cross-stitch border above has red flowers and a blue "fence." Second from right, a lovely pattern of blue and gold cross-stitch is repeated in the drawn work.

ONE of my firmest domestic beliefs is that all women love linen. "Purple and fine linen!" That's a magic phrase, and the most magic part of it is "fine linen." It sings to the ear. I like to think that weaving is an art as old as the recorded world; that Paris found Helen at her loom, that Penelope wove for Ulysses a martial mantle patterned with hounds and huntsmen. It binds our ancestresses to us with unbreakable threads of Life and Time. In our early American colonies linen was rare at first. Always, I think, the finest webs were imported, but even after the successful flax crops had been gathered there were the endless months of preparation, the processes of cleaning and swinging and hackling before a woman could sit at her loom to create beauty. Yes, I maintain that all right-minded women love linen, and that poor Mrs. Tulliver's distressed assurance, "And the linen's so in order, as if I was to die to-morrow, I shouldn't be ashamed," is also our high ideal.

But most of us cannot spin, neither can we weave. Alas, that's only too true, I know. Still, the silver lining to this cloud is that most of us have some lovely strip, "heirloom linen," that we keep in a trunk and take out to wonder at occasionally, and never, never use. All of which would seem terribly thriftless to our great-grandmothers who spun and wove it; and that their busy spirits may not reproach you in dreams, I urge you to eat your cake and have it too. By which I mean to look up all your old linens—fine tablecloths, creamy sheets and damask napkins—spread them out before you and see what beauty you can bring into your lives by really using them.

"But," you say—I'm like Alice in Wonderland; I like to pretend conversations—"I have just half a sheet," or "two towels, and the fringes are worn away," or "my sister and I divided my grandmother's wedding tablecloth. What can I do with just that?" Like a prudent person, I have my answer all ready. Half a sheet is lots better than no linen. Usually, you know, the old looms wove narrow strips thirty-four inches wide—the narrower the strip the older the linen—so that your half means selvaige to selvaige. And the length, though naturally this varies, is usually about ninety inches.

NOW let's begin: Get your scissors and your yardstick, for we must measure carefully; snip just one tiny end and draw the thread. I think we'll make a lunch cloth thirty-four inches square and a dozen eleven-inch napkins. Of course the first problem is how to finish them. You could use Binde or Cluny, but the result would not be nearly so delightful as the method I employed. I took a thread from the sheet and matched it as nearly as I could; for, while linen does not run so uniformly even as cotton, it is much more desirable and in keeping. Moreover, handwork always does and should show a slight irregularity, which is really pleasing to the experienced eye. I hemmed the cloth with as narrow fineness as I could, then into the edge I crocheted a design copied from an old Pennsylvania Dutch linen piece. This is the way it goes:

First row, chain five, short treble in cloth, chain and treble entirely around cloth. For the second row, chain five, and treble in treble also around the square. Then turn and finish with a picot edge. Be careful to hold the thread so that the edge does not "full" too much; and you will find the work much easier and easier if you will first stitch with an unthreaded machine the depth you wish to crochet in your lace. In the case of the napkins, which are merely to be finished with a picot edge, I should not hem them. The edge itself will make a perfectly firm finish, and a hem thickens too much so small a piece. Shall I tell you just how I do my edge? First I carefully pull a thread an eighth of an inch down, then I crochet in six stitches, chain four and join, and so to the end, getting a result unbelievably smooth and fine.

Blue and rose cross-stitch makes the unusually lovely border above.

Above, red and green cross-stitch, drawn work and darning; at right, drawn work and cross-stitch.

The 1814 peacock pattern at left is in tones of blue and rose; at right is a drawn-work sampler made before 1628 by Anne Gower, the first wife of Governor John Endicott.

Large stars, solidly worked in blue and pink cross-stitch, were well liked in early days as decorations for towels and other linens.

Sometimes, too, you have smaller pieces of linen. I did—two plain pillow shams of finest linen that my grandmother's great-aunt had woven in eighteenth-century Ireland. So fine it was that I could not match the linen for ruffles; but instead of locking it up uselessly in a drawer and celebrating its beauty just occasionally, I drew meticulous threads and made sixteen afternoon tea napkins. Only nine inches square they are, but they are utterly adorable done in cross-stitch—dark blues and azures and two pinky roses and a daring little dash of green. The edges were delicately rolled and whipped, then cross-stitched in dark blue, so that the final effect is very much like the edge of the little Leeds cap shown on page 118. As far as pattern goes, you are practically unlimited in this work, though I think I should get the

(Continued on Page 117)

An easy economy—a side of Premium Bacon

A whole side of Premium Bacon in the pantry is the modern equivalent for the well filled larder of our thrifty grandparents. It takes but little room—and think how convenient it is—of how many good dishes it forms an indispensable half!

Bacon and eggs, of course, bacon and liver, bacon and fried potatoes or baked apples are just a few of them. In fact, crisp, curly slices of Premium Bacon make almost any dish more tasty and more nourishing.

And by buying a whole side at once you make sure of having the delicate flavor and firm, even texture of Swift's Premium Bacon always at hand—and at the lowest possible price per pound.

Swift's Premium Hams and Bacon

It is not necessary to parboil Swift's Premium Hams before broiling or frying

Look for this "No parboiling" tag when you buy a whole ham or when you buy a slice

Swift & Company
U. S. A.

You will always get the same fine quality in Premium Bacon—whether you buy it by the piece, or sliced, in the glass jar and parchment carton

NONE SUCH MINCE MEAT

"Like mother used to make"

How Long Does it Take You to Make a Mince Pie?

If you use None Such Mince Meat you can make a juicy, tempting mince pie in one-tenth the time it usually takes.

None Such saves you all the bother of buying, chopping, mixing, and cooking the eleven choice ingredients that go into it. All you do is put on the finishing touches. And you have a pie that is more than delicious; it is nourishing and readily digested.

Leading bakers can supply you with None Such Pies. Serve None Such Pie at home, or try it at a restaurant. None Such has been the standard for over thirty-five years.

NONE SUCH FRUIT CAKE

Most delicious, rich fruit cake can be made with None Such Mince Meat. Try this recipe:

Stir to a cream two eggs, one cupful of brown sugar, one-half cupful of butter or substitute. Add one-half cupful dark molasses, one cupful sweet milk, stir thoroughly. Mince fine with a fork the contents of one package of None Such Mince Meat. Sift together three cupfuls flour, two teaspoonfuls baking powder, one teaspoonful salt. Stir into mixture until of proper consistency. Bake one hour in a moderate oven. This makes two cakes.

None Such Mince Meat comes in two convenient forms: in cans, ready for use; in packages, condensed

Merrell-Soule Sales Corporation, Syracuse, New York

EVERY THURSDAY IS NONE SUCH MINCE PIE DAY

Eat Your Cake and Have it Too

(Continued from Page 114)

Above, dark blue cross-stitch incloses a rose border, and motif recurs in drawnwork. At right, gay wools and cottons are used.

habit of studying old samplers to catch the feeling. And I think, too, if I had an old sprigged tea set or cream-and-rose Staffordshire cups and saucers I should take my cross-stitch motif and colors from my china, and so have my tea table all harmony. Or, if you prefer, this fine linen can be entirely white, picot edged with sheerest crochet cotton—unless you can get linen thread as fine as in a fairytale—and marked with tambour script initials. You can get the effect I mean by employing a very delicate double chainstitch, instead of crocheting them from underneath, as was the quaint, painstaking method of our grandmothers. Or again, you can edge your napkins with small scallops of satin stitch, not too much padded, and initial them with squarish letters half an inch high, worked like that delightful marking on Anne Gower's seventeenth-century sampler. Do them in punch work with the slenderest of stilettes and the finest of thread, and you will be as proud of them as she was.

Crochet edges the Pennsylvania linen centerpiece above; the tea napkin below, cross-stitch initialed, was once a towel.

a diamond pattern—and each towel, threads drawn first of course, was cut into six eleven-inch napkins. Now here comes the exception that proves the rule: I did not match the linen thread, but took instead a soft, silky cotton, and after drawing my thread an eighth of an inch down, crocheted in a picot edge as before. It had gone to my heart to pick out the old marking, W. S., 1826, in cross-stitching, "so fine, so fine it must have been done by little mice," but I comforted my conscience by working a script letter exactly in the same manner. And in marking this type of letter don't forget your characteristic period, composed of four tiny cross-stitches which form a quaint and interesting pointing-up square.

Now here I thought that my tale had been told. That is, I thought so until, just the other day, I found something so lovely that I must share it with you. This loveliness is the old Pennsylvania Dutch linens, the hand towels that these long-ago maidens worked with such careful stitchery, such simple charm.

I SEARCHED in my mind to find a word adequate to describe them to you, and at last I decided upon "wholesome." They remind me invariably of the sweet and smiling Pennsylvania country, where they were made; they are artless, naïve and full of a fine unself-conscious decorative instinct. I want to tell you about them so that you may copy them; that this old beauty may not be lost.

Half a sheet is made for this work. Old sheets, as I told you, were woven in strips thirty-four inches wide, and such a strip will cut into two other strips of seventeen inches, just the width of these towels. And nothing is more adapted to table runners than these gay cross-stitch designs, with inset knitted laces and fagoting and fringes brightly marked with color. Half a sheet, therefore—remember it's ninety inches long—will make crossed runners possible; a "square table" which, set with the charming new-old peasant ware that we are using so much to-day, is as pleasant as pleasant can be.

Of course cross-stitch is the real basis for all this work, and the range of colors is rather primitive—reds, blues, touches of bright rose and a good deal of soft pink, occasionally a vivid green, and, rarely, browns and yellows. I have tried to pick out characteristic patterns for you—peacocks, doves, Noah's Arkish trees; stars and hearts and crowns and formal vases holding spiky blossoms. Beware of fruit designs, no matter how alluring, for they do not belong to Pennsylvania.

Sometimes, for the finer work, silk was employed, but not often, and for the most part cottons were used. Occasionally, though, in the heavier patterns you will find stitches of wool. Many of the towels were worked all

(Continued on Page 118)

The fagoting stitch much used for decorative purposes on linen is illustrated at left.

Lucille knows better than anyone else how to work with taffeta. She chose Corticelli Taffeta in a lovely Old Blue to create this bouffant frock for Irene Castle.

Photo by Campbell

Designed by Irene Castle

Photo by Iva A. Hill

For morning or afternoon, indoors or out, the Summer through, you will be fashionably dressed in Corticelli Castle Crêpe—the new printed silk shown here. This is one of six Corticelli Castle Crêpe costumes Irene Castle is wearing this season.

For each style the most appropriate silk

THIS is a season when silken fabrics are demanded for every sort of wear. And variety in silks is necessary to carry out the demands of the designers.

For we have sharp contrasts—models that demand the soft clinging lines of the popular crêpes and others that must have the crisp billowy effect only taffeta can give.

Another season for crêpe?—yes! And the loveliest of all—Corticelli Castle Crêpe which Irene Castle has made her own. Today these new printed effects, in all the fashionable colors and at the most inviting prices, are being displayed and eagerly bought in the Fifth Avenue shops.

If your favorite store cannot show you Corticelli Castle Crêpe or other Corticelli Dress Silks, including Satin Patria, Satin Princess, Satin Crêpes, Crêpes de Chine, Taffetas, Poplins, please write us. Address The Corticelli Silk Company, 103 Nonotuck Street, Florence, Mass.

Free booklet of Irene Castle's new frocks with special pattern offer

Send for free copy of the new booklet which tells you how to obtain patterns of two of Irene Castle's favorite frocks made of Corticelli Castle Crêpe. This booklet also illustrates in actual colors five other dresses in Corticelli Castle Crêpe, Satin Princess and Service Taffeta.

Address The Corticelli Silk Company, 103 Nonotuck Street, Florence, Mass. No Canadian orders accepted.

THE CORTICELLI SILK COMPANY

Also makers of Corticelli Spool Silks, Ladies' Silk Hosiery, Yarns and Crochet Cottons.

Exquisitely Made of Soft
Lingerie Nainsook
Garment No. 131—$1.75 in

ROYAL SOCIETY
EMBROIDERY PACKAGE OUTFITS

HAND EMBROIDERY has an alluring charm and refinement that always enhances feminine daintiness. It gives opportunity for individuality in a woman's clothes, home and everything about her. And it is interesting to know that ROYAL SOCIETY EMBROIDERY PACKAGE OUTFITS provide an inexpensive and convenient way to have fashionable Hand Embroidered articles of the Highest Quality.

These packages contain completed articles in wide variety, stamped with artistic, original designs, together with the necessary floss for embroidering.

Exquisite Lingerie (note the beauty yet low price of Combination illustrated), up-to-the-minute styles in Children's Dresses, Baby Layettes, handsome Table Runners, Lounging Cushions, new ideas in embroidered Novelties, etc.

ASK YOUR DEALER FOR INFORMATION AND ILLUSTRATED CIRCULAR OR WRITE TO US

THE NEW CROCHET BOOK

No. 19—Price 15c in U. S. 20c elsewhere

SEND FOR COPY, JUST OFF THE PRESS

Chic new styles in silk Sweaters, Smart Hand Bags, Dainty Crocheted Yokes, Centerpieces, Pillows, Scarfs, New Edges, etc.—all beautifully illustrated with complete directions.

H. E. VERRAN CO., Inc.

Union Square West

New York

Eat Your Cake and Have it Too

(Continued from Page 117)

over, and this I would not advise for table runners. In the first place, it would mean a life work; in the second, the color designs at the ends and possibly a central motif are all that is necessary for charm and suitability. Can you imagine a more engaging design for your dining room than the towel with the fringed ends and the "fence pattern" of cross-stitch shown in the photograph on page 114? Yet it is quite simple; the central vase design is done in double cross-stitch in red and blue, while the formalized motifs in the corner are in the same colors. The fringes are cross-stitched in blue and red, and the fence pattern is alternate red and blue crosses. Sometimes the fringes are hemmed in red or blue; sometimes this fringed end is joined to the body of the towel by a row of fagoting. Or perhaps there is an inserted strip of knitted linen lace or a hemstitched band or five rows of fringe, all hemmed with color and separated by single cross-stitching. You can hardly go wrong if you will remember the colors, and that the Pennsylvania Dutch never worked in a naturalistic method. Instead, they interpreted the dailiness of life around them in angles.

YOU have noticed of course how many of the towels show the drawn work at the bottom. This was a legacy from the seventeenth century; earlier, indeed, if we think of Catharine of Aragon having introduced it into England. It is, you see, an elaboration of the drawn work, but, since art is long and time certainly fleeting, I am urging a shorter stint for your needle: Real net can be bought in strips and inserted as you wish, and the pattern darned in with a heavy mercerized India floss. If the upper motif is repeated in the panel the effect will be both charming and harmonious; observe, please, how delightfully it is carried out in the towels done by Elisabeth Rauch and Anna Fogg, which have been photographed.

Looking over this old work you will be surprised to find what a variety the simple cross-stitch can give: double, with single, thick threads and thin threads. Indeed, I found a variant of the stitch which was quite new to me, and, maybe, may prove so to you. Threads are drawn about a quarter of an inch apart, and into these lines the stitches are taken, tallish and rather straight up and down; then, as you come down for your second stitch, you must slip your needle under the thread. The result is unusually pretty and different. Another engaging effect is practically an Irish stitch. Again the threads are drawn, this time as if for hemstitching, sometimes an eighth, sometimes a quarter of an inch, and the colored strands of cotton are "darned" in, under two threads and over four, the second line covering the threads that the first has skipped.

This 1813 example worked in gold and brown has, as an insert, a rare Mennonite symbol in punto tirato (drawn work).

Ah, they are all so lovely, "needles in and out of cloth," fine stitches, gay hues and every colored dream that was sewed into them.

Can't you imagine these blond Mennonite lasses sitting and rocking and singing, perhaps, as they worked, verses of those stalwart old Lutheran hymns? And can't we, in these rushing twentieth-century days, stop to borrow a little of the artless beauty that they created?

The Leeds cup above suggests a charming pattern. Eighteenth Century Irish linen makes the cross-stitch tea napkin at the left.

The fine red and blue cross-stitch at the left was done in 1822 by a fourteen-year-old girl; the stars, birds and old German rime is signed "Mary Schills her X 1835."

La Fée de La Fontaine
(Adapted from an old French Fairy Tale)
To them did Nainette, her faithful dwarf, bring the secret word which broke the evil spell. And so La Fée de La Fontaine herself at last performed the marriage ceremony in the Emerald Palace of the Prince.

A. H. S. Co.
1921

Paris whispers the Magic of "la Toilette Harmonieuse"

DID you visit to-day, Mesdames Américaines, that winter capital of France, that fairy city of Nice, you would doubtless mingle on the Promenade des Anglais with the most beautiful of all the Parisiennes. Would you learn the innermost secret of their boudoirs—the priceless secret of charme français?

Écoutez, Madame, Mademoiselle! The beauty of Paris and of France speaks to you! To be truly Parisienne, to be, en réalité—of to-day's mode it is quite necessary that each article of your toilet table bear the same French fragrance.

Par exemple, the French fragrance of French Djer-Kiss breathing its charm in each exquisite spécialité de Djer-Kiss, the Face Powder, Talc, Rouge, Sachet, Toilet Water, Extract.

Even in the pure crèmes and soap—le savon so dainty, which keeps the skin fine textured and smooth—does fashion demand that Madame use the Parisian fragrance of Djer-Kiss. Thus more and more will you desire all the Spécialités de Djer-Kiss. Little by little or ensemble, you will buy them. Then in their daily use will you find la toilette harmonieuse—that final charm and elegance so approved by France.

Djer-Kiss Toilet Water:

So fragrant is it that you will say it must have been stolen from perfumed fairy fountains. Many uses there are for this enchanting Djer-Kiss toiletry. You will wish to employ its Maytime freshness and fragrance as an aid to the Parisian perfection of your dressing hour, will you not?

Special Sample Offer:

Send 25c and receive the dainty "Week-end Specialty Box" containing serviceable samples of Djer-Kiss extract, face powder, cold cream and vanishing cream with dainty satin sachet. Address Alfred H. Smith Co., 40 W. 34th Street, New York City.

EXTRACT • FACE POWDER • TALC • TOILET WATER • VÉGÉTALE • SACHET • SOAP • ROUGE • COLD CREAM • VANISHING CREAM

These spécialités, Rouge, Soap, Compacts and Creams, temporarily blended here with pure Djer-Kiss concentré imported from France

Djer-Kiss
Made in France
PRONOUNCED "DEAR-KISS"

Fitting Corsets to the New Idea

Science Has Banished the Rigors of Ancient Stays

PROCRUSTES is dead. The bad man of mythology is no more. His cruel bed to the size of which he accommodated his victims by stretching the short and telescoping the tall—Procrustes and his bed have gone down the dumbwaiter of modern corsetry.

The necessity of even the irksome old-fashioned corset to support and give shape to the figure has been recognized by centuries of womanhood. But now comes the P. N. Practical Front Corset to sustain the figure without paining it—to rejuvenate and perpetuate the graceful shape and to erase the marks of age, occupation or faulty posture.

More Than Custom-Made

The P. N. Practical Front Corset renders a priceless service. Easily, gracefully, comfortably and naturally it moulds the stylish contour. Not only has it the fashionable custom look when bought, but it retains its distinctive and individual lines throughout the life of the corset.

For it makes possible a new and fresh refitting every time you put it on! The steels of ordinary front-lace corsets are not at the center but a little to one side, causing an unbalanced effect. The most powerful factor in the desirability

The inexpressible comfort of the pliable elastic vest of the P. N. Practical Front Corset is the vest of pliable elastic which clasps so surely and vertically at the center of the body, without a possibility of shifting to left or right. An inexpressible comfort!

A Delight in Lacing

Over the elastic vest of the P. N. Practical Front Corset the outer flaps lace with utmost ease—not through elusive eyelets but over flat hooks—shoewise. Through its obliging construction it lends simplicity and handiness to that indispensable elixir in the life of a corset—that powerful influence in permanent retention of the corset's shapeliness—the daily lacing. The lacing relieves the vest of strain and conforms the corset exactly to the lines of the figure. It is in effect a fresh fitting—a re-born corset—every time you do it.

An unforgettable adventure in permanently perfect corseting

Procrustes, the Bad Man of Mythology, is no more

A Style for Each

There is a model of P. N. Practical Front Corset for every requirement and to suit your every preference of fashion or utility. Whatever the contour you select you will find in your chosen model the basic and exclusive features which have brought P. N. Practical Front to the premier place in the corset world. You will find it an unforgettable adventure in permanently perfect corseting.

The prices of the P. N. Practical Front Corset are moderately placed at five dollars and upwards to twelve. At most good stores or departments where corsets are sold you may select your appropriate model, or

Upon request the makers will mail you a Descriptive Style Book

P. N. Practical Front
Pat. U. S. A. and Foreign Countries
BOSTON, CHICAGO AND NEW HAVEN
CORSETS
I. NEWMAN & SONS
222 FOURTH AVENUE
NEW YORK

Manufactured exclusively in Canada by DOMINION CORSET CO., Quebec, P. Q., Canada; in England by WILLIAM PERRY & SONS, LTD., Ipswich, England

Layette Features that a Baby Likes to Have

PHOTO BY MARGARET HUGHES PEATTIE

Above the yoke is joined to the dress with fine entre-deux, always a dainty touch.

A very practical as well as attractive feature of the dainty little dress on the right is the wide square yoke, which is cut in one piece so as to avoid a seam across the top of the shoulders. The lovely eyelet embroidery and the effective use of baby Irish crochet make this quite worthy of being baby's first short dress. Pattern comes in sizes $\frac{1}{2}$, 1, 2 and 3 years.

For all his hunting, Daddy could never have found anything so pretty and so cozy for the much-discussed wrapping of Baby Bunting as a tiny robe of white cashmere lined with pale pink China silk, with all its edges blanket stitched in the same color, feather stitched seams and embroidered roses on sleeves and skirt. The pattern for this comes in one size only.

3512

The little flannel band at the right boasts as decoration a single embroidered pink rose and as a practical feature tiny buttons to close it on each shoulder. Like everything else on this page, with the exception of dress No. 3744 and the one in the photograph at the upper left, it is included in pattern No. 3512.

3144

Transfer 14967

3512

Baby's great-grandmother might well have worn the high-waisted little dress at the left above. It is of fine nainsook trimmed with feather stitching, tatting and entre-deux where the sleeves join the yoke. Heavy linen threads are pulled through to plaid the other equally cunning dress. One pattern, in one size only, includes the three-piece set.

3512

Such great French houses as Worth, Lanvin and Madeleine et Madeleine design fascinating layettes in moments of relaxation, from one of which comes a dainty bib of delicate embroidery and Val lace. For this a pattern in one size only is included in the set. The cunning Gertrude petticoat of white long-cloth with edging of Armenian crochet and the nainsook nightgown trimmed with embroidery and tatting are included in one pattern.

Not by Looks Alone

Your accustomed eye picks out the precise shade of yarn you want. Your sensitive touch tells you when yarn is soft, even, and alive. But you can always confirm your own judgment by asking for Minerva Yarns by name.

Minerva Yarns are beautiful and lustrous. From the 237 lovely shades you can choose the color that is most becoming.

Sweater, scarf, dress, or hat holds its shape, looks well, and lasts long because of the high quality of virgin wool used in

MINERVA YARNS

The sweater pictured here with instructions for making is in the new Minerva Knitting Book, Vol. VII. Scarfs, hats, dresses, and children's sweaters are also shown. For sale at yarn counters, 15 cents. Sent by mail for 20 cents, postpaid.

Sample Offer Wool Flowers

Fifteen pieces of Minerva Yarns of different colors, with instructions for making the wool flowers now so fashionable, will be sent for ten cents (stamps or coin). Fill out this coupon.

JAMES LEES & SONS CO. (B-1)
220 Fifth Ave., New York, N. Y.
Gentlemen: I am enclosing ten cents, for which please send me Minerva Yarns and instructions for making flowers.

Name _____
Street _____
City _____ State _____

EATON'S HIGHLAND LINEN

The Correct Writing Paper

"I have written a letter of recommendation for you, Céleste."
 "Thank you, madam. If the letter speaks as well of me as the letter paper does of you, I shall secure a position most easily."

EATON'S HIGHLAND LINEN speaks well of everybody who uses it. It reflects good taste in no uncertain terms. In texture, colors, sizes and envelope shapes it conforms to the standard set by social usage.

You can get Eaton's Highland Linen wherever good stationery is sold and at a price so moderate as to warrant its use for all correspondence.

Miss Caroline De Lancey, an acknowledged authority on social correspondence, has just completed a book which answers every question relating to correct forms for letters, invitations, visiting cards, etc. The book covers the whole subject and should be on the writing desk of every woman. Mailed post paid, with samples of Eaton's Highland Linen, for 50 cents.

This new and authoritative book with usable samples of Eaton's Highland Linen sent for 50 cents.

back to 50¢ a box
 Everywhere

EATON, CRANE & PIKE COMPANY New York-Pittsfield Mass.

Sponsors for correctness in Correspondence

A Quickly Made Bedroom Set

By LAURA L. WILLIS

MORE than one busy housewife has found herself admiring a bit enviously the dainty summer bedrooms of her more leisured friends and wishing that she, too, had time and energy to make lovely things of embroidery and appliqué. Just such a woman must have first conceived the idea of embroidering dotted Swiss and applying bands of it on plain sheer muslin or dimity to make the daintiest and most usable of bedspreads, curtains and dresser scarfs imaginable. Since each dot, embellished with a cluster of French knots, forms the center for a flower, the petals of which are worked in the simplest of all embroidery stitches—the lazy daisy—there is no need of pattern or transfer design, no counting of stitches or measuring of distances. And not only may such a bedroom set be made with an incredibly small demand upon one's time and eyesight, but the strain upon the pocketbook is also a light one, for the materials are inexpensive.

Four inches is a good width for the bands of dotted Swiss, whether they are used on bedspread or scarf. To be most effective, the material chosen should have dots of such size and so spaced that just three rows of them will fall within this four-inch space. If the dots are too small or too close together the embroidery does not show to its best advantage. Hemstitching is the most satisfactory method of applying the bands. This may be done in white or to match the petals of the flowers, and it will cost little to have it done by machine if one does not care to do it by hand.

The possible color combinations in a bedroom set of this sort are legion. The young daughter of the family will love a set of white, with yellow-centered flowers and the petals worked in two shades of soft pink, first a group of the deeper shade, then one of the lighter, but with so little difference between the two that one must look twice to be sure of it.

For the guest room, soft yellow muslin with bands of white-dotted Swiss would be delightful. Plain blue material may have a border of white-dotted Swiss which has blossomed forth with yellow-centered blue cornflowers; or, if one wishes to take the trouble, it would be most attractive to dye the dotted Swiss blue before doing the embroidery. In this case particular care should be taken to cover completely the dots with the yellow French knots which form the flower centers.

The sketch above gives an idea of the way in which the bands of dotted Swiss should be applied. The bedspread, one corner of which is shown in detail below, is one hundred twelve and a half inches long by ninety-nine inches wide and has a ruffled valance fourteen inches long. The outer border of dotted Swiss is placed just inside the valance, as close as possible to the three-quarter-inch hem; eleven inches in from this border is a second band of the Swiss. The flowers when completed measure one and three-eighths inches across.

Belding's

Makers of Fine Silks
for Gowns, Linings, Lingerie

For Linings Chosen for beauty and certainty of long wear

NEW and unusual designs for small gifts, scarves, sports hats, sweaters, bags, etc., including a full color page of cross-stitch designs—all in

Belding's Book of

Silk Embroidery, Knitting and Crochet

Fifteen Cents, at your dealer's or from Belding Bros. & Co., 902 Broadway, N.Y. Use Belding's New Process Embroidery Silks—made of pure silk—for articles which must withstand long wear or frequent launderings and Belding's Crochet Silks to give the utmost durability to crocheted articles. Belding's Syltex—a fast dye artificial silk—is especially adapted to dress embroidery.

ELGIN TAILORED BLOUSE

BARNARD—The pleated edge which trims collar and opening panel is an interesting feature. The port silk bow and link cuff are mannish and smart. Sizes 36, 44—White only.

103 S.—Super Sport Satin . . . $9.50
103 C.—Extra Heavy Crêpe de Chine $9.50
103 H.—10 Misme Lustrous Habotai $5.75

RYN MAWR—A trim, purposeful-looking blouse. The collar is convertible and the shoulder line exceptionally good. Small silk bow attached. Sizes 36, 44—White only.

100 S.—Super Sport Satin . . . $9.75
150 —Extra Heavy All Silk Broadcloth . . . 8.50
100 H.—10 Misme Lustrous Habotai . . . 5.75

SILKS of a quality that have never been put into blouses before.

Models that are the result of long study and experimentation by our style experts.

Stylish ahead of the times, yet so fashioned that they remain always in vogue.

Workmanship that only the most skilled artisans can produce.

Elgin Tailored Blouses should be in every woman's wardrobe—suitable for all occasions, including sports wear.

ELGIN

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

Look for this label on tailored blouses.

If your dealer can't supply you, send his name with cash or money order directly to us, and we will fill your order. Style book sent on request.

ELGIN WAIST COMPANY
Eighth & Locust Sts., Philadelphia, Pa.

LAKE FOREST—A charmingly youthful blouse with pointed Peter Pan collar and pin-tucked Tuxedo front. Link Cuffs—small silk bow tie. Sizes 36, 44—White only.

153 S.—Extra Heavy All Silk Broadcloth . . . $9.25
153 H.—Super Radium (Willow) . . . 9.25
153 H.—10 Misme Lustrous Habotai . . . 5.75

ELGIN TAILORED BLOUSE

How Thin Folks May Become Plump

(Continued from Page 24)

The window should be wide open, or two windows, if there are two, should be open. The common way of facing the bed with its head against the wall or in the corner of the room is pernicious. The bed should be made up so that the head of the sleeper is at the foot of the bed, so that his face is in the middle of the room where he can get a free supply of air and not be crowded into the corner, away from the circulation of life-giving oxygen. It is utterly impossible to be well nourished, rugged, red-tipped and rosy-cheeked without an ample supply of oxygen.

A great many persons who are thin and scrawny lack proper elimination. They share this disability with those who are overweight. There is something about the toxins of fermentation and the waste material of the body that makes for disturbance in metabolism. By metabolism we mean the natural balance between intake of food and the outgo of waste. If metabolism is disturbed the patient puts on an excess of fat or loses weight, becoming emaciated. Therefore it is important to be sure that the kidneys are eliminating properly and that one is not suffering from constipation. Likewise, a good many thin people suffer from chronic diarrhea. Needless to say, this trouble is a drain upon the system, and means that the food is undigested and is not furnishing proper nourishment. The causes for the diarrhea must be determined and removed before one can hope to be normal in weight.

We hear much these days about "focal infection." Abscesses of the teeth, diseased tonsils, disease of the nasal accessory cavities, absorption of pus from the skin disease known as acne—all these are types of so-called focal infection. Thinness of the body may result from poisoning of this sort. Therefore, in order to obtain a sure diagnosis to eliminate these possible causes through disease, it is well to visit your dentist as well as your doctor, and the medical examination is not complete until the throat and nose have been examined.

Worry More Deadly Than Disease

LOSS of sleep is a great factor in the production of thinness. The most common cause for sleeplessness is constipation. Next to this comes poor ventilation of the bedroom, of which we have already spoken. Over-fatigue, eating late at night, staying too long in an atmosphere laden with tobacco smoke are among the causes of sleeplessness. The social demands of an active "season" are so exhausting to young women, debutantes and others who rush pell-mell into the social swing that they are apt to suffer from insomnia and consequently from scrawnyness.

A tremendous amount of nerve energy, vitality and flesh is lost by excessive nervousness on the part of the individual. This nervousness is shown by the individual fidgeting, in constant motion, fussing with something with his hands, moving his body, and the common expression of it in a woman is where she constantly fusses with her hair.

Worry has killed more people than any disease in the books of the medical profession. Fear is more deadly than bullets. Worry will dissolve flesh quicker than any chemical solvent.

We do not think much of men who fail to have a little bank account, a reserve in case of need. You are just as improvident if you fail to have upon your body flesh enough to give you a reserve in case of illness. Somehow or other, a body plump, well nourished, supplied with a sufficient amount of fat, will resist disease when a thin, meager body will succumb. This is particularly true of diseases of the lungs. It is very important to the young married woman approaching maternity to be supplied with sufficient bodily development to give her a reserve for the experience she is to have. The well-developed and plump mother is better equipped to supply her child with its normal nourishment. Many a thin, scrawny mother lacks the normal breast food for her infant.

Let us consider the diet to overcome thinness. We have in general three kinds of foods: Fats, carbohydrates—including sugar and starches—and proteins. Proteins supply the muscles and framework of the body. Fats and carbohydrates supply the fat, the element lacking in thin persons. It would be a hasty deduction to rule out the proteins and to have a diet that would be exclusively composed of fats and carbohydrates. The protein food is most important. It must be taken in liberal quantities in order to maintain the body. Without it the heart, lungs and other vital organs would soon be without repair material, and the body would deteriorate exactly as a house would that never had repairs to it. The mere ingestion of fats, instead of effecting the desired result, would tend to clog and poison the system; indigestion would follow and ill health result from such a dietary.

Along with the right choice of foods to overcome thinness there are certain rules to be followed. In the first place you must take in a lot of fluid. We tell fat people not to take water at meals, but advise them to take all they want between meals. The reason why water should not be taken at mealtime by fat persons is because it washes down their food and causes them to eat more than they really should. Most thin persons do not eat enough, and anything that will aid them to increase the amount of food is desirable. Therefore I would say take at mealtime all the water you want, and if you don't want water take it anyhow. It is essential to the purpose you have in mind.

In the sanatoriums for the tuberculous great attention is given to the diet. I remark this not because the thin person must have tuberculosis by any means, but because the main effort of the sanatoriums is to combat thinness and to restore the patient to normal weight. The dietary given for this purpose consists largely of milk and eggs. The reason these articles are given is because they contain all the essential protein and other food elements and, in addition, are rich in fats. The yolk of the egg is largely fat. The cream of the milk is fat. The more cream you take without discomfort or impairment of digestion, the more fat you will put on your body.

Milk and More Milk

A THIN person really making an effort to add weight should take as much as two or three quarts of milk a day. Indeed, some medical authorities recommend taking as much as four or five quarts a day. But no such amount of fluid should be added to the diet without making sure that the heart and kidneys are in good condition, and this extreme course should in most cases be under medical observation.

An eminent authority states that a diet to maintain good health should consist of milk, potatoes, cabbage and bread. You will see at once that the cream of the milk, the starch of the potatoes and bread contain the fat-giving elements, while the cabbage supplies roughage and certain of the vitamins.

In speaking of milk I refer to fresh whole milk with a high content of butterfat, as is found in Guernsey or Jersey milk. Not only should there be much intake of milk, but butter and whole-milk cheese, both rich in fat, should be added to the dietary.

In addition to the three regular meals, to each of which the thin person should go with a good appetite, there must be taken between meals a certain amount of nourishment. For this purpose milk, either fresh or a fermented product made of whole milk, should be taken. Let me emphasize that just milk of any sort is not sufficient. It must contain butterfat or the purpose of its ingestion is defeated. It is a food and therefore should not be hastily swallowed like so much water, but taken in sips or with moderate slowness.

Let us determine, then, to have between breakfast and the midday meal two glasses of milk, between the midday meal and the evening meal two glasses, and before bedtime another glass or two. Instead of tea or coffee use milk with meals.

With many persons milk produces constipation. Whether it does or not, bran should be added to the diet.

Nuts, all cereals and all kinds of bread are desirable. On general principles, whole-wheat flour is better than the refined flour used for making white bread. Every slice of bread should be thickly spread with butter. The sugar of candy has its value in adding weight, but candy ought not to be taken between meals by the thin person, because it will dull the appetite and interfere with the eating of a large meal, such as we must have in order to conquer thinness. Let the candy be taken following the meal; as much as the person desires may then be eaten without harm.

Menus for Thin People

I HAVE prepared the following menus as suggestive of the types that will put good, sound flesh upon thin persons:

BREAKFAST

Sliced orange or grapefruit with sugar, or stewed dried fruits.
Liberal portion of cereal with sugar and an abundance of cream. Sprinkle over this a tablespoonful of bran.
Two eggs and a strip or two of bacon, baked potato with butter.
Two glasses of milk. If coffee is taken, a generous amount of cream should be added.
Rolls with sirup, if desired.

LUNCH

Creamed soup.
Salad, with cream, oil or cheese dressing.
Several slices of well-buttered bread.
Two glasses of milk.
Pie, pudding with cream sauce or ice cream, known to contain the legitimate amount of butterfat.
Slice of cake if desired.

DINNER

Bean or pea soup.
Codfish with a thick sauce.
Roast beef, outside cut, with a little fat.
Brown potatoes with gravy.
Carrots, parsnips or vegetable oysters with cream sauce.
Several slices of well-buttered bread.
Two glasses of milk.
Chocolate or bread pudding with cream sauce, or ice cream.

BREAKFAST

Fruit.
Rice with cream and sugar, or corn meal with bran sprinkling.
Ham and eggs, and potatoes.
Two glasses of milk.
Buttered toast and honey.

LUNCH

Asparagus soup.
Mutton chops, potatoes au gratin.
Hearts of lettuce salad with oil dressing.
Two glasses of milk.
Lemon meringue pie.

DINNER

Creamed oyster soup.
Roast duck, turnips, plenty of stuffing, sweet potatoes.
Cranberry sauce.
Two glasses of milk.
Mince pie with whipped cream.
Boston brown bread.

BREAKFAST

Fruit and cereal as before.
Finnan haddie with potatoes.
Toast and marmalade.
Two glasses of milk.
Corn muffins.

LUNCH

Tomato soup.
Sweetbreads, stewed corn or succotash.
Coleslaw.
Two glasses of milk.
Prune whip.

DINNER

Italian vegetable soup.
Creamed fish.
Roast tenderloin of pork, spaghetti with cheese.
Cauliflower.
French ice cream and cake.
Two glasses of milk.
Hot biscuits.

Everything for Art Needlework

BEAR BRAND YARNS

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.
"Standard of Quality Since 1867"

Bear Brand

Yarns are supreme in quality

It is an arbitrary ruling of Fashion for Spring, 1922, that no wardrobe is considered correct unless it includes several hand knitted garments and novelties for outing and sport wear. They are no longer a temporary craze. They are a style necessity.

You should have Bear Brand Blue Book, Vol. 38, 15c (postpaid 17c), fresh from the press, which illustrates and shows how to easily make the very latest Navajo and Peter Pan sweaters, hats, blouses and scarfs, among them the new Navajo here shown.

The hundreds of beautiful colors in Bear Brand yarns give you a superb range of choice, and allow you to select those most becoming to you, including the lovely fuchsia, honeydew and fiery shades that are now so greatly in demand.

Packages offer the latest novelties

The new Spring Bucilla Package Outfits, now at your dealer's, are scoring a most sensational success.

Two reasons explain this. First, we have kept prices down in spite of rising markets. Second, the new line is richer than ever before in those absolutely new and fascinating ideas which you have learned to expect in Bucilla Packages.

New and exquisite buffet and luncheon sets, napkins, towels, aprons, scarfs and centerpieces, lingerie, children's and infants' wear come in Bucilla Packages, together with all materials to complete the embroidery. The illustration shows only one of the many exceptional values.

Write for free circular

No. 5786
13 Pc. Luncheon Set
$1.00 Complete

For Embroidery, Crochet and Knitting—use GLOSSILLA REG. U.S. PAT. OFF. "Brighter than Silk"

Bucilla Cottons of wonderful lustre and exquisite colorings

More than one hundred new and superbly blended shades in Rope, Hindu and Six Strand embroidery threads have recently been added to the well known and extensive line of Bucilla Cottons.

Bucilla Rope is the perfect floss for all colored embroidery on fine decorative pieces. (Bucilla Hindu is of the same texture, but in size adapted to finer work.) Bucilla Six Strand is used for Cross Stitch, French Knot, Loop stitch, etc., or is easily separated and one or more strands used for fine embroidery on delicate fabrics.

Send for free skeins of these beautiful cottons.

The full Bucilla line includes every suitable Cotton for Filet and Irish Crochet, Tatting, Lace Making, etc., in both guaranteed Wash-Fast and Boil-Proof colors. You will find "A Perfect Thread for Every Purpose."

Glossilla Rope—for all "Brighter-than-Silk" embroidery

Fine art, as applied to beautiful decorative pieces for the home, finds its highest expression when the designs are embroidered with lustrous, rich-toned Glossilla Rope. Its texture is indescribably beautiful, and there are more than 200 colors from which to choose.

In addition, with a few deft touches of Glossilla Rope embroidery, and at small cost, you can double the beauty and greatly increase the style of your dresses, hats, blouses and wraps. Equally charming color effects and richly silk-like textures for sweaters and modish sport garments can be secured by using the beautiful Glossilla "Brighter than Silk" Twist.

Send for free sample skein of Glossilla Rope.

BUCILLA REG. U.S. PAT. OFF. Needlework Products

Supreme for over half a century

Products of

BERNHARD ULMANN CO. 34 Mercer St. New York

If you cannot secure these products from your dealer—write to us.

"FAMOUS
FREEDOM SPOTS"

No. 1

Send 6c in stamps for this handsome etching of the Boston Massacre Monument on historic Boston Common. In sepia tints. Much larger than shown. Suitable for framing.

Woman's New Freedom

NO LONGER does fashion place artificialities above the incomparable feminine birthright of natural beauty. Paris, even, has quit powdering her nose. And with this broadening of thought, has come a fine new freedom of dress. It starts with one's FEET. Women now realize that it is neither womanly nor attractive to totter and limp through life.

"Type 3"
One-Strap Pump

"Type 2"
Women's Oxford

Children's
Oxford

GROUND GRIPPER WALKING SHOES

are the ORIGINAL "natural line" Health Shoes

THEY were first to take women's feet out of bondage;—a joyous release, bringing unrestricted comfort, supple buoyancy, renewed vigor, wonderful freedom from fatigue and "nerves"—a truer Womanhood.

These world-famous Shoes have sensible toes and heels and flexible arches like the arches of your own feet. They insure absolute perfection of fit, support and strengthen delicate bones and muscles, and keep a new warmth of good red blood—Woman's most efficacious beautifier—coursing through the body.

But their inimitable health features do not restrict you to a single type of shoe. "Ground Grippers" are now made in a number of handsome styles;—each fulfilling certain well defined physical requirements and results—all in harmony with the preferences of a world of well dressed women—yet, oh, so comfortable!

Two of these smart new models are illustrated here. With them is also shown a pair of "Ground Grippers" for Children—shoes that start little feet on the right road and keep them there!

GROUND GRIPPER SHOE COMPANY, INC., 140 Brookline St., East Lynn, Mass.
(Largest Exclusive Manufacturer of Health Shoes in the World.)

Exclusive Stores in Principal Cities. 2000 Agents Everywhere. If there isn't a "Ground Gripper" Shop in your locality, send us the name of your regular dealer. Refuse substitutes!

Never in your life have you known anything to compare with the complete HAPPINESS of "Ground Grippers." Write for our Style and Medical Booklets on Feet—FREE.

The Ghost Story

(Continued from Page 7)

GEORGE (leaping to his feet): I knew it! I knew they'd come piling in here just the instant I — (He turns upstage, clasping his brow.) Oh, my heavens! I knew it!

ANNA: Oh!

[The door into the hall is opened by the housemaid, and two girls of nineteen or twenty are revealed, divesting themselves of outer wraps. They at once come hurrying gayly down to ANNA, greeting her with a jumble of words and laughter, to which she contributes in like manner, as they exclaim: "We just thought we'd frolic over to see you, old thing," and "Nothing doing at our house, so we thought we'd see if you knew anything." ANNA responds simultaneously, "Just lovely of you! We were just hoping you'd take it into your heads to drop in. How nice of you!" and so forth. The newcomers greet GEORGE with "Hello, George." He responds pessimistically.

GEORGE: Howdy-do, Mary. Howdy-do, Grace.

ANNA: George just dropped in to say good-by.

MARY: Gracious! Hope we're not interfering.

GEORGE (feebly): Oh, no. Not at all!

ANNA (laughing): Why, of course not!

[The bell rings.

GEORGE: Oh, my goodness! Here's some more!

GRACE (reproachfully): College English, George? Don't they teach you to say "Here are more"?

GEORGE (with gloomy absent-mindedness): Yes, there certainly are! I knew it!

[The hall door opens to admit five more lively young people: a girl and four youths. The girl's name—it appears during the ensuing greetings—is LENNIE, and the young gentlemen are known to those present as TOM, FLOYD, LYNN and FRED. They chatter phrases and half sentences of greeting all together for a few moments, though GEORGE takes only a pessimistic and fragmentary part in these ceremonies; then LENNIE shouts louder than any of the others and obtains a hearing.

LENNIE: But what are we going to do? We aren't just going to sit around and talk, are we?

MARY: Let's all go somewhere.

SEVERAL OF THE OTHERS: Well, where? Where is there to go? Where do you want to go?

LENNIE: Well, most anywhere.

GEORGE: That's a sensible idea.

MARY: Where do you say to go, Anna?

ANNA: I? Oh, nowhere. I thought I wouldn't go out to-night.

GRACE: All right then; we'll stay here.

CHORUS: Well, why not? Might as well be here as anywhere. Yes, let's take it easy for one night. (And so forth.)

LENNIE: Well, what's the matter with our shaking the hoof a while? Turn on that phonograph, somebody. (She grasps the youth FLOYD.)

CHORUS: That's it! Come on then! We can dance here's well's anywhere! Tune her up, George!

[They prepare to dance; ANNA is seized upon, and in the pairing of the couples the gloomy GEORGE finds himself the odd person, excluded.

CHORUS: Start the instrument, George! George, you're the band! Why don't you tune up, George?

[GEORGE starts the phonograph, which stands in a corner of the room. The others dance, chattering. GEORGE goes to the fireplace and compares his watch with the clock on the mantel shelf. Then he produces a camper's pocketknife, opens out of it a small screw driver and returns to the phonograph with an air of determination. Glancing over his shoulder and assuring himself that the dancers are too busy to observe him, he busily sets to work upon the mechanism of the phonograph. Meanwhile the others begin to sing loudly and gayly the air played by the record, all oblivious of GEORGE's energetic destructiveness. The record falls; then it begins to make peculiar sounds.

CHORUS (not pausing in the dance): Why, gracious! What's the matter with the music? Is that instrument sick? Sounds like cholera morbus! (And so forth.)

FLOYD (shouting): Put on another record, George. What's the matter with the thing, anyhow?

GEORGE (moving hastily away from the phonograph): I don't know. Is something wrong?

CHORUS: Can't you fix it? Put on another record! Do something!

GEORGE: Well, I'll see. (He puts a hand under the lid of the phonograph; there is instantly a clatter, and the music stops. So do the dancers.)

CHORUS: What is the matter? Why don't you fix it? Why don't you —

GEORGE: Something seems to be the matter with it.

GRACE: Well, hurry and fix it.

GEORGE: I don't believe I —

LYNN (looking under the lid): Well, no; I don't believe you could! (He takes from under the lid the metal arm and detached sound box of the instrument.) Why, it would take Edison himself to put this phonograph together again—it's all fallen apart!

CHORUS: Goodness! Why, just look at it! Well, of all the disappointing — Oh, my, how silly of it! (And so forth.)

TOM: That's all the dancing you'll do to-night, ladies!

MARY: But you're men. Why don't some of you fix it?

LYNN (singing):

Humpty Dumpty sat on a wall,
Humpty Dumpty had a great fall —

GRACE: Oh, do hush. Why don't you fix it? FLOYD and LYNN (singing together):

All the king's horses and all the king's men
Couldn't put Humpty together again!

[They execute a few dog steps by way of conclusion.

MARY (sinking into a chair): How tiresome!

FLOYD and LYNN: Thanks, lady!

GRACE (sitting): Well, what are we going to do?

FRED: Let's play Button, Button! Who's Got the Button?

LENNIE (sitting): Do hush!

GEORGE (earnestly): Well, I can't think of any way you could amuse yourselves. Strikes me this would be a great night for everybody to go home and get some sleep.

TOM: I thought you had to start back to college to-night.

GEORGE: I do. I meant everybody else.

TOM: What's the matter with you, George? I mean with your mind.

GEORGE: Nothing. I only meant —

GRACE: Oh, do hush! Can't anybody think of something we could do?

GEORGE: No. Not a thing.

MARY: We could play charades.

GEORGE: Charades? They're terrible.

GRACE (with a shrug): Well, let's just sit around and talk then.

GEORGE: Oh, murder, no!

ANNA: Well, what do you want to do, George?

GEORGE (hastily): Well, I want to — (He checks himself.) I was just trying to think. It does seem a great night to go home and sleep.

FLOYD (finishing a consultation with FRED): Why, of course! We've got enough for two tables, with George left over. He has to go pretty soon, anyhow, so he needn't play.

GEORGE (uneasily): I needn't play what?

FLOYD (smilingly): Bridge. We've got just enough for two tables without you.

(Continued on Page 128)

Start the day right with Wamsutta Sheets

"Mother, don't you think my dolly is lucky to have a real Wamsutta sheet?"

Yes. But far luckier is every member of the thousands of families using Wamsutta Percale sheets and pillow-cases, for every one can enjoy what dolly cannot—their smooth "feel"; their gleaming white crispness; their soft, unwrinkled texture.

Because they stay dry and keep their freshness, Wamsutta Percale sheets make bed the most comfortable place on earth—in the winter, a cozy refuge from cold and damp; and in the summer, a cool retreat on the hottest nights.

Introduced as a war-time economy into many households where for years linen had been the standard of excellence, Wamsutta Percale sheets and pillow-cases have prevailed against custom and tradition, and are now considered superior to linen in comfort and appearance.

And they cost only about half as much as linen.

Several of the country's leading hotels have discontinued linen and are now using Wamsutta Percale sheets and pillow-cases.

Sold at all the best stores. Look for the green-and-gold Wamsutta Percale label. Made in all sizes; plain hemmed and hemstitched.

Wamsutta Mills make two other brands of sheets and pillow-cases: Strong Thread and New Bedford, costing less than the Percale, but each standard in its grade.

WAMSUTTA MILLS, New Bedford, Mass. Founded 1846
RIDLEY WATTS & CO., Selling Agents, 44 Leonard St., New York

Send for Doll's Sheet

Send 15 cents for doll's sheet, 16 x 20 inches (torn size), made up of Wamsutta Percale, fully hemmed, just right for doll's bed. Address Wamsutta Mills, New Bedford, Mass.

WAMSUTTA

Sheets and Pillow Cases

The finest of cottons

Wamsutta Mills make Lustersheer, the new material for dainty frocks. Also Lingerie Nainsooks, Batistes, etc.

Aunt Belle's BABY BOOK

Fastest Selling BABY BOOK ever printed

Thousands and thousands of babies are being brought up in accordance with its sensible, motherly and scientific advice.

It is a text book pure and simple. The wonderful, reassuring first chapter is on preparing for Baby; the second, on furnishing the nursery; and then chapter after chapter it counsels on each and every problem which might puzzle young mothers—food, clothing, the bath, habits, first aids.

It is bound in board covers, printed on fine paper and beautifully illustrated.

Because we want the friendship of every mother in the United States, we will gladly mail one copy to each for 25 cents, or 35 cents in Canada.

Aunt Belle advises that Mennen Borated Talcum should be used on babies, because she knows it is absolutely pure, mildly antiseptic and essential to Baby's health. She also lays stress on the wonderful virtue of Kora-Konia for prickly heat, chafing, baby rashes and all skin irritations. Nothing like it has ever been produced for the skin troubles of babies and adults.

So please fill out the coupon.

The Mennen Company
NEWARK, N. J. U.S.A.
The Mennen Company, Limited,
Montreal, Quebec

only 25¢
a copy

The Mennen Company,
Newark, N. J.

I enclose 25 cents (Canada, 35 cents) for Aunt Belle's Baby Book.

Name _____

Address _____

The Ghost Story

(Continued from Page 126)

CHORUS: That's it! Of course! Bridge! We'll play bridge till midnight. That's splendid! (And so forth.)

[As they chatter they begin to clear two tables for cards.]

GEORGE: No! For heaven's sake —

CHORUS: Anna, where are the cards? Get some counters and pencils. Who's going to be my partner? Who's going to be mine?

GEORGE (shouting): No! Stop it! My goodness! Don't you ever get tired of doing the same thing night after night? Just because you can't dance you don't have to play bridge, do you? Stop it!

[He is so vehement that he commands their attention; they pause in arrested attitudes.]

FLOYD: Well, what's your idea? What do you think we'll like better?

GEORGE (desperately): Well, let's—let's—let's—I'll tell you what let's do: let's tell ghost stories.

CHORUS (dismally): Oh, my! Why, how silly! Of all the foolish — (And so forth.)

[They turn to the tables again.]

GEORGE: Wait! I'll tell you a ghost story. I'll show you if it's silly or not! I'll tell you a ghost story that the first time it was told in college everybody got so nervous that—well, some of 'em couldn't stand it.

FRED: What did they do?

GEORGE: Well, they—they got so nervous they—they —

FLOYD (skeptically): Had to go right home to bed, did they?

GEORGE: Well, never mind. Let's see what you do.

MARY: I'd like to hear the ghost story that would make me nervous!

ANNA: Let's see if he can. Shall we all sit down, George?

GEORGE: Yes; all of you please sit down. (They take chairs, smiling to one another and whispering skeptically as he goes on.) And we don't want so much light; just this lamp'll do. I'll make it dimmer. (He ties his handkerchief about the bulb of a lamp on a table.) The way to feel a story like this is to think about it almost in the dark. (He shuts off the other lights at a switch upon the wall, leaving only the vague illumination of the dimmed lamp on the table.)

CHORUS (incredulous, satirical and giggling): Goodness, ain't it creepy! Why, George, how can you be so dramatic? How turrabill! Oh, Georgie, Georgie! (And so forth.)

GEORGE (assuming a husky voice): Listen, I tell you. (He stands by the dimmed lamp so that his face is vaguely seen above the triangular patch of light made by the lamp shade.)

FLOYD: Well, go on. We're listening.

GEORGE (impressively husky): This is a true story. It happened in a house a little way out in the country from Wilmington, Delaware.

A SATIRIC VOICE: Wilmington, Delaware? My goodness, how fearful! Delaware!

ANOTHER VOICE: Give the poor thing a chance.

GEORGE: It was just fourteen years ago this winter, and the facts are known by pretty near everybody in Wilmington. If you ask almost anybody from Wilmington about it he'll tell you it's so. Well, this house was an old frame house; it was long and—and —

A VOICE: Rambling. Long and rambling, George.

GEORGE: Yes, it is; it's long and rambling. That is, it was; because after what I'm going to tell you happened to it, why, it had to be torn down. Of course after that nobody would live in it. But fourteen years ago an old man lived there; he lived there all alone. After dark nobody ever saw a light in that house, and—nobody knew anything about the old man except that he used to kill any cat that happened to come in his yard. The neighbors watched one night, and they heard a cat meowing under a bush, and they saw the dim figure of this old man creeping and creeping toward the bush. Then they heard the cat give a kind of terrible scream, and they saw the old man capering around and wringing this cat's neck—just like a chicken's neck! Now, this old man —

A GIRL'S VOICE (impressed): It is fairly creepy.

A YOUNG MAN'S VOICE (also rather impressed): Well, go on, George.

GEORGE: This old man never went out in the daytime. No one ever saw just what he looked like, except that he had long, scraggly white hair, and his complexion was a horrible kind of fishy-white color.

But night after night the neighbors would see him prowling among the bushes and underbrush in the big weedy yard—and then they'd hear something give a kind of strangling scream, and he'd be wringing something's neck like a chicken, in the dark.

And they kept wondering and wondering, and so one night—one night when everybody was asleep and the wind was moaning and the sky was covered with a thunder cloud —

[At this point, while GEORGE talks, the curtain descends for a moment to indicate the lapse of about half an hour, during which GEORGE is telling the greater part of his story. Upon the curtain's rising again he is discovered to be continuing, speaking more dramatically as he warms toward his climax.]

GEORGE: The rapping on the wall was always the same. Three times. Just like this. (He raps upon the table.) Three times. Like this. Always just three times. Like this.

A GIRL'S VOICE (nervously): See here! I'm beginning not to like this a little bit!

GEORGE: Listen, will you? Can't you listen?

A YOUTH'S VOICE: We are listening!

A GIRL'S VOICE (at the same time): Go on; we're listening.

ANOTHER VOICE: What's the matter with you?

TWO OTHER VOICES: Why don't you go ahead?

GEORGE: Then listen! On the thirteenth of March, exactly thirteen years after the night the old man was killed, some workmen were making repairs to the plumbing in that rickety old house where he died. Now, these workmen —

A GIRL'S VOICE (interrupting nervously): George, did you say these workmen were plumbers?

GEORGE (rather crossly): Yes, they were.

A YOUTH'S VOICE: Why, they had to be plumbers, didn't they? He said they were doing something to the plumbing. How could they help being plumbers if they were there on account of the plumbing?

ANOTHER VOICE (impatiently): Well, who said they weren't? Go ahead.

GEORGE (rather annoyed): It was an old plumber and a young plumber.

ANOTHER VOICE: Just two of 'em?

GEORGE: Listen! These two plumbers were in the old house all alone—all alone in that empty old house where the murder —

A GIRL'S VOICE (again interrupting nervously): But if there were two of 'em how could either of 'em have been all alone? I don't —

GEORGE (impatiently): Listen, will you? These two men were working at the bathtub where the old man's body—I mean his remains—where his remains had been found thirteen years before, on the thirteenth of March, the same night of the month that they were working there now. The only light these two plumbers had was the light of a lantern, and all the rest of the big old house was pitch dark. Then all at once these two plumbers heard something they thought

(Continued on Page 129)

Many men came and went in her life

SHE fascinated each one only for a little while. Nothing ever came of it.

Yet she was attractive—unusually so. She had beguiling ways. Beautiful hair, radiant skin, exquisite teeth and an intriguing smile. Still there was something about her that made men show only a transient interest.

She was often a bridesmaid but never a bride.

And the pathetic tragedy of it all was that she herself was utterly ignorant as to why. Those of her friends who did know the reason didn't have the heart to tell her.

People don't like to talk about halitosis (unpleasant breath). It isn't a pretty subject. Yet why in the world should this topic be taboo even among intimate friends when it may mean so much to the individual to know the facts and then correct the trouble?

Most forms of halitosis are only temporary. Unless halitosis is due to some deep-seated cause (which a physician should treat), the liquid antiseptic, Listerine, used regularly as a mouth wash and gargle, will quickly correct it. The well-known antiseptic properties of this effective deodorant arrest fermentation in the mouth and leave the breath clean, fresh and sweet. It is an ideal combatant of halitosis.

So why have the uncomfortable feeling of being uncertain about whether your breath is just right when the precaution is so simple and near at hand?

If you are not familiar with Listerine and its many uses, just send us your name and address and fifteen cents and we shall be glad to forward you a generous sample of Listerine together with a tube of Listerine Tooth Paste sufficient for 10 days' brushing.

Address Lambert Pharmacal Company, 2182 Locust Street, Saint Louis, Missouri.

For HALITOSIS use
LISTERINE

For SIXTY-FIVE YEARS
the
SUPREME SEASONING

Spices

Black Pepper

White Pepper

Red Pepper

Pastry Spice

Ketchup Spice

Pickling Spices

Poultry Seasoning

Nutmegs

Allspice

Cinnamon

Paprika

Ginger

Cloves

Mace

The knack of proper seasoning distinguishes the expert cook from the novice. Famous chefs and experienced housewives know that pepper is not the only staple spice, but that rich and delicate flavors are best produced by the skillful use of a complete assortment of good spices. They know the art of making oft-repeated dishes new and fresh at negligible cost.

For sixty-five years, The A. Colburn Company has been importing the finest quality spices, milling them scientifically to retain all the natural strength and flavor.

These fine spices are packed in the famous Colburn red canisters, with handy sifting and pouring tops—a patented feature which preserves the flavor, prevents waste, and saves time.

Mustard

Because of new milling facilities, Colburn's Mustard is today finer than ever. No mustard in the world surpasses Colburn's in quality.

Extracts-Condiments

The same fine Colburn quality.

Vanilla Extract

Tapioca

Lemon Extract

Celery Salt

Curry Powder

Table Sauce

The A. Colburn Co., Philadelphia

Colburn's

Spices-Mustard

Extracts-Condiments

The Ghost Story

(Continued from Page 128)

was a drop of water—just one drop of water that seemed to drip from somewhere. But it had a queer sort of sound, and they didn't like it. "What was that?" the younger one asked the older one. "It sounded like a drop of water falling—from somewhere. I guess it was water," he said. Well, the older one looked around, but he couldn't see anything. "I guess it's probably only a leak in the roof, maybe, and a drop of rain came through." "Well, but how could that be?" the other one said. "There hasn't been any rain for a month." Then, just as they were talking, they heard another drop fall, and they didn't see where it lit. Then another drop fell, and it made a kind of little sizzling sound. "What makes it sound like that?" the younger one wanted to know; but the older one said he couldn't think what did. Then there was another drop—and another—and another—and all at once the old workman said, "Look, here! What makes our light so red?" Well, the young one jumped right up. "By George! I was just noticing that!" he said. "Our light has been getting red!" And so, just that second another drop fell, and made the sort of sizzling sound they'd noticed—and both of 'em jumped round and looked at the lantern, because the sound came from there. "My goodness!" the younger one said. "Look at that lantern chimney!" The drops were falling on the hot lantern chimney; that's what made the sizzling sound. And what made the light red was the color of the drops that were falling on it. The lantern chimney was all red with what had been falling on it!

A GIRL'S VOICE (protesting nervously): Say!

A YOUTH'S VOICE: Hush up! Go on with the story.

ANOTHER GIRL'S VOICE: This is just awful. I wish you'd turn up the light.

ANOTHER YOUTH'S VOICE: Go on, George.

GEORGE: Then, just as another drop fell on the lamp chimney, the two plumbers heard a louder sound, and it made the flesh creep on their spines, because it sounded like a long, strangling kind of a wail, and it seemed to come right from the floor—the very floor they were standing on; it came from right under their feet —

ANNA'S VOICE (protesting): I can't stand this! Honestly, I can't!

A YOUTH'S VOICE: Don't be so silly, Anna. You know it's only a story.

ANNA: I don't care! It's too awful. I wish George'd stop!

GEORGE: Listen! "What on earth is that?" one of the plumbers said. "I never heard any such sound as that from a human voice!"

ANNA (pleading nervously): Please stop, George.

GEORGE: And then the red drops on the lantern chimney trickled so fast they got to be almost a little stream, so the red light got dimmer and dimmer, and then, right underneath them, down in the floor, they heard that long, strangling kind of a wail again. "Oo-oo-oo-ow!" it said. "Oo-oo-oo-ow-ow-ow —"

ANNA (uttering a kind of a wail herself, in her extreme nervousness, so that the two sounds mingle): Oh-oo-oo-oo —

ANOTHER GIRL'S VOICE: My goodness! What is that?

A YOUTH'S VOICE (alarmed): See here! Who's doing that?

GEORGE: This wailing went on: "Oo-oo-oo-oo —"

ANNA (screaming not loudly, but with convincing sincerity): Oh! Oh! Oh! Oh! (She continues.)

ANOTHER GIRL'S VOICE (excitedly): What is all this?

A YOUTH'S VOICE: See here! Who is doing that?

[OTHERS exclaim, "My goodness!" "What's the trouble here?" and "Let's cut this out!" There are sounds of confusion, chairs are overturned, ANNA continues to vociferate, "Oh! Oh! Oh! Oh!"

GEORGE (determined to reach his climax, and making himself heard in spite of everything): "I'll find out who's doing this wailing," the old plumber said. "It sounds to me like a cat!" And he took his ax and struck right into the floor. That brought the most awful scream —

[It brings subdued screams also from ANNA and LENNIE. Everyone talks at once.

FLOYD (commandingly): Stop, it, George! Turn up that light! Anna's got hysterics!

GEORGE (shouting): I got to finish my story, haven't I?

ANOTHER VOICE: Turn up some lights, will you?

[A key button is pressed and the stage is alight, revealing a confused group, with the girls gathered anxiously about ANNA. She is in a chair near the center and continues to be rather vociferously agitated.

ANNA: Oh! Oh! Oh! Oh! (She goes on.)

GRACE: Where's some ammonia! Who's got any ammonia?

FRED (rushing in from another room with a glass of water): Here! Dab this on her face!

LENNIE: Rub her hands! Rub her, Floyd!

[They dab water upon her face with handkerchiefs, while FLOYD and LYNN obediently rub her hands.

ANNA (protesting, but continuing to be hysterical): Don't! Don't splatter me! How could he do it with an ax, George? What do you mean, an ax?

GEORGE: I said —

ANNA (wildly): You said the plumber hit the floor with an ax! Where would a plumber get an ax? Plumbers don't have axes!

GEORGE: Well, this one did!

ANNA: Then he couldn't have been a plumber! (MARY presses a wet handkerchief upon her lips; ANNA struggles): Stop it, Mary! Don't put that handkerchief in my mouth!

MARY: Yes, dear; it'll do you good.

ANNA: It won't! Let go my hands!

GRACE: No. Keep on rubbing 'em!

[They do.

ANNA: I never saw a plumber with an ax. Oh! Oh! Oh!

LENNIE (sternly): Hush! Hush! You must hush!

ANNA: Oh! Oh! Oh!

MARY: We'd better call her mother.

ANNA (sharply): Don't you dare!

GRACE: Well, what are we going to do about her?

ANNA: I'll be all right. Just let me alone. Oh! Oh! Oh!

GEORGE: That's it. We ought to let her alone. We ought to go home and give her a chance to quiet down. She never will if we all stay here and keep her excited like this.

LENNIE: Well, some of us ought to stay. The rest of you go, and I'll stay with her.

GEORGE: No. You go with the rest, and I'll stay till she gets quiet.

LENNIE: You? Why, you're the one that gave her hysterics!

GEORGE (earnestly): Then I ought to be the one to cure her.

ANNA: I'm — Oh! Oh! I'll be all right if you'll just leave me to myself.

MARY (nervously): Let's do go! This room gives me the creeps after —

CHORUS: Let's go! Anna wants us to. We'd better let her alone a while. She says so herself. Come on!

GEORGE: I'll stay and —

LENNIE and MARY and GRACE: No, you won't!

GEORGE: But I —

LENNIE: Why, the very sight of your face'd make her worse! You march out of here!

CHORUS (moving toward the hall door and carrying GEORGE with them): You'll be all

(Continued on Page 131)

Prospectus
FREE
To every HOME BUILDER
who mails the coupon

There is no added cost for "Morgan-Quality"

Building a home, whether the first or not, is always a serious problem. A lot of your money and years of comfort and happiness rest upon your judgment. Once the last nail and board and brick are in place the die is cast. You cannot discard it like an old piece of furniture. You cannot tear down and rebuild without great expense. You may not be able to sell except at a sacrifice. You must live in it. How important it is then for the happiness of all concerned to "be sure you are right" at the beginning.

"Building With Assurance," a product of 2 years' labor and over $150,000 in money, is designed to start you right and to keep you right. To have this great book as your guide may mean a saving of many hundreds of dollars.

Read the Contents

First, there are many colored illustrations of bungalows, cottages and dwellings, etc., with floor plans to aid you in selecting a type of architecture.

Then comes page after page of interiors. These include halls and stairways, beautiful dining rooms, living rooms, dainty bedrooms, cozy breakfast nooks, etc. In addition, "Building With Assurance" contains almost priceless advice by authorities of international prominence—such as, "Interior Decoration and Floor Coverings," by Marshall Field & Co., "Modern Plumbing," by Standard Sanitary Mfg. Co. Other subjects covered are "Home Heating," "Hardware That Harmonizes," "Landscape Gardening," "Paints and Finishes," etc. Never before has this valuable information been produced in book form.

Mail the Coupon Below

We wish this wonderful book, "Building With Assurance," to go only to those who are seriously interested in home building, or home improvement. So we have prepared a beautiful prospectus—in which the Master Book is very fully described. Actual pages are reproduced, the contents given, etc. This prospectus tells clearly how you may secure a copy of the big book. We will gladly send it FREE to any person who mails us the coupon.

Morgan Woodwork Organization

MORGAN-QUALITY

STANDARDIZED WOODWORK

COUPON

Address Nearest Office, Dept. R-3

Morgan Sash & Door Co.

Chicago, Illinois

Morgan Millwork Co.

Baltimore, Md.

Morgan Company, Oshkosh, Wisconsin

Gentlemen: Please send me, at once, copy of your beautiful Free Prospectus which describes "Building With Assurance."

Name _____

Address _____

Town _____ State _____

Digitized by Google

JELL-O

America's most famous dessert

PERFECT results will follow your use of Jell-O in salad preparation. To make the Imperial salad above, drain juice from half a can of pineapple, add one tablespoonful of vinegar and enough water to make a pint. Heat to boiling point and add one package of Lemon Jell-O. Just as Jell-O begins to set, add three slices of canned pineapple, cubed, one-half can Spanish pimentos, shredded, and one medium size cucumber, salted and cut fine. Mould in individual moulds or in one large mould and slice. Serve with cream salad dressing. ☞ ☞ Send for our new free Jell-O Book describing other salads and many desserts. Our address is on our package.

The Ghost Story

(Continued from Page 129)

right pretty soon, Anna. We'd better do as she says. She'll be all right.

MARY (returning to ANNA): You're sure you don't want —

ANNA: No, no, no! I'll be all right just as soon as I can be a little quiet, by myself. I really will. Good night, dear!

CHORUS: Good night! Good night, Anna! See you to-morrow, Anna! It's a shame George didn't have more sense! George never did have a grain of intelligence! Good night! Good night!

GEORGE (turning back): Anna, I'll —

MARY and LENNIE: No, you won't. Let her alone.

[They seize his arms and propel him out into the hall. The door is closed, leaving ANNA alone; it is immediately opened again by GEORGE, returning.

GEORGE: Anna, I want to say —

[LENNIE, GRACE, MARY, FRED, TOM, FLOYD and LYNN instantly seize him and carry him back into the hall.

CHORUS: You come back here! Haven't you got any sense? George, you ought to be hanged! Bring him along, the idiot!

[They again close the door, and for some moments, as they put on their outer wraps, the sound of their voices, in extremely unfavorable comment upon GEORGE, continues to be heard. Then the talk grows fainter as they move away in the hall. The outer door is heard to close, and there is silence. ANNA at once rises calmly, her agitation entirely vanished. She goes to the hall door, looks out, then closes the door and goes thoughtfully to the fire. She seems to wait. Then, as though abandoning an idea, she shrugs her shoulders.

ANNA: Oh, well!

[Humming a tune, she goes to the piano. But she does not sit. Standing, she touches a chord thoughtfully; then shrugs her shoulders again, goes to a table, picks up the leather-bound book she had pretended to read at the opening of the play and, sighing, walks gloomily to the door and opens it, about to leave the room. However, she pauses, listening. A sound has reached her ears from a window across the room. The curtains are drawn, but there is a tapping upon the windowpane. The taps come in sets of three, well defined. She smiles suddenly, a very bright smile.

ANNA: Oh, it's a ghost. (She becomes serious and returns into the room.) Is it the ghost of the old cat murderer? (The tappings continue steadily. She goes to the window, pulls back the curtains and reveals a frosty glass, behind which is a masculine figure. She interrogates it): Is it the ghost?

[The tappings become more emphatic; she opens the window and GEORGE is seen, light snow on his hat and shoulders.

GEORGE (hushily): Anna —

ANNA: Yes, George?

GEORGE: Are you better?

ANNA: Yes, George.

GEORGE: I sneaked away from 'em. I thought it might be best to keep away from the front door if any of 'em were looking. Besides, I was afraid they might follow me back. Can I come in?

ANNA: Yes, George.

[He shakes off the snow and climbs in.

GEORGE: Why, you look all right. Are you?

ANNA (gently): Yes, George.

GEORGE: I just had to tell you: I never dreamed of frightening you. I thought—well, what I thought was maybe I could make that story so awful they'd get scared and go home. But I see I was wrong; the more scared they'd get, why, the less they'd want to leave. I was doing exactly the wrong thing to make 'em go!

ANNA (smiling): Yes, George.

GEORGE: And the only one I really frightened was you! That is, unless—unless—well, I wondered — You see I know the tones of your voice pretty well—and—and —

ANNA: Yes, George?

GEORGE: I wondered—Anna, did you pretend to be scared hysterical?

ANNA (laughing faintly): Yes, George.

GEORGE: And that's why they went! Anna, did you want 'em to go?

ANNA (looking away): Yes, George.

GEORGE (looking at his watch and the clock): I've only got—Anna, I've only got about—(he swallows)—well, it's a pretty short time. Can I —

ANNA: Yes, George.

[She sits.

GEORGE (taking off his overcoat): Thanks! (He puts the coat and his hat on a chair.) Anna, I—well, there's something I wanted to say to you. I've wanted to say it ever since the day you wore a blue dress. This thing I want to say to you—well, I'm afraid you'll be surprised when I tell you what it is —

ANNA (biting her lip): Yes, George?

GEORGE (with increasing nervousness): Yes, I'm afraid you will. And I'm—well, I'm terribly afraid you — I'm afraid you won't like it. Of course I—I know I'm not worthy to say it to you, and if you don't like it—and I'm almost sure you won't—well, if you don't, I—(he swallows again)—I'll just have to stand it somehow, I guess! Well—(he looks at the clock)—I've hardly got time to say it —

ANNA (frowning): Yes, George?

GEORGE: I don't know what you'll say!

ANNA: Yes, George?

[His attention seems to be caught uneasily.

GEORGE: Anna, what's the matter? You just say the same thing over and over.

ANNA: Yes, George.

GEORGE (bewildered): I don't understand. You see I came here to-night—to—to—to say to you that I—to ask you—to ask you —

ANNA: Yes, George?

GEORGE: I—I—I told you about what my father said to me—how I'd have a share in the business after commencement. So I felt justified in—in—in —

ANNA (with some emphasis): Yes, George?

GEORGE: And so I—I—I want to ask you—to ask—to ask you —

ANNA (whispering it shyly): Yes, George?

GEORGE (swallowing): To ask you—could you—could you—Anna, could you, could you — (He approaches her, his voice growing louder in his nervousness.) Anna, could you, could you—could you —

[At this instant the heads of LENNIE, MARY, GRACE, FLOYD, TOM, LYNN and FRED, who have been crouching outside below the sill, suddenly appear in the window.

LENNIE, MARY, GRACE, FLOYD, TOM, LYNN and FRED (all together): Yes, George!

[Anna rushes upon the window, closes it and pulls the curtains across it.

GEORGE (astounded): Why, what do they mean? They don't mean I—they don't mean you —

[Anna forms the words "Yes, George" with her lips, then looks shyly down.

GEORGE: Oh! (He swallows.) Oh!

[His expression, which has been one of great anxiety, alters to a widening smile as the curtain falls.

Dress in your gown of blue brocade.

MOTHER'S gown of blue brocade, her shimmering white satin wedding dress, the pink muslin house dress, the walking costume of blue serge—all were fastened with De Long Hooks and Eyes.

And now she and her daughter use De Long Hooks and Eyes wherever they are needed—but De Long Snaps, the modern, fashionable fasteners, have taken the place of hooks and eyes where snaps are better.

De Long Snaps are the flattest made. They lie under the sheerest material without bulging. The reversible clasp can be sewn on either side up. The covered springs grip tightly, yet release easily when desired. Rust? Never!!

Every article De Long makes has in it the character that women know is in De Long Hooks and Eyes—a quality that has been maintained for thirty years.

Look at the illustrations on the left. Whenever you buy these, take the time to be sure they are De Long. They are sold on a blue card with a red circle and the famous old trade mark, "See that hump?"

DE LONG SNAPS

DE LONG HOOK & EYE COMPANY

St. Marys, Canada

Philadelphia, U. S. A.

Handy Kit—10 Cents

Send ten cents and your dealer's name and we will mail you our useful little Handy Kit, which contains some Hooks and Eyes, Safety Pins, Toilet Pins, Hair Pins, Snaps and Klix.

Toilet Pins
Sharp, unbendable points

Safety Pins
All brass—heavily plated

Hair Pins
Smooth points—beautifully finished

Hook-and-Eye Tape
Strong—useful—rustless

Hooks and Eyes
"See that hump?"

See that hump?
De Long Snaps

Many women who have been using Hinds Honey and Almond Cream on the hands and arms do not realize how delightfully beneficial it is for the complexion. The same distinctive qualities that soothe and heal chapping and sunburn will keep the skin of the face and neck soft, clear and refreshed, thus enhancing the charm of natural skin beauty. It is fragrant, refining.

This picture is a reduced copy of the original photograph of the Hinds Cream Girl

Let me suggest that you begin to use this gratifying cream now so you may have that soft, velvety skin throughout the winter, even tho daily exposure to bleak winds is unavoidable. Apply only sufficient to moisten the skin, use it morning and night, also before and after an outdoor trip.

IF YOU WOULD LIKE TO TRY a Sample Assortment of the Hinds Cream Toilet Requisites send us 10c. in stamps, or a dime carefully wrapped, and we will mail the package to you at once, postpaid, containing samples of Hinds Honey and Almond Cream (liquid), Cold Cream, Disappearing Cream, Face Powder and Talcum. A charming booklet: "The Girl Who Loved the Beautiful," will be mailed separately.

HINDS WEEK-END BOX contains six trial size packages of the fascinating Hinds Cream Toilet Requisites—pure, fragrant, refined, beneficial. Charming boxed in old rose. 50c. Postpaid.

ASK YOUR DEALER FOR Hinds Cream Superior Toilet Requisites; but if not obtainable, order from us. We will send postpaid in the U. S. and guarantee satisfaction.

A. S. HINDS
Dept. 38
Portland
Maine

Staging The Ghost Story

By GLENN HUNTER

I SUPPOSE I hardly realized how young I was at the time. Funny, isn't it? I thought I was a real grown-up man of the world, and I was only eighteen! Looking back on it over these years a person sees how much he had still to learn! My goodness! When I think of all I've been through since then —

The speaker is twenty-two. He is George, the hero of Booth Tarkington's comedy, The Ghost Story. The amateur who plays this world-weary youth of twenty-two will do well to consider the quoted speech carefully, for in it he will find the key to the interpretation. George must be played with absolute seriousness and sincerity.

If I were to play George, rarely, if ever, would I allow him to smile, except, of course, at the very end, when his expression, which has been one of great anxiety, alters to a widening smile as the significance of Anna's "Yes, George," penetrates to him.

George is a typical Tarkington youth, and, like the others, he is a clear and a definite person. He is older and more sensible than Bobby Wheeler in "Clarence," and he is less of a "boob" child than Johnny White, the part I am playing at present in "The Intimate Strangers," but he will be just as effective as either on the stage.

GEORGE is the college type, a football player, but not necessarily a husky. He is home on a vacation, and he has grown a little apart from the scatter-brained juveniles that break in on his scene with Anna. They probably look upon him as a much older person, too old to be gay.

As I read over "The Ghost Story" I find more to tax the amateur's memory than his skill. Started right, with a conception of earnestness and sincerity and embarrassment, the part will play itself, if you can remember the lines. The lines are so good that they almost read by themselves and the feeling and stage business are clearly indicated. George has, however, several long speeches which will require a little care. But it is not necessary to deliver them in a lump, nor need they be taken as a ditch, all at once. Well-simulated embarrassment will help greatly to get the amateur through his long speech in the first part of the play; in fact, to read slowly those lines which begin, "No. I mean yes," is almost the automatic creation of embarrassment.

George has two manners. First, he is serious and embarrassed and obsessed with the idea that he will not have time enough to propose to Anna before he takes the "nine-fifty-one" back to college. Later, having failed to persuade Anna's friends that it is a "great night for everybody to go home and get some sleep," he becomes a young man with determination. Though he should not be made exactly glib in the telling of the ghost story, he is, at any rate, fluent. During this, George should employ a husky, melodramatic voice with much intensity.

OF THE other characters, Anna alone will require skill and especial intelligence. This part is not nearly so long as that of George nor so difficult to learn, but if the feigned hysterical scene is given some skill, it can be made to count very much, especially if in the playing it can be conveyed to the audience toward the end that Anna is on to what George is trying to do.

At the end of the comedy the author gives Anna one line, with variations in the directions for saying it, seventeen times. This line, "Yes, George," by its very repetition and by the variety of tone and inflection that should be put into it can be made very funny.

There are seven other juvenile characters and a maid. The maid has nothing to do except to walk through the hallway to answer the outdoor door. The breezy bunch that breaks in upon Anna and George is made up of flip, thoughtless young things. They will require no particular skill in the playing, but it is not so easy to be colloquial and natural in a room with one wall removed. You must exaggerate a bit and you must speak up to be heard. You must have "pep" and easy chatter at the entrance, or George's seriousness will not have full play. Watch others. You can get points from them that you would never see in yourself.

"The Ghost Story" is ideally fitted for schools and younger social clubs. If done by a regular dramatic club it will afford a chance to try out the younger members of the organization. The play cannot well be played, however, by actors who are much older than the characters they are supposed to be. If the club or school organization has a casting committee, it will select the best people at its disposal for George and Anna.

EVERY play needs a director. Amateurs can waste a great deal of time and never be right or as good as they could be, if there is not some person who has all the business in hand and knows exactly what is to be done. The director should have working with him a stage manager, whose business it is to see that everything which the director has worked out is held in the performance and to manage the stage generally. The stage manager will also have everyone at the entrances at the right moment. There should be a prompter, a property man and a responsible person to manage the lights if the play is given in a theater or hall that has no electrician. All are responsible to the director.

The director will begin in the usual way. He will make a ground or scene plan of his stage. Certain things are needed, and do not be deceived because the author has not placed them all in his stage directions at the head of the play. There are certain requirements—a doorway showing a hall, a window, a piano, a phonograph, a fire, a table and sufficient chairs. Make your stage look like a real room, and don't overcrowd it so that there is no space to dance. The play should have a dull, neutral background, since nine figures are to move against it on what may be a very small stage.

The people in the scene must not get in one another's way nor must they obscure the speaker when they are grouped around him in the telling of the ghost story, nor during the dance must they altogether hide George when he is at the phonograph, tampering with it.

ANOTHER point that would cause some difficulty in staging is the very end, where the characters appear at the window and watch George and Anna. They must not take attention from George and Anna on the stage, and yet the crowd must be seen by the audience. It may be effective to have some of them kneel and some of them stand, as in a group photograph. When they shout in chorus, "Yes, George," all should be visible.

As the director is studying the play before reading it to the actors, he will mark on his copy of the magazine a great many suggestions for positions, crossings and groupings. He has made some note as to the partners in the dance. He will perhaps have two of the boys dispute in dumb show for Anna.

The director has found in the play an occasional speech which is not assigned to a character, but reads: "Another Girl's Voice: My goodness! What is that?" This is from the audience's or reader's point of view. It is possible that no audience would distinguish the voice of the speaker, nor does it matter; but the director's working script must assign that speech to Grace or Mary or Lennie. Also when Fred comes into the room with a glass of water and says: "Here! Dab this on her face!" the director will provide that one of the girls—Mary, for instance—take the glass of water and begin to dab Anna's face with her moistened handkerchief. Then the other girls do the same. Likewise the business of turning off, and later turning up the lights will be assigned to some one of the boys.

There are other instances which will require the sorting out of speeches on the part of the director. When Lennie and the four boys enter they "chatter phrases and half sentences of greeting all together for a few moments . . . then Lennie shouts louder

(Continued on Page 135)

ESMOND

Jacquard Blankets

A popular pattern in the Esmond 2-in-1 Bed Blanket.

Two Esmond Crib Blankets—dainty, warm and durable.

Richly colored Esmond Blanket Comfortable in all-over design.

Esmond Blanket Comfortable in smart color contrast with conventional border.

Esmond Blanket Comfortable in quaint Paisley pattern.

Colorful Indian Blanket—the practical outdoor covering.

"Soft as Rabbit Skin"

BABY'S covers must be warm and light and easily washed. That is why mothers choose Esmond Crib Blankets with their deep, soft nap and gay nursery designs in tub-fast colors.

And the Crib Blanket is only one of the Esmond Jacquard Blankets.

Esmond Two-in-One Bed Blankets, really two blankets woven in one, are easier to launder than a "pair" of blankets and allow added warmth and wear without extra weight.

Esmond Blanket Comfortables are as decorative as they are comfortable. Their colors harmonize with any scheme and they are used all year round. Unlike the stuffed comfortable, they are readily washed and enduring.

Esmond Indian Blankets serve as couch throws, porch and camp blankets, motor robes—all outdoor purposes.

The Esmond ticket on any blanket assures you of the Cortex finish exclusive with Esmond. This means a deeper, warmer nap and more beautiful appearance. The Jacquard patterns are so practical too, for their all-over designs remain fresh much longer than the plain-center blanket. Demand Esmond Robe Cloth in your Bath Robes.

All are moth proof, fast color and moderately priced.

Send 10c for Doll's Blanket and story of "Bunny Cortex" a book for children.

"Made in America"

"Soft as Rabbit Skin"

THE ESMOND MILLS — ESMOND, R.I.

CLARENCE WHITMAN & SON, INC. — Selling Agents — New York City

BLABON ART Linoleums

To make sure that the dealer offers you genuine Blabon Linoleum insist upon seeing this label which appears on the face of all Blabon Art Linoleums.

Beautiful floors that need little care!

Isn't this a quaint and charming bedroom—restful enough to invite refreshing sleep!

A prominent place in the harmonious effect is occupied by the Blabon floor of Art Linoleum.

And how easy it is to keep this sanitary floor clean and bright—a light regular going over with a damp cloth or mop is all the care it needs!

The floor in the illustration above is of Blabon Plain Gray Linoleum cemented down over builders' felt paper, which is a new and approved method of laying. This makes a permanent floor. It may be waxed and polished, if desired. A handsome fabric rug in harmonious colors is thrown over it, and removed in summer.

The dealer in Blabon Art Linoleums can send or recommend an experienced man to lay them for you, which insures the best results.

Blabon floors are quiet and comfortable to the tread. Their plain colors and artistic inlaid patterns go clear through to the burlap back, and never wear off while the floor endures. Their long life makes them remarkably economical. For genuine linoleum look for the name Blabon. Write for illustrated booklet.

Blabon Rugs of genuine Linoleum combine the advantages of linoleum with the beauty of the costlier fabric rugs. Sanitary. Mothproof. Durable.

The George W. Blabon Co., Philadelphia
Established 77 years

Important Notice:

Floor coverings (including rugs) made upon a felt paper base are not linoleum, and to describe, advertise or sell them as linoleum is a violation of the law. Felt paper floor coverings have a black interior which is easily detected upon examining the edge.

Staging The Ghost Story

(Continued from Page 132)

than any of the others and obtains a hearing." Lennie's speech is, of course, given; but from the entrance to that speech the greetings will have to be fashioned. All this the director will mark on his manuscript.

The director will find another stage direction for which he will have to watch out; this is the interruption of the ghost story. The direction says: "At this point, while George talks, the curtain descends for a moment to indicate the lapse of an indefinite period of time, during which George is telling the greater part of his story." It must be determined by the director the exact moment at which the curtain is to begin to descend. A too-abrupt curtain will spoil the intensity of George's story. The curtain should be slow, and if it is a curtain that does not work too expertly some exact timing must be done and the cue for the start of the curtain be that point in George's speech which will make the descent of the curtain jibe with the time required to give the remainder of the speech. If the curtain closes instead of descending, similar experimenting must be done.

When the curtain rises after the break, the grouping should be somewhat changed. George has been talking for some time, and his hearers have moved somewhat nearer to him. Also it is not conceivable that such agile and restless young things would sit still even when interested. I am sure that it will be found more effective and it certainly will be easier for George to give his long speech which begins "Listen, will you? These two men were working at the bathtub," etc., if the speech is interrupted and broken by gasps, stifled "ohs" and shifting movements at the most dramatic points. All this will not only make it easier for George, but it will indicate that his hearers are now greatly impressed by his story.

BUT the ghost story cannot help but be effective. It needs, however, the addition of correct lighting. This will be the most difficult thing in the whole production. The stage direction calls for the turning out of all the lights except one lamp, and this is to be shaded with a handkerchief—good and effective business, but on any but the smallest stages it will readily be found that one lamp partly covered is not sufficient light.

The lighting must be more than adequate. It must be expert to a certain extent in that it must work on cue. If your stage is so equipped that you can have your lights on a switch, and have the director assign to one of the characters the business of turning them off, your problem is merely to determine how much light in addition to the one lamp should be left on during the telling of the ghost story so that George's face can be seen. It is not necessary to have all the faces visible, but now and then one or the other should move into the circle of light.

On a well-equipped stage with footlights and borders this is largely a question of conferring with the electrician until the desired result is obtained from various points in the auditorium. If the lights cannot work on an actual switch a fake switch might well be put upon the wall. This presupposes that the lights can be correctly operated by the stage manager or electrician on a cue or signal from the stage. If the lighting must be separate then the characters will move about the stage and go through the business of turning off the lights. In case other illumination than electric light is used, lamps might be turned very low.

IF, AS suggested in the ground plan, there is a fireplace, it is possible to get sufficient light from that. Of course a fire will be faked. This is done by concealing a few electric light bulbs amid the coal or wood. A coal fire in a basket grate usually looks more realistic. The hidden lamps should be amber and rose and may be covered with colored paper. The old convention was red, but it never looked like anything except a signal. This make-believe fire will give practically no light until it is reinforced by a spot or flood light which is placed in the opening in such a way that it cannot be seen by the audience. Outside the window, if it is possible to arrange for it, there should be a blue light to suggest night. If not, the space may be left dark and black.

Don't forget about the clock. It is twenty minutes past seven when the play begins, and George is to take the nine-fifty-one train. George compares his watch with the clock. A real clock may be used and started at seven-twenty and allowed to run along. When the curtain is lowered in the midst of the ghost story the hands might be moved ahead a bit so that when the lights are turned on again the clock will not seem to have loafed. If it is not running its face should be soaped a bit so that the hands cannot actually be seen.

THE property man will of necessity provide a phonograph which has a "metal arm" and "sound box" easily "detached" or duplicates ready to be used. There might be considerable leeway in pretending to put the phonograph out of order. A duplicate part or two from another machine, which can be held up for the audience's view, will probably cost less and be the simplest arrangement.

The property man must also provide off stage a doorbell, the sound of a door slamming and the noise of fingers tapping on a piece of glass. This presupposes that there is not actual glass in the window. He also will have ready a glass of water for Fred to carry on. Personal props will consist of overcoats and wraps for everyone except Anna and the housemaid. George must have a watch, a handkerchief, camper's knife with a small screw driver, and all the girls must have handkerchiefs.

When George comes in the window, there must be a suggestion of snow upon his overcoat and cap. This is usually accomplished by sprinkling a little salt, which glistens like snow and will shake off easily. There should be a little snow upon the other characters when they are in the window. A paper snow might be found as effective as salt, but never powder. Powder will not shake off the clothing.

The dressing of these characters is very simple. The boys will wear their ordinary clothes, and the dress for the maid is, of course, obvious. The girls may dress as attractively as desired, but it must be remembered that it is a snowy night and these people have tramped about a good deal. There are five girls, and their dresses should not clash in color.

IN MAKE-UP for amateurs it is better to use too little than too much. As a matter of fact, in The Ghost Story there is no reason for using make-up unless the play is performed on a stage with foot and border lights. In that case the actors will look ghastly and pasty if they have not the aid of paint and powder.

Ordinarily the best results in amateur shows are obtained if a professional is in charge of all the make-up. If this cannot be done, one member of the club may be put in charge of this work. For the boys the face would be covered with cold cream. After the superfluous is wiped off with a piece of cheesecloth, a foundation of flesh-colored grease paint—yellowish pink—is put on the face. Put it on in small quantities and work it all over the face, up into the hair and down the neck. Then, if desired, put a little red on the cheeks, nose and chin and blend this into the face. Over the whole dust gently yellow-pink face powder. The eyebrows, and perhaps just a suggestion under the eyes, should be lined with a black lining pencil.

For the girls a dry make-up will be found best; but it scarcely seems necessary to tell young girls in these days how to put on rouge, powder, lip stick and to pencil lightly the eyebrows.

All make-up that is purchased for amateurs should be theatrical make-up, and even the cold cream should be especially suited for this purpose. All make-up is removed with cold cream.

I have suggested only a few of the things to watch out for, if a nonprofessional is to put on the stage Booth Tarkington's comedy, The Ghost Story.

Incidentally, I envy the young man who has a chance to play George.

Style calls for Bias Fold Trimming

WHEN you buy Bias Fold Tape insist on F-A Quality. It is cut on a perfect bias. Full width and yardage guaranteed.

Every cross seam is opened and pressed which makes it extremely easy to sew with.

Comes in Lawns, Cambrics, and Percales. White, Black and Colors. All fast and washable.

Without a flaw. Most economical. Ask for it by name, F-A Quality. Your store can get it.

FRIEDBERGER-AARON MFG. CO., Philadelphia

Other F-A Quality Specialties on notion counters of all good stores.

Lingerie Braids and Tapes
Shoulder Strapping
Middy braids and Socklets
Fancy Trimmings for Dresses

She's Had Extra Money Continuously Since 1888

Mrs. Mary Miller of Illinois
(Drawing by Edwin Marcus)

IN 1888 Mrs. Mary Miller of Illinois forwarded to us her first subscription order. Since that time hundreds of people in her neighborhood have become readers of The Ladies' Home Journal, The Saturday Evening Post and The Country Gentleman as a result of her efforts. Why has she wanted to stay with us so long? There's only one answer: She likes her work—it is pleasant, dignified, permanent, AND IT PAYS!

Let Us Make You a Cash Offer

For full details about our money making plan whereby you, like Mrs. Miller, have a present opportunity to make every spare hour bring extra profit and to build up a permanent business that will bring you profit year in and year out, clip and send TODAY the coupon below.

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY
474 Independence Square, Philadelphia, Penna.

Gentlemen: Please tell me of your offer to full-time and part-time subscription representatives. I assume no obligation in making this inquiry.

Name _____

Street _____

Town _____

State _____

Willoway

A modernized bandeau extending comfortably over the hips, eliminating the need for a corset. Detachable hose supporters.

Smartway

The Outline of Youth

Youth's Lovely Lines

FASHION no longer demands the frozen curves of a moulded figure, but seeks rather to express the charm of youth—youth with its graceful, ever changing lines—with its classic grace of unfettered posture—with its slim beauty.

DeBevoise Brassieres have an irresistible appeal to everyone in sympathy with this modern conception of the perfect form. There is a DeBevoise for every type of figure, for every phase of feminine activity and for every occasion.

The "Willoway" illustrated above, is perhaps the most perfect garment ever designed to support one's figure without imposing the slightest restraint or concealing graceful body curves. It gives just the right degree of sinuosity demanded by the newest style creations and is admirably adapted for active sports and dancing.

At the left is a delightful example of exquisite DeBevoise design and needlecraft, cunningly wrought of lace and fretted ribbon and nosegays—a creation to delight the soul of any beauty-loving woman.

The "Youthsway" shown at the right, is a topless corset bandeau with an elastic waistline which has won universal popularity. Its clever design flattens the bust, giving the girlish straight lines of youth.

Your favorite Brassiere Department will gladly assist you in the selection of the "Debb-e-voice" style best suited to your figure. An illustrated booklet, which we will send at your request, will also aid your selection.

De Bevoise

Brassieres · that · Beautify ·

All Figures All Occasions All Prices

Made, Labeled and Guaranteed by
CHAS. R. DEBEVOISE CO., Newark, N. J.
World's oldest and largest Brassiere Manufacturers

De Bevoise
Brassiere

ORIGINAL—BEST

Youthsway

A bandeau with elastic waistline, designed extra long to come well down over the topless corset.

TRYING TO MAKE ENDS MEET WHEN THEY WON'T IS NO FUN. HERE'S A BETTER PLAN!

Have You Enough Money?

MANY a reader of THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL is letting these best years of her life slip by, hampered in everything she wants to do because she "can't afford it." Are you one of these folks? Please listen to me then. It is such a mistake, and so unnecessary, to deprive yourself of the nice things of life. Don't you know that there is a Club conducted by the HOME JOURNAL itself which gives every Journal reader a way to make enough extra dollars to escape from bill worries, to provide for books and music and pretty clothes and attractive house furnishings? And that you can join this Club to-day and make money, extra money, in your leisure time, for all sorts of pleasant things?

Let me tell you about some of the nice girls and women who are already members of our Club, and then you will understand why I say that you will find our plan interesting and worth while in itself. You will thoroughly enjoy the making as well as the spending of this money.

MISS SARA and Miss Alice R. are two sisters of a very prominent family who live alone in their old home. They have one brother, who is really so burdened with his own family expenses that long ago Miss Sara determined not to add to this brother's financial problem. Miss Sara has a fine independence and frankness, and she faced—squarely—what it would mean to her sister and herself to live on their own tiny income alone. They'd have no money for gifts, for charity, for hospitality, for books, for any of the gracious things that belong in a fine woman's life. Miss Sara felt that she could not take a regular business position. So she has found in 'The Girls' Club of the HOME JOURNAL a way to make the extra dollars she should have to live nicely. She has made more than $50 a month in The Club in spare time, leaving her ample leisure for other interests. And in thanking 'The Girls' Club for the opportunities it has given her, Miss Sara never fails to mention the pleasure she takes in doing our Club work, because it gives her a chance to be of real service, to exert an uplifting influence, as well as to make extra dollars—worthy of being her life work.

Mrs. Ernestine N. is a music lover. Now that her two daughters are old enough to start their musical education, this thoughtful mother has earned in 'The Girls' Club of the HOME JOURNAL the extra money needed for their lessons. It is significant of the dignity and interest of our work that this wife of a young professional man can earn money in 'The Girls' Club without hurting her husband's pride or his reputation among his friends, as a most devoted and generous helpmate.

Mrs. S. is a minister's wife who "helps out" on family and personal expenses through her Girls' Club earnings, and yet does not offend the sensibilities of the most exacting members of her husband's church. In fact, there is a helpfulness in our way for making money that particularly commends itself to a sincere and thoughtful woman, whether a home woman whose husband's feelings must be considered, a widow who must think of any possible reflection on her son's support of her, or a teacher who must consider the opinions of the school board.

I am emphasizing the high character of our Girls' Club work, as well as the really splendid sums of money made by those who do it, because we want as our members only discriminating girls and women who like to do something worth while and interesting, as well as to make extra dollars.

OF COURSE we spend our money as we please, and we please to do all sorts of things with it, from paying college expenses or car fare to the Yellowstone to buying baby's shoes or a very necessary new dress or a vacuum cleaner. And of course business girls who already hold positions may join us, as well as stay-at-homes and teachers. Ours is a way to make extra dollars in spare hours.

You really should belong to this interesting Club. Do find out about it! Write me a note or a postal simply saying: "I'd like very much to know how I, too, can make some extra money in my odds and ends of time." You can begin making money the very day you receive my reply. There is no expense of any kind to you, now or later. Sit down right now and write me—addressing the

Manager of The Girls' Club

THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL
456 INDEPENDENCE SQUARE
PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA

You Do Not Know

What Kitchen Work Costs You

2,113 steps every day to get average meals. And 1,592 of these steps are needless waste of strength

Here are the facts

Average Number of Steps to get	When Napanee is used
	Number Steps	Number Steps Saved
Breakfast . . . 466	117	349
Lunch 651	142	509
Dinner 996	262	734
Daily Total 2113	521	1592

Proven Savings
by the

Napanee Dutch Kitchenet

It has now been definitely proven by the country's leading authorities that the effort of getting three meals every day in the average American home is appalling.

It was never known before because it was never measured. Now we know it is useless waste. It can be ended completely.

By extended experiments, Mr. Harrington Emerson, famous Efficiency Engineer, and leading Domestic Scientists, discovered how much time and how many steps are taken in the average kitchen to prepare all the usual American dishes. Stop-watches and pedometers were used to count the minutes and the steps with scientific accuracy. Results were averaged.

These studies cost thousands of dollars. But they are the most important ever made for housewives.

They proved by actual tests that the same cooks who took 260 steps to make an apple pie or 651 steps to get lunch could make the pie in the same kitchen with only 36 steps, or get the same meal with only 142 steps, when using a Napanee Dutch Kitchenet. And equally amazing savings were discovered on every dish prepared! They mark the end of kitchen drudgery for all women!

These Savings Are For You

Do not put this announcement down as important and then forget it. In justice to yourself, act on it.

Save your own strength and health. Send for the book that will show you how to make these astonishing savings on every dish you prepare.

This book tells what the experiments showed about the average kitchen. It tells you exactly what the Napanee will save you—its extraordinary value to you.

The Napanee is not like any other kitchen cabinet. It is the utmost in kitchen efficiency. Its amazing savings are due to its new and scientific superiorities. Get all the facts about this new kitchen method. Send coupon for the book.

COPPES BROS. & ZOOK
Nappanee, Indiana

COPPES BROS. & ZOOK
Dept. 203, Nappanee, Indiana

Please send me "Scientific Studies of Kitchen Work," giving the report of the tests made by the Emerson Engineers on the preparation of meals.

Name _____

Address _____

TAILORED FOR
Miss Manhattan
NEW YORK

No. 2040M

The smartness of steel beads on a welltailored dress can hardly be overestimated.

Miss Manhattan
Coats-Suits-Dresses
Youthful New York Styles

WELL made from good materials, styled for youthfulness, and priced to suit your pocket-book are all the Miss Manhattan modes.

$25 to $75

If your favorite store does not carry Miss Manhattan creations, write me at once, mentioning the store name, and I will mail you free a Miss Manhattan Fashion Book of actual photographs of Fifth Avenue's most popular costumes.

498 Seventh Ave.
New York

Miss Manhattan

England's Only Princess Marries a Commoner

(Continued from Page 9)

But there the distinction stops between the ideal and its reality, especially that of the American girl of a social leadership in any way approximating the princess' position and yet surfeited with the tremendous luxuries of the Dollar Princess. Princess Mary does not even own her own motor; hence the bicycle. This girl, on whose father's domains the sun never sets, says quite frankly: "I can't afford a motor and help the people I should."

Hans Andersen charmed the world through his fairy stories with his belief that all princesses must be very beautiful, must dress in long silver robes and must sleep on a mattress without a single pea in it or presto! they cease to be princesses. I am sure the poor man would be bewildered over Princess Mary's trousseau. Only the classic Gothic beauty of the Chapel Royal, almost unadorned, will be the setting of her marriage, the simplicity of which she has insisted upon in these times of world distress. Her wedding dress is of white satin, like her bridesmaids', who will number only six intimate friends in contrast to her mother's twenty-four from the former kingdoms of Europe. The robe is an almost revolutionary departure from the royal wedding dress of past times with its brocaded design of the rose, leek, shamrock and thistle which used to take ten weeks to set and three months to weave.

Gifts for Her Trousseau

ALTHOUGH the design of the lines of the gown is by a well-known modiste, the dress itself has been made by ex-service soldiers, a very skilled needle guild of crippled men. The train alone will be embroidered with Tudor lilies by the blind soldiers of St. Dunstan's by special request of themselves. Her wedding veil, however, is a priceless heirloom worn by her mother, the queen, her grandmother and four previous generations. This veil will not be worn over her face, as no royal brides have been covered since Edward I's, who stumbled and always attributed bad luck to this omen. All the linen of her trousseau will be made in Ireland. On the announcement of the princess' engagement, the old lace makers of Carrickmacross wrote, declaring dubiously from their Sinn Fein province: "Whatever happens to Ireland we would all like our girl to have a grand wedding." Another thing has touched the princess deeply. Entirely unasked, the fisher girls of Southern Ireland all gave one penny each, "to get you a fine Donegal tweed."

Another interesting donation comes from all the Marys of the British Empire, although eight thousand Marys of other countries have contributed a shilling each. Princess Mary has asked for her wedding gifts in checks as far as possible, so she can give them directly, like the Maharaja of Patiala's thirty thousand dollars, to her hospitals.

But the most amusing things in her trousseau are the curious items that give snapshots of her character.

Besides the glorious Caricade jewels and the Irish lingerie threaded daintily with blue, are a new typewriter and a pair of boxing gloves. The typewriter is as important now as during the war, when she was her father's private secretary.

Princess Mary will have no lady-in-waiting after she marries and, like Princess Patricia of Connaught, will drop her royal title and be simply Lady Lascelles.

Like most revolutions, this was a bit disturbing when the king's warrant for her marriage, issued by the Archbishop of Canterbury, was drawn up by the royal clerk, Sir Lewis Dibdin. He said: "I had to lock myself up in a special room with twenty quill pens and a thick roll of parchment, and take eighteen hours' hard writing to complete the royal warrant."

It seems strange that the King of England's daughter should receive her jewels from her husband, not her father; but both her parents own practically no great gems, wearing only those which are state property.

The Caricade jewels, which are the Lascelles family jewels to be worn by Princess Mary, are among the most famous in the world. They include six strings of pearls and one of the most priceless black pearls in existence. There are also four gemmed tiaras.

To match the emerald tiara, Viscount Lascelles gave Princess Mary her emerald engagement ring.

The boxing gloves in the trousseau are not new, but the old ones with which she has twice knocked out her royal father. Although Viscount Lascelles has been three times wounded in the war, he is still accounted a fair man with the gloves, and in case his royal bride shows any prehistoric cave-womanish tendencies, perhaps he can hold his own!

VISCOUNT LASCELLES, AS LIEUTENANT COLONEL OF THE GRENADEIER GUARDS

Princess Mary's London house will be Lord Lascelles' present one, Chesterfield House, where the second Lord Chesterfield wrote his famous Letters to My Son. Generally she will live at Goldsborough, the rather small dower house of the Lascelles Yorkshire estate. It is said that the royal wedding had to be postponed a month because the present tenant of Goldsborough, who has been there forty years, "couldn't make up his mind about going." On the death of Lord Lascelles' father, the Earl of Harewood, she and her husband will come into the historic Scotch estate of the "Bold Buccleuchs," as they are known in history, connections of Sir Walter Scott. Owing to Princess Mary's direct Stuart descent, her wedding cake will be cut with Bonnie Prince Charlie's sword, and she will pass under the aisle of claymores made by the Scots Guards.

To Have No Regular Honeymoon

IN HER first home at Goldsborough she has asked for one wedding gift: "An American bathroom right off my own room, like David says Americans have."

Princess Mary will have no regular honeymoon until Lord Lascelles can take her to Canada, where he was formerly aid-de-camp to Earl Grey.

One glance at her morning desk with its huge mail would give the best idea of the princess as a business woman. In the plainly furnished blue-and-white sitting room that adjoins her bedroom in Buckingham Palace, the large writing desk, given by the Prince of Wales on her eighteenth birthday, is the most conspicuous object. Three of the windows look down upon the broad Mall with its imposing memorial to Queen Victoria, one of whose forty-five great-grandchildren the princess is. She was born in the year of Queen Victoria's Diamond Jubilee.

My own country place is midway to Windsor Castle and the Golf Club, where I caught my first insight into my type of English girl. Since then I have stored away many memories of the princess—sometimes bicycling with her brothers through these twisting lanes whose trim boundary hedges often lead to an old thatched inn for tea; sometimes walking alone or with one of her brothers or with Miss Dorothy Yorke, her secretary, or her girl friend, the Honorable Mary Gardner, one of the four daughters of Lord and Lady Burghclere; sometimes galloping with her father through the great park, when the king often seemed to be put to it to keep up with his daughter.

But this riding is a tame proceeding compared to a "go" in the hunting field, where those of us who follow her after the hounds know what a fearless rider she is. There is no going through a hedge gap or an open gate.

She is a Qualified Nurse

PRINCESS MARY, among many smaller duties, is the colonel of four regiments, president of the Land Girls, an association of farm women numbering thousands, head of the Girl Guides and Girl Scouts, president of the Voluntary Aid Detachment, a vast army of women war workers known as the V. A. D., for whose activities in peace, as formerly in war, the princess is responsible. Added to her own interests in farming, poultry and rabbits, for which she has won several ribbons at local fairs, in her social life she has to lay innumerable corner stones in a land which is rebuilding, to open schools, clinics, bazaars and hospitals and a hundred activities which would overtax any diplomat without her careful physical training.

When the Prince of Wales was asked in Canada what he would be if he weren't prince, he replied quite impulsively: "Oh, a farmer, of course."

To a similar question Princess Mary answered: "Oh, a children's nurse."

In the Great Ormond Street Hospital in London, Princess Mary took a full course in child nursing. She is now a completely qualified nurse, with a medical certificate as assistant at operations, capable of giving anesthetics, bandaging and full nursing attendance. Bathing babies was her specialty.

She herself planned and decorated a nursery for the show, last winter, in London's "Street of Babies." Among the many nurseries designed by royal mothers, Princess Mary's stood out with its practical sense, its hygiene and its wholesome chances for fun and enjoyment. Her space—the same as for all contestants—was subdivided into a small night nursery, a bathroom, an electric kitchenette cupboard and a sitting room. Every detail of the preparation of food, medicine, fresh air, exercise, and so on, showed her medical training.

But the play room made us all long to turn a somersault and shed our wrinkles. The walls were stenciled with farm animals—rabbits and cows and horses and dogs and pigs. The borders were of homely tree design; acorn, maple, holly and mistletoe. A big teddy bear held the place of honor, as he used to in the princess' own room, and the rag rugs were warm and gay and washable. Everything had the look of being made for play, all carefully thought out. But its distinction lay principally in the cupboard to hold the toys. These had open bars like the animal cages at the Zoo, so the child could always see its beloved toys, the last thing at night, winking in the firelight.

"I hated to see my own toys shut up at night," said the princess. "I used to wonder if they weren't lonely in those closed cupboards. Now the little child can see them so long as its eyes are open."

It is rather humorous for an American child to know how very little money either the Prince of Wales or his sister had to spend when young. Until she was eighteen years old Princess Mary's allowance was only five shillings—about a dollar and a quarter—a week.

Clothes that lend smartness to the occasion

For less than you ever spent on clothes before

THE loveliest yet most economical clothes you ever owned! Dance frocks, afternoon dresses, suits—all may have the exclusive look of original models—yet you, yourself, can make them at an actual money-saving!

Because of that wonderful invention, the Deltor, the smartest clothes you could desire may also be the least expensive.

No matter what your skill in sewing, no matter how economical you may have been, this Deltor brings its own additional economy, never possible before; it guides your needle to the charm that you thought only Parisian modistes could attain.

The smartness that Paris calls "chic" in the most economical of clothes

YOU will find this invaluable Deltor enclosed in the envelope with your new Butterick pattern. It is not a part of the pattern itself, but a separate, patented service—a picture-guide especially planned for the pattern it accompanies.

Easily and simply, in just three steps, each individual Deltor will guide you to economy of time and money, to Paris smartness.

The first thing that the Deltor does is to save you money by an individual layout chart (yes, individual, not just a general chart, but one for your exact size and for each width of suit-

Each Individual DELTOR

especially planned for the pattern it accompanies

Saves You 50c to $10 on materials

- I. enables you to buy $\frac{1}{4}$ to $1\frac{1}{2}$ yards less material because of its individual layout chart.
- II. guides you in putting your garment together so that you attain the fit, drape and finish of an expert.
- III. gives you Paris' own touch in finish—those all important things upon which the success of your gown depends.

BUTTERICK
Style Leaders of the World

able material). Because of it, you buy $\frac{1}{4}$ to $1\frac{1}{2}$ yards less than would otherwise be possible—a saving of 50c to \$10 on materials alone!

Then, with your frock cut out, you follow the simplest of picture-and-word illustrations which show every stitch, every trick the French modiste would practise in putting your own frock together. Quickly, confidently, you sew, almost unaware that you are embodying in your frock the fit, set and lines of Paris!

And now—that critical moment when your frock nears completion. How should you finish the bateau neck—of what should you make the blossom which holds the girdle—and the sleeves, how will you achieve the correct effect? Here it is—the Parisian answer to your every question—carefully explained among the finishing suggestions designed especially for your frock!

Select your wardrobe now from advance spring fashions

AT the Butterick counters, a host of early spring styles awaits you. Select your wardrobe from these authentic fashions, remembering that with the Deltor you make the most intricate style as easily as the simplest; you cut your garment out of less material than was ever possible before, a saving of 50c to $10, always. And remember that in every case, the garment you are making costs less than it ever could, were it not for the Deltor.

Lysol

Disinfectant

Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

*added to cleaning water
kills germs*

The soles of shoes track millions of disease germs into your home every day. These germs spread and breed more germs. And then a real menace to your health exists.

Ordinary soap-and-water cleaning removes the visible dust and dirt from your floors, but it is not strong enough to rid your floors of the unseen germ life that lurks there. Continual indifference to this fact invites sickness.

Before starting to clean, add a little Lysol Disinfectant to the cleaning water. Lysol Disinfectant is a soapy liquid that kills germs. It mixes readily with water, and aids in cleaning as it disinfects.

Disease germs also breed in sinks, toilet bowls, garbage cans, drains, wash-tubs, hard-to-get-at corners, and dark closets. Sprinkle a few drops of Lysol Disinfectant, mixed with water, into all such places—at least twice a week.

A 50c bottle makes 5 gallons of germ-killing solution. A 25c bottle makes 2 gallons.

Lysol Disinfectant is also invaluable for personal hygiene.

LEHN & FINK, INC.

635 Greenwich Street, New York

Makers of Pebecco Tooth Paste

Harold F. Ritchie & Company, Canadian Agents, 30 McCaul St., Toronto

Send for free samples of other Lysol products

You can purchase a 25c bottle of Lysol Disinfectant for trial purposes at any drug store. We shall be glad to mail you free samples of the other Lysol products.

Shall we send a sample of Lysol Shaving Cream for the men folks? Protects the health of the skin. Renders small cuts aseptically clean. We will also include a sample of Lysol Toilet Soap. Refreshingly soothing, healing, and helpful for improving the skin.

Send name and address on a postcard.

II

AWAY went Silvergray, undulating among the high branches that led to the next tree, and behind her came the other two gray squirrels—Bannertail and his al. Then they met at the branch it had furnished the footway for the gray lady, and in a moment they atched. Grappling like cats, they ve their teeth into each other's udders, just where the hide was ckest and the danger least.

n their combat rage they paid no ed to where they were. Their ry clutch was on each other, none the branch, and over they tumbled a open space.

Two fighting cats so falling would e clutched the harder and hoped h that the other would be the one and on the underside. But squir- i have a different way. Sensing fall, at once they sprang apart, h fluffed his great, flowing tail to utmost—it is nature's own "land- y"—and they landed gently wide rt and quite unshaken even by fall.

ut overhead was the lady of the reney in plain view, and the two it knights lost not a moment in ting up her tree. Again they met on a row limb, again they clutched and stabbed h other with their chisel teeth, again the less grappled clutch and the drop in va- t air; again they shot apart; one landed he solid ground; but the other—the echo e—went splash, plunge into the deepest t of the creek.

n ten heartbeats he was safely on the bank. here is such soothing magic in cold water, a quenching of all fires, be they of smoke ve or war, that the echo singer crawled h in quite a different mood, and Banner- flashing up the great tree trunk, went alone.

o have conquered a rival is a long step and victory, but it is not yet victory com- e. When he swung from limb to limb, nearer Silvergray, he was stirred with the best hankering of love, for was she not alto- er lovely? But she fled away as though feared him; and away he went, pursuing. here is no more beautiful climbing action than that of squirrel; and these two, half a leap apart, winding, wend- ripling through the high roof-tree of the woods, were like two gray climbing things than some long, silvery ent, winding, flashing in and out in undulating coils with ess grace and certainty among the trees.

WHO will say that Silvergray really raced her fastest, and who will deny that he did his best? He was strong swift; the race must end; and then she faced him with r and menace simulated in her face and pose. He ap- ched too near; her chisel teeth closed on his neck. He still, limp, absolutely unresisting. Her clutch relaxed. he not surrendered? They stood facing each other, an ed neutrality established, nothing more. ily apart and yet together, they drifted about that feeding at feed time. But she was ready to warn him his distance he must keep. By countless little signs they rstood each other; and when the night came she red a familiar hollow tree and warned him to go home. ext day they met again, and the next; for there is a rule woodland courtship, three times he must offer and be sed. Then having passed this proof, all may be well. he tradition of the woods was fully carried out, and nertail, with Silvergray, was looking for a home. innertail was well satisfied with the home in the red oak assumed that thither he should bring his bride. But he not reckoned with certain big facts—that is, laws—for the on that he had never before met them. The female wild g claims all authority in matters of the home, and in the ymoon time no wild mate would even challenge her ; to rule.

the red-oak den was then and there abandoned. Search ie hickory grove resulted in a find. A flicker had dug the trunk of a tall hickory where it was dead. Once ough the outer shell the inner wood was rotten punk, too for a flicker to work in, but exactly right and easy for a squirrel.

IN THEIR COMBAT RAGE THEY PAID NO HEED TO WHERE THEY WERE. THEIR EVERY CLUTCH WAS ON EACH OTHER, AND OVER THEY TUMBLED INTO OPEN SPACE

Bannertail

The Story of a Gray Squirrel

By ERNEST THOMPSON SETON

Decorations by Charles Livingston Bull

impulse—fat acorns, found from last year's crop and hidden deep in the lining of the nest.

There can be no happier time for any wild and lusty live thing than when working with a loving mate at the building and making of the nest.

Their world is one of joy—fine weather, fair hunting, with food enough, overwhelming instincts at their flush of compulsion—all gratified in sanest, fullest measure. This sure is joy; and Bannertail met each yellow sunup with his loudest song of praise, as he watched it from the highest lookout of his home tree.

His Qwa song reached afar, and in its vibrant note expressed the happy time and, expressing it, intensified it in himself.

There seemed no ill to mar the time. Even the passing snowstorms of the month seemed trifles; they were little more than landmarks on the joyful way.

The stormy moon of March was nearly over when a change came on their happy comradeship. Silvergray seemed to show a coolness, a singular aloofness. If they were on the same branch together, she did not sit touching him. If he moved to where she chanced to stand and tried, as a thousand times before, to snuggle up, she moved away. The cloud, whatever its cause, grew bigger. In vain he sought by pleasing acts to win her back. She had defiantly turned against him; and the climax came when one evening they climbed to their finished, set and furnished house. She whisked in ahead of him, then, turning suddenly, filled the doorway, with her countenance expressing defiance and hostility, her sharp teeth menacingly displayed. She said as plainly as she could: "You keep away; you're not wanted here."

And Bannertail—what could he do? Hurt, rebuffed, not wanted in the house he had made and loved, he turned away perforce and glumly sought his bachelor home in the friendly old red oak.

Whatever was the cause, Bannertail knew that it was his part to keep away, at least to respond to her wishes. Next morning, after feeding, he swung to the nesting tree. Yes, there she was; but at once she retreated to the door and repeated the signal: "You are not wanted here." And the next day it was the same. Then on the third day she was nowhere to be seen. Bannertail hung about, hoping for a glimpse, but none he got. Then cautiously, fearfully he climbed the old familiar barkway; silently arrived at the door, he gently thrust in his head. The sweet, familiar, furry smell told him, Yes, she was there.

He moved inward another step. Yes, there she lay curled up and breathing, one step more when up she started with an angry little snort, and Bannertail sprang back and away, but not before he had seen and sensed this solving of the mystery. There, snuggling together under her warm body, were three tiny little baby squirrels.

For this indeed it was that Mother Nature whispered messages and rules of conduct. For this time it was she had dowered this untutored little mother squirrel with all the garnered wisdom of the folk before. Nor did she leave them now, but sent the very message to mother squirrel and father squirrel and the little ones, too, at the very time when their own poor knowledge must have failed.

IT WAS the unspoken hint from her that made the little mother-soon-to-be hide in the nesting place some nuts with buds of slippery elm and twigs of spice bush and the bitter but nourishing red acorns. In them were food and tonic for the trying time. Water she could get near by, but even that called for no journey forth, for it chanced that a driving rain drenched the tree, and at the very door she found enough to drink.

Bannertail was left to himself, like a bachelor driven to his club. He had become wise in wood lore, so that the food question was no longer serious.

Amusement aplenty Bannertail found in building "drays" or tree nests. These are stick platforms of the simplest openwork placed high in convenient trees. Some are for lookouts, some for sleeping porches when the night is hot, some are for the sun bath that every wise squirrel takes. Here he would lie on his back in the morning sun with his belly exposed, his limbs outsprawling, and let the healing sun rays strike through the thin skin, reaching every part with their actinic power.

The bond between them had kept Bannertail near his mate, and her warning kept him not too near. Yet it was his daily wont to come to the nesting tree and wait about in case of anything being needed, he knew not what. And thus it was that he heard a rustling in the near-by limbs one day, and then caught a flash of red. A stranger approaching the tree of trees! All Bannertail's fighting blood was aroused. He leaped by well-known jumps, and coursed along well-known overways, till he was on the nesting tree, and undulated like a silvery shadow up the familiar trunk to find himself facing the very red squirrel whose range he once had entered, and from whom he, Bannertail, had fled.

But what a change of situation and of heart! Redhead scoffed and shook his flaming tail. He shrieked his Skit, skit! and stood prepared to fight. Did Bannertail hold back—he, Bannertail, that formerly had declined the combat with this very rogue? Not for an instant! There was new-engendered power within compelling him. He sprang on the red bandit with all his vigor and drove his teeth in deep. Redhead was a fighter too. He clinched and bit. They clung, wrestled and stabbed, then losing hold of the tree went hurtling to the earth below. In air they flung apart, but landing unhurt they clinched again on the ground; then Redhead, bleeding from many little wounds and over-matched, sought to escape, dodged this way and that, found refuge in a hole under a root; and Bannertail, breathless, with two or three slight stabs, swung slowly up the tree from which Silvergray had watched the fight of her mate.

There never yet was feminine heart that withheld its meed of worship from her fighting champion coming home victorious, which reason may not have entered into it at all. But this surely counted: The young ones' eyes were opened; they were no longer shapeless lumps of flesh. The time had come for the father to rejoin the brood.

With the come-together instinct that follows fight, he came to the very doorway. She met him there, whisker to whisker. She reached out and licked his wounded shoulder; then when she reentered the den he came in too. Nosing his brood to get their smell, just as a woman mother buries her nose in the creasy neck of her baby, he gently curled about them all, and the reunited family went sound asleep.

III

NOT many days later they had a new unfriendly visitor. It was in the morning rest hour that follows early breakfast. The familiar Cluck, cluck! of a flicker had sounded from a near tree top. Then his stirring tattoo was heard

(Continued on Page 142)

Miss Saratoga

TAILORED SCHOOL DRESSES

HERE are three of the new tailored School Dresses sponsored by "Miss Saratoga." They have charmed the critical shopping public of our leading cities; we feel sure they will charm all mothers who have daughters 6 to 14 years of age.

Made of excellent cottons and linens in guaranteed fast colors. Tailored with seams that are strong, with buttons that stay on, with simple yet pretty trimmings suited to young girls. They are easy to wash and still easier to iron; in fact mothers tell us they are the most practical school and every-day dresses they have ever seen.

Best of all: Prices are extremely low for really fine garments.

Ask your favorite department store for either "Miss Saratoga" School Dresses or "Miss Saratoga" Middy Blouses, Middy Dresses, Middy Suits and Bloomers. Or write us direct for style plates and we will see that you are served.

CRIPPEN & REID
Baltimore, Md.

New York Office: 1182 Broadway
1182 Broadway

This picture is a real photograph and shows exactly how our School Dresses look on real girls.

Miss Saratoga
THE GUARANTEED BRAND
CRIPPEN & REID - BALTIMORE

Bannertail

(Continued from Page 141)

on a high, dead limb of the one tree. A little later a scratching sound, and the hole above was darkened by the head and shoulders of a big bird peering down at them through the opening. His big, long beak was opened to utter a loud, startling Clap!

Up leaped Bannertail to meet and fight off the invader. There was little fighting to be done, for the flicker sprang back onto a high limb. His fighting feathers were raised, and his threatening beak did look very dangerous, but he did not wait for Bannertail to spring on him. He swooped away in a flurry of yellow wings and with a chuckle of derision. It was a small incident, but it made a second break in their sense of secrecy.

One day later came a still more disturbing event. A roving, prowling cur found the fresh squirrel track up the tree, and yapped so persistently that two boys who were leagued with the dog for all manner of evil came, marked the hole and spent half an hour throwing stones at it, varying their volleys with heavy pounding on the trunk to "make the squirrel come out."

Of course neither Bannertail nor Silvergray showed themselves. That is very old wood wisdom: "Lay low; keep out of sight when the foe is on the warpath"; and at last the besiegers and their yap colleague tramped away without having seen sign or hair of a squirrel.

There was very little to the incident, but it sank deep into Silvergray's small brain. "That nest is ill concealed. Every hostile creature finds it." Their only course was to abandon it.

TWICE a day now, Silvergray left the little ones to forage for herself—soon after sunrise and just before sunset. It was on the morning outing that she went house hunting. And Bannertail went too. Ever he led to the cozy home in his old red oak. But there is a right that is deeply rooted in custom, in logic and in female instinct, that it is the she one's right to select, prepare and own the home. Every suggestion that he made by offered lead or actual entry was scorned, and the one who made it snubbed. She did her own selecting and, strangest thing of all, she chose the rude stick nest of a big-winged hawk, abandoned now, for the hawk himself, with his long-clawed mate, was nailed to the end of the barn.

Winter storm and beaming sun had purged and purified the rough old aerie—it was high on a most unclimbable tree, yet sheltered in the wood—and here Silvergray halted in her search. All about the nest and tree she climbed, and smelled to find the little owner marks of musk or rasping teeth, if such there should be, the marks that would have warned her that this place was already possessed. None there were. The place was without taint, bore only through and through the clean, sweet odor of the woods and wood.

And this is how she took possession: She rubbed her body on the rim of the nest, she nibbled off projecting twigs, she climbed round and round the trunk below and above, thus leaving her foot and body scent everywhere about, then gathered a great mouthful of springtime twigs with their soft green leaves and laid them in the hawk nest for the floor cloth of her own.

She went farther and found a sassafras with its glorious, flaming smell of incense, its redolence of aromatic purity and, with a little surge of joy instinctive, she gathered bundle after bundle of the sweet strong twigs, spread them out for the rug and floor cloth of the house. Bannertail did the same.

This was the founding of the new nest, and these were among the hidden springs of action and of unshaped thoughts that ruled the founding.

The nest was finished in three days. A rain roof over all of fresh flat leaves, an inner lining of chewed cedar bark, an abundance of aromatic sassafras, one or two little quarrels over accidental rags that Bannertail still seemed to think worth while—thus the new nest was finished, pure and sweet, with a consecrating, plague-defying aroma of cedar and of sassafras to be its guardian angel.

It was early in the morning, soon after sunrise, that the Graycoats took the hazard of moving the young. Silvergray had fed the babies and looked out and about, and had come back and looked again. Then picking up the nearest by the scruff of its neck, she rose to the doorway.

Thenshetook the final plunge and went scurrying and scrambling down the trunk. On the ground she paused again, looked forward and back, and then to the old nest to see her mate go in and come out again with a young one in his mouth, though he knew exactly what was doing and how his help was needed.

With an angry Quare! she turned and scrambled up again, bumping the baby she bore with many a needless jolt, and met Bannertail. Nothing less than rage was in her voice, Quare, quare, quare! and she sprang at him.

He could not fail to understand. He dropped the baby on a broad, safe crook and whisked away to turn and gaze with immeasurable surprise. "Isn't that what you wanted, you hot-head?" he seemed to say. "Didn't we plan to move the kids?"

Her only answer was a hissing Quare! She rushed to the stranded little one, made one or two vain efforts to carry it as well as the one already in her mouth, then bounded back to the old home with her own charge dropped it, came rushing back for the second took that home, too, then vented all her wrath and warnings in a loud, long Quare! which plainly meant: "You let the kids alone. I don't need your help. I wouldn't trust you. This is a mother's job."

SHE stayed and brooded over them a long time before making the third attempt. And this time the impulse came from the tickling crawlers in the bed. She looked forth and saw Bannertail sitting up high, utterly bewildered. She gave a great warning Quare! seized number one for the third time and forth she leaped to make the great migration.

Bannertail had taken the hint. He was still up high, watching, but not going near the old nest.

Silvergray, having safely placed number one in the new home, went back for number two, and then for number three.

She was curled up with the three in the new high nest for long before Bannertail, after much patient, watchful waiting, seeing no return of Silvergray, went swinging to the old nest to peep in and realize that it was empty, cold, abandoned.

He sat and thought it over. On a high, sunny perch that he had often used, he made his toilet as does every healthy squirrel. He drank of the spring, went foraging for a while, then undulated to the new-made nest and shyly, cautiously, dreading a rebuff, went slowly in.

Yes, there they were. But would she take him in? He uttered the low, soft, coaxing Er-er-er, which expresses every gentleness in the range of squirrel thought and feeling. No answer. He made no move, but again gave a coaxing Er-er-er. A long pause. Then from the hovering, furry form in the nest came one soft Er, and Bannertail, without reserve, glided in and curled about them all.

(Continued in the April Home Journal)

Feature Strap

Reinforced Diaphragm

TREO

GIRDLE

Patented

The All-Elastic Corset

TREO

Paraknit

Patented

Elastic Brassiere

THE Treo Girdle is made entirely of surgical elastic web. Combines style and grace with comfort. Gives freely to every movement of the body, yet firmly holds figure. Our patented method of construction and character of materials used make it equally suited for street, evening and sport wear. Retail from $2.00 to $15.00. Write for illustrated booklet.

IS made of "Paraknit," a new light-weight, open-work, elastic material invented by Treo Co. expressly for bust-reducing, bust-supporting brassieres. Gives natural and graceful contour. Flexible and extremely stylish. Diaphragm feature is very advantageous, supporting and reducing diaphragm. White or flesh. Sizes 34 to 52. Retail $2.00 and up. Write for illustrated booklet.

TREO COMPANY, Inc.

160-B Fifth Avenue, New York Canadian Address: Hisman & Co., Toronto

“Mum is the word” — says The Dainty Woman

DO YOU want to be always free from the embarrassing odor of perspiration and other body odors?

“Mum” is the word.

At the dance, theatre, reception, or other crowded places, where the air is apt to be close—do you want to enjoy the comfortable assurance that these odors cannot steal away your feminine daintiness and charm?

“Mum” is the word.

“Mum” is the word for the delicate snow-white cream that prevents the odor of perspiration and all other body odors.

“Mum” is the discovery of an eminent physician. It removes all body odors; but it does not check perspiration nor interfere with any function of the body. Neither does it irritate the skin—or even make it the least bit uncomfortable. You can use it as often as you like.

“Mum” does not stain or injure the finest waist or gown. You can dress immediately after using “Mum.”

With each jar of “Mum” is a pamphlet which tells more about this delicate subject and explains why “Mum” is especially the friend of womankind.

Get “Mum” today—25c at your drug, or department store.

And get “Amoray,” the rich exotic talc (really a Powder Perfume) whose fragrance lasts throughout the day and evening, giving you the combined effect of a talc and a perfume—dainty and refined, cool and comfortable—35c.

But the most important thing is “Mum”—“Mum” is the word. Every dainty woman needs “Mum.”

SPECIAL OFFER

IN order to introduce “Amoray” (Powder Perfume), the distinctive feminine talc, we are making this special offer. Send us 50c and your dealer's name and we'll send you both “Mum” and “Amoray” postpaid. Use the coupon.

Mum Mfg. Co. March 1922
1100 Chestnut St., Philadelphia
I enclose $_____. Please send me the articles checked below.
☐ “Mum” 25c ☐ “Amoray” 35c
☐ Special offer “Mum” and “Amoray” 50c
Name _____
Address _____
City _____
Dealer's Name _____
Dealer's Address _____

“Mum” prevents all body odors—25c
Elderflower Eye Lotion—75c

MUM MFG. CO., 1100 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA

“Amoray” Talc—Powder Perfume—35c
Evans' Cucumber Jelly—25c

"Onyx" Hosiery

Perfectly fits the smartest of ankles. "Onyx" is the Hosiery of Fashion

EMERY & BEERS COMPANY INC. • WHOLESALE DISTRIBUTORS • NEW YORK

STEERO BOUILLON CUBES

Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

Patented Oct. 21, 1919

Does your family eat as heartily as a lively boy?

Perhaps you have often despaired of the lagging appetite of your family as the food, no matter how tempting, went almost untouched.

But have you considered serving a hot, savory dish like hot bouillon made from STEERO bouillon cubes at the beginning of a meal?

Hot STEERO bouillon helps to make folks eat as if they really wanted to, and it is easily and quickly made.

Put a STEERO bouillon cube in a cup and simply add boiling water. It is ready to be served immediately.

Try STEERO bouillon cubes for seasoning and flavoring other dishes such as left-overs, meat and vegetable sauces.

Put STEERO bouillon cubes on your order list today—and insist that you get STEERO.

Send for Free Samples

Let us send you free samples of STEERO bouillon cubes so that you may learn how good hot STEERO bouillon tastes. Write today. If you enclose ten cents we will also send you the 64-page STEERO Cook Book, full of practical and delicious recipes—helpful to every housewife.

Schieffelin & Co.
260 William St., New York
Distributors for American Kitchen Products Co.,
New York

"A Cube Makes a Cup" "Simply Add Boiling Water"

STEERO BOUILLON CUBES—the trade-mark STEERO is on every wrapper—are sold in boxes of 12, 50, and 100. If not readily obtainable at your dealer's we will mail direct upon receipt of 35 cents a box of 12. Ask for STEERO bouillon cubes.

The Complete Furnishing of the Little House

(Continued from Page 32)

of a colored thin material close to the glass of the recessed window that seems to demand this treatment. Also in the old-fashioned house that has those excessively high ceilings and overpoweringly tall windows, all the window draperies, including the side drapes and valance, are sometimes successfully hung inside the window trim, which acts as a frame for them, thereby greatly decreasing the apparent size of the windows.

Overdraperies are usually lined, and the more professionally made they are the more likely they are to be lined. But this again is a matter of taste in many instances. Things that may be said in favor of lining side drapes are, first, that they wear better; second, that they hang better; and third, that their colors are not unpleasantly diffused by the light shining through them. Many experts consider that the additional cost of lining is made up in the long run by the increased service the curtain gives. The materials that are almost universally used for lining draperies are unbleached muslin and sateen; these are cut so they come to within about an inch of the curtain edge, which space is taken up by the hem of the curtain itself. At the bottom of the side drapes, the hems of both the drapes and the linings hang free, so that there will be no buckling, but here also the lining is fully an inch shorter than the drape.

There is a great difference in materials that are chosen for draperies, and this frequently governs the matter of lining: the figured linens, stunningly beautiful as these usually are, have a spotty and muddy effect when hung unlined against the light, which hardly improves their appearance; while the same designs in cretonne have a translucence and luminous quality that sometimes makes the color effect quite wonderful when the sun is shining through, and too decorative to disregard. In this case linings are frequently dispensed with. The decision in the matter of all side-drape linings becomes simple, if two points are carefully considered: If the material looks better or worse with the light falling through it; and, second, if the light falling through the material causes the silhouette of the window trim to force itself unpleasantly upon the attention, when the overdraperies were intended to hide it.

Valances are always lined, with the exception of Dutch valances, which are formed of a connecting piece of material, cut as short as will look well, and run on the same rod between the two side drapes of a window; and plainly made full valances that run across the entire window width and are placed so that the bottom edges do not come in contact with the light of the window. In a full valance, greater softness is made possible if the material is unlined.

Valance Boards

VALANCES may be Dutch, full, or fitted. The fitted valance may be made in any shape desired, for which it is safer to first make a paper or lining pattern before cutting the material. Full valances may be made straight top and bottom; or straight at the top and sloped down gradually at the outer edges to the bottom, which results in their being curved down over the side drapes. Valances may be made of material that matches the side drapes, or if the side drapes are of figured or striped material the valances may be of a plain, contrasting color in the same or a different material.

The most professional way to attach draperies to the window, and I have always felt it was the easiest way, too, despite all we hear about gooseneck rods, is to make use of a valance board.

Valance boards are also called cornice boards and may be ordered to fit any window; and they cost, together with the rod, about a dollar and a half. The boards measure three inches in width, and about seven-eighths of an inch in thickness; in length they should reach just as far across the window as you plan to run the outside edges of your side drapes. The valance boards that are bought to order have end pieces of wood about three inches square and seven-eighths of an inch in thickness; in other words, exactly matching the boards themselves, except that they are only three inches long. These are used to project the valance boards three inches toward the room, and out over the windows. This three-inch projection is very important, for inside of this are hung all the other curtains, and this space is just enough to allow these curtains to hang down precisely as they should without interfering with each other. The valance board is fastened to the window trim with cornice hooks and eyes, and along the top of the valance board are set little drive hooks, or even tacks that stick up well, to which the valances themselves are attached by means of a row of little rings sewed in corresponding spaces on the wrong side of the valance a half inch down from the top edge.

The valance should be cut big enough, so it will turn the corners and cover the projection pieces of the valance board.

Inside the valance board there is fastened a rod for the side drapes. This is set in far enough so that the side drapes will not bump out the valances even if they are arranged to pull together. A draw-cord equipment consisting of cord, pulleys and drops may be ordered, or one may be contrived at home by tying a cord to the first and last rings of each curtain, running through the rings, with two drop cords arranged to fall from the back of the curtain. When the curtain tops are above the reach of the hand, there must be this method of adjustment.

Draw Curtains and Roller Shades

INSIDE the valance board, also, are arranged the separate rods for the glass curtains, and fastened at the extreme inside of the width of the board, or on the window trim itself, so that they will be brought sufficiently near the glass. If draw curtains are desired, these, of course, should be hung between the side drapes and the glass curtains, midway of the space the valance board allows between the two.

At very slight cost valance boards can be made at home. A three-inch-wide board, seven-eighths of an inch thick, may be cut the proper length and set up on the top of the window trim with its seven-eighths thickness resting against the wall, which still gives the required three-inch projection into the room. The board is fastened in position with knee irons, and the curtain rods are held in position to the under side of the board.

Draw curtains take the place of roller shades and are being most extensively used. They are of a plain, colorful material as a rule, and are for use at night when light is shining brightly in the rooms. They are hung, as I have said, between the glass curtains and the overdrapes, and they may be drawn together as little or as much as may be desired, or completely hidden from sight behind the side drapes. They may come to the bottom of the window trim, or to the floor.

Roller shades are not particularly decorative, even when made of cretonne, since their flat surface is extremely unyielding and uninteresting in appearance. Cream or white shades are much more possible than the regulation green ones, but even when these are used it is better to keep them rolled all the way to the top of the window out of sight when not in immediate use, thereby not spoiling the window treatment. The only shade I can recommend as not really ruining the decorative effect of a window is the shade made of crinkled Austrian cloth or puff shading, usually in a deep ivory or cream. This is mounted on a roller, and at the bottom there is an uneven and attractive line, two or three long scallops, and a good-looking cord and heavy tassel for a pull. A slat or rod is run near the bottom of these curtains so that they will not buckle. They cost about nine dollars apiece, if bought ready made; but a clever woman could make them herself, since it is possible to buy the cloth by the yard, which can be attached to the regulation roller.

Modern Venetian blinds are also exceedingly decorative and may easily be the making of the room in which they are used. Painted to match the woodwork they may

(Continued on Page 147)

REMOVES FINGER PRINTS

HOT DISHES WON'T MAR

WILL RENEW LINOLEUM

FOR WOODWORK

JOHNSON'S PREPARED WAX

Paste - Liquid - Powdered

JOHNSON'S PREPARED WAX cleans, polishes, preserves and protects—all in one operation. It does not catch dust and lint—takes the drudgery from dusting—rejuvenates the original finish—and gives an air of immaculate cleanliness.

Johnson's Prepared Wax forms a thin, protecting film over the finish, similar to the service rendered by plate glass over a desk, table or dresser top.

Johnson's Prepared Wax Paste is the proper finish and polish for floors of all kinds—wood, tile, marble, composition and linoleum. It does not show scratches or heel-prints—and floors polished with it can easily be kept in perfect condition.

Johnson's Liquid Prepared Wax is just the thing for polishing woodwork, trim, furniture, pianos, automobiles and leather-upholstery, shoes, traveling bags, etc.

Insist upon Johnson's Prepared Wax and Artistic Wood Finishes—there is no substitute.

Mail coupon for our beautiful color book on Home Beautifying—FREE.

S. C. JOHNSON & SON, Dept. LH3, Racine, Wis.
"The Wood Finishing Authorities"

Canadian Factory: Brantford

FREE—This Book on Home Beautifying

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

Best Paint Dealer's Name _____

F. W. WOOLWORTH CO. 5 AND 10¢ STORE

10¢

EACH

Cap and Fringe; Extra Large;
Single and Double Mesh

Lorraine

TRADE MARK

Single and Double Mesh HAIR NETS

IF you want the best there is in a hair net, choose a Lorraine. Lorraine Hair Nets, sold exclusively at and guaranteed by the Woolworth stores, are the finest hair nets money can buy.

In single and double mesh; cap and fringe shape; all colors, including grey and white—10c!

Stop in tomorrow and buy a supply.

Sold Exclusively at and Guaranteed by F. W. WOOLWORTH CO. Stores

The Complete Furnishing of the Little House

(Continued from Page 144)

take the place of any other curtain treatment at the window group. Inside shutters are decorative impossibilities, and rather than bother to drape around them, under them, or on top of them, it is always better to have them removed—that is, when you wish attractive windows.

Casement windows may have overdraperies as a rule only when they open out, when it may be very stunningly accomplished. When opening in, their glass curtains are usually cased top and bottom on small brass rods adjusted to the woodwork of the casement sash itself, thus moving with the window.

Window groups may be treated as one unit, a valance stretching over the entire series, a side drape at each outer side, and glass curtains next to the panes, with draw curtains in their proper relation to the other curtains. When the group is a bay window, the draw curtains are placed in near the glass curtains.

The French doors in a room should be treated with side drapes if desired, but never with valances, even when the windows in the same room have these. French doors are always more attractive when not covered up with glass curtains, and a simple way out of this difficulty, when it is really necessary to be able to shut one room off from another, is to have the side drapes of sufficient width to be drawn together over the closed French door.

When glass curtains are insisted upon, these are usually made of silk gauze, cased top and bottom on the door proper, sometimes not covering the top row of panes, and sometimes covering all completely, but not any more of the door woodwork than is necessary.

Open doorways may have portières of plain material, if desired, preferably of velvet, rep, or figured linen. These should hang straight from their simple wooden pole, without being tied back, and they may be of contrasting materials on either side, thus making it possible to follow different color schemes in adjoining rooms.

Among the materials that may be used for the overdraperies of windows are the figured cretonnes and printed linens, velours, silks, taffetas which are made expressly for this purpose, sunproof material, granite, linen frisé, mohair cloth, unbleached muslin that is dyed a stunning color, velveteen, antique grograin, and tussah.

My Years on the Stage

(Continued from Page 25)

company—several of the men were members of The Players and also wanted to be there that night—attached to the newspaper-and-mail train that arrives in Boston early in the morning.

We had the most uncomfortable train ride and arrived early, far out in the yards. We went to our hotels, where we learned that we were not booked to play a holiday matinee. New Year's Day was not at that time a holiday in the State of Massachusetts. The company manager had not taken the trouble to consult the Frohman office. He took it for granted that we were to play a matinee.

Nat Goodwin got his start as the hind legs of the heifer in Evangeline in Boston, where his father had been a gambler. Some years afterwards Nat came back to Boston—he had made considerable of an impression as an actor and an imitator in the meantime—and a dinner was given him by some club.

In reply to a toast he said he was so glad to receive this kindness from the citizens of the town "where he had dwelt and his father had dealt so long."

It was Nat's idea of humor without any restriction; he couldn't help saying that, and he wouldn't conceal the fact that his father had been a gambler.

He was a great mimic, and he was one of the great natural comedians of this country, and now he is only a name. He left little to talk about except his many marriages.

I played two plays by W. Somerset Maugham: Smith and Jack Straw. Smith, in which Mary Boland played the title part, was a success from the beginning.

An Actor in His Home Town

THOMAS FREEMAN, the part I played, comes back from South Africa to find the society he had lived in before entirely changed; he finds it inane and almost vicious. In the parlor maid Smith, so beautifully played by Mary Boland, he finds a mate to take back to Africa with him in preference to anyone of his own kind.

In my company in Jack Straw, which, like Smith, was also a great success, there were a number of amateurs, for in one scene there was a restaurant and a number of people walked on and took places at tables. One of the young men had nothing to do except to walk to a table with a young woman, to be told by the head waiter to go to another table, and then, after they had moved, to be told that they must move again. They are supposed to be very irate at this. It was all dumb show.

When we were on tour we reached the native town of this young man, and the papers in advance had some small notices about him and that he was a member of my company.

"It's too bad," I told him, "that you are making your first appearance in your home town as a mere figure."

I wrote him some lines, so that this friendly audience could see him do something more than merely walk on and so he could say that he had acted in a play.

The night of the performance came. The house was full of his friends and they gave him a great reception, so great that he forgot all the lines that I had written for him. He just went through the dumb show as usual.

Even an Old Actor Forgets

SUDDEN loss of memory in the theater is not uncommon, and it is often tragic in its consequences.

But there is an amusing story of an old actor who had been out of a job for a long time. Finally he obtained a small part which, for anyone of experience, should have been easily learned.

In the play he had a speech in which he advised his son to be very diligent and persistent. This fatherly advice ended with the good old adage that "Time is money."

When he got to this line on the opening night he said: "Don't forget that time is —" He paused, coughed and appealed to the prompter, who answered in an audible whisper: "Money."

The old actor: "Oh, yes—time is money."

The deduction was it had been so long since he had had any money that he had forgotten it existed.

My season at the Empire Theater under the management of Charles Frohman usually opened on Labor Day or very close to that day.

I played a varying number of weeks in New York and then went on tour. Our itinerary on the road was much the same, except that we did not go to the Coast every year. One year we would go to New Orleans, playing Richmond, Charleston, Savannah and the intervening towns on our way, and the next year we would go to the Coast.

The year that we did My Wife, a comedy by Michael Morton from the French of Gavault et Charnar, we went both South and West. We reached the Coast just at the time the fleet came into San Francisco; that was the year that Roosevelt sent the fleet around the world. There was a great deal of enthusiasm and a good deal of entertaining for the officers and men. I knew many of the

(Continued on Page 148)

THE 40th LEONARD YEAR

"Like a Clean China Dish"

Leonard CLEANABLE Refrigerator

The Leonard helps the housewife to serve better meals at less cost; it lessens her drudgery; gives her more rest.

The Leonard saves your food and keeps it fresh. It gives you most refrigeration with least ice. That's Leonard economy—proved by many tests.

Exclusive Leonard features: One-piece porcelain-lined food chamber, rounded inside corners, ten walls of insulation, patent trap, non-leaking device, airtight locks, retinned shelves. Rear icing door and porcelain-lined water cooler, if desired.

One out of every seven refrigerators sold is made by Leonard. See the nearest Leonard dealer. If you fail to find him, write us; we will see that you are supplied.

Send for actual porcelain sample and catalog illustrating over 75 styles and sizes of refrigerators. Mr. Leonard's booklet, "Selection and Care of Refrigerators," will be mailed, too.

C. H. LEONARD

There is a size and style of Leonard Refrigerator to suit every purse

GRAND RAPIDS REFRIGERATOR COMPANY

23 Clyde Avenue, GRAND RAPIDS, MICHIGAN

Be sure the refrigerator you buy is made in Grand Rapids

Minute Tapioca

Try this Minute Tapioca Raisin Pie

Boil for 15 minutes 4 tablespoons of Minute Tapioca, a pinch of salt, 3/4 cup of sugar and 3/4 cup of raisins in a pint of hot water. Remove from stove and add 1 egg slightly beaten. Line a deep plate with a pie crust, fill with the cooked tapioca, sprinkle with nutmeg or cinnamon. Cover with a top crust and bake a delicate brown, or make with one crust and use a meringue.

This is another way to serve Minute Tapioca. Minute Tapioca requires no soaking and may be thoroughly cooked in 15 minutes. Serve it often, for it is both delicious and nutritious. Always identify it by the red and blue package.

Send for free Minute Cook Book and folder of new receipts.

Minute Tapioca Co., 13 Jefferson Street, Orange, Mass.
Makers of Minute Tapioca, Minute Gelatine, and Star Brand Pearl Tapioca

Sani-Flush

Cleans Closet Bowls Without Scouring

Stains, incrustations and rust marks that make a closet bowl so unsightly, and are hard to get rid of in any other way, are promptly and thoroughly removed by Sani-Flush.

And by thoroughly cleansing every part of the bowl and trap Sani-Flush makes the use of disinfectants or harmful preparations of any kind unnecessary.

Always keep Sani-Flush handy in your bathroom.

Sani-Flush is sold at grocery, drug, hardware, plumbing and house-furnishing stores. If you cannot buy it locally at once, send 25c in coin or stamps for a full sized can, postpaid. (Canadian price, 35c; foreign price, 50c.)

THE HYGIENIC PRODUCTS CO.

Canton, Ohio

Canadian Agents

Harold F. Ritchie & Co., Ltd., Toronto

"Never Saw a Perfect Set of Teeth in any American Child"

—Says Noted N. Y. Dentist

This condition is due to neglect, bad habits, carelessness or ignorance of the proper means of preserving the teeth.

Calox—the Oxygen Tooth Powder—kills the germs of tooth decay. For Calox, when wet by the mouth fluids, develops oxygen—Nature's own germicide.

Calox also neutralizes the acids that eat into the enamel of the teeth.

Send for liberal sample and free booklet, "The Truth About Tooth Pastes and Dentifrices."

McKESSON & ROBBINS, Inc., New York

CALOX

The Oxygen Tooth Powder

STUDY NURSING FINE POSITIONS SECURED
Write PHILADELPHIA SCHOOL FOR NURSES
2223 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Wedding Invitations, Announcements, Etc.
500 in script lettering, including two sets of envelopes, $1.50. 100 Vail-ing Cards, $1.00. Write for samples.
L. OTT ENGRAVING CO., 1033 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

My Years on the Stage

(Continued from Page 147)

commanders and we visited several of the ships for lunch.

My Wife did an enormous business in San Francisco that year, as it had done everywhere on the road. In all the towns that we visited, Billie Burke, who was my leading woman, was acclaimed as a charming actress and a beautiful woman. She played Beatrice DuPre.

In this play I am the guardian of Beatrice, who has run away from school and suddenly appears at my place. We go to Switzerland, and I gradually fall in love with her. On our return we are married.

Someone sent out some press stuff to the effect that I was not only her guardian in this play but that I had some years before made a pact with her father—whose name also was Billie Burke—that, in case of his death, I would look out for his daughter. Of course there was no truth in this statement. Billie Burke had become my leading woman because she had done well in some Frohman plays in London. Charles Frohman was much pleased with her reception in this country, and the following year he starred her in Love Watches.

One night just after the play in San Francisco, word was brought into my dressing room that Mr. Daly wanted to see me. I did not know anyone named Daly in the city at that time, nor could I place him when a large, powerful-looking Chinaman wearing American clothes was ushered into my room.

"You don't remember Lu Lung, Mr. Drew?" he said without any accent.

Then I remembered that on one of our trips to the Coast years before, Augustin Daly had bought a little Chinaman from his parents for a period of three years. For a while Lu Lung Daly, dressed in beautiful Chinese clothes, had given out the programs in the lobby of Daly's Theater, and Augustin Daly was greatly pleased with his contract; but he became very tired of the little Chinaman and got too much of him in his household and in his employ.

Daly never found a way to get out of the arrangement which he had made with the boy's parents, and it used to amuse the rest of us a great deal; for he never found any difficulty in getting rid of anyone else connected with the theater. He was forced to support the boy for the entire period.

What Hurt Sothern

NOW he stood before me, recalling the old days and telling me of Chinatown where, from his own talk, he seemed to be something of a power.

"But why do you call yourself Daly?" I asked.

"I was Daly—Lu Lung Daly—when I knew you, and I thought you would remember me that way."

I had been playing in Louisville the first three days of the week, and E. H. Sothern was to follow me for the last three. Before I left town Sothern arrived, and we met in the corridor of the hotel. We were joined by a very dignified old gentleman, who was evidently a citizen of the town.

He came up, bowed and said to Sothern: "Mr. Mansfield, I am very glad to see you here, and I'm going to be delighted to attend every performance of yours during your all too brief sojourn. I have watched your career, Mr. Mansfield."

The citizen of Louisville shook hands with Sothern again and walked away.

"Why, in heaven's name, didn't you say something?" I asked.

"What was there to say?" said Sothern.

"He doesn't know that Dick Mansfield is dead," I went on.

"That doesn't hurt me so much," said Sothern. "He doesn't know that I'm alive."

My daughter, Louise Drew, and I were riding in Central Park one afternoon in December of the year that I was playing Inconstant George at the Empire. My mare stumbled and, while I was trying to get her on her feet again, she fell. Before I could disengage my feet from the stirrups she rolled over me. My collar bone was broken, my shoulder fractured and the ligaments in my right leg twisted.

While I was in the hospital I received a letter from Frederic Remington, the painter:

See by paper you are on the mend. You know I have a life sentence to walk on one leg because of a horse, so I can sympathize. You don't have to walk on your hands, but you will have to be easy when you "muscle out" chairs as you once did so grandly.

MR. DREW'S HOME IN EAST HAMPTON, LONG ISLAND

When I came out of the hospital Frederic Remington was dead.

After some weeks I returned to playing, and I opened my season in Boston with Inconstant George, the play I had been doing before. This adaptation from the French of L'Ane de Buridan was never so successful in this country as it was afterwards in England, where Charles Hawtrey played the leading part, that of the man of many love affairs who falls victim to a young woman at last.

After I left the Daly company I played but one Shaksperian character, Benedick in Much Ado About Nothing. I had always wanted to play this character, and when Maude Adams and I were playing together I had wanted her to play Beatrice. We talked about it a good deal, but it was years afterwards before I finally played Benedick, and Laura Hope Crews was the Beatrice.

What Quotations are For

FROHMAN did not care much about the Shaksperian comedy, but he was not unwilling that I should play Benedick. I suppose that I had been away from this style of comedy too long—more than twenty years; in any event, the production was not a success, and the acting was not up to the standard set in the Daly productions of Shakspeare. This revival was withdrawn and my old success, The Tyranny of Tears, with Barrie's fine play in three scenes, The Will, used as an afterpiece.

In these years as a Frohman star I also played Pinero's play, His House in Order, in which Margaret Illington gave a splendid performance; The Perplexed Husband by Alfred Sutro; The Prodigal Husband, which was adapted from the French; The Chief by Horace Annesley Vachell; and A Single Man by Hubert Davies, in which Ivan Simpson, Mary Boland, Thais Lawton and my daughter, Louise Drew, appeared.

Joseph H. Choate, when he was ambassador to England, had always been extremely kind and gracious to my niece, Ethel Barrymore, and myself when we were in London. I always had a lively recollection of this kindness, and one day when I was walking down Fifth Avenue I saw before me a somewhat bowed figure, which I recognized to be that of Mr. Choate.

I overtook him and said: "Do you remember me, Mr. Choate?"

He looked at me for a moment and said: "Good God, it's Drew."

I said: "It is."

"Mercy, why don't you grow old?" he asked.

It was then some years since our meetings in London.

I replied: "I don't know, Mr. Choate, unless I can explain in the words of old Mr. Adam in As You Like It, who says: 'For in

(Continued on Page 149)

Do You Need Money?

WRITE TO ME NOW!

and I will tell you an easy way to have more money to spend

Thousands of women have a vital need for more money—to properly bring up their family—to meet the present cost of living and tide them over this period of unemployment. Many of them have been helped in this problem and now have money to spend and a permanent assured income by becoming our representatives and selling our

World's Star Hosiery and Klean-Knit Underwear

to their friends and neighbors. As we have shown them, we can show you a fine independent way to have more money to spend.

We've Helped More Than 25,000

They are now enjoying large and prosperous businesses with constantly increasing sales. With our help their incomes are growing larger every day. One woman made over $100 in twenty-one days. By our help one mother of two small children is banking $80 each month after paying all her expenses. You can do just the same as these women have done.

No Previous Experience Is Necessary Write to-day! We will send you our beautifully illustrated catalog—shows how easy it is to become a World's Star Money Maker. Protected territory—prompt deliveries.

We have been in business for twenty-seven years.

WORLD'S STAR KNITTING CO.
Dept. 31 Bay City, Mich.

Coffee that stays at home

Keeps the goodness and flavor of your coffee from wandering away and getting lost. Buy it whole.

Then just before you are ready to pop it into the pot, grind it yourself with the

ARCADE CRYSTAL COFFEE MILL

You'll have a better drink from the same coffee. The tight glass container that keeps the air out, also keeps the goodness of the coffee in and saves for your cup the rich taste and fragrance that escape into the air from store-ground coffee.

The Crystal Mill is adjustable to any degree of fineness and measures the coffee as you grind. Buy it of your dealer. Send for free folder, "How to Make Coffee."

ARCADE MFG. CO.
Freeport, Ill.

Think it's fair?—

to baby's health and content and mother's strength and nerves, not to find out how very much Kiddie-Koop means to their lives?

Free Book Tells

how it saves care, footsteps, fear; how it serves better, yet costs less than separate bassinets, cribs, playpens; how winter and summer, baby asleep or at play, Kiddie-Koop is indispensable. Just write—Send your FREE BOOK

E. M. TRIMBLE MFG. CO.
431 Central Ave., Rochester, N. Y.

See Standard Size at Store; also Junior Model—costs less because smaller, simpler.

KIDDIE-KOOP

OMO BIAS TAPE

13 Widths —
Innumerable Uses

WHATEVER your particular need for dress trimming, there is a particular width and color of OMO BIAS TAPE to meet it.

For facing or finishing hems; for undergarments, wash dresses, aprons—it is the short cut to neatness and accuracy.

Cut on a true bias, joined with flat seams, accurately folded; goes round curves without puckering. Made in 13 widths, in lawns, cambrics, percales.

Your Notion Counter has a complete supply in individual dust proof packets.

THE OMO MANUFACTURING CO.
Main Office and Factory
Middletown, Conn.

TRADE MARK REG.
U. S. PAT. OFF.

J-O DANGER!

Rats, Mice, Roaches and Water Bugs are dangerous pests; every effort should be made to exterminate them. "J-O" Roach-Rat Paste does exterminate them. Sold on a money-back guarantee for 47 years. Safe, clean.

Always look for our trade-mark. It is a guarantee of reliability. SEND 25c in stamps and name of your druggist, and we will send you a full sized can of J-O ROACH-RAT PASTE.

JOHN OPITZ, Inc.

Blissville Long Island City, N. Y.

Kills rats mice roaches

My Years on the Stage

(Continued from Page 148)

my youth I never did apply hot and rebellious liquors in my blood."

He looked at me quizzically under his bushy eyebrows and asked: "Drew, is that entirely true?"

I laughed with him and said: "No, sir; it isn't. That's what quotations are for."

He laughed, patted me on the shoulder, and we parted.

I did not see Charles Frohman before he sailed on the Lusitania, but when I was in Anaconda I received a letter from him telling me that he was sailing very shortly. Alf Hayman, who owned the Empire Theater and ran the business affairs of the Frohman offices, and I had tried to dissuade him. He laughed at us for our fear for him.

In these late years, when I have been playing Philadelphia, I have made pilgrimages to the different places that were associated with my youth.

The Old, Familiar Places

MY OLD school is one of them, the Episcopal Academy at Pine and Locust streets; the school has moved out into the country towards Haverford, but the building still stands.

I walk to Logan Square, where I attended a fair with my mother in the early days of the Civil War. It was called a Sanitary Fair, because it was held under the auspices of the Sanitary Commission. I have an album that my mother bought me there.

I walk down and look at the front of the Arch Street Theater, which holds so many memories. It has fallen on different days and has been in turn a German, a Yiddish, a variety theater!

I go to St. Stephen's Church, Tenth Street, near Chestnut, now in a kind of sordid neighborhood. The church was rehabilitated a comparatively short time ago. The last time I was there I asked to see the baptismal register and found out that I was christened on my mother's birthday, January 10, 1854.

There was a young woman doing some work in the church and, after I pointed out the entry on the register, she said: "Oh, I have something that may interest you."

She brought out a box containing a great many odds and ends, and from it took a silver plate. It brought back memories of going to Sunday school and then being taken into church afterward and being dismissed by my grandmother, Mrs. Kinloch, before the sermon. That silver plate had been on my mother's pew in St. Stephen's for more than sixty years. On the plate was engraved "L. Drew."

"Speak your piece good and you will get a large red apple," was an ancient wheeze of the rural schools.

When my niece, Ethel Barrymore, appeared for the first time at the Garrick Theater in New York in Clyde Fitch's play, Captain Jinks, I gave her a large red apple. This was the start of a custom that I have since observed on the first nights of the plays in which not only my niece, but my two nephews, Lionel and John Barrymore, appear. And in recent years my niece and nephews have sent me a large red apple on the first nights of the plays in which I have appeared.

The two Barrymore boys did not go onto the stage so early as their sister. They both thought of careers outside of the theater, John as a newspaper artist and Lionel as a painter.

John was for a time on the art staff of the Evening Journal in New York. He drew clever but involved pictures. I remember one entitled The Web of Life, in which a lot of weird people were trying to get across some place. It carried an editorial note which began: "This is not an unpleasant picture when looked at properly."

Shortly after 1900 they were all three on the stage, where practically every member of their family before them had been. John is the only one of the three Barrymores who has not played in my company. All three of the Barrymores have been in the moving pictures.

Ethel some years ago appeared in a Russian picture called The Kiss of Hate. The exterior scenes of this play were taken in and around New York. I remember going one day with her to a "location" in the Bronx, where there was quite a Russian, certainly a foreign-looking house. A great number of Russians had been engaged to fill the scene and provide the atmosphere. Among that crowd were Trotsky and one or two others who have since become prominent in Bolshevik circles in Russia.

Of course at that time nothing was known of Trotsky, and he was not identified in the film until the Bolshevik Government was set up in Russia and his pictures began to appear in the newspapers.

"Acting Blood"

THOUGH this country has had no theatrical family which can boast, like the Ichikawa, in Japan, of two hundred years in the theater, there have been several families closely identified with the stage. In an editorial article called Acting Blood, the New York Herald a few years ago printed:

The theatrical profession has produced families in which the acting blood ran strong through more than one generation. The Booths, Jeffersons and Davenports were notable examples of inherited talent, and still more distinguished, in the eyes of the present generation of playgoers, are the Drews, now conspicuously in the public eye. The founder of the family was John Drew, one of the best Irish comedians our stage has known, who flourished during the fifties and whose wife, Mrs. John Drew, was a famous Mrs. Malaprop.

My daughter, Louise Drew, the granddaughter of two famous actresses of the American stage, my mother, Louisa Drew, and Alexina Fisher Baker, and the great-granddaughter of the English actress, Eliza Kinloch, together with the three children of my sister, Georgie Drew Barrymore, herself an actress of fine talent, are carrying on the family tradition and demonstrating the possession of "acting blood" in the fourth generation.

THE END

JOHN DREW IN "THE SECOND IN COMMAND"

STOUT WOMEN

Dress
Fashionably
Look
Slender

STYLE
BOOK
FREE

STOUT women, now, may dress in latest fashion. They can follow the latest mode, fashions of the hour—and look slender.

They can procure ultra-modish clothes—with slenderizing lines—ready to put right on and wear.

Lane Bryant specializes in providing just such clothes. Fashions of the hour re-designed with lines that slenderize.

Prices Very Low

The finest materials and the best workmanship—always. Yet prices are very low, for Lane Bryant manufactures as well as designs—and sells direct to you.

Our service is nation wide. The Lane Bryant stores in New York, Chicago and Detroit serve daily the elite of the land. The Lane Bryant Style Book brings this service to you, right to your very door.

Style Book Free

Best free—the new Lane Bryant Style Book, the only style book published exclusively for stout women. 76 pages. Pictures smartest, new Spring and Summer Coats, Skirts, Dresses, Corsets, Underwear. Sizes 38 to 56 bust. Write today.

Lane Bryant

Address Dept. 50
38th Street at
Fifth Avenue NEW YORK

BEAUTIFUL GARMENTS FOR EASTER

Low in price. Beautifully made by French Needleworkers. Layettes $15.00 (31 pieces) and up. Satisfaction guaranteed. Ask for special Easter folder, also catalog.

De Lis, Dept. F-3, New Orleans, La.

De Lis Hand Made Infants' Wear

1150—Ornate frock 2808—Boys' vest 1332—Pique white, pink or blue, size 6-12 mos. Coat, hand embroidered and white, hand embroidered and smocked in pastel broderie, smart, scalloped, 6 mos. chador, 1 to 2 yrs. $4.00 2 to 3 yrs. $4.00 to 3 yrs. $2.50 1338 (not illustrated)—Hand-made button dress, with pockets, French knots and embroidery. Neck and sleeves edged with lace. 6 mos. 1, 2 years. $3.00

EARN MONEY AT HOME

By coloring and selling our line of black and white Greeting Cards and Folders. Beautiful designs—Fascinating work—Big profits. Our 1922 Easter line, new Birthday and Everyday cards are in stock. Our illus. catalog "Pleasant Pages" gives all information. It's free.

LITTLE ART SHOP, Inc., 624 F St., N. W., Washington, D. C.

GRACE HARLOWE BOOKS

Best and least expensive books for girls. Four new titles. More than 400,000 sold. Write for free catalogue. Henry Altman Co., 1306 Vine St., Phila., Pa.

LAN YOUR HOME NOW

Send for Stillwell Building Books with Economy Plans

of new California Styles suitable for any climate. Famous for comfort and beauty.
"Representative Cal. Homes"
10 Houses—1 to 10 Rooms—$1.
"The New Colonials"
10 Houses—6 to 10 Rooms—$1.
"West Coast Bungalows"
10 Houses—6 & 7 Rooms—$1.
"Little Bungalows"
75 Houses—3-4-5 Rooms—$1.
SPECIAL OFFER: Send $2.50 for any three of these books and Garage Folder FREE.
Money back if not satisfied.

W. STILLWELL & CO., Architects, 749 Calif. Bldg., Los Angeles

SIX-ROOM HOUSE No. 628

Designed for the Service Dept., American Face Brick Assn.

This splendid example of the justly popular Gambrel Roof Colonial House is one of the designs in our "Face Brick Bungalow and Small House Plans." The sun porch, the large living room and the ample, well-ventilated bedrooms are especially worthy of note.

Beautiful, Enduring Homes

THE recollection of an attractive home is one of the richest legacies you can hand on to your children. And if it is an enduring Face Brick house it will remain a living inspiration to them and their children.

The abiding charm of the Face Brick house is not a matter of size and cost. The simple cottage can in its way be as attractive as the magnificent mansion. The economic advantages are as definite. The Face Brick house will last for generations, requires no repairs and but little painting around doors and windows, and lessens fuel costs and insurance rates. It combines beauty, durability, and economy as can no other material.

These matters, as well as comparative costs of various building materials, are fully discussed in "The Story of Brick," an artistic booklet with numerous illustrations and much helpful information for all who intend to build. Sent free.

"Face Brick Bungalow and Small House Plans" is issued in four booklets, showing 3 to 4 room houses, 5 room houses, 6 room houses, and 7 to 8 room houses, in all ninety-two, each reversible with a different exterior design. These designs are unusual and distinctive, combined with convenient interiors and economical construction. The entire set for one dollar. Any one of the booklets, 25 cents. We have the complete working drawings, specifications and masonry quantity estimates at nominal prices.

You may want "The Home of Beauty," fifty designs, mostly two stories, representing a wide variety of architectural styles and floor plans. Sent for 50 cents. We also distribute complete working drawings, specifications and quantity estimates for these houses at nominal prices. Address, American Face Brick Association, 1125 Westminster Building, Chicago, Illinois.

Just a Beginning

(Continued from Page 27)

"Well, all right, daddy. I'll try to, but I don't think those other boys will like it," the boy promised soberly.

"But here's something else," he suggested: "I've got a dollar that Uncle Earl gave me. Would it be all right with you if I spent my own dollar for a battleship now and do all those things you say for three weeks and then get your present too? I'd like to have the other ship in case the boys won't play scrap. Would that be fair?"

"John," replied the family plenipotentiary, "that dollar is your own. You can do as you like with it. But if you get a battleship or any other war toy now, I do not think it will be fair. I think it will be breaking our agreement, even if we didn't say anything about that dollar in the first place. What do you think?"

The Result of the Conference

"I DON'T think it would be fair either. I won't buy it now." The boy said it very quietly. There was tenseness in the child's voice, almost a sob. How he did want that battleship!

There were no further conferences, but a sort of an exchange of ratifications by letter at the end of the next week, when John wrote as follows:

Dear Mother and Daddy: They like the game, but we had a lot of trouble. They drove us out of the bathroom the way I told you, before we got enough water in the tub to sink them. There was a little ice on the pond, but the boy that owns the Japanese fleet has a cold and the housemother won't let him help break the ice to make a Pacific Ocean. But we played the new game with mousetraps that spring up where the cheese is. Not the big round traps with holes in the edges that catch five mice at one time because they are too expensive and are too big to go in the boats. We use the little traps made of just a narrow piece of wood and one spring to catch one mouse. Billy brought one from home and hurt his finger with it, and it flew across the table and broke the round looking-glass his sister gave him to see if his face was clean in before supper. That made him think of something, so he invented this game more than I did and he never went to Washington at all. He put a trap in a boat and sprung it and it knocked over the smokestack and the boat rolled over on its side. We bought a lot of mousetraps for five cents for each.

One boy wasn't in our crowd at all and didn't own any battleship, but he had four white mice in a cage. We gave him two big battleships and a submarine and a raft with a drowning sailor on it for the four mice. Then we put cheese on all the ships and turned the mice loose in the room while we peeked through a crack in the door. It wasn't fair. One of the mice ran away when we looked in and the other three all went and exploded British ships and didn't touch the United States and Japanese. They got killed in the traps. The other one is somewhere in the dormitory and the housemother is sort of mad. She keeps thinking she hears it somewhere. Next day we took the ships away from the other boy because his mice didn't play fair and then we sprung the traps by dropping marbles on them. It wasn't war, but peace, for each one dropped marbles on his own boats and not on the others. We thought at first we'd explode half of them, but we exploded them all, and the rule is we can't fix them till after three weeks, like you said.

But what will we do next? What will we do with the soldiers? We've got a lot of soldiers. We can't play peace by each boy killing his own, like battleships, for soldiers are people. It would be all right if we could kill each other's, but that isn't peace and we can't use them for anything else, because they've all got guns that are made a part of them all in one piece of lead. They are just standing around. Tell me, mother, what to do with the soldiers. The other boys want to know too.

With love, JOHN.

P. S. I think, daddy, I'll want a catcher's mask instead of a battleship after three weeks. And could you send me a quarter in the next letter? I borrowed it for my traps from the boy who owned the mice and he's mad.

JOHN.

The mother of the boy who wrote that letter was only one of millions of mothers who stood, either actually or in spirit, in front of the conference building at Washington, waiting to see what would happen and determined that whatever happened they would demand that it be supplemented by more, by something more every year at future conferences. The women of America know, and the statesmen of America admit it, that the women, beginning a year ago this month, were chiefly responsible for creating in the United States the public opinion that first demanded the conference and enabled it to produce actual results in the way of armament reduction and in bringing about more friendly understanding among nations which, prior to the third anniversary of the armistice, were headed toward war by the route of big navies and competitive battleship building.

Much was accomplished. American women joyously acknowledge it and are grateful to their government, but they have not the slightest intention of letting their government rest. They refuse to grant that we have taken more than the first step on a long road, and now, like the schoolboy, they are asking of the government, what next? They know what they themselves will do next. All through 1922 they will keep up the fight and the agitation to create public opinion that will demand more from the second conference than was obtained from the first.

More and more they will work internationally with the women of Europe and Asia. Briand, the French prime minister, gave them one cue when he declared that France could not disarm morally or physically because Germany was not disarmed morally. American women and English women do not believe that this is true of Germany as a whole. They have much evidence to the contrary, received through the channels of their international organizations.

Mrs. Charles Sumner Bird, head of the international peace work of the National League of Women Voters, wrote letters to all the queens and to many of the leading women of Europe, asking for cooperation. She did this before President Harding made her one of the four women members of the general advisory committee of the conference.

Sympathy from German Women

THERE were many replies to the letters, all of them sympathetic, most of them ardent in their expression of desire for world peace and in their recognition of the fact that women will have to get it, if it is to be got.

Perhaps the most interesting of these replies, because of its source, is that from Luise Ebert, wife of the President of Germany. Madame Ebert's letter, hitherto unpublished, is as follows:

BERLIN, Sept. 11, 1921.

My dear Mrs. Bird: I am in receipt of your letter of August 24 and I have read the contents with much interest.

I am sure that many thousands of German women have exceptional sympathy with the work of the American women for the great ideal of military disarmament and world peace and I wish with all my heart that your work for the benefit of civilization and all mankind will meet with great success.

With expressions of greatest respect,

LUISE EBERT.

I asked Mrs. Bird and her associates who had seen this letter if they considered it as sincere, and therefore significant, or merely a part of the political propaganda which some German women are accused of using for the purpose of getting their country politically reinstated in the world.

"We believe absolutely in the sincerity of it," replied Mrs. Bird.

Of course that belief is in itself tremendously significant. So was the fact that Madame Ebert was selected as one of the European women to whom letters should be sent. There are scores of other letters from German women, also accepted as sincere.

Madame Millerand, wife of the President of the French Republic, through the French consul

(Continued on Page 153)

Home Sewing Means True Economy

YOU can have more clothes for yourself and the children by doing your own sewing.

The manufacturers of Clark's O. N. T. Spool Cotton recently issued a twenty-four page book of designs for children's clothes. It also contains valuable information about hand and machine sewing, which every mother and daughter should know.

If your dealer cannot supply you, send ten cents for a copy of Clark's O. N. T. Book No. 14 to

THE SPOOL COTTON COMPANY
Dept. 56, 315 Fourth Ave. New York

The Best Value in Thread

STARTEX

STARTEX

Even on the finest glass and silver Startex leaves no lint or streaks

THIS new fabric has made the first improvement in dish-washing for generations.

It makes a towel with five important advantages:

1. It positively leaves no lint.
2. It has the highest drying qualities* and does not wet through quickly as ordinary towels do.
3. It launders beautifully, all stains coming out readily.

4. It wears several times as long as ordinary towels.

5. It costs less than even cheap linen, and only a few cents more than the old-fashioned "union crash."

How has this remarkable result been accomplished? By a special process of spinning and weaving.

Linen and cotton are spun together, then woven into the towels both ways. That is the secret of Startex—the soft absorbent fibres of linen combined completely with strands of cotton. Thus we get high drying qualities, strength and complete lintlessness at moderate cost.

Look for the name on the selvedge at any good store. Or send the coupon below and test the Startex towel in your own home.

INTERNATIONAL COTTON MILLS
STARK DIVISION

Lockwood, Greene & Company, Managers

*Proved by scientific laboratory tests made by Professor Haven of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology

STARTEX

CRASH TOWELING

Has linen spun and woven both ways

LAWRENCE & CO.
Selling Agents
BOSTON NEW YORK
CHICAGO

SEND THIS COUPON
and 15 cents for a 27-inch sample Startex towel, and test this quick-drying, lintless new fabric.
Address: STARK MILLS, Manchester, N. H.
Name _____ Address _____

There are dresses that will cost more than L'Aiglon but none that will embody more perfectly the charm, style and exclusiveness which come only from expert workmanship expended upon finest materials. Look for the L'Aiglon label on all gingham or light-weight dresses you buy.

BIBERMAN BROTHERS, Inc., Biberman Building, Philadelphia Manufacturers of L'Aiglon Wash Dresses, Made' and Nurses' Uniforms, Bathrobes

Photographic Reproductions of Moving Picture Favorites

—At your request we will send the L'Aiglon De Luxe Style Book containing art gravures of screen favorites displaying advance Spring and Summer Styles. These plates show every detail of the dress as well as the charming beauty of each actress.

Just a Beginning

(Continued from Page 150)

at Boston, expressed her "sincere appreciation and thanks."

John P. Fletcher writes from Europe to Frederick J. Libby, executive secretary of the National Council for the Limitation of Armaments, of the peace activities going on all the time in both Germany and France. In 1920 these peace demonstrations were held in only three cities of Germany and not more than eighty thousand persons participated in them. In 1921 they were held in all the big cities and in more than two hundred towns, with five hundred thousand participants, both men and women. The motto of the organized women of Germany is "Nie wieder krieg" (No more war).

In France the working men and women, writes Mr. Fletcher, held antiwar demonstrations on the day of the celebrations in Germany. The French and the German peace workers are making speeches in each other's countries.

American women have the machinery of various international organizations, which they are using to help matters in Europe. They want to aid the women of Germany to bring about such a condition in that country that at the next international conference even Briand or his successor will feel justified in amending his speech of the last conference. They want to help the women of France put that country in such a state of mind that its government and Chamber of Deputies will eventually be able to see that there are some people, some tendencies in Germany which they may trust. Noblemaire, of France, already has said that his country wants the friendship of Germany.

"Of course we can trust the German women," Mrs. Eleanor Franklin Egan, of President Harding's conference advisory committee, said to me; "they have the same God that we have. They recognize the same basic virtues that we recognize."

Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, head of the International Suffrage Alliance, says that the present rôle of the women of the United States is to act as the mediators between those of Germany and France.

Ahead of the Statesmen

NEXT month the National League of Women Voters, an organization of two million members or more, is to have a Pan-American conference of women at Baltimore and Washington, the first meeting of the sort ever held. There will be delegates from all the Central and South American nations and from Canada. Their program includes much that has to do with the work of making world peace permanent. President Harding hopes that, in addition to the next meeting with the European and Asiatic nations, the United States will soon be sitting at a political conference table with all the American states, devising some plan by which the Western Hemisphere may contribute something to assuring peace for both hemispheres. So once more the women are just ahead of the statesmen and creating the public support without which the statesmen cannot work.

At its biennial convention in June the General Federation of Women's Clubs is to have sessions on international relations and develop the work with the women of other countries. The world's Women's Christian Temperance Union at its convention in Philadelphia next fall will have peace making on its agenda. And so on through the long list of organizations of American women, an ever-increasing number of which are becoming international in scope and membership.

The year 1922 is going to be far more active than was 1921, and the work is far better organized. It is conservative to say that ten million women are mobilized for it through their clubs, political associations and welfare organizations. Furthermore, their several activities for peace are all coordinated and made to drive effectively at the main point by means of their joint affiliation in the National Council for the Limitation of Armaments.

"The adjournment of the international conference," says Mrs. Maud Wood Park, president of the National League of Women Voters, "leaves us with three distinct groups in America so far as this matter of peace is concerned. First, there is the group of those who are dissatisfied, who think the conference has failed because it did not even contemplate complete disarmament. That is a small group, composed chiefly of women, but containing a few men. Secondly, there is a very large group, composed chiefly of men, but with a few women in it, who are inclined to be satisfied with what we have got and consider the whole matter ended. This group includes those whose main desire is to reduce taxation by reducing navy expenses. The third group is, I believe, the largest of all. It contains millions of the women of America, and many men. It is the group that is satisfied for the moment, but only for the moment. It accepts what we have got as a good first step, but will insist for years to come on taking subsequent steps."

"One of the duties of this third group is to save the first and radical group from bitterness and from refusing to help in gradual progress because they cannot win everything at once. We must prevent that second and larger group, which is satisfied with tax reduction, from blocking our way with apathy and indifference."

Why Women Want Peace

SO FAR there seems to be little danger of bitterness. Jane Addams, one of the leaders of the minority group of nonresistant women in America, feels none. Prior to the war there was no American woman who was more highly revered or more loyally followed by her countrywomen than was Jane Addams. The war changed that for the time being. Her peace organization dwindled to a quarter of its former strength. Now it is coming back gradually, and with it the old appreciation of Miss Addams. Her organization, the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, with Mrs. George T. Odell as the American chairman and Miss Emily Balch as the International Executive Secretary at Geneva, is working with the more conservative groups in the National Council for the Limitation of Armaments, all with the same end in view.

Why are women so much more active than men in the matter? It is no mere fiction that they are more active. It is an admitted, notorious fact that men's clubs and lodges and chambers of commerce were remarkably sluggish in the matter of putting themselves on record for armament reduction. Many of them have taken no action at all. There is much more to the answer than the fact that women hate bloodshed. I have put the question to many women.

"It is because women are more concerned than men about the continuity of the race, and more truly appreciate its importance," says Mrs. Thomas G. Winter, president of the General Federation of Women's Clubs and one of the four women appointed by President Harding to the advisory committee of the conference. "The work which women do in groups," continued Mrs. Winter, "is always altruistic work. It has some phase of general welfare as its object. Women delegations do not come to Washington to get something for themselves as individuals or for business enterprises in which they are interested."

Mrs. Ellis Asby Yost, legislative superintendent of the W. C. T. U., at Washington, gives this brief explanation: "Women are more direct. We are not given to compromise. We neither understand it nor believe in it."

C. A. S.

ARCH-TONE SHOE

"THE TONIC FOR TIRED FEET!"

So restful, so smart in style

The perfect shoe for all the day's activities

A STRENUOUS day of household tasks, of social activities, of outdoor exercise—small wonder that your arch weakens, your foot grows tired!

The special features of the Arch-Tone Shoe insure utter restfulness and, with it, the shapeliness you rightly ask. A strong but light invisible steel shank gives firm support to the tired arch of the foot and extra strong counters hold the heel in place. Arch-Tone Shoes are made over lasts which hug the instep, yet provide an extra bit of roominess for the forepart of the foot.

Pursue your day's activities on tireless feet—though shod as smartly as you will. Learn how abundantly comfort is coupled with style—in the Arch-Tone Shoe. Write for free book showing the new Arch-Tone styles and the name of the store where you will find them, or if you live in a town of 70,000 or over, call Tel-U-Where.

The Krohn-Fechheimer Co.

735 Dandridge Street, Cincinnati, Ohio

MAKERS OF THE FAMOUS RED CROSS SHOE

692—"The Speedway"—A dull silver or gold buckle ornaments this comfortable walking shoe with low, flat heel. Price $9.00

705—"The Nomad"—The graceful lines of this patent leather oxford are accentuated by the absence of tip. Price $9.00

KROEHLER DAVEN-O

The Invisible Bed Room

An added Room
-Subtracted Rent

An extra bedroom is ready when the Kroehler Daven-O, a luxurious davenport by day, is opened with one simple motion into a full-sized bed. Bedding entirely concealed by day. Many handsome styles, at all prices.

Sold by leading furniture dealers everywhere. Ask to see the Kroehler trademark. Send for free booklet. KROEHLER MANUFACTURING COMPANY - CHICAGO. Factories at Kankakee, Ill., Naperville, Ill., Binghamton, N. Y., Canadian Factory: Stratford, Ontario.

The World Owes Your Boy Nothing

You have always guarded and shielded your boy, smoothed his path, fended troubles from him. In spirit you always will. In reality you know he must tackle the world with his own two fists and make a place for himself.

What does the world mean to him? When he comes to face it, will it be a confusing maze of conflicting forces? Or will he have a calm, strong understanding of things, of men and motives? Will he expect a quick, easy road to success? Or does he appreciate that there is a contest ahead where, undaunted, he must give and take, make sacrifices, gain by giving of himself?

THE AMERICAN BOY

"The Biggest, Brightest, Best Magazine for Boys in All the World"

has for its great purpose the giving to boys of true ideas of the great world they some day must serve. Its editors, knowing boys, boy enthusiasms, boy sensitiveness, boy capacities, map out stories and articles treating of authentic facts and conditions as they are in business, politics, history, geography, science, commerce, law, literature, health, sports, and then employ talented writers to weave these realities into fascinating stories that instruct without preaching, that teach better than textbooks, that fire boy imagination, awaken ambition, clear away confused impressions.

A half million boys eagerly look forward to these monthly tales of adventure and achievement. Unconsciously they absorb ideals of honor, fair play, the spirit of service. They see the need of the work going on in the world. It takes on a magnetic attraction. They are inspired to take a part, even as boys, realizing that life calls for the best there is in them, realizing they must equip themselves for a tussle and that the best mind, the cleanest heart, wins.

Every boy needs THE AMERICAN BOY. Every boy wants it. Invest $2.00 in a year's subscription for your boy and watch his intense interest in it grow as his understanding broadens and deepens. Buy it for a year for that other boy you want to help.

A year's subscription to THE AMERICAN BOY costs only $2.00 by mail. Single numbers, 20c at news-stands. Subscribe for a year, or place a standing order at your news-dealer's.

The American Boy
The Biggest, Brightest, Best Magazine for Boys in All the World

THE SPRAGUE PUBLISHING CO.
No. 351 American Bldg., Detroit, Mich.
Herewith Enc. $2.00. Please send THE AMERICAN BOY for one year, beginning with current issue, to

Name _____
Address _____

The Unspeakable Gentleman

(Continued from Page 23)

engaged in a venture. From the north we had carried here five hundred bales of fur, valued at fifty dollars to the bale. You contracted with us, Captain Shelton, to convey those bales to England. It would have been a nice piece of business if your supercargo had not been an honest man. He knew you, Shelton, if we did not. He knew the game you had planned to play, and although he was your brother-in-law he was man enough to stop it." Mr. Penfield's voice had risen so that it rang through the room, and his words followed each other in cold indictment.

THE others stood watching my father with strained attention. "Indeed," he said.

"Yes," said Mr. Penfield, "as you so aptly put it—indeed. Your ship carrying that consignment had Jason Hill as supercargo and Ned Aiken, that wretched parasite of yours, as master. A day out from this port a plank sprung aft, which obliged him to put back to Boston for repairs. The cargo was transhipped. When it was aboard again Jason Hill happened to examine that cargo. The furs had gone. In their place five hundred bales of chips had been loaded in the hold. He went to the master for an explanation. Mr. Aiken, who had been drinking heavily, was asleep in the cabin and on the table beside him was a letter, Shelton. You remember that letter? It bore instructions from you to scuttle that ship ten miles out of Liverpool harbor."

"And," said my father with another howl, "I was to collect the insurance. It was nicely planned."

"If you remember that, you recall what happened next. We called on you, Shelton, and accused you with what you had done. You neither confirmed nor denied it. We told you then to leave the town. We warned you never to return. We warned you that we were through with your trickery, with your cheating and your thieving. We warned you, Shelton, and now you're back—back, by your own confession, on another rogue's errand."

"Not on another's," my father objected mildly—"one of my own, Mr. Penfield. The experience you have outlined so lucidly convinced me that it was better to stick closely to my own affairs."

"Mr. Shelton," Mr. Penfield went on, regardless of the interruption, "we warned you yesterday to leave the town before nightfall, and you have failed to take our advice."

"I see no reason why I should leave," replied my father easily. "I am comfortable here for the moment. I would not be outside. Even the arguments you have given are specious. You got your furs back, and, if I recall aright, they proved to be so badly moth-eaten that they were not fit for any trade."

"Even though you see no reason," said Major Proctor smoothly, "you are going to leave, Shelton. You are going to leave in one hour. If you delay a minute later we will come with friends who will know how to handle you. We will come in an hour with a tar pot and a feather mattress."

"YOU are not only unwelcome to us on account of your past," said Mr. Penfield, "but more recent developments make it impossible, quite impossible, for you to stay. We have heard your story already from Mr. Jason Hill. You are right that it is no concern of ours, except that we remember the good of this town. We have a business with France, and we cannot afford to lose it. Major Proctor was blunt just now, and yet he is right. Give us credit for warning you, at least. You will go, of course?"

My father smiled again and smoothed the wrinkles of his coat. For some reason the scene seemed vastly pleasant. He shrugged his shoulders in a deprecatory gesture, walked over to the table and lifted a glass to his lips. "I remarked before that I was quite comfortable here," he replied after a moment's pause. "I may add that I am amused."

Since I have returned to the ancestral roof and looked again at the portraits of my family, I have had many callers to entertain me. Two have tried to rob me. One has threatened me with death. And now six come and threaten me with tar and feathers. It is too diverting to leave. Pray don't interrupt me, Captain Tracy. In a moment you shall have the floor."

HE TOOK another sip from his glass, watching them over the brim. And then he continued, slowly and coldly, yet turning every period with a perfect courtesy: "There is only one thing that you and all my other callers appear to have overlooked: You fail for some reason to realize that I do things only of my own volition. It is eccentric, I know, but we all have our failings."

He paused to place his glass daintily on the table and straightened the lace at his wrist with careful solicitude.

"Once before this morning I have stated that I am not particularly afraid of anything. Strange as it may seem, this statement still applies. Or put it this way: I have grown blasé. People have threatened me too often. No, gentlemen, you are going to lose your trading privileges, I think. And I am going to remain in my house quite as long as I choose."

"Which will be one hour," said Major Proctor.

"Be careful, major," said my father. "You have grown too stout to risk your words. Do you care to know why I am going to remain?"

No one answered.

"Then I will tell you," he went on. "Three of my ships are in the harbor, and times are troublesome at sea. They are armed with heavy metal and manned by quite as reckless and unpleasant a lot of men as I have ever beheld on a deck. Between them they have seventeen guns of varying caliber, and there is powder in their magazines. Do I need to go any further or do we understand each other?"

"No," snapped Captain Tracy hoarsely. "I'm hanged if we do!"

"IT SOUNDS crude as I say it," continued my father apologetically, "and yet true nevertheless. As soon as I see any one of you or any of my other neighbors enter my grounds again I shall order my ships to tack down the river and open fire on the town. They have sail ready now, gentlemen. My servant has gone already to carry them my order."

"And you'll hang for piracy to-morrow morning," laughed the major harshly. "Shelton, you have grown mad."

There was silence for a moment.

"Exactly," said my father gently. "Mad, major—mad enough to put my threat into effect in five minutes if you do not leave this house; mad enough to scuttle every ship in this harbor; mad enough to set your warehouses in flames; mad enough even to find the company of you and your friends most confoundingly dull and wearisome; mad enough to wonder why I ever suffered you to remain so long beneath my roof; mad enough to believe you a pack of curs and cowards, and mad enough to treat you as such. Keep off, Tracy, you bloated fool."

(Continued on Page 157)

Little Miss Gage

desires to send you a beautifully illustrated booklet called "Little Miss Gage in the Big Out-Doors," which contains not only some fascinating nature stories that will please little girls but a complete description fully illustrated of the new line of "Little Miss Gage" tailored and trimmed hats for girls of from six to twelve years.

The reputation of Gage Brothers, formed during sixty-five years of leadership in millinery for women, has been conveyed into the individuality, wearing qualities and smartness of style of these hats for girls. They can be seen at leading millinery departments.

This descriptive booklet will be mailed on request.

GAGE BROTHERS & CO.
18 So. Michigan Ave. Chicago
Fifth Ave. & 37th St. New York

Little Miss Gage HATS

Beautifully illustrated—showing decorative schemes, color combinations and practical treatments for walls and floors. For those who expect to build new homes or remodel old ones.

THE MANY USES OF TILES

are shown attractively. Tiles represent a service for all parts of the home, and numerous ideas in design and color cannot be expressed so well in any other way. The book will be sent free on request.

THE ASSOCIATED TILE MFRS.
1284 Seventh Avenue, Beaver Falls, Pa.

TABLE SERVICE-WAGO
Large Broad Wide Table Top—Removable Glass Service Tray—Double Drawer—Double Rollers—Large Deep Underneath—"Silent" "Rolling" "Silent"—Rubber Tired Swivel Wheels—High grade piece of furniture—unexcelled in General Utility—Easy Action—Silent—No for pumpkins and dealer's name.

Combination Products Co., 504-Q Canal Bldg., Chicago

OLSON
Velvety
RUGS

BIG NEW RUG CATALOG
FREE

YOUR CHOICE OF 31 COLORS
ALL SIZES

—How to Save 1/2
On Your New Rug

WRITE today for the finest rug book we have ever issued, showing in actual colors 31 patterns of OLSON VELVETY RUGS in the fashionable one- and two-toned effects. This book describes how your old, faded, worn out, threadbare carpets, rugs and old clothing are first washed, pickered, carded, combed, respun and then dyed and re woven into beautiful VELVETY RUGS that rival new Wilton and Axminster rugs. You can select any color or pattern you wish regardless of the color of your old material. OLSON VELVETY RUGS are entirely different from any other rugs you ever have seen that were made from old carpets or rugs. They are so fine and the saving in money is so great that you simply cannot afford to overlook this opportunity. The OLSON process brings high grade, luxurious, up-to-date rugs within reach of all. There is no other house like OLSON'S in the world.

Send Your OLD CARPETS, RUGS
And Old Clothing

Look at your floor coverings. Are they threadbare? Are they faded? Are they presentable when you have company? Have you tired of the patterns? Why not let us convert this old material into bright, new rugs that you will be proud to own? Consider what a satisfying change an OLSON rug will be — a beautiful rug in the harmonizing one- and two-toned effects demanded today for the up-to-date home. Like the fine Wiltons, OLSON VELVETY RUGS are firmly woven with a soft, smooth surface or nap that stands "straight up." They are seamless and reversible and will stand the hardest kind of wear.

One Million Customers

There is a charm about OLSON VELVETY RUGS all their own. You will find them in the finest hotels, the most select clubs, and thousands of the most exclusive homes that could well afford higher-priced rugs. Unsolicited testimonials in never-ceasing flow have been our best advertisements for 48 years.

All Orders Completed in One Week
We have thousands of customers in every State. Forty-eight years of square dealing have made the OLSON RUG CO. the largest rug factory in the world doing business by mail.

WE PAY EXPRESS
Parcel Post or Freight

Write at once for this money-saving offer

FREE TRIAL

Our ironclad guarantee gives you the right to use your new rugs five days on the floors of your home, subject them to everyday hard wear, compare them with new store rugs costing twice as much, then, if you do not think your new rugs are the biggest rug value you ever had for the money, send them back at our expense and we will pay you liberally for your material.

Write Today!

Every home-lover will welcome this unusual rug book, showing modern homes with the fashionable one- and two-toned rugs. Each room is correct in every detail of interior decoration. Our prices are right down to rock bottom. Never in our 48 years of rug weaving have we been able to offer such great savings. Send coupon or post card NOW for this FREE book. Learn how easy it is to order.

"FROM OUR LOOMS TO YOUR ROOMS"

OLSON RUG Co.

28-40 Laflin Street, CHICAGO, ILL.

TEAR OFF
THIS COUPON

Fill in this coupon and mail NOW
OLSON RUG CO., Dept. B-15, 36 Laflin St., Chicago, Ill.
Gentlemen: Please send your latest FREE rug book, postpaid to:
PRINT YOUR NAME _____
STREET (R. F. D.) _____
TOWN _____
POST OFFICE _____
STATE _____

American Lady

PLIO-TOP

Corsets

Fashionably Boned with Mightybone

Plio-Top model 892 of pink coutil with medium length skirt and broad rubber insert in back. For stout figure. Sizes 25 to 30. $5.00

This tag is attached to every American Lady Corset. Look for it; it promises corset comfort.

For sports wear or for the slim figure, a flesh color elastic girdle, 771. Made without Plio-Top feature. Sizes 22 to 32. $4.00

Lightly boned flesh color brocade Plio-Top model 706, with medium skirt and low bust, for slender or medium figure. Sizes 23 to 30. $3.50

Plio-Top model 818, pink brocade with elastic waistline top and long skirt. Sizes 22 to 30. $5.00. Plain coutil, model 770, $3.50

This is the Plio-Top feature. The moment you bend forward you will feel the difference!

Answering Fashion's Demand for the lithe, young figure

WITH the waistline accentuating the width of one's hips, with skirts but narrow sheaths, with the revival of pleats and the flare of draperies—the figure, the foundation of the silhouette, must be slim; it must have suppleness; it must be as young as Spring itself.

To meet these commandments of smartness a corset with a new and exclusive feature was created, a model born of fashion—the American Lady Plio-Top!

Right at the top of this corset is the Plio-Top feature which brings glad relief from the front steel which in some corsets thrusts itself inward at the slightest forward motion. When the body bends, the Plio-Top bends!

And of course Plio-Top models are boned with Mightybone. Because of Mightybone's superior resilience, American Lady Corsets are fashionably boned with the fewest strands that litness can desire, yet sufficiently boned for healthful support.

Ask your dealer for the corsets featured on this page and other individual American Lady models designed for every type of figure.

AMERICAN LADY CORSET COMPANY, INC.
DETROIT · CHICAGO · NEW YORK · SAN FRANCISCO

The Unspeakable Gentleman

(Continued from Page 154)

"By heaven!" Captain Tracy shouted, "we'll burn this house over your head. In an hour we'll have you shot against the town hall."

"Perhaps," said my father; "and yet I doubt it. Pray remember that I keep my word. Your hats are in the hall, gentlemen. In three minutes now my ships weigh anchor. If you do not go I cannot stop them."

Mr. Penfield had grown a trifle pale. "Captain Shelton," he demanded slowly, "are you entirely serious? I almost believe you are. Of course you understand the consequences?"

"Perfectly," said my father.

"Let us go, gentlemen," said Mr. Penfield. "You will hear from us later." They turned quickly towards the hall, my father following them, closing the door gently behind him.

Mademoiselle, who had risen from her chair, where she had listened, only half understanding the conversation in a tongue foreign from hers, stared at the closed door, her lips parted and her forehead wrinkled.

"What have they been saying?" she asked.

"Why are they afraid? Is everyone afraid of this father of yours?" And then impulsively she seized me by the arm. "But it makes no difference. He is serious, monsieur, and you must leave him alone, or perhaps I shall not get the paper after all; and remember, I must have it. My brother must have it, and he shall; only you must not disturb your father. He may shoot at the town if he cares to, or murder your uncle. He has often spoken of it at Blancy, but the paper is another matter. You must leave it to me."

"To you?" I cried.

"Precisely," said mademoiselle. "You—what can you do? You are young. You are inexperienced. Pardon me, but you would be quite ineffective."

MY CHEEKS flamed. Somehow no sarcasm of my father's had bitten so deep as those last words of hers.

"Ah," she said, "I have hurt you and, believe me, I did not mean to."

Something in the polite impersonality of her voice gave me a vague resentment. She had moved nearer, and yet I could not meet her glance.

"I am sorry," she said, and paused expectantly. "Last night you were very kind. Last night you tried to help me."

"Mademoiselle," I began, "anything that I did last night —"

"Was quite unnecessary," she said, "and very foolish."

I drew a sharp breath. The bit of gallantry I had on my mind to speak seemed to be weak and useless now. "Mademoiselle is mistaken," I lied smoothly. "Nothing that I did last night was on her account."

"Nothing!" she exclaimed sharply. "I do not understand."

"No, nothing," I said. "Pray believe me, anything I did, however foolish, was solely for myself. I have my own affair to settle with my father."

"Bah!" cried mademoiselle, tapping her foot on the floor, and, oddly enough, my reply seemed to have made her angry.

"I say you are entirely ineffective and must leave your father alone. You do not understand him. Usually he is most well behaved. He is moderate, monsieur. At Blancy a glass at dinner was all he ever desired. For days at a time I have hardly heard him say a word. The marquis would call him the sphinx, and what has he been doing here? Drinking bottle after bottle, talking steadily, acting outrageously. What is more, he has been doing so ever since he spoke of returning home."

I tell you, monsieur, you must keep away from him, or perhaps he will do with the paper exactly what he says. I say your father was an honest man, as men go, and a brave one, too, and that you have changed him; and I warn you to leave him alone in the future. You do not know him or how to deal with him. I tell you his trifling about the paper is a passing phase, and that you must not disturb him. No, no, do not protest. I know well enough you are not to blame. You must leave him to me. That is all."

"It pains me not to do as mademoiselle suggests," I said.

"You mean you will not?" she flashed back at me angrily.

"I mean I will not," I answered.

"But you said—" she interrupted.

SHE did not have the chance to continue, for a hand was trying the latch of the door, and then a sharp knock interrupted us. I unbolted and opened the door. My father was standing on the threshold. With a smile and a nod to me, he entered and proceeded to the center of the room, while I closed the door behind him and bolted it again.

If he noticed my action he did not choose to comment. Instead, he continued towards the chair where mademoiselle was seated. "I had hoped that you might get along more pleasantly, you and my son," he observed. "Surely he has points in his favor—youth, candor, even a certain amount of breeding. You have been hard on him, mademoiselle. Take my word for it, he is to blame for nothing."

"So you have been listening," she said.

"As doubtless mademoiselle expected," said my father. "I had hoped —"

"And so had I," I said—he turned and faced me—"hoped," I continued, raising my voice, "that you might enter here and leave your servant somewhere else. I have wanted to have a quiet talk with you this morning."

If he noted anything unusual in my request he did not show it, not so much as by a flicker of an eyelash. "It has hardly been opportune for conversation," he admitted. "But now, as you say, Brutus is gone. He is out to receive a message I am expecting, which can hardly be delivered at the front door. You were saying—doubtless mademoiselle will pardon us —"

"Mademoiselle," I went on, "will even be interested. I have wanted to speak to you so that I might explain myself. Since I have been here I fear I have been impulsive. You must lay it to my youth, father."

He nodded a grave assent. "You must not apologize. It has been quite refreshing."

"And yet I am not so young. I am twenty-three."

"Can it be possible?" exclaimed my father. "I had almost forgotten that I was so near the grave."

"I came to see you here," I continued, "because, as my uncle said, you are my father. I came because—because I thought—" I paused and drew a deep breath, and my father smiled. "Why I came is aside from the point, at any rate," I ended.

"Indeed yes," agreed my father; "and have we not been over the matter before?"

"If you had accorded me one serious word it might have been different," I continued; "but instead, sir, you have seen fit to jest. It is not what you have done this morning, sir, as much as your manner towards me which makes me take this step. That you have brought a lady from France and robbed her, that you have robbed my uncle and have threatened to fire on the town—somehow they seem no particular affair of mine except for this: You seem to think that I am

(Continued on Page 158)

Rubens
Look for the trade-mark

Doctors Say—

Protect This Vital Spot

The surest way is with Rubens Infant Shirt. Experienced doctors and nurses will tell you so.

They know that it insures baby against the most common cause of illness, especially in winter. They know that double thickness across chest and stomach gives double protection. They know that it is cut with the convenience of a coat. No tapes, no buttons. They know that the belt is easily adjustable to baby's growth; fastens with a single safety pin. Knitted of finest, softest goods, for baby's delicate skin. Comes in twelve different materials for children and infants.

They know that for thirty-one years we have specialized in this one garment. It is endorsed by thousands of physicians and leading authorities on the care of babies.

They know that there is only one Rubens. They know that there is no substitute. Always insist on seeing this trade-mark. If your dealer cannot supply you, write us.

Manufactured only by
RUBENS & MARBLE, Inc.
24 No. Market St., Chicago
Established 1890

RUBENS INFANT SHIRTS

Your First Thought

on entering the house from the wind-swept outdoors should be for your skin. Rub a little Frostilla on your face and hands and your skin will always be satin smooth. Use it too as a base for face powder; it helps your powder cling on longer. Frostilla is a long established product, but enthusiastic friends are constantly finding new uses. If you wear low shoes rub it on your ankles each evening and you will suffer no more from painful chaps or rough skin. Men will welcome it for shaving. Sold everywhere—35c. HOLMES FROSTILLA CO., Elmira, N. Y.

FRAGRANT
Frostilla

Do Half a Day's Work in Half an Hour and have cleaner, brighter, free from dust and prettier floors. Do away with bending, kneeling and stooping. Save time, work and money. All of this is possible and practical with the new

O-Cedar Mop
Polish Mop

Enlarged
Improved Strengthened

Pre-War Prices
$1 and $1.50
($1.25 and $2.00
in Canada)

AT ALL DEALERS'

Channell Chemical Co., Chicago, Toronto, London, Paris

Finest Fish

Choicest codfish and haddock, fresh from the sea. Boned, cooked, seasoned, ready for instant use.

B & M Fish Flakes are immediately obtainable AT YOUR GROCER'S. Recipes on label—more in "Good Eating" booklet, sent free.

BURNHAM & MORRILL CO.
70 Water St. Portland, Me.

Burnham & Morrill Fish Flakes

You Can Make at Home
Parchment Shades and Lamps
Easy Interesting Profitable

Parchment Shades, Lamps, and Shields in artistic designs are the newest vogue. Save 1/3 usual price by getting our Shades and Lamps flat, designed, ready for coloring, full directions for making. Very simple—any one can do it. 200 shapes, sizes and designs shown in free catalog. This quaint 8x12-inch Electric Lamp, flat, designed, ready to paint, complete. Gilt Bracket, 3 Tassels, Ebony-lam Base, Socket, Silk Cord and Plug, $2.95, postage 15c. Same design. Parchment Lantern for drop light, $2.95, postage 10c.

China Painters!

The latest of everything in china. We effect a great saving for you because we are America's largest white china importers selling direct to users.

Send for Free Catalog No. 50L
THAYER & CHANDLER, 913 West Van Buren St., CHICAGO

The Unspeakable Gentleman

(Continued from Page 157)

incapable of doing anything to hinder you, and frankly, sir, this hurts my pride. You feel that I am going to sit by passively and watch you."

I came a step nearer, but he did not draw back. He only continued watching me with a patient intentness, which seemed gradually to merge into some more active interest. His interest deepened when I spoke again, but that was all.

"You feel that I am going to be still and do nothing, even after you drugged me last evening. Did you think I would not resent it? You are mistaken, father."

My father rubbed his chin thoughtfully. "I had not thought of it exactly so," he said; "yet I had to keep you quiet."

"So, if the tables were turned, and I were you and you were I, you would hardly let matters go on without joining in?"

"HARDLY," he agreed. "You have thought the matter out very prettily, my son. It is an angle I seem to have neglected. It only remains to ask what you are going to do. Let us trust it will be nothing stupid."

"I am glad you understand," I said, "because now it will be perfectly clear why I am asking you for the paper, and you will appreciate any steps I may take to get it."

He cast a quick glance around the room and seemed satisfied that we were quite alone. "Do I understand," he inquired, "that you have asked me for the paper?"

I nodded. "His voice grew thoughtfully gentle. 'You interest me,' he said. 'I have a penchant for mysteries. May I ask why you believe I shall give it to you?'"

"I shall try to show you," I tossed aside my coat and drew my small sword.

He stood rigid and motionless, and his face became more set and expressionless than I had ever seen it.

But before he could speak, mademoiselle had sprung between us. "You fool!" she cried. "Put up your sword. Will you not be quiet, as I told you?"

"Be seated, mademoiselle," said my father gently. "Where are your senses, Henry? Can you not manage without creating a scene? Put up your sword. I cannot draw against you."

Mademoiselle, paler than I had seen her before, sank back into her chair.

"I am sorry you find yourself unable," I said, "because I shall attack you in any event."

"What can you be thinking of?" my father remonstrated. "Engage me with a small sword? It is incredible."

"I have been waiting almost twelve hours for the opportunity," I replied. "Pray put yourself on guard, father."

HIS stony look of repression had left him. The lines about his mouth relaxed again. For a moment I thought the gaze he bent upon me was almost kindly. Then he sighed and shrugged his shoulders, and began slowly to unwind a handkerchief which he had tied about his right hand, disclosing several cuts on his knuckles.

"I forgot that Captain Tracy might have teeth," he said. "Positively, my son, you become disappointing. I had given you credit for more imagination, and instead you think you can match your sword against mine. Pray do not interrupt, mademoiselle," he added, turning to her with a bow; "it will be quite nothing, and we have neither of us had much exercise."

He carefully divested himself of his coat, folding it neatly and placing it on the table. When it was placed to advantage he drew his sword and tested its point on the floor.

"Who knows?" he added, bending the blade. "Perhaps we may have sport after all. Lawton was never bad with the foils."

We had only crossed swords long enough for me to feel the supple play of his wrist before I began to press him. I feinted and disengaged, and a second later I had lunged over his guard and had forced him to give back.

"Ah, ha!" exclaimed my father gayly, "you surprise me. What! Again? Blast these chairs."

A fire of exultation leaped through me. I grinned at my father over the crossed blades, for I could read something in his face that steadied my hand. My best attack might leave him unscathed, but I was doing more, much more, than he had expected. I lunged again, and again he stepped back, thrusting so quickly that I had barely time to recover.

"EXCELLENT!" said my father. "You are quick, my son. You even have an eye."

"Mademoiselle," I called sharply. "The paper—in the breast pocket of his coat. Take it out and burn it."

"Good heaven!" exclaimed my father, parrying the thrust with which I ended my last words. "Pray accept my apologies—and my congratulations."

You have a better mind and a better sword than I could reasonably have expected. Indeed, you quite make me exert myself. But you must learn to recover more quickly, Henry, much more quickly. I have seen too many good men go down for just that failing. It may be well enough against an ordinary swordsman, my son, or even a moderately good one, but as for me, I could run you through twice over. Indeed I would, if —"

"The paper, mademoiselle," I called again; "have you got it?"

"Exactly," said my father; "the paper. If the paper were in my pocket, you, my son, would now be in the surgeon's hands. The paper, however, is upstairs in my volume of Rabelais. And now —"

His wrist suddenly stiffened. He made a feint at my throat and in the same motion lowered his guard. As I came on parade my sword was wrenched from my grasp. At the same time I stepped past his point and seized him around the waist.

"You heard, mademoiselle?" I cried. "The door!" And we fell together.

My father uttered a curse and clutched at my throat. I loosened my grasp to fend away his hand, and he broke away from my other arm and sprang to his feet.

Just as he did so there was a blow, a splintering of wood. The door was carried off its hinges, and Brutus leaped beside him.

THE floor had not been clean. My father brushed regretfully at the smudges on his cambric shirt. "My coat, if you please, mademoiselle," he said. "I see you have it in your hands. Gad, my son, it was a nearer thing than I expected. On my word, I did not know that Brutus was back."

"He is like you, captain," said mademoiselle, handing the coat to him. "You are both stubborn." For some reason that I could not fathom, her good nature had returned. It was relief, perhaps, that made her smile at us.

"It is a family trait," returned my father. As though kicking down the door had been a simple household duty, Brutus turned from it with quiet passivity and adjusted the folds of the blue broadcloth with an equal thoroughness, while my father straightened the lace at his wrists.

"Huh!" said Brutus suddenly. Then I noticed that his stockings were caked with river mud, and that he had evidently been running.

My father, forgetful of his coat for the moment, whirled about and faced him.

(Continued on Page 159)

LABLACHE

FACE POWDER

"Cherie petite—have you likewise discovered the secret—the charm of a lovely complexion?"

Is it because of Lablache, the powder adorable, that your skin is so smooth and free from blemish?

Ma foi, I do not know! But Lablache I like and shall always use, because it's so clinging—so pure—so fragrant. As I love my complexion, likewise do I love Lablache."

Refuse Substitutes

They may be dangerous. Flesh, White, Pink, or Cream, 50c. a box of druggists or by mail. Over two million boxes sold annually. Send 10c. for a sample box.

BEN. LEVY COMPANY
French Perfumers, Dept. 152
125 Kingston St., Boston, Mass.

Dye any Garment or Drapery with "Diamond Dyes"

Each package of "Diamond Dye" contains directions so simple that a woman can dye or tint faded, shabby skirts, dresses, waists, coats, sweaters, stockings, hangings, draperies, everything like new. Buy "Diamond Dyes"—other kind—then perfect home dyeing guaranteed, even if you have never dyed before. Tell your druggist whether material you wish to dye is wool or silk or whether it is linen, cotton, or mixed goods. Diamond Dyes never stain, fade, or run.

Wells & Richardson Co., Burlington, Vt.

Dress Designing Lessons FREE

Women—Girls—15 or over, can easily learn Dress and Costume Designing during their moments IN TEN WEEKS. Dress and Costume Designers Frequently Earn $45 to $100 a Week. Many Start Part-time in Their Own Homes. Every woman who now does plain sewing (the Home Study Course) should take up Dress Designing. Send for Catalog. Name: _____ Address: _____

Become a Nurse $25 to $35 a Week

BY training at home through our correspondence course. Twenty years of success—Graduates. Age 19 to 65. The standard course of instruction for nursing. Invaluable for women who want to become independent for the practical. Entire tuition earned in a few weeks. Two month trial. Money plan guaranteed. Send for catalog.

The Chautauqua School of Nursing
315 Main Street Jamestown, N.Y.

Wedding
50 Engraved Visiting Cards $2.00. Royal Engraving Co., 814A Walnut St., Phila.

OAK FLOORS

(For Everlasting Economy)

At the New Prices Anyone Can Have This Floor

If you can afford the new home at all, you can afford Oak Floors—beautiful, dustless, lasting, sanitary and easy to clean. Floors that add 25% to selling and renting values. Floors that improve with age and use. Of which you will always be proud.

Cost Lowered 1/2 to 3/4

A room, say, 14 x 14 feet can now be floored for from $20 to $30 in the highest plain grade, depending on your location. Any lumber dealer will give actual figures. Compare them with any other floors you had in mind. Shop around all you like. You cannot get away from the facts and figures.

New Floors Over Old

A 3/4 of an inch thickness is made especially for laying over old floors. Costs even less, as the old floor makes the sub-floor.

See any dealer, or write for our 3 free booklets, in colors, which give all the facts in detail.

OAK FLOORING CORPORATION
1053 Ashland Block, Chicago, Ill.

Drumfire Dishwasher

The Drumfire's a wonder. Washes dishes, silver and glassware quickly. No motor to buy. Hot water from faucet runs it and washes the dishes. It washes vegetables also. Its price—only $45—is soon saved through its care of the china. It works on a new principle—

"It shoots off the grease!"

The Drumfire is a real joy to the housewife. Don't fail to see it perform. We let you use it in your own kitchen, free, for 10 days. Partial payments arranged if desired. Write direct to our factory.

The Dietz Manufacturing Co.,
Dept. A-3, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Good territory open to high grade women to act as our representatives.

MAJOR'S CEMENT

excelled for repairing china, glassware, earthenware, furniture, masonry, etc. (for tips on repairing china, glassware, earthenware, furniture, masonry, etc. see page 60). Major's Cement, famous since 1876. Major's Cement and Leather Cements are good. If three kinds—20c per bottle. At dealers or write us. MAJOR MANUFACTURING CO., New York

Swollen Ankles!

—will soon return to fashionable slenderness. You need not sacrifice footwear style.

See page 60

The Unspeakable Gentleman

(Continued from Page 158)

"To think I had forgotten!" he cried. "What news, you black rascal?"

"Huh," said Brutus again, and handed him a spotted slip of paper.

My father's lips parted. He seized it with unusual alacrity, read it and tossed it in the fire. Then he sighed like a man from whose mind a heavy weight of care has been lifted. The tenseness seemed to leave his slim figure, and for an instant he looked as though the day had tired him and as though another crisis were over. "He's there?" he demanded sharply.

"Huh," said Brutus.

"Now heaven be praised for that!" said my father almost with fervor. "I was beginning to wonder if perhaps something had happened."

Mademoiselle looked up at him demurely. "The captain has good news?" she asked.

He turned to her and smiled his blandest smile. "Under the circumstances," he said, "the best I could expect." Still smiling, he smoothed his coat and squared his shoulders. "Our little melodrama, my lady, is drawing to its close."

VI

THE sun had finally broken through the clouds, and already its rays were slanting into the room, falling softly on the dusty furniture and making the shadows of the vines outside dance fitfully on the wall by the fire; and the shadows of the elms were growing long and straight over the rain-soaked leaves and the rank, damp grass of our lawn. It was the dull, gentle sunshine of an autumn afternoon, soft and kindly, and yet a little bleak.

"Yes," said my father, "it is nearly over. It turns into a simple matter, after all. I wonder, mademoiselle, will you be sorry? Will you ever recall our weeks on the high-road? I shall, I think. And the inn in Brittany, with Brutus up the road and Ned Aiken swearing at the post boys. At least we were living life. And the Eclipse—I told you they would never beat us on a windward tack. I told you, mademoiselle, the majority of mankind were very simple people."

"And you still feel so?" she asked him.

"Now more than ever," said my father. "I had almost hoped there would be one sane man among the dozens outside, but they all have the brains of schoolboys. No wonder the world moves so slowly, and great men seem so great."

And he wound the handkerchief around his hand again.

"The captain has arranged to sell the paper?" asked mademoiselle.

"Exactly," said my father. "The price has been fixed, and I shall deliver it myself as soon as the day grows darker. I am sorry, almost. It has not been uninteresting."

"No," assented mademoiselle with a shrug; "it has not been uninteresting."

"You are pale, my son," said my father, turning to me. "I trust you are not hurt?"

I shook my head.

"It is only your pride? You will be better soon. You have seen enough of me, I hope, to hate me. And yet, let us be philosophical. Be seated, my son. Brutus, it is three o'clock. Bring in the glasses and the noon meal."

I DID not reply, and he stood for a moment watching me narrowly. Brutus threw another log on the fire, which gave off a brisk crackling from the bed of coals. He then stood waiting doubtfully, until my father nodded. "Take the door out as you go," my father directed. "Mademoiselle, permit me." He pointed out an armchair beside the fire. "And you, my son, opposite. So." From the side pocket of his coat he drew a silver-mounted pistol, which he examined with studious attention. "Come," he said, slipping it back, "let us be tranquil."

THERE fell a silence while he stood watching us. A gust of wind blew down the chimney and scattered a cloud of dust over the hearth. The rafters creaked. Somewhere in the stillness a door slammed. The very lack of expression in his face was stamping it on my memory, and for the first time its phlegmatic calm aroused in me a new emotion. I had hated it and wondered at it before, and now in spite of myself it was giving me a twinge of pity. For nature had intended it to be an expressive face, sensitive and quick to mirror each perception and emotion. Was it pride that had turned it into a mask and drawn a curtain before the light that burned within, or had the light burned out and left it merely cold and unresponsive? "The captain is thinking?" said mademoiselle.

He smiled and fixed her with his level glance. "Indeed, yes," he answered briskly. "It is a rudeness for which I can only crave your pardon. Strange that I should have tasted your father's hospitality so often and should still be a taciturn host."

Mademoiselle bit her lip. "There is only one thing stranger," she said coldly.

"And that is—," said my father, bending toward her attentively.

"That you should betray the last request of the man who once trusted you and showed you every kindness. Tell me, captain, is it another display of artistic temperament or simply a lack of breeding?"

Her words seemed to fall lightly on my father. He took a pinch of snuff and waved his hand in an airy gesture of denial. "Bah," he said; "if the marquis were alive he would understand. He was always an opportunist, the marquis. He would not blame me. Besides, he owes me nothing. If it were not for me your brother would be drinking his wine in paradise instead of cursing at the American climate. And you, mademoiselle—would you have preferred to remain with the police?" He looked thoughtfully into his snuffbox. "Dead men press no bills; surely you recall that the marquis said that. No, mademoiselle, we must be practical to live. The marquis would understand. The marquis was always practical."

She caught her breath sharply.

But my father seemed not to have perceived the effect of his words. "Ah," he said, "here is Brutus with the meal."

Brutus had carried in a small round table on which were arranged a loaf of bread and some salt meat.

It was a strange meal.

"Now we shall talk," said mademoiselle when it was finished.

My father raised his glass to the light. "It is always a pleasure to listen to mademoiselle."

"I FEAR," replied mademoiselle, "that this will be the exception."

"Impossible," said my father, taking a sip.

"All this morning I have tried to have a word with you," said mademoiselle, "but your time has been well taken up. I hoped to speak to you instead of your son, but he failed to take my advice and remain quiet. As I said before, you are both stubborn; not

(Continued on Page 160)

Gendron for Your Child

Mothers—keep your children out of doors. Keep them healthy and happy. It gives you more time for your duties.

For fifty years Gendron has been building play vehicles—developing them to perfection for your child.

Today Gendron, the world's largest manufacturer of juvenile automobiles, handcars, coaster wagons, velocipedes, tricycles, doll buggies and baby carriages, offers your children outdoor play and exercise.

In your purchase of any of these articles the trade mark

The Pioneer Line

insures you of the best materials, most sturdy construction and pleasing appearance.

Gendron dealers are in every city.

The Gendron Wheel Co.
610 Superior St.
Toledo, Ohio

Free
An interesting book of outdoor games. Write for it.

ARTAMO

CHILDREN'S DRESSES
Ready-to-Embroider

There is a new delight for mothers in providing their little ones with dresses—the ARTAMO way. Every ARTAMO dress is all made up. No sewing required. Each individual package contains the dress, full, detailed instructions, all the necessary incidentals and more than enough D. M. C. cotton to complete the design.

Send for copy of the 1922 STYLE BOOK

Rumper No. 2034
Made of unbleached muslin for patchwork and simple embroidery.

$1.50

1 and 3 years

At your Art Needlework Store or Write to

G. HEIS & BRO.
892 Broadway, N. Y.

LA FRANCO Creme Le Mon

DOUBLE STRENGTH

The French Lemon Cleansing Cream Supreme. This golden, fragrant cream sinks into each tiny pore, cleansing the skin as soap and water cannot do. A skin clean from the pores-out gives that clear transparent, natural complexion that no make-up can imitate. Creme Le Mon Whitens and Cleanses as only a lemon cream can. Soothing and grateful to the most delicate skin. The fine oils in Creme Le Mon keep the skin satiny smooth and supple—the greatest help in preventing wrinkles. Guaranteed not to grow hair.

Cleanses Refreshes Whitens
SOCIETE LA FRANCE
Dept. L, 15 West 20th Street, New York City
Also Makers of Le Mon Vanishing Cream—an excellent base for powder.

Dialogues, Monologues, Musical Comedies, Vaudeville Acts, How-to-Stage-a-Play and Reviews, Min-strel Opening Chorus, Darky Plays, Catalog Free. T. S. DENISON & CO., 623 So. Wabash, Dept. 89, CHICAGO

The Original Knit Waist

For Boys and Girls

Nazareth Waist

When you buy children's under-waists look for the Nazareth label in the neck.

This label assures you a high quality, well made, serviceable knit waist. Millions of mothers during 35 years have bought no other kind.

Nazareth is the original knit waist; has elastic-knit suspender tapes; metal pin-rubbers for hose supporters; buttons down front; sizes 2 to 15 years.

*Nazareth Waist
Union Suit*

Light weight shirt, pants and waist in one. Saves time in dressing and laundry and saves money in buying. Taped front, back and sides. Nicely trimmed at neck and arms. Sizes 2 to 15 years for boy or girl. Nazareth Shirts for infants 1 to 6 years are exceptionally good value. Sold by retailers; if yours cannot supply you write us.

SEND FOR NAZARETH DOLL CUT-OUTS

Two dolls in color with two costume changes for each one, sent for 2ct. stamp.

NAZARETH WAIST CO., 366 Broadway, Dept. K, New York
Mills at Nazareth, Pa.

SANITAS MODERN WALL COVERING

An Atmosphere of Good Taste

THOSE who take pride in their homes, know the importance of selecting harmonious wall coverings. Homes are made pleasing and attractive by tasteful selections and treatments of Sanitas Modern Wall Covering in thorough accord with the color scheme and spirit of the furnishings, the architectural design of the rooms and the method of lighting.

Sanitas is distinctive not only for its colorings, patterns and texture, but also for its adaptability to frescoing, stenciling, stippling, blending and paneling. It is made on cloth, machine-painted with durable oil colors, hangs just like wall-paper, does not crack, peel or fade and can be wiped clean with a damp cloth.

Have your decorator show you the new Sanitas styles.

Send for Samples and Booklet

THE STANDARD TEXTILE PRODUCTS CO.

320 Broadway

Dept. 1

New York

The Unspeakable Gentleman

(Continued from Page 159)

that it has made much difference. You still have the paper."

"Is it not painful to continue the discussion?" my father inquired. "I assure you I have not changed my mind since last evening, nor shall I change it. Must I repeat that the affair of the paper is finished?"

"We shall see," said mademoiselle.

"As mademoiselle wishes," said my father.

"It has been six years since I first saw you in Paris," said mademoiselle. Her voice was softly musical, and somehow she was no longer cold and forbidding.

MY FATHER placed his glass on the table and, seemingly a little disturbed, gave her his full attention.

"Six years," said mademoiselle. "I have often thought of you since then."

"You have done me too much honor," said my father. "You always have, my lady."

She only smiled and shook her head.

"You are the sort of man whom women think about and admire; surely you know that without my telling you. A man with a past is always more pleasant than one with a future. Do you know what I thought when I saw you that evening? You remember, they were in the room, whispering as usual, plotting and planning, and you were to have a boat off the coast of Normandy. You and the marquis had ridden from Bordeaux. I thought, captain, that you were the sort of man who could succeed in anything you tried—yes, anything. Perhaps you know the marquis thought so too, and even to-day I believe we were nearly right. We saw you in Brussels later, and in Holland, and then at Blanzay this year. I have known of a dozen commissions you have performed without a single blunder. Indeed, I know of only one thing in which you have definitely failed."

"Only one? Impossible," said my father.

"Yes, only one; and it seemed to be simple enough." A touch of color had mounted to her cheeks.

My father raised his hand hastily to his coat lapel. "Is there never a woman who will not reduce matters to personalities?" he murmured. "I should have known better. I see it now. I should have made love to you."

Though her voice was grave, there was laughter in her eyes. "I have often wondered why you did not. It was the only method you seem to have overlooked."

"There is one mistake a man always makes about women." He smiled and glanced at us both and then back at his glass again. "He forgets that they are all alike. Sooner or later he sees one that in some strange way seems different. I thought you were different, mademoiselle; I thought you even rational. Surely you have every reason to dislike me. Let us be serious, mademoiselle. You do not hate me?"

"I am afraid," said mademoiselle, "that you have had quite an opposite effect."

In spite of myself I started. Could it be that I was jealous? Her eyes were lowered to the arm of her chair, and she was intent on the delicate carving of the mahogany. It was true then. I might have suspected it before, but was it possible that I cared?

"Good heaven!" my father exclaimed and pushed back his chair.

Mademoiselle rested her chin on the palm of her hand. "I told you the interview would not be pleasant," she said. "But you are pessimistic, captain. I have not said I loved you. Do not be alarmed. I was going to say I pitied you. That was all."

"BLESS me!" my father murmured; "it is worse." And yet I thought I detected a note of relief in his voice. "Surely I am not as old as that."

Mademoiselle, whose eyes had never left his face, smiled and shook her head. "I know what you are thinking," she said. "No, no, captain; I am not offering pity to the villain in the story. Even the first night I met you I was sorry for you, captain. I was sorry as soon as I saw your eyes. I knew then that something had happened, and when I heard you speak I told myself you were not to blame for it. I still believe you were not to blame. You see, I know your story now."

"Indeed?" said my father. "And you still are sorry. Mademoiselle, you disappoint me."

"Yes," said mademoiselle, "I heard the story, and I believe she was to blame, not you. After all, she took you for better or worse."

And then a strange thing happened. In spite of himself he started; his face flushed and his lips pressed tight together. It seemed as though a spasm of pain had seized him which he could not conceal in spite of his best efforts. With an unconscious motion he grasped his glass and the color ebbed from his cheeks. "Mademoiselle is mistaken," he said. "Another glass, Brutus." The stem of the one he was holding had snapped in his hand.

"Nonsense," said mademoiselle shortly.

My father cleared his throat and glanced restlessly away, his face still set and still lined with the trace of suffering. "Mademoiselle," he said finally, "you deal with a subject which is still painful. Pray excuse me if I do not discuss it. Anything which you may have heard of my affairs is entirely a fault of mine. You understand?"

"Yes," said mademoiselle, "I understand, and we shall continue to discuss it, no matter how painful it is to you. Who knows, captain? Perhaps I can bring you to your senses; or are you going to continue to ruin your life on account of a woman?"

"Be silent, mademoiselle," said my father sharply.

But she disregarded his interruption. "So she believed that you had filled your ship with fifty bales of shavings. She believed it and called you a thief. She believed you were as gambler as that. I can guess the rest of the story."

But my father had regained his equanimity. "Five hundred bales of shavings," he corrected. "You are misinformed even about the merest details."

"And for fifteen years you have been roving about the world, trying to convince her she was right. Ah, you are touched? I have guessed your secret. Can anything be more ridiculous?"

He half started from his chair, and again his face grew drawn and haggard. "She was right," he said a little hoarsely. "Believe me, she was always right, mademoiselle."

"Nonsense," said mademoiselle; "I do not believe it."

MY FATHER turned to me with a shrug of his shoulders. "It is pleasant to remember, is it not, my son, that your mother had a keener discernment and did not give way to the dictates of a romantic imagination?"

"Sir," I said, "there is only one reason why I ever came here, and that was because my mother requested it. She wanted you to know, sir, that she regretted what she said almost the moment you left the house. If you had ever written her, if you had ever sent a single word, you could have changed it all. In spite of all the evidence, she never came fully to believe it."

"Ah, but you believe it," said my father quickly.

I do not think he ever heard my answer. He had turned unsteadily in his chair and was facing the dying embers of the fire, his left hand on the table before him. Again the spasm of pain crossed his face. Mademoiselle still watched him, but without a trace of triumph. Indeed, she seemed more kindly and more gentle than I had ever known her.

"Five hundred bales of shavings," she said softly. "Ah, captain, there are not many men who would do it—not any that I know, save you and the marquis."

"Brutus," said my father, "fill up the glass." With his eyes still on the fire he drank and sighed. "And now, Brutus," he continued, "my volume of Rabelais."

But when it was placed beside him he left it unopened and still continued to study the shifting scenes in the coals.

(Continued in the April Home Journal)

Old English Wax

Given Away!

A can of Old English Wax will be given away with every Old English Waxer-Polisher. This new time- and labor-saving device both applies the wax and polishes the floor. It's a great improvement over any weighted brush, because with it you can polish just as well and wax the floor besides, as easily as running a carpet-sweeper. It lasts a lifetime. If your dealer can't supply you, take advantage of our short-time offer. Just mail the coupon below.

Lifetime beauty for your floors, woodwork, and furniture

You are judged as a housekeeper largely by the appearance of your floors, woodwork, and furniture. With Old English Wax it's easy to keep them all spick and span, with that soft, velvety lustre which reflects good taste.

Once waxed, the finish lasts a lifetime, with an occasional "touching up" where most used. Waxed floors will not show heel-marks and scratches. You needn't wait days to use the room; you can walk on a waxed floor at once.

The new, easy way

Anyone who can run a carpet-sweeper can both wax and polish floors with the Old English Waxer-Polisher. It's the new, easy way. A soft cloth will do. But the Waxer-Polisher is much easier and quicker. It saves wax, too.

And it's inexpensive

Old English Wax costs about one-third of most other finishes. It contains a large proportion of hard, high-grade, imported wax. That's why Old English goes farther and lasts longer. It is the ideal finish for any home, however simple or magnificent.

Wax just one floor

Try it. See for yourself the permanent beauty that Old English Wax gives all your floors—whether they're unfinished hardwood or softwood, varnished or shellaced—and your woodwork and furniture.

For dancing

Sprinkle Old English Powdered Wax lightly over the floor—the feet of the dancers put on the polish.

Wax and polish all your floors with the Old English Waxer-Polisher. Easy as running a carpet-sweeper.

Beautify your woodwork and furniture with Old English Wax; bring out the beauty of the wood; protect the surface.

Old English Powdered Wax makes a perfect dancing surface.

How to clean your floors

Old English Brightener is the ideal cleaner for your floors—waxed, varnished, or shellaced—and for your woodwork and furniture. It is the preparation that cleans perfectly without injuring the finish. It leaves a light film of wax that polishes beautifully, protects against wear, and makes the finish last twice as long. Keeps linoleum pliable and protects the surface. Old English Brightener contains no oil, so it will not collect dust, discolor the wood, or soil your rugs.

Mail coupon for FREE book

Into this book we've condensed expert advice based on our experience of more than a quarter of a century to help you in finishing your floors, woodwork, furniture, linoleum, etc.

Get Old English products at your paint, hardware, drug, house-furnishing or department store. Or write us direct. At least mail the coupon for the free book.

THE A. S. BOYLE COMPANY, 1028 Dana Avenue, Cincinnati, Ohio
Canadian Factory: Toronto

THE A. S. BOYLE COMPANY,
1028 Dana Avenue,
Cincinnati, Ohio.

☐ Send me your free book, "Beautiful Floors, Woodwork and Furniture—Their Finish and Care."

☐ Send me, all charges paid, an Old English Waxer-Polisher at the special time-limited price, $1.50 (Denver and West, $4.00), which I enclose.

Name _____

Address _____

Smart Fabrics in New and Youthful Ways

ALTHOUGH for formal occasions this spring and summer one's skirt must be no shorter than eight inches from the ground, for sports and street wear ten to twelve inches is still the accepted height. Of course, this does not apply to the matron of mature years, whose skirts should always be from four to six inches longer than those of her débutante daughter. Even as skirts, on the whole, continue to be short, length is still the principal consideration when waistlines are being placed, whether it is an evening gown or a sports blouse that is in the course of construction. Straight lines mark the spring silhouette, relieved by an ever-increasing variety of sleeves of many shapes and designs, but usually of a size to be respected.

The infinite possibilities for feminine adornment that lurk in even so supposedly unsophisticated a garment as a white-flannel sailor suit are cleverly revealed in the sketch at the extreme left above. Navy crêpe de Chine is responsible for the transformation—navy crêpe de Chine that smartly laces the side of the blouse, edges as a narrow binding each fold of the skirt, faces the pocket, and finally makes, of sober roundness, a wide graceful collar far removed from any suggestion of the humble "gob." Even if it means transferring her allegiance from West Point to Annapolis, any débutante or college girl will want such a suit for sports wear this spring. A fitting accompaniment is the hat of white straw, trimmed with bow and loops of blue velvet ribbon, in the manner originated by Reboux, of Paris.

The college girl or young matron will find a three-piece suit of tan chamoisette a most useful and becoming addition to her spring wardrobe. The cape is fastened with large white pearl buttons to each side of jumper at waistline, while the organdie collar sewn into the blouse extends over the cape also, giving a welcome touch of white next to the face. Well suited for wearing with this suit is a brown straw hat trimmed with plaited tan ribbon, the cockade crushing in the soft brim and the pointed ribbon ends hanging over one ear, in a fashion sponsored by Lewis.

The combination of white chudda cloth, one of the newest and loveliest of the wool crêpes, and rose organdie, in the good-looking two-piece sports frock sketched above, is an interesting and decidedly successful experiment. Plain rose-colored organdie makes the sleeves, and edges the Persian-striped organdie used on the skirt, the sleeves and at the neck. The very effective hat of rose straw, lined with rose felt and trimmed with plaited cockades of rose-colored ribbon, was inspired by one of Maria Guy's creations.

Chudda cloth is used again, this time in mustard yellow, to make the sports frock at the extreme right on the opposite page. The soft wool crêpe is well suited to the straight, long-waisted lines of the dress and the simple trimming, which consists of edgings of narrow self-material fringe and double rows of drawn hem-stitching. To trim the graceful hat of sheer crin so carelessly laid on the wall, moiré silk ribbon is run beneath the folded back edge of the brim and tied to hang in long loops and ends—a method much used by Maria Guy.

Particularly designed for sunshiny spring mornings is the jumper frock at the extreme left above, for there is no color more appropriate to youth and springtime than the soft yellow which is here combined so delightfully with white in a Rodier peasant linen. The chintz design is among the season's favored modes. The sleeves and neck bindings are of white handkerchief linen and are edged, as are the hems, armholes and pockets of the jumper, with bands of black taffeta.

Kasha, which closely resembles camel's hair in texture, is still a favorite material, in both white and colors, for sports wear this spring and summer. An unusually attractive two-piece dress of white Kasha is sketched above, with and without the sports coat designed to accompany it. Red Kasha is used to trim the frock and form belt and buckle, while the coat is solid red with pocket bindings and facings of cuffs in white Kasha and a lining of white China silk. Red, by the way, promises to be a predominating color among sports clothes. All white is also effective for this type of sports suit, particularly so in one of the new materials woven to resemble quilting, in crêpe de Chine with quilted borders, or in any of the rough handwoven fabrics so good this year, such as homespun or the native Moroccan cloth now being imported. The small hat worn with this frock is of red straw, with a red cock's feather run across the front and caught in the cleft brim, in the manner featured by Georgette.

White promises to be extensively worn this spring and summer by every woman, whatever her age. If she is young and slender, the white crêpe frock in the center of the sketch above will prove wonderfully becoming. The material is a Romaine crêpe, trimmed with white Bohemian lace, or with fine Irish crochet, which is seen on some of the handsomest afternoon frocks this year. When the Irish is used, the sleeves are of crêpe. A slip of flesh Georgette is worn beneath the blouse and shows above the lace insert in the back. The interesting combination of materials in the hat worn with this frock was originated by Caroline Reboux. Black crin straw is faced with brown duvetyn, and the band of twisted duvetyn around the crown is caught on the side with two large motifs of jet.

For spring or summer evening wear, the débutante, and the matron who is still young and slender enough to look well in a sleeveless dress, will do well to choose the white Georgette dancing frock sketched at the right. To the blouse, with its interesting double belt, rows of pearl beads give a delightful trimming touch, without in any way destroying the simplicity of its straight lines. Cascade sides add gracefulness to an otherwise untrimmed skirt. This is charmingly appropriate for the high-school or college girl's wardrobe.

Paris Hints of Spring

IN AN interesting suit of white cloth embroidered with jet beads, Worth emphasizes by a wide black leather belt the long waistline of the season's mode. Cherry-colored crêpe satin is used on the wrong side in a draped evening gown designed by Worth. A jewel-like motif holding the drapery, and fringe of cherry silk showing beneath it, are the only trimming notes.

A rose crêpe tunic, with oddly shaped side pieces caught at the low waistline by roses of crêpe, is worn over a slip of rose chiffon in a Martini et Armand evening frock of unusual charm. Small velvet flowers cross the shoulders on rose-crêpe straps of uneven length. A Jenny suit of heavy seal-brown crêpe has a coat embroidered with raised silk and heavy scroll borders and is finished with collar and undersleeves of ashes-of-rose organdie.

Paul Poiret first made the evening cape at right of striped black plush and silver lace, but for spring wear it would be charming in crêpe with the upper part heavily embroidered in self color. From Premet comes a lovely all-white evening gown of satin and chiffon. The bodice is of satin with all-over embroidery of small crystal beads; the chiffon skirt is beaded with pearls, some of which are underlined with embroidery. If one wishes a touch of color the feather at the waistline may be a soft pink.

In the good-looking suit at the upper left of opposite page Molyneux has made delightful use of the present popularity of white for every type of costume. The material is white Kasha cloth. For the trimming ivory-colored flat silk braid in two different widths is used. An ivory-and-jet buckle fastens the low belt, and flaring pieces over the hips and on the deep cuffs lend originality to the silhouette.

There is a suggestion of military inspiration about the Madeleine et Madeleine frock of gray cloth, with its scarf collar, straps of gold braid and large gold buttons. Although buttoning demurely down the back, it simulates an opening on the left side front.

A most practical, wearable two-piece dress of beige and tan-wool plaid, designed by Chanel, has a youthful jumper blouse with wide armholes, fringed hem and the inevitable low waistline. The skirt, which is also fringed, is reasonably narrow and in length about eight inches from the ground. This eight-inch height will probably be the most approved this season, although one may wear street clothes several inches shorter and keep within the mode.

Midnight-blue corded silk is trimmed with brick-red broadcloth and embroidered in blue and gold for the stunning Dœuillet afternoon frock sketched in the lower left-hand corner of the opposite page. By the use of set-on side flares Dœuillet effects an attractive variation from straight lines, and makes the dress ideal for the matron's afternoon wear.

Color is Everywhere

MANY women hold the idea that Paris fashions are impractical and only for the very rich. Nothing could be further from the truth. Paris sets the fashions for the world. Take, for instance, the wide straight sleeves now appearing in so many of our clothes. Jenny introduced them over a year ago; to-day they are almost universal. The boat-shaped neck originated with Premet over four years ago; to-day we are wearing it in every type of dress. Then there is the uneven hem line—but one could go on multiplying instances indefinitely. Every month THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL will reflect the smartest fashion tendencies of the French capital, and whether you want clothes of a very distinctive style or the little touches that make the simplest frock attractive and different, you will always find them in its pages.

SELDOM have plain and plaid materials been so attractively combined as in the Premet suit at the left. The long-waisted coat of tan-and-black plaid is trimmed with bands of plain black, while the black broadcloth skirt owes its uneven hem line to side pieces of the plaid material. By her method of applying the panels, Jenny marks the navy serge frock at the left as Parisian and her own. In both back and front the panels are attached at unequal heights and held beneath rows of tiny buttons, but the rear panels alone hang outside the belt to give a straight line to the back. Panels and sleeves are faced with foulard. The attractive Martiel et Armand general-wear suit sketched above has a coat of black Kasha, piped with the same red-and-black Rodier fabric which makes the close-hanging skirt. Side panels of the Kasha cloth are faced with a plain red that matches the red of the plaid.

Morning, Noon, and Night

LITTLE hands have to be washed and dried many times a day. In homes where children play, good absorbent towels—and plenty of them—are needed morning, noon, and night.

Two dozen towels may be made from a 25-yard bolt of Boott Mills Absorbent Toweling. Boott Mills Absorbent Toweling is bright-white and attractive, soft yet firm, full-bodied and durable, absorbs moisture quickly and thoroughly. Made of selected cotton, it launders like new and wears long.

Buy Boott Mills Absorbent Toweling by the bolt. It is economical and convenient to have a generous supply. It is practical for any purpose—for bath, hand, roller, glass, china, and silver. It embroiders beautifully and makes attractive table runners, bureau scarfs, pillow covers, aprons, bibs, and many other household and personal articles.

BOOTT MILLS, LOWELL, MASS.

Send us 50 cents
for two sample towels
such as you can make at home by buying Boott
Mills Absorbent Toweling in the bolt from your dealer.

Address—BOOTT MILLS
Dept. J-M-2
LOWELL, MASS.

When buying, always look for this label

Even the Youngest May Have Paris Easter Clothes

When deciding on spring modes, Paris does not neglect the younger generation. Chéruit, who gives to children's clothes the same charm and originality that mark her grown-up designs, makes the cape coat above of strawberry-red cloth and trims it with scallops of black silk braid. To complete the costume there is a quaint little hat of black satin with a bow of red ribbon on top and a row of red beads on the brim. For the very small boy, Fairyland, a delightful Paris maison devoted exclusively to children's clothes, suggests an artistic, but none the less masculine, suit of green wool embroidered with gray Chinese motifs. Also from Fairyland is the amusingly sophisticated little suit of soft navy tricotine in the center above. The embroidery, worked in white and red on Rodier cloth, is as distinctively French as the tiny bell-shaped black satin hat with its ribbed crown. The Maison Orange, one of the newer French houses that is making a great success with its children's clothes, sponsors for juvenile wear a good-looking raglan sports coat of beige covert cloth. A hat of beige straw, with a pointed design of duvetyn stitched on the brim, accompanies it. The adorable, much-tucked party frock of China blue cotton voile is also from the Maison Orange. Rust-colored ciré ribbon makes the narrow belt and trims the graceful hat of blue taffeta. Chéruit originated the fascinating dress of rose satin, with rose-edged gold braid plaiding the bodice and hanging in looped ends over skirt.

ONE does not always care to reproduce a French costume exactly as it was designed, but a small amount of imagination will suggest changes in material, color or trimming that will adapt it to American use without in any way destroying its Parisian personality. This is particularly true of children's clothes. The cape coat above, for example, need not be of strawberry red; plain covert cloth in any becoming shade of blue, woodsy brown or gray would be quite as smart, and could very well have the cape edges finished either straight or scalloped. In one of the waterproof fabrics, with a hat to match, this would make a delightful rainy-day costume. When braid is used, three tiny loops of narrower braid at the tip of each scallop, as in the sketch, are very attractive.

As a "dress-up" costume for the four or five year old son of the house, who is already rebelling against feminine frills, the Chinese-inspired suit in the sketch is excellent in any woolen or heavy wash material and in a dozen or more color combinations. Small daughter will probably want to wear the very grown-up suit of navy tricotine just as it is, but it can be easily simplified by replacing the embroidery with braid or omitting it entirely. The wide skirt, plaited on the sides, is particularly becoming if one is between ten and fifteen. Unless duvetyn or serge seems preferable, or another color is desired, the sports coat above should not be altered, for it is of a type that is always "in" and always becoming to children. The stitching at each seam gives a strap effect that is new.

In the dress of blue cotton voile, the use of tucked panels in back and front over a straight slip, the unusual way in which the sleeves are tucked and the miniature bateau neckline are all excellent features. It is a quite sophisticated little dress and therefore splendid for a rather formal party or to be worn by the flower girl at a spring or early summer wedding. Any of the pastel colors or white would look well. In America the satin and gold braid of the frock at the extreme right of the sketch above would be worn only by a flower girl or ribbon bearer at a formal wedding. The dress, however, would be very good-looking in serge with silk braid, either all white or navy with black or red braid, and the waist alone may be braided. The dress is a "chemise" with seams on the shoulders.

Dermaline of Roses

Soothes and Heals the Smarting Skin

A good skin lotion is necessary in every household. Dermaline of Roses is a delightfully perfumed preparation that quickly heals chaps, wind-burn and other skin irritations.

ZANOL PRODUCTS

This trademark identifies each one of the 350 ZANOL Household Products, famed for their quality and purity. Sold at your door only through our exclusive ZANOL distributors, insuring absolute freshness at lowest cost.

We have good paying, permanent positions in unoccupied territory for ambitious men and women to represent us. Excellent pay. No experience needed. Write for particulars. Address Dept. 2.

The AMERICAN PRODUCTS CO.
Zanol Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio

Your Baby

Should be a healthy, happy growing baby if it has loving care, proper food and comfortable clothing.

NON-NETTLE WHITE FLANNELS

Sold only by us are the softest and smoothest for infants' wear. "Non-Nettle" stamped every half yard on selvage except silk warps.

We Send Free a Sample Case containing samples of flannels, Antiseptic Diaper, Rubber Sheeting, large lines of White Goods, Dimities, Long Cloth, etc.

Also Illustrated Catalogue showing 36 styles of White Embroidered Flannels, Infants' Outfits, Separate Garments, Rubber Goods, Baby Baskets, and hundreds of necessary articles for expectant mothers and the baby, and valuable information on the care of babies.

For 25 Cents we will add a complete set of 17 Modern Paper Patterns for baby's first wardrobe that would cost $1.75 if bought separately.

THE LAMSON BROS. CO., 345 Summit St., Toledo, O. Established in 1885. Known around the globe.

THE A.E. LITTLE SHOE

—It brings a message to you of style and comfort in one little shoe.

See page 60

Music Lessons
At Home

Complete Conservatory Course by Mail
Wonderful home study music lessons under great American and European teachers. Endorsed by Paderewski. Master teachers guide and coach you. Lessons a marvel of simplicity and completeness.
Any Instrument
Write naming course you are interested in: Piano, Harmony, Voice, Public School Music, Violin, Cornet, Mandolin, Guitar, Banjo or Reed Organ—and we will send FREE CATALOG. SEND FOR IT NOW!
University Extension Conservatory, 515 Siegel-Myers Bldg., Chicago

Wedding
Invitations & Announcements
Engraved in the very latest styles. Write for samples.
Dep't. J
VIRGINIA STATIONERY CO. RICHMOND, VA.

New Invention Revolutionizes The Art of Cooking

I am now able to offer to the world the cheapest, easiest and most perfect method of preparing the family meals ever known. Here is a cooking appliance that saves 50% to 75% of fuel cost—saves hours of time—saves countless steps—and insures better prepared, more tasty and healthful meals, from cereals to dessert.

Automatic Rapid Electric Cook Stove

A new, simple, practical invention that gives you every cooking, baking, roasting, frying, boiling and broasting facility of the expensive electric range, plus every advantage of the fireless cooker, at less than you would pay for even a good gasoline or oil cookstove, and at less fuel expense than any other known method of cooking. No other cooking stove or appliance needed. Simply snap on the switch and electricity heats the food. When the cooking starts, it shuts off automatically and the "fireless cooker" principle does the rest, without any additional heat or attention from you.

Attaches to any electric light socket, requires no special wiring. Ready for use when you receive it. Aluminum lined throughout. Equipped with "Wear-Ever" cooking utensils. Guaranteed.

Try It Thirty Days At My Risk

I want you to try this great invention 30 days in your own kitchen—at my risk. I want to prove what it will do for you.

Send for my FREE Home Science Cookbook Today!

A Postcard will do. Write today!

W. M. CAMPBELL CO.

Dept. 13 Detroit, Mich.

Saves
50% to 75%
of Fuel Cost for Cooking

Wm. Campbell,
President
The Original
Fireless
Cooker
Mfg.

NESTLÉ'S MILK FOOD

The World's Greatest
Baby Food

The Milk is already in it.
Send for Sample and for 72 page Mother Book—FREE

Nestlé's Food Company,
43 Nestlé Bldg. New York City

Be a Nurse

Learn in spare time at home
Earn $30—$35 a week

Every woman should learn. We train Beginners, Practical Nurses, Mothers and Religious Workers by our Fascinating Home-study Method. Leading Chicago System. Endorsed by physicians. Established 12 years.

Earn while learning

If you are over 18 and under 55 years of age write for illustrated catalog and 12 Sample Lesson Pages with FREE details of Money-Back Guarantee and FREE NURSE'S EQUIPMENT.

Become Independent

Chicago School of Nursing, Dept. 33, 421 Ashland Blvd., Chicago

High School Course in 2 Years

You can complete this simplified High School Course at home inside of two years. Meets all requirements for entrance to college and the leading professions. This and thirty other practical courses are described in our Free Bulletin. Send for it TODAY.

AMERICAN SCHOOL

Dept. H-353 Drexel Ave. & 58th St., CHICAGO

Molyneux has made this suit of tan Kasha and trimmed it with white silk crêpe medallions, smartly embroidered in tan and brown. Blouse of crêpe.

From Jean Patou comes this suit of black silk crêpe trimmed with black stitching and cordings. Blackembroiders the satin waistcoat.

Paris Suits Have Narrow Skirts, But Jackets May be Flaring

By MARY BRUSH WILLIAMS

Patou's straight wrap of red wool is ingeniously trimmed with stitchings and corded lines, and has a straight stitched cape-like piece over the center back.

WHERE had I met that little dog before? He rowed his course along the Rue de Rivoli just the way Mrs. Burke-Roche's little dog used to row up Fifth Avenue, his little legs going out on the side like oars and his stomach almost flat on the ground. It was going to be embarrassing in a minute if I could not place him. He was not the handsome Russian wolfhound that sat for his portrait and belonged to Madame Jacques Balsan, who was the Duchess of Marlborough, who was Consuelo Vanderbilt. In a moment I had it. We had met first at St. Moritz, where he appeared one morning a mere black speck on the snow, as the hot sun pelted us. And he was feeling terribly dressed up that day, because on the side of his collar he wore a huge purple bow. That bow was discovered later to connect up with a lovely white wool outing suit that fanned into purple on the underside of the white box pleats, and was topped with a purple velvet hat like a pansy. And that costume connected up with an American girl, who in turn connected up with a Hollander, a Rumanian, an Englishman—and romance—the Hollander for the moment seeming to have the best of it. The girl was always reading colored booklets of the Riviera, and later we saw most of the party down in Cannes.

Her pretty manners and her pretty clothes I thought furnished a fashion note of magnitude. They showed in clean-cut relief against a background a little heavy, with the strain of maintaining a bizarre chic. To be sure, there were the loveliest foulards I ever saw; not "spotty," like foulards of old, but covered with all-over patterns that sounded a modern note. They were made up with serge, and sometimes as linings that turned back on the material, forming part of the garment. But for the rest, there was organdie trimmed with monkey fur, and people sat around discussing how to obtain the correct shade of white. It is the color elected by secret ballot to supplant black, and it was earlier making its bleak

(Continued on Page 177)

A low waistline effect is achieved in this Jean Patou cape of tan-faced cloth by cleverly passing looped bands of the cloth through slits in the center back.

Lucette FROCKS

TRADE MARK

2515—There's a charming simplicity to this little Lucette frock of checked gingham. The pleated edging about the neck, cuffs and panel is of white organdie. In pink-and-white, blue-and-white, orchid-and-white, each of self material. Sizes 14 to 44, $5.00.

2563—Few frocks are more colorfully attractive than this with its combination of gingham, organdie and wood embroidery. The frock illustrated is of orchid-and-white gingham, the collar and apron effect of orchid organdie edged with white organdie plaiting. The embroidery in three-color wood trails gracefully down the front. The sleeves finished in organdie of both colors are smart. In orchid-and-white, blue-and-white and brown-and-white. It opens at side, each of gingham. Sizes 14 to 44, $10.00.

2534—Gingham and organdie have been strikingly combined in this model. The vest of white organdie is boned with gingham, the long graceful collar is likewise boned with gingham. A band inset of white organdie in the skirt is trimmed with wheels of gingham and the narrow belt ties at the side. In red-and-white, black-and-white, blue-and-white and green-and-white. Sizes 14 to 44, $7.50.

You feel so well dressed—in your Lucette Frocks. Perhaps it's because they're so interestingly designed—maybe it's the crisp ginghams in their rainbow of colors—or, still again, it might be the careful tailoring, which is not found in the ordinary wash frock.

In any event, one does feel—not as though one were in a house or porch frock—but charmingly and fittingly dressed for the luncheon, the country club, the house party—all the informal and semi-formal events of these delightfully festive days.

Select your Lucette Frocks now for spring and summer wear. Those described above, and many other styles, are shown by the stores carrying Lucette; they are so surprisingly moderate in price that you may have a lovely array in a bevy of colors. You couldn't possibly have them made for these prices.

Write us today for the new Lucette Style Brochure (no charge) and if you are in doubt as to who sells Lucette Frocks in your vicinity, we will advise you.

H. LINSK & COMPANY, Central Bldg., Philadelphia

A quaint legend of South America tells of a travelling magician who came to a city and announced that he was a maker of masks. The curious multitude besieged him. One woman wished her complexion different, another asked that the color of her eyes be changed, a third was dissatisfied with her nose; all pleaded for superior endowments. Patiently he fashioned for each the mask she coveted. The next day he returned and found an angry mob and the masks lying broken in fragments on the stones. They accused him of having caricatured their defects—of making sport of them. The wise man answered simply: "In striving to be different you destroy your inner beauty of heart and sentiment and taste. Nature knows best; who follows her cannot err."

THE source of true beauty is in the natural intelligence of every woman, answers the wise man of the legend. There is charm in the thought and a kind of inspiration.

Do not change your type; make the most of it. Study yourself point by point if you would seek a style distinction that can only be found in the proper expression of individual beauty. Study your complexion, hair, teeth, hands, feet, but most of all—decidedly most of all—study your figure. "For," warns Fashion, "though one doesn't need to be as slight as a moonbeam to wear the new clothes, one's curves must occur rhythmically—under the right corset. You see these modern clothes are so chastely simple that a curve in the wrong place has no disguise, no excuse."

GOSSARD artistry recognizes as many types of beauty as there are types of women and has produced a sophisticated corsetry to take care of every kind of figure there is and prevent every kind of figure there ought not to be.

PROPERLY corseted, the tall slender woman has a litheness that challenges age—a grace of poise that gives allurements to everything she wears. Uncorseted or wrongly corseted she becomes angular, stiffly thin, and she isn't young despite what the masseuse has done to her face.

THERE is the short slender type. A half-inch thickening of the hips, an inch on the thighs, that would be worrying enough to a taller woman, becomes positive disaster to her—it steals ill-spared inches from her precious height. And such a tiny wisp of a corset would save to her the illusion of the perfect miniature.

SO many women who are no longer slim have gone on buying the same kind of heavily boned, strait-jacket corsets year after year; treacherous corsets that show hard lines through the best tailoring and entirely destroy the soft, studied-careless effect of a thin frock. Gossard artistry has produced some modern illusion-savers for the woman of full figure; unobtrusive corsets that disguise their astute existence behind a natural, slim-by-proportion appearance that subtracts pounds from the apparent weight. They give dignity, poise, and that grace that comes from unrestrained motion.

G O S S A R D FRONT LACING C O R S E T S

"THE GIFT OF EVE": So we have named a tiny book that is just off our press. It is not pretentious but it will be cherished by every woman who appreciates the importance of that quiet distinction that ever marks the woman of good taste. To you we shall be glad to send it, if you will trouble to write your request to our home offices at 1006 S. Michigan Ave., Chicago, Illinois.

WHETHER you are tall or short, large above or large below the waistline, curved back or short waisted, there are special Gossards made for you that will corset you without a telltale line; give you a smooth pleasing curve from armpit to knee without a moment's discomfort. And with this unrestricted natural charm of line comes that subtlest and youthfulest of all the beauty gifts—grace.

AND then of course there is the average type so many of us approximate. If we are truthful with ourselves we know that the slimness of youth cannot be ours by divine right forever and ever and that a clever corset is all that stands between us and that vague, shapeless bourne from whence no traveller returns—age.

YOU will find these original front lacing corsets at the best stores—everywhere—and you will be served by trained corsetiers who will unerringly help you select just those models that will best express your personal charm. As faultless in material and workmanship as they are in design, they will retain their original grace of outline to the last day they are worn. In the economy of this superior wearing service alone they amply justify their nominal cost.

THE brassiere of today, like the corset of today, must be made for types. As in corsetry, the brassiere should be used to attain perfect type proportions. The bust should never be flattened by an obviously unsuited garment, nor allowed to unbecomingly drop in an ill-advised support. In the suitability of their dainty materials and in their characteristic shaping, Gossard Brassieres conform unerringly to the individual needs of the figures for which they have been designed. They fit with that incomparable nicety of detail that is so much worth while to those of us who really care about our appearance. And they are most reasonably priced so that every woman can afford them.

The H. W. GOSSARD CO.
Chicago New York London Toronto Sydney Buenos Aires

Ideal Figure
Tall Slender

Ideal Figure
Short Slender

Ideal Figure
Tall Heavy

Ideal Figure
Short Heavy

Ideal Average
Figure

Ideal Figure
Large Below Waist

Ideal Figure
Large Above Waist

Ideal Figure
Curved Back

Ideal Figure
Short Waisted

Here Careful Planning Makes Easy Sewing

A SHORT cape that snaps at the back of the neck and across the shoulders is the outstanding feature of the matron's light-gray Kasha general-wear frock at the left above, but the fascinating trimming of cherry-red cloth points is not to be overlooked. Then, too, the plaited sides, which make this dress so wearable for the matron, and the wide sleeves gathered into narrow cuffs add to the smartness. The pattern comes in sizes 16, and 36 to 40.

A very practical frock of a type usually becoming to the matron of straight lines is that sketched at the right above. It would be extremely good-looking in black, navy, gray or one of the woodsy browns in broadcloth, wool crepe or serge, trimmed with flat silk braid. The pattern comes in sizes 16, and 36 to 42. Plain and figured silk crêpes have been well combined in the attractive afternoon frock at the left, which is well suited to the matron of generous proportions. If one wishes to make the frock largely of the printed material the front panel may be of plain silk crêpe. Again, serge may make the whole costume. The pattern comes in sizes 36 to 46.

Foulard or crêpe with an all-over figure has side panels, collar and deep cuffs of navy or black serge in the matron's frock at the right. Here also the materials may be reversed to good effect. Pattern comes in sizes 16, and 36 to 42.

Patterns may be secured from any store selling Home Patterns; or by mail, postage prepaid, from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City. Dresses, 35 cents; Coats, 35 cents; Blouses or Skirts, 30 cents; Children's Patterns, 25 cents.

Corns Lift Right Off

Drop a little "Freezone" on a touchy corn or callus for a few nights. Instantly it stops aching, then shortly you lift it right off. Doesn't hurt a bit.

You can lift off every hard corn, soft corn, corn between the toes, and the "hard-skin" calluses on bottom of feet. Just get a bottle of "Freezone" at any drug store, anywhere.

Edward Wesley and Co., Cincinnati, O.

Direct from mill

Make this new Spring slip-on for $2.50

You can make this smart Spring slip-on for $2.50 with Peace Dale Fillee Silk and Worsted Floss. Send for free sample card of yarns and get directions free.

Wonderful quality

Peace Dale Yarns are the finest all-wool worsted yarns—strong, soft, smooth, easy to knit with. Peace Dale prices are very much cheaper than other yarns anywhere near the same quality. Old New England firm. Satisfaction guaranteed.

Free samples and directions

Send today for 90 free yarn samples—8 different kinds and weights—36 beautiful colors. Get finest quality yarns at direct from the mill prices. Peace Dale Mills, Dept. 406, 25 Madison Avenue, New York.

Fillee silk and worst slip-on—make it for $2.50

Peace Dale Knitting Yarns

Nervous Feet!

Relief is here! And the shoe is smart.

See page 60

Hotels Need Trained Women

Nation-wide demand for trained women; all departments, hotels, clubs, apartment houses; uncrowded field; fine living, quick advancement. Our methods endorsed by leading hotels everywhere. Write for FREE BOOK "Your Big Opportunity." LEWIS HOTEL TRAINING SCHOOL, Room 513, Washington, D. C.

AT HOME LEARN TO PLAY

Free Book—Discloses secret which makes Music intensely interesting and easy. Explains how you can learn to play any instrument in your own home without a teacher. Make Money Thru Music. Write for book today. Mention Instrument. U. S. School of Music, 3433 Brunswick Bldg., New York City

AZUREA
W/ FACE POWDER de Luxe
L. T. PIVET
Paris, France

This Delightful Odor may be had in EXTRACT SACHET
TOILET WATER
VEGETAL SOAP and also in the Charming New
PIVET Toilet Accessories
TALC CREAM and COMPACT FACE POWDER

Other English Perfumes
Created by the Master of L. T. PIVET
FLORENCE L'ETRE
POMPEIA CAFRANO
MUGUET VIOLETTE
ASTRID MICHELIS

CHAS. BAZZ, Sole Agent for U.S.
28 East 12th Street, New York City

Straw and Fabric Share Honors in Spring Hats

By her draped turban of copper-colored satin straw cloth, with its crossed quills, Eva Le Gallienne proves that she chooses a hat as successfully as she plays in the N. Y. Theater Guild's production of Lilium.

PHOTOS BY RICHARD MORGAN

Although shape rather than trimming is emphasized in the spring millinery, rosettes of gold-edged canna ribbon add much charm to a hat of canna faille.

The black satin straw turban above owes its effectiveness to a winged bow of black satin and a smart new high sloping front.

Distinctive features of the brown Milan hat above are the brim, faced on top with brown taffeta and split to hold a straw quill, and the oddly dented crown.

Orchid-colored gros de Londres, heavily embroidered in self color, lends itself well to the turned-up brim that is so popular for this spring.

Most becoming to Miss Le Gallienne is a youthful seven-sided hat of cornflower faille with an old-fashioned bouquet tucked under its brim.

A fairly large crown and a turned-back brim mark the hat of maize-colored Milan above as this season's, while loops of grosgrain ribbon covering the brim induce one to choose it for Easter.

In the beige faille hat above, black-and-white ribbon binds each edge of the three-storied brim and makes on one side a cocarde half hidden from the eye.

Silk floss, curled and doubled to imitate ostrich feathers, is used to soften the straight brim line of Miss Le Gallienne's hat of black Milan.

Quality Behind the Name

MORE Farrington Eye Glass Cases are used by opticians and optometrists than any other one make. The superiority of Farrington Cases begins with design, continues with material and workmanship and is proved by long, satisfactory service. Opticians or optometrists cannot supply better than

Farrington Eye Glass Cases

Angel Food Cake

You want to be the best cake maker in your neighborhood. I can teach you how. If you will follow my methods you can on your first attempt build a delicious angel food cake and many other kinds—cakes that will immediately give you a wonderful reputation.

Your Chance for Profit—One woman I taught sold 300 cakes, made by my methods, for $3 each. I have thousands of letters from thankful women who are making cakes by the Osborn Cake Making System—My methods are original. You cannot fail with them. They are easy to learn and you are sure of success the first time. Just tear off the coupon, fill it out and mail it in. I will send you particulars right away with no obligation on your part.

Mrs. Grace Osborn,
Box 13, Bay City, Mich.

Send me without obligation full particulars about the famous Osborn Cake System.

Name _____
Address _____

Two of these postures are wrong

They affect your style and your health

Which is yours ?

HAVE you noticed that nowadays when you talk with anybody about corsets you are almost sure, sooner or later, to say something about their effect on your health? Style, yes; of course that comes first. But the day is past when a woman wears style that injures her health. And thanks to sensible physicians, and to the Spencer Designing System, women are learning that before you can have good style you must have good health.

It all comes down to a question of posture. Doctors have said over and over again that 95 out of every 100 American women have faulty posture—and lack the erect, graceful carriage and easy poise which you mean instinctively when you say "She wears her clothes well."

If you will think over all the women you know, and then look at the pictures on this page, you will understand what your doctor means when he says that 95 out of every 100 women have postures of either the fatigue type or the lordosis type.

Not all have faults of posture so marked as those shown—often only a wrong tendency is apparent which, if not corrected, will become more and more pronounced.

The fatigue type shows most noticeably rounded shoulders, a flat chest and a general effect of sagging. The wrong corset makes this condition worse—it fails to support the abdomen and pokes into the body at the top. Headaches, backaches and indigestion are the first ill effects, and unless this fatigue posture is corrected, your doctor will make a mental note of "ptosis." And in the train of ptosis come many really serious illnesses.

The other kind of wrong posture is ominously called lordosis. "Sway-back" describes it better. A corset which is too tight across the waistline in back will often cause this condition. Lordosis shows in an exaggerated hollowing-in of the back; the stomach and digestive apparatus are displaced and their functions interfered with.

Perhaps you are one of the lucky few to whom a mirror shows a normally poised, erect figure like the third picture above. There are, however, only five women in every hundred who can boast that distinction, and distinction it is, for with it go vigor and buoyancy of health and the charm of style.

It is the perfect figure, alas! that the style creator has in mind when he designs the gown that you eventually buy. It is the perfect figure that most women have in mind when they hopefully select a corset. That is why so many smart gowns and tailors simply "don't go" with their wearers.

For the last fifteen years we have been studying the problem of posture and its relation to style and good health. We have analyzed the individual measurements of a million women. This experience proves (1) That no two women have figures just alike and (2) that creating for every woman a special corset is the only certain way to improved posture, good style and health.

On this the Spencer Designing System was based. So far as we know, we are the only corset makers in the world who create a separate design for each client.

The Spencer corsetière who calls at your home has been trained to recognize figure faults and wrong posture of every sort. She takes your measurements and sends them with an exact description of your figure to our designers. If your figure shows a tendency toward ptosis or lordosis she will have our designers make for you a Spencer Supporting Corset which will bring back correct posture and the natural lines which mean both health and style.

If you do not need special support, a Spencer corset—also especially designed for you but without the special supporting feature—will prevent the coming of either form of wrong posture.

With the finished corset, you receive a guarantee, backed by a $1,000 bond, that every measurement and the description of your figure were actually used in designing and making the corset.

THE BERGER BROTHERS CO.

141 Derby Avenue, New Haven, Connecticut

We make supports for every purpose upon physicians' prescriptions. The designers in our Medical Department have a training equivalent to a course in dissection at a medical school of the first class.

SPENCER
Rejuveno
CORSETS
Never sold in Stores Reg. U. S. Pat. Office

We shall be glad to hear from well-bred, capable, neat women who desire to represent us. Those whose applications we accept will be given free training in the Spencer System of Corsetry. Spencer Corsetry is a profitable occupation in which you will find the satisfaction of rendering service to others.

If you do not find "Spencer Corsetry" listed in your telephone book send this coupon to The Berger Brothers Co., 141 Derby Ave., New Haven, Conn., for our free booklet and address of nearest corsetière.

Your name _____
Address _____

Give this year's look to last year's hat

Don't discard last year's straw—you can have all the joy of a new hat for a few minutes' jolly work and a few cents in money.

Every day you admire hats that—if truth were told—are not new, but have been made to look new by the use of Colorite Straw Hat Finish. There are sixteen durable, waterproof colors to choose from, and they are on sale in all drug stores and in dry goods and department stores.

If a substitute is offered you, send us 25 cents (30 cents in Canada) for the color you want.

You can also get Colorite Fabric Dyes (in convenient tablets) for the easy dyeing or tinting of cotton, wool, silk, and mixed goods. One dye does all.

16 COLORS

Jet Black (Gloss)
Dull Black
Cardinal Red
Yellow
Navy Blue
Cadet Blue
Victory Blue
Sage Green
Lavender
Old Rose
Cerulean
Burnt Straw
Brown
Violet
Gray
Natural

CARPENTER-MORTON COMPANY

Established 1840

Dept. 23 77 Sudbury Street, Boston

Colorite

HAT FINISH

NOVELITE SPREADS

They're Novel—They're Light

Appealing in their fanciful weaves and dainty coloring—so easy to keep fresh and wholesome.

You may choose from a variety of charming patterns—clustered stripes, basket-weave squares, quaint sampler stitch. In delicate rose or blue—snowy white if you prefer. The colors are sun-fast and tub-fast.

They come in all desired sizes—tuck-in or cut-out corners, plain or scalloped, bolster covers to match. Priced from $3 to $8.

Write us today for Novelite Style Book and samples of fabrics giving name of your favorite store. No charge.

MARGRACE MILLS, Inc.,
JAMES F. WHITE & CO., Inc.,
54 Worth St., New York
Selling Agents

A Frock for Every Woman of Every Age

Inserts of black satin in the matron's general wear navy serge at the left are unusually effective when banded with a novel up-and-down application of narrow braid. The pattern comes in sizes 16, and 36 to 44. Augustine and André, of Paris, make the hat of black satin with facing of black duceryn.

When black broadcloth is lightened by sash, scalloped collar and sleeve bands of beige crêpe de Chine, one has a smart, youthful frock that is practical for general wear all during the spring. Pattern comes in sizes 16, and 36 to 42. Augustine and André pleat ribbon and use pearl pins to trim the black straw hat with its round crown.

Black crêpe with a pointed drape of jade-green crêpe and an interesting jet motif reflects the spirit of the spring mode in both line and color. Pattern comes in sizes 16, and 36 to 42.

3469

A FABRIC bases its claim for recognition this season largely upon its suppleness. Serge, broadcloth, moiré and every variety of wool and satin crêpe will be worn throughout the spring, but must be soft and pliable. Printed fabrics will be very good and will range from chintzes of both English and Oriental inspiration and cotton materials closely resembling the old-fashioned calicoes, to gorgeously colorful maroccains and Georgette crêpes. In silken materials the printed design is quite as often in closely set medallion form as in widely scattered motifs. Colorful allover Persian effects appear on many crêpes and soft tulle, and are much used for sleeves and trimmings. Trimmings on the whole remain simple, featuring flowers and straps of self material, rows of narrow braiding and some beads. Rickrack is smart on morning cottons, while lace is a good trimming note for formal afternoon and evening wear.

3454

Patterns may be secured from any store selling Home Patterns; or by mail, postage prepaid, from The Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City. Dresses, 35 cents; Coats, 35 cents; Blouses or Skirts, 30 cents; Children's Patterns, 25 cents; Transfer, 30 cents.

The bouffant type of dancing frock, always becoming to a youthful and slender figure, is here happily developed in silvery-pink taffeta or faille, embroidered with silver medallions. The pattern comes in sizes 14 to 20.

For afternoon wear, sand-colored Canton crepe, with chiffon sleeves attached and trimmed by zigzag rows of tiny dull green beads, is both distinctive and youthful. The pattern, in sizes from 14 to 20, provides also for long sleeves.

The young matron's white crêpe de Chine frock, shown at the right below, may be distinctly jeune fille, with ruffles of sheer thread lace and small pearl beads for trimming. The pattern sizes are 16, and 36 to 42.

In the matron's formal evening gown, below, gathered panels of fine black lace hang gracefully over an underskirt of black satin, while the bodice is of fuchsia velvet and black lace. Pattern sizes are 16, and 36 to 46.

Patterns may be secured from any store selling Home Patterns; or by mail, postage prepaid, from The Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City. Dresses, 35 cents; Coats, 35 cents; Blouses or Skirts, 30 cents; Children's Patterns, 25 cents; Transfer, 30 cents.

What is latest in millinery?

No matter when you buy a Fiskhat—pre-season or mid-season—you are sure of latest style.

Fisk Dealers In Intimate Touch with Style Tendencies

Every week we send them latest information on the styles, while every few days they receive the latest Fiskhat creations.

The Span Between Our Designers and You Is Very Brief

The latest dictates from the center of style are interpreted daily into Fiskhats and shipped immediately to our dealers.

The latest styles in "Fiskhats" are waiting for your inspection right now.

Write for the Fisk Style Letter

—please mention your milliner's name

D. B. FISK & CO., 225 North Wabash Avenue, Chicago

Creators of Correct Millinery

New York

Chicago

Paris

The dealer displaying this sign,

is a style authority on millinery

The name that means "Style and Quality Assured"

These Gordon-Van Tine Home-Owners Write:

"I figure I saved $500 on a $2,200 house."—J. E. Keller, Branson, Mo.
"My carpenter says I saved $1,000."—Ralph D. Grigsby, Blandinsville, Ill.
"I saved between $250 and $300."—J. O. Kurtz, Scottsdale, Penn.
"Saved almost half on our house."—Wm. H. Jenner, Rochester, Minn.
"You saved me at least $600."—J. G. Fitchpatrick, Nevada, Iowa.

Distinctive Homes at Guaranteed Prices 200 Plans FREE!

Buy at wholesale prices. Our guaranteed price on a Gordon-Van Tine Home covers all materials as specified. No extras. Highest quality materials only. Shipped anywhere. Satisfaction or money back.

We have helped thousands save money and get better homes. Don't judge building costs by what people tell you of local conditions—investigate Gordon-Van Tine's wholesale prices today.

By Ready-Cut method—all sawing, cutting and fitting by machinery in 4 big mills—you make big savings in lumber and labor costs. Specifications conform to all city building codes. Prompt shipment—safe arrival guaranteed.

Ready-Cut Garages Well planned; 1 to 5 rooms. Inexpensive. Summer Cottages Davenport, Ia.; St. Louis, Mo.; Chehalis, Wash.; Hattiesburg, Miss.

Four Big Mills Davenport, Ia.; St. Louis, Mo.; Chehalis, Wash.; Hattiesburg, Miss.

Gordon-Van Tine Co. ESTABLISHED 1885

Satisfaction Guaranteed or Money Back
148 Case Street Davenport, Iowa

200 Home Plans—FREE

Learn about our service. Send for our Book of Plans, "Gordon-Van Tine Homes." Photos, prices, specifications, full descriptions of homes for town and country, Colonial, bungalows, 1 and 2 story cottages, etc. Many conveniences—built-in pantry cases, cabinets, linen closets, etc.

Building Material Catalog—5,000 bargains in lumber, screens, paint, roofing, etc., at wholesale prices.

GORDON-VAN TINE CO., 148 Case St., Davenport, Iowa

Send me FREE BOOKS as follows: I expect to ☐ Build ☐ Repair
Name _____ City _____
St. No. or R. F. D. _____ State _____

Betty Wales Dresses

THIS page reproduces the cover of the Betty Wales style portfolio for Spring, 1922. The booklet is authoritative and will assist you in selecting your new dress.

Ask the local Betty Wales Dealer for your copy or write us and we will mail it without charge.

Every Betty Wales Dress is Unconditionally Guaranteed.

Betty Wales Dressmakers
NEW YORK

Paris Suits Have Narrow Skirts

(Continued from Page 168)

entree on the streets in the cold, wet fogs of wintry Paris. It mustn't have any ivory in it, but must be a white white.

Further conversation concerned itself with how passé it is to wear green dyed with blue in it, when now it should carry the note of yellow. People were wearing heavy sheets of material like window curtains as sleeves. They hung from under armhole to hem—sometimes in the evenings below it—leaving the arm quite bare.

Everybody was wondering whether the present trip of the Prince of Wales would give us "a feeling for East Indian things." Already a dress had appeared in the ballroom in which the heavy East Indian embroidery had been set with tiny looking-glasses. The next morning the hotel guests were sitting a little stiffly around aperitif tiny tables discussing this, when the American girl, with her entourage complete from little dog to suitors, waited in. She had on one of the wraps which M. Molyneux, who creates such lovely clothes, calls "those hang-off-of-you" capes, and which fall from the shoulders down the back of you and are so graceful. I should say to watch out for them for spring. She pulled it off with a careless gesture, flung it in a corner with her tennis racket, dropped a ball, picked it up before any of her suitors could scramble for it, dropped the other while recovering the first, arranged a lock of hair with the free hand, and before you knew it slid out into the dance. All the room took on a freer look and one of admiration.

There is more to style than color, line and East Indian motifs, and now it is the fashion to be Anglo-Saxon, to be sprightly, and wear clothes that are useful. To watch her lively group conduct its outing was the freshest spectacle I think that has presented itself on the stage of old Europe in this dull year.

She was the first to present us with the spectacle of a tailored suit with a coat made like a jumper, which you draw on, sweater-like, over your head. It seems that Chanel was responsible for this creation, which was made of beige wool, fringed round the bottom of skirt and jumper, and trimmed after the edict prescribed by M. Rodier, in clusters of brown stripes, descending from the under-arm area. It tied at the throat with some woolen strings, and it was altogether to the good as an outing costume. That was on the Riviera.

All Suits are Low in Waistline

NOW, later, on the Rue de Rivoli, preceded by her little dog, this American girl gave us our preliminary glimpse of a Parisian spring. Of course, being Anglo-Saxon, she was in a tailored suit at this season. The French have had to make them for us, and they admire their own work so much they are beginning to adopt them too. It was gray and, of course, mixed material. It was eight inches from the ground, and narrow as to skirt. The jacket came only as low as the wrist line below the belt, and it was bloused in the back very low over a narrow girdle. Being early in the season, it had a high standing collar, the shape of a muf, and made of gray Astrakhan, and this fur also banded the long, easy sleeves. That coat hung down the back in as straight a line from collar to belt as if one had plumbed for it, and it buttoned straight up the front. Of course we stopped to converse, and even the little dog turned back in some annoyance through the heavy seas of the Rue de Rivoli. This morning he was not wearing his purple bow, and that circumstance was what kept me from recognizing him. He had on a very trim, correct-for-the-morning tailored collar, set with yellow stones. The girl unfastened her tailleur to show me something the Hollander had given her from his last trip to the Dutch East Indies, and disclosed in the movement that her blouse and lining were of yellow. It is awfully smart in Paris to dress your little dog to match your coat lining and your handkerchief!

She had the scoop on that tailored costume. There will presently be millions of them, details of which might be described ad infinitum, but essentially and fundamentally they will be like that. Many of them will be in beige and coffee color, but you see her outing suit was inclined to brown. Some of them will be tipped across the back with those butterfly capes that began their flight across the stage of fashion last fall. One of these, like the jacket it accompanies, is bordered in a pattern of shells made of the material. Lanvin, you know, trims some of her dressier costumes in real shells, like the border round the flower bed in front of your railroad station.

A number of tailored suits lap far over on the side in skirt and jacket, both of which fasten along the meridian of the under-arm seam. But whatever the difference in detail, all suits are short and tight in the skirt, all of them are long in the waistline, and for the most part they flare in boxlike effect, or have a tight band like a bandage around the hips. Many of them are bloused in the back, and, to be sure to get them that way, you must always lift up your arms after putting them on and before securing them with that tight belt. Topcoats promise to be quite straight and long. Some of them will have cape backs.

Skirts Widen for Afternoon

FOR "dress up" some suits will be in taffeta, tipped here and there in organdie. They will lead one over the boundaries of morning into the serenity of afternoon, when skirts unobtrusively lengthen and widen and the tight bandage loosens a little round the hips. Woolens give place to chiffons, crêpes and Georgettes that waft among smart tea tables. Sometimes the dresses are hung with heavy panels of lace. There is colored lace and silver lace and lace cirée. White mouflon garnishes some charming white dresses in woolen Jersey and others in silk by M. Molyneux.

A Georgette gown in russet-red is finely plaited into a lace yoke of coarse threads, and belted low, but very loosely, with notched ribbon tied in a bow. The same ribbon runs along the cuffs and ties in bows low on the hands. There is something charmingly simple about it, as if it might have come out of our Middle West, except that it has a sure technic which is Parisian. There is no trimming except the notched ribbons, and they are what we used to use so much in our small town. Still, the bronze slippers accompanying this costume are like a garnishment, so beautifully do they reinforce the lovely color of the dress and repeat the shading of the small hat, which is in no other material than leather, ornamented on the side with a russet, reddish-brown ostrich plume. Ribbon will probably be used a great deal in trimming this spring. Georgette is responsible for this hat and Doucet for the dress, which is accompanied by a short cape of heavy lace—more for ornament than use. I saw it earlier at Monte Carlo and yesterday at the Ritz at teatime.

Into those meadows of airily soft but straight-lined dresses comes dauntless Vionnet, sewing the seed of what may prove a "second crop" of fashions, in which circular and slanting lines shall prevail. Her favorite pastime is to wait until a style is set up and then see, as in a game of ninepins, how many of the features she can knock down. She has intruded on the trig spring silhouette of morning with a loose raglan topcoat that slopes off the shoulders and undulates round the ankles. Again, in the afternoons, she is still using the handkerchief, which is almost like a trade-mark with Vionnet. She is rounding one of its points into the seam at the collar, allowing the one opposite to fall in a point at the waistline, and the two opposite ones to spread across the shoulders in a cape that flares. By the sign of this spreading cape we may formulate the generalization that all lines of the season will not be straight. Still, many a dress bearing the name of Vionnet has never a ripple in it. After all, she launches that little flaring cape unobtrusively and features the Vionnet point.

In another dress Vionnet repeats the point in two long V-shaped designs set into the material itself, in a design similar to one

(Continued on Page 182)

The TWO-IN-ONE MIDDY BLOUSE

$2.00 upwards

"Just what I've been looking for"

Look for this label

"HOW easily it turns up and fastens! No fussing with pins. None of that careless, bunched appearance at the waist."

Remarks like these greet the Paul Jones Two-In-One everywhere. It is long and comfortable for gym or sports and still may be changed quickly into a dainty, dignified garment for ordinary wear.

Two hidden tabs are sewed inside the Two-In-One. Roll up the middy twice, button the tabs together in the back and instantly you have a smart, blousy, trim-fitting garment, suitable for any occasion.

The Two-In-One is original and exclusive with Paul Jones. It is made in a variety of styles and materials at $2.00 upwards. If your dealer cannot supply you, write for attractive style book and name of nearest dealer.

Paul Jones garments are guaranteed without reserve.

MORRIS & CO., Inc., Dept. A-1, Baltimore

PAUL JONES MIDDIES

Sidway

TRADE MARK

BABY VEHICLES

A GENUINE pleasure is the daily outing with baby in his elegant Sidway Pullman Sleeper. You know there is every comfort for baby in that deep, roomy carriage body, in those long resilient springs, in the pivoted front axle which keeps him from being tossed sideways. And you are conscious of the admiration which others have for the graceful, sweeping lines and distinctive design of this vehicle. You instinctively feel it "just a little better than the rest" as you point out to friends, the heavy, rich corduroy upholstery, the flawless weave of the red, the stylish finish and color, the well-tied, well-built wheels. And in bad weather you are thankful for the deep body, roomy enough for both baby and bundles, the deep sheltering hood, with sliding fixtures, and the emergency rear storm curtains.

This is only one of the endless variety of Sidway road, fiber and collapsible carriages, made by the world's largest manufacturers of baby vehicles. Look them up.

Write Dept. 23 for dealer's name and our helpful Baby Book.

Sidway Mercantile Co.
Elkhart, Ind.

Branch Factories:
Los Angeles
Toronto, Ontario

Sidway PULLMAN SLEEPER

One of the many beautiful designs made possible by hand weaving of genuine red.

BY INVITATION MEMBERS OF

A Sidway is Worthy of Your Baby

0112—Flesh color Dobby Cloth.
Two hose-supporters. $1.00

0123—Flesh color Francine Cloth.
Four hose-supporters. $2.00

0116—Flesh color brocade.
Four hose-supporters. $4.00

From Get-Up to Go-to-Bed

Model
corset-brassière

Confers the Soft, Supple,
Sinuous Silhouette

THE Fountains of Fashion, Paris and New York, decree the uncorseted appearance as indispensable to the modishly moulded figure of the day. You can gain the lithe, willowy, youthful uncorseted effect surely by wearing the MODEL Corset-Brassières.

Ask for MODEL Corset-Brassière—$1.00 to $6.50—at your favorite shop in your preferred material and in your accustomed fastening. MODEL Brassières in all types—50c to $8.50. If not obtainable, write direct to the manufacturers.

Model Brassière Co.

Dept. 8

London . 200 Fifth Avenue, New York . Paris

Illustrated Style Book sent upon request

Nice for Both Easter and School

THE busy mother of a family has time and energy to make only the simplest of clothes for her children, but this need not mean a monotonous lack of style. Nothing could be more easily made than the blue-serge dress at the left of the sketch above, yet its raglan sleeves, white linen collar and cuffs and patent-leather belt place it far above the average serge school dress. For summer wear it would be attractive and easy to launder in linen or a heavy cotton material. The pattern comes in sizes 6 to 14. In the foreground, plain linen or a heavy cotton fabric is combined with an old-fashioned calico print in a type of dress always becoming to the growing girl. Plain serge with a blouse of plaid wool would also be good-looking. The pattern is in sizes 6 to 14. Small brother wears a suit of navy Devonshire cloth, with tuck collar and cuffs of tan linen, for which there is a pattern (No. 3470) in sizes 2 to 6. A plaited skirt, topped by a blouse that buttons over the hips, is smart and decidedly becoming even before one reaches the flapper age. For the dress at the right above, gray may be combined with gray and red, or tan with brown and tan, in either serge and plaid wool or chambray with plaid gingham. Pattern is in sizes 6 to 14.

Patterns may be secured from any store selling Home Patterns; or by mail, postage prepaid, from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City. Dresses, 35 cents; Coats, 35 cents; Blouses or Skirts, 30 cents; Children's Patterns, 25 cents; Lingerie, 25 cents.

Mrs. Hall sells us only her spare time—yet by our plan she earns $100.00 extra in one month!

IT helps in a hundred ways just as 100 extra dollars would help you! Why not earn them, as she does—by acting as our representative? Scores of Curtis workers average up to $1.50 an hour profit. Thousands of Curtis subscriptions expire this spring! We will pay you liberally to collect the local renewal and new orders.

To obtain our cash offer, mail this coupon today.

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY,

467 Independence Square, Philadelphia, Penna.

Gentlemen: Please tell me, without obligation, how I can easily earn $100 by your plan.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____

Peggy Paige WEEK · March 18^{TO} 25

A Fashion Event at one Exclusive Shop in Each City

FOR one week, beginning March 18, an exclusive shop in your city will present a semi-annual fashion event—Peggy Paige Week—which will disclose the final trend of the new mode, as interpreted by the delightful dresses fashioned by Peggy Paige. This event is awaited with eagerness by smartly-dressed girls throughout the country. For in these dresses is embodied all that Paris decrees, all that the smart girl accepts, for this season.

Authentic Spring Colors and Fabrics

LIMOSA, cornflower blue, Chinese green and canna, the provocative colors of a riotous spring—you will find them all in dresses fashioned by Peggy Paige.

The new fabrics: softest cashmere which the French call kasha cloth; that charming crepe that is like a heavy marisette; laces, soft as a butterfly's wing

DRESSES
Fashioned by Peggy Paige
NEW YORK

The Peggy Paige label, sewn in every Peggy Paige dress, guarantees satisfaction, always Today send for the spring edition of "Peggy Paige in Fashion Land," a style book that will intimate just how charming the new Peggy Paige creations are. We will also give you the name of the Peggy Paige shop in your community. Address PEGGY PAIGE, 14 West 32nd Street, New York City.

or heavy as a net to catch minnows—all these and more beguile you in the season's creations of Peggy Paige.

Cape dresses with a decided military air, others braided in lovers' knots, still others quaint as the smocked frocks the English fashion for children. Hardly a whim, a fancy, has passed them by.

You Must Witness Peggy Paige Week

If you are young, if you would look young, you cannot afford to miss Peggy Paige Week. You will find not only the dress salon but the entire shop privileged to feature dresses fashioned by Peggy Paige, all decked out in the habiliments of the new season. The shop itself will announce its readiness for Peggy Paige Week in the local newspapers. Watch them carefully for the definite styles and further details.

Day in and day out Comfort

*This is one of the six reasons why
Warner's Rust-Proof is the most popular
Corset in America*

★Remember!

Warner's Rust-Proof is the guaranteed corset.

Two Warner's Rust-Proof Corsets, one for dress and one for ordinary wear, will last you through the entire year.

Also made in Canada by the Warner Brothers Co., Montreal.

Warner's Rust-Proof Corsets—

PERFECT corset comfort is a result of perfect flexibility and perfect fit. And if you wear a Warner's Rust-Proof you can have the utmost comfort without the slightest sacrifice of style.

In a Warner's Rust-Proof you can sit far back in the biggest chair, you can lounge in the most restful positions with perfect freedom, ease and naturalness.

There are two reasons for the perfect comfort of Warner's Rust-Proof. First, for every type of figure there is a Warner model particularly made to follow the lines of that figure—and this results in the perfect fit so necessary to comfort. Second, Warner designing and Warner boning result in extreme resilience and perfect flexibility.

Every Warner's Rust-Proof is guaranteed★ absolutely not to rust, break or tear. You can always keep it fresh and dainty by washing it as frequently as you wish. Warner's Rust-Proof stands today the most popular corset in America because it is outstanding in the six features of corset satisfaction—fit, style, durability, comfort, flexibility and economy.

Prices: $1.50, $2, $3 and up to $10.

Good Manners in the Home

By

NATHALIE SCHENCK LAIMBEER

COURTESY is still the nose-gay that can make the plainest woman attractive; it is still the touch that transforms the shabbiest home into a place of beauty. Moreover, it seems evident that in our complex life courtesy has an even more important place than it has ever had before; that in an age of commerce, of machines and engines and speed and efficiency, all the more have we need of the refreshing, restful influence of good breeding and cultivation.

Of course modern etiquette is perhaps set to a slightly quicker tempo than was that of our grandmothers, who had leisure for formal, elaborate social usages that we in our more practical life could no more manage than we could their hoop skirts and dust ruffles. But the spirit of true courtesy is still the same to-day as it has always been; it is still the spirit born of a kind heart, of generous impulses, of the desire to make those around us happy. This is the real thing, the courtesy that is as different from mere superficial correct conduct as pearls are from paste. And the people that have this spirit have a treasure that money cannot buy, though it is the possession that marks them off as the gentle people of the world.

But "company manners" won't do. We must be polite, even to the family. We have to wear our manners every day if we want to be classified as really well-bred people.

Are there not too many homes in the world in which the graceful little amenities of living are eliminated for the bare essentials of eating, sleeping, working, playing?

Of course there are, and the surprising thing is that these same people, whose manners are so unlovely, are often the most excellent people, morally, that we have. They are honest, solid, even progressive. And yet they are not the élite, somehow, because they have not been well bred.

Everybody Works Like Father

I SUPPOSE it is at table that family manners are most thoroughly tested, as it is there that the family is all gathered together for a common purpose. I want to tell you of one family that I know of, who have so little of worldly possessions as to be extremely shabby, but who have so much of the priceless wares of unselfishness, good cheer and exquisite courtesy as to make them one of the happiest and most charming families that I know.

They keep no servant and have no help except that of a laundress one day a week. The mother does most of the cooking; the daughters and sons, whose ages range from twelve to eighteen, all pitch in and save their mother most of the dishwashing, bed making, dusting, errands, and all of the waiting on table. They are busier than most young people want to be, but they have the satisfaction of saving their mother from overwork and fatigue, of keeping her in such good health and spirits that she is never too tired for a walk or a taffy pull or a barn dance or a turn at the piano.

The father of this family attends to his furnace and yard of course, but in addition has several other special jobs in the house. He makes the toast at the breakfast table. Every Sunday night he gets the supper and his fond pride in making cinnamon toast and heating up beans is innocent enough. He also has a weakness for wiping dishes—not that he likes to a bit, but that he wants to give the girls a rest from it. He's a dear father to do all this, for he is naturally not in the least handy or domestic; but he just happens to believe in waiting on women, and on that belief he acts.

Dinner at this home is the perfect family dinner. The two girls and the sixteen-year-old boy take turns in serving by the week; and no matter who is there or what the meal is, the mother of the family sits serene at her end of the table, while one of the children quickly and quietly removes plates between courses, brings in fresh supplies of bread, water, and so on, and keeps a close watch to see that everybody is well provided for. The father serves the meat and vegetables at his end of the table in the usual servantless-family style; the mother pours the coffee and serves the dessert. Soup and salad are brought in from the kitchen in their individual plates. A pitcher of water is kept on a small side table. It is, you see, a perfectly simple service, and yet it makes the meal easy, quiet and orderly, instead of the confused, disorganized, unlovely affair that family meals sometimes are in a home where there are children and no servants. If the mother is having more than one or two guests, by the way, the "maid" or the "serving man" does not sit down at the table, for in the case of a large table full of people they found that constant bobbing up and down with a bite between bobs was unsatisfactory.

Make Table Talk Interesting

IN THIS home everybody is on time for meals, except in the case of very special emergencies. Even at breakfast they go into the dining room together. The father seats his wife at table; the brothers help their sisters. There are no heavy silences at this breakfast table; there is no hasty gobbling, no reaching or grabbing or dashing from the table to run for a street car with scarcely a good-by. Breakfast is set for a comparatively early hour—early enough, that is, for everybody to have time to enjoy it in leisure, and the waitress of the week is there just the same to expedite the details of service. Father is presumably allowed to read his paper, but he doesn't get away with it really, for there is so much talk going on, he can't bear to miss it, so that the headlines are about all he has time for until he's on the way to the office. He pretends to grumble about it, but everybody knows it's only a bluff, for he's a father who enjoys his children, and the children know it.

The mother of this family is a good cook, but the family somehow has the habit of not talking much about food, especially at meals. To talk at all about it might lead to adverse comment, and nobody ever criticizes anything, of course. If she should put ipecac into the soup I'm sure they would all bravely try to keep down the grimaces and would simply desist from taking the soup without a word! The youngest boy of this family has been especially hard to train in this regard. He was so apt to say "Mmm" when he discovered the delectability of pumpkin pie or ice cream; but at last his mother won the battle, and now there is only a bright glitter in his eye when he comes upon his favorite dishes, a heroism of repression that his family duly appreciate. Incidentally, all the members of this family eat practically everything that there is to eat. One or two of them are a bit finicky and have their favorite prejudices, but there is never any discussion of the matter. He simply says "I don't care for any, thank you," whatever it may be, and the matter ends there.

That is the family into whose home one loves to go, the family which has the most nearly perfect conception of what home life should be. It is a family where good breeding is so instinctive with the parents as to be unavoidable; where it is so natural with the children as to be sheer habit.

But there are numerous details other than those of table conduct that make the home either a confused center of several individual lives or a harmonious whole composed of mutually considerate, helpful members—all of which details are born of the general attitude existing in the home. Assuming, however, that we all want to be courteous in our homes, what are some of the "little things" to remember?

Of course we keep our word implicitly in the family. A promise is a promise, an engagement is a strict obligation, even if it's only an engagement to set the table for the cook. We are cheerful if we are really polite, for no polite person scowls or sulks or mopes, except behind his own door. We are punctilious about money matters.

Let the Family In

WE WAIT on each other and on our guests. A man rises when a caller comes into the room, asks her permission to smoke, stands aside while wife and grown daughters pass through a door. A woman never forgets to express her thanks for little services rendered, is quickly appreciative of thoughtfulness and sacrifice on the part of her husband and children. We are careful about the niceties of polite speech, omitting to say "Huh?" and "What?" and remembering to say "Yes, Henry," or "No, mother," instead of "yeah" and "nope."

These are fundamentals; but there are many other items, bigger than details, that are important. One of the first of these is to express an interest in family affairs. Of course all the members are interested in each other's doings, but so many neglect to inquire into them, except, alas, when curious! But what a warm feeling it gives one to have a member of the family say "Tell me about the meeting last night," in the attitude of one who is really ready to listen—that entirely different affair from the perfunctory inquiry which warns you, at your peril, to launch forth on a recital. If a boy is baseball crazy, what fun it is for him to have his father and mother and sisters ready to talk baseball at home. If father wants to talk business, why on earth shouldn't he? I never understood why it has been said that business should be dropped by a man when he enters the house; rather should he let the family in on it, share the experience that is the source of their daily bread. Father would talk it, too, if he had sympathetic ears in which to tell the stories of the day's work, sketch the personalities of his associates, confess his hopes and name

(Continued on Page 182)

Built with Ideal Brick Walls—cost less than frame

Your Own Home

The Ideal Wall Makes Your Dream Come True

THE Ideal Wall enables you to build a beautiful brick home at the cost of frame. This wonderful new idea cuts the cost of wall construction one-third, producing a dry, permanent, fire-safe dwelling. Suits any locality; uses any standard brick. Laid in any bond; any pattern.

Ideal Wall Saves Brick, Mortar, Labor, Time, Furring and Lath

It is the strongest and driest air-spaced wall ever conceived. Any brick wall saves painting, insurance and upkeep—the Ideal Wall also saves materials and labor.

If you want to know how to build a brick house at cost of frame, send for free circular.

The Common Brick Industry of America
1328 Schofield Bldg. Cleveland, Ohio

A Delightful Birthday Gift

Distinctive—Unique—Pleasing

AN IDEAL PRESENT FOR SCHOOL CHILDREN

THREE PENCILS—60 cents in beautiful embossed genuine leather case with your name engraved in 18 karat Gold on pencils and case. Stamps accepted.

THE IMPRINT PENCIL COMPANY
530 Broadway, New York, N. Y.

$3 BRINGS THIS COLLAPSIBLE DRESS FORM INTO YOUR HOME

MAKES DRESSMAKING EASY
Perfect fitting dresses easily and quickly reproduced. Makes dressmaking a pleasure and satisfaction. An necessary for fitting to the sewing machine for sewing.

DUPLICATES YOUR EXACT FIGURE
By setting "each section of form" it quickly and independently adjusts Neck, Shoulders, Bust, Waist, Hips and Skirt to exactly reproduce any woman's style, size or figure.

EASY PAYMENT TERMS
Remit $3 and we will send you our guaranteed $15 Acme Collapsible Adjustable Form. Pay the balance of $12 at the rate of $3 a month. Ten Days' Trial. If unsatisfactory, return form and we will gladly refund your $3.

Order an "Acme" Form today or write for Free Illustrated Catalogue with detailed information.
ACME SALES COMPANY, Dept. 3-F
1400 Third Avenue Brooklyn, N. Y.

Write for Illustrated Catalogue and Easy Payment Terms

Look Closely
Imagine This Wonderful Cord Slide

Wilson Garter
on your child. The comfort, freedom that builds straight up boys and girls, worth worlds to every mother. The Cord Slide is the greatest improvement ever made in hose supporters, and price is so little. For your child's good health, comfort, act now.

Shoulder style for boys and girls, 1 to 16 years, white or black web, 50c. Give age. Women's sizes, same style, for home, athletics or maternity wear, 85c. Bust sizes.

At Dealer's, or we send post-paid. Money back if not the best ever.

A. M. Wilson Co.
101 Main St., Cherokee, Iowa

Infants' Wear

STYLE BOOK FREE. Pictures everything to outfit babies and children (up to 6 years). Also nursery furniture. Prices very low. Money back if not satisfied. Style Book sent FREE. Write TODAY.

Lane Bryant Address Dept. 53
387 St. at 5th Ave. New York

We Want More Workers Like Miss Gubler

WE want, as subscription representatives of our three publications, more men and women of wholesome ambition, sound business sense, exceptional industry and pleasing personality. To such workers we will pay commissions and bonus that offer opportunity for profit without limit. Miss Gubler of Utah is exactly the sort of representative we want—as R. M. Hofer of E.

Hofer and Sons, Salem, Oregon, to whom she sold subscriptions, says of her, "This young lady sells your magazines by sheer ability to show the prospective subscriber that he really needs the publication she handles." For the service of such men and women we are ready to make liberal payment, and to offer the opportunity of working into full-time salaried employment.

We Paid Her Over $400.00 in a Single Month

In a single month we have paid her more than $400.00 and month after month her profits have amounted to $400.00, $350.00, $300.00—seldom less than $250.00. Is it surprising that she likes the work?

But the money is not its only attraction. In introducing our publications, she feels that she is benefiting the communities that she visits. That the service is appreciated by those among whom she works is evidenced by the way they receive her in their homes. "I love my work," she writes, "I feel that my subscribers are my friends. My trip is just one continuous renewal of friendships."

Would YOU like such an attractive, well-paying position? Let us describe our offer. Use the coupon below to request full details.

The Curtis Publishing Company,
455 Independence Square, Philadelphia, Pa.

Gentlemen: I should like to learn more about your offer to subscription representatives of The Ladies' Home Journal, The Saturday Evening Post and The Country Gentleman, without assuming any obligation. What commissions do you pay?

Tell me about your bonus. I should like to know what other workers have been able to do—in spare time and in full time.

Name _____

Street or R. F. D. _____

Town _____ State _____

Good Manners in the Home

(Continued from Page 181)

his fears. All this is deeper stuff than mere manners; and yet it is the stuff of which courtesy is made and on which family life thrives.

But interest in each other must not become curiosity, and intimacy must not degenerate into the familiarity that breeds contempt.

There must still be inviolate privacy, for there are times in everybody's life when even two is a crowd, when just to be alone is all we ask of the world—and those times should be respected by our families. Consequently, if we are well-bred people we not only knock at another's door to obtain admission and refrain from opening another's mail, but we also stay severely away from mother when she has gone to her room to write letters, and though we may be dying to know what is in that letter from Cousin Nellie, we do not sit in significant silence, waiting to be told.

Of course, too, it is not necessary to stress the presumptuous habit some people have of allowing their family even to have no personal property, considering it their liberty at any time to go to a sister's or a mother's closet and borrow without permission.

Begin With the Child

MORE than this, everybody is entitled not only to privacy and property, but to his own personality in his own home. A family is a group made up of people of different ages, sexes and pursuits, and each member of it ought to be considered from his own standpoint. For example, the girls and boys of the family ought to be allowed to go to their parties and dances without undue emphasis put upon it by the smirking and teasing of the rest of the family. Such conduct is not only ill-bred and vulgar, but it is harmful to the young people themselves; for boy-and-girl companionship is one of the most natural things in the world and to make it the butt of jokes and gibes is to rob it of its sweetness and naïveté and to make it artificial and silly.

Practical jokes, likewise, with their inevitable result of humiliation and deep hurt, are in bad taste, even in the free atmosphere of the home.

Invalids or elderly persons or those not so sturdy must be considered from their own special standpoint, for they may be made wretched or happy according to the conduct of the people around them. A truly chivalrous family protects the weaker members in it, thinks of their comfort first but says nothing about it, lest the invalid feel herself a burden, and sees to it that these weaker ones have a part, however small, in all family affairs.

Well-bred people regard their servants not as social inferiors or as intimates, but as workers whose labor commands dignity and respect, and they treat them accordingly.

Be Excellent Examples

A WORD here about the manners of the child; for even if courtesy in the home did not pay of itself, it is utterly necessary if we expect to have our children become well-bred men and women. The same general truth about the source of real courtesy applies to children as it does to grown-ups. If we teach the child to think of others, to enjoy serving his elders, or indeed his little guests, because it makes them happy and comfortable, we shall probably find the child is polite and charming. If we treat children as equals they will be saved from self-consciousness and awkwardness to a large extent.

If we give them a real part in the family life they will acquire dignity and self-possession.

But let us not treat them like amusing puppies, show them off to guests, tell stories about them in their presence and draw attention to their faults or virtues.

Let us introduce them to guests when they come into the room in a natural and dignified manner and teach them to curtsy and shake hands without shyness or embarrassment.

Let us admit them into table conversation, but never allow them to monopolize it. Let us be more than strict about their table manners, about their "thank you's" and "please's."

And let us be as excellent examples ourselves as we know how, so that they may imitate us, unconscious little apes that they are, and become, as we want them to become, gentle mannered and gracious.

EDITOR'S NOTE—Mrs. Laimbeer's next article, Good Manners in Public Places, will appear in an early issue.

Paris Suits Have Narrow Skirts

(Continued from Page 177)

Madeleine and Madeleine have played with. This version by Vionnet is in crepe of two shades, brown being the color of the costume, and beige the delicate tint for the insets.

Stating the corollary to all of the foregoing fashion points, we may deduce that for dresses and for coats alike, from morn to dewy eve, we may accept the bolster-slip silhouette with safety both in dresses and coats. In the latter, however, ignore the movement for bright colors, except in sports things. Parisians are getting their contrasts with gay dresses and coats that are either dark or in neutral tints, such as gray and beige. Even Vionnet has not gone so far as to set aside the low belt, and nearly all of her costumes have it.

Only in the evenings do we ignore all restrictions at the waistline and go in for long sweeps of material that wind round and round and round, almost forever, ending at last in one daring, stabbing fastening on the right side near the waistline, crushed against you with a cluster of precious stones—or, if you go in for the simple, by a single flower. The same materials and very much the same outlines continue, with trains shooting out from unexpected places—although, if I were getting a new dress now, I should not have it too irregular round the hem. Even if uneven boundaries continue, they are getting so common that it is more distinguished, I think, to have easily flowing lines. Let the shoulders do all the work of holding it, and have the gown straight. I bought a dress at Callot's, not so long since, with very large sleeves, and they told me to bring it back in the spring for them to make the sleeves smaller, which means that we shall wear sleeves of comfortable, but not exaggerated, size. An evening coat of Poirer's, made in striped plush with a silver lace gilet, has a wide armhole, edged by a cuff without any sleeve at all.

The novelty for evening costumes I think lies in the bandeaux and headdresses. It is very smart to have numbers of these set in stones that are avowedly not precious, but glitteringly lovely and carefully chosen to aid by contrast or perfect matching the shadings of one's costume. The Queen of Spain ordered thirty-five of these the other day. That is exactly the number of crowns and coronets and other headdresses that she has in her castle in Spain, all of which of course are made of priceless pearls, diamonds and emeralds. But they did not "go with" her gowns, and she was very frank about protesting she would rather be in the mode to being merely royal, and she bought an audacious band of sapphires that even a queen's dress allowance would stagger under if it were real.

I think, next to the American girl, the smartest person I have seen this early spring was her mother. It was at a dinner dance, where she had on a dress encrusted with sequins in bright blue.

Corns?

—just say
Blue-jay to your druggist
Stops Pain Instantly

The simplest way to end a corn is Blue-jay. A touch stops the pain instantly. Then the corn loosens and comes out. Made in two forms—a colorless, clear liquid (one drop does it!) and in extra thin plasters. Use whichever form you prefer, plasters or the liquid—the action is the same. Safe, gentle. Made in a world-famed laboratory. Sold by all druggists.

Free: Write Bauer & Black, Chicago, Dept. 16, for valuable book, "Correct Care of the Feet."

THE CHORE BOY IO
I take drudgery out of housework. I clean dishes, pots and pans in a jiffy! I have 243 different uses. I save soap and cleansers. I save time. My scour-tempered copper fingers loosen the grime, and my suction three grab the grit. I work as long as I have a thread to my back. Satisfaction or money back. Get me where you buy soap, cleansers or stencils. Or send 10c with your dealer's name and I'll come by mail postpaid.
Chore Utensils Corp. of Amer., Orange, N. J.

AGENTS! A SALE IN EVERY HOME

Take orders for our beautiful Dress Goods, Silks, Wash Fabrics and General Yard Goods. Our agents get big business. Large book of over 1000 handsome fabric samples. Write today!
National Importing & Mfg. Co., Dept. 29X,
578 Broadway, N. Y.

Feet Worth $50,000!
So say insurance companies. If foot fashion plus foot health —is worth anything to you,
See page 60

Colson Wheel Chairs and Cripples' Tricycles
Models for All Needs
The COLSON Co.
1105 Cedar St., Elyria, O. Catalog Free

Money in Poultry and Squabs Start small, grow big, get winter eggs, keep healthy fowls, raise prize winners. Our stock pays best, low prices on leading varieties. Big Free Book tells how.
Crescent Poultry Co., Box 1, Des Moines, Iowa

The TAILORED WOMAN MAGAZINE Spring and Summer

Your Spring Suit and Coat and Frock are shown in the Spring issue of "The Tailored Woman" fashion magazine.

There are styles for every one from daughter in school to grandmama, for each type from the tall and willowy to the tiny and plump. And, as for occasions, there are models for town, for country, sports and dressy wear.

And the nice part of it is, you may study and plan your Spring attire right at home. Instead of faring forth a bit confused as to the newer modes and how they will become you, you may learn from an authoritative source what the new, the correct and the lasting in tailored apparel will be before you start.

"The Tailored Woman" is more than a magazine of abstract style information. Thirty-seven actual suits and coats and frocks are illustrated and described in detail—and you are directed to a shop in your vicinity where you may see, try on and purchase them if you choose. You will be delighted with the variety of fabrics ranging from sturdy tweeds and homespuns to softest marvella; alluring shades; interesting checks, diagonals and stripes.

Each model carries the signature of the Wooltex Tailors inside the collar and this is your assurance that style, fabric and workmanship are the kind to give you "That Well-Dressed Look."

"That Well Dressed Look"

Wooltex

Tailor-mades and Knockabouts

Wooltex Tailor-mades, $38, $48, $58
Wooltex Knockabouts, $25, $38, $45

The Spring issue of "The Tailored Woman" magazine is now out and you are entitled to a copy from the Wooltex merchant in your community. If you do not know who that is, write us and we will advise you and see that you receive a copy of the magazine at once. There is no charge.

"LAWRENCE KNIT—TAILORED TO FIT"

If Women talked about their Underwear—

The celebrated
Lawrence Union
Suits, Shirts and Drawers for men are the ideal all-season underwear.

If women talked about their underwear as frankly as other topics, the discussion would reveal—that some of them are dissatisfied with the lack of comfort of their underclothing, and that others have found perfect fit and perfect comfort in Lawrence Tailored Knit Underwear.

Most women will agree that because of its elasticity and absorbent qualities, fine knitted cotton is the ideal fabric for underclothing—cool in summer, warm in winter. Yet many complain they cannot find knit underwear with the style they desire.

In fabric, in style, in tailoring, Lawrence is different. Made of combed cotton, fine and soft and silk-like—yet firmly woven to avoid bunching and bagging. Each garment, cut separately by hand, is exactly true to size, which means perfect fit—roominess where room is required, snugness where snugness should be.

Ask any good store to show you Lawrence Underwear. You will marvel at its quality and moderate price.

Union suits with round or bodice top—loose or ribbed-cuff knee—closing flap made wide.

Under-vests with round or bodice top. Bloomers roomy and comfortable. Always look for the Lawrence label.

If your dealer hasn't the styles you want, write to us.

LAWRENCE MANUFACTURING CO., Lowell, Mass.

Established 1831

America's Largest Manufacturers of Men's and Women's Light and Medium Weight Knit Underwear, from the raw cotton to the finished garment.
E. M. TOWNSEND & CO., Selling Agents, New York City.

LAWRENCE

Tailored Knit

UNDERWEAR

The Truth About the Pied Piper

(Continued from Page 19)

wondering to herself if she was a foolish old lady to allow such a caper as this. As for the gander, he had quite recovered his former sober air. The scolding Mother Goose had given him would last the silly bird quite a while.

It was really very humiliating for a fowl of his standing to be rebuked in public as he had been.

"It's right and natural to live in a cave," the Pied Piper was saying. "Who wants to live in a house, anyway?"

"It's very nice to live in a shoe," piped up Judy.

But they were now at Honeysuckle Hill. At the foot of the hill Mother Goose and the gander took up their stand.

"Have them back soon," admonished Mother Goose.

"In an hour from now," promised the Pied Piper.

He lifted a spray of honeysuckle from the side of the hill, and a small opening appeared. He pushed Judy and Santa in and followed them rapidly.

They took a quick breath. They were in the Pied Piper's cave!

V—The Pied Piper's Cave

BUT the cave was not a big, black pit such as they had heard about at all! As they looked around in their first hasty glance, Santa and Judy thought they must be in heaven or London or some other wonderful place. It was so shiny!

They had never seen such light before. It seemed as if all the candles in the world must be alight, and Santa and Judy, who were used to going to bed with one, blinked at the blaze.

The Pied Piper, noticing their dazzled eyes, pointed to the waxen candles set in the silver walls of his cave. "We burn them at both ends here," he explained. "Pudding Lane doesn't believe in that, but I find it gives a great deal more light."

"It's very beautiful," said Judy. She wished her mother would burn candles that way. It got very dark down in the toe of the shoe at night, and Judy, though she knew it was foolish, got almost afraid to go there at times.

"It's light here all the time," said the Pied Piper. He showed them a brilliant sun above.

"Light all the time? Does the sun never set?" asked Santa.

"Oh, we have two," replied the Pied Piper airily. "And I'm thinking of putting in another. Twelve hours is pretty long for anybody's sun to be on duty."

Two suns, and a third to come! Who had ever heard of such a thing?

"But it does rain here," continued the Pied Piper. "I'll have a little shower for you, if you like."

"Oh, no," answered Santa politely. "I don't especially care for rain."

BUT before they could take another breath, Santa and Judy were amazed to see a shower of kittens and puppies come tumbling to the ground.

Such cunning little animals as they were! There were fat white puppies with stubby tails; wabbling brown puppies with tip-tilted ears; gray, fuzzy kittens, yellow kittens, tiny, shiny black ones; and all of them squealing and mewling and squirming and tumbling in the most astonishing hodgepodge you can imagine.

"You see, it rains cats and dogs here," said the Pied Piper calmly.

Just then the tiniest kitten of all tumbled right into Judy's apron, and at the same time a jolly little puppy sprawled plump down into Santa's fat arms.

The Pied Piper smiled at them. "Keep them if you like," he said. "We've had a good deal of rain here lately, so we've quite enough to go around. But now," he continued, "we must go on. There are lots of things to show you. Would you like to see the castles in the air that the orphans and beggars have built? They are really quite lovely."

VI—The Wonderful Castles

"OH, YES," replied the children. "We have never seen any castle except old King Cole's, and his isn't in the air."

"But he doubtless has one there," the Pied Piper answered. "Most people do. You'll have them yourselves when you grow older. Come, we have only to cross the bridge, and we'll be there."

But Judy had stopped to spell out a sign that hung on the bridge. Now Judy was a jolly little girl all right, but she did have trouble with her lessons, and spelling puzzled her most of all. After much hard work, however, she made it out. It said: "You must not cross this bridge before you get to it."

She said it over twice and then spoke out. "But how could you cross it before you get to it? It sounds a little silly to me."

"Well, people do it just the same," the Pied Piper told her. "It is silly for them to, but they do."

Judy thought this was very amusing and she laughed at the thought of people doing such a foolish thing. But she never really understood that sign until she grew up.

Santa asked where the children of Hamelin were, and the orphans and beggars and other lonely people.

"Oh," said the Pied Piper, "I have to have a little privacy. So they stay up there in their castles in the air most of the time. We'll see them now. First we'll go to the beggars' castle; shall we?"

With that the Pied Piper squatted on the ground and then took a big leap, and the children were astonished to see his figure flying high into the air.

"Do the same," he called down to them.

They did, and felt themselves flying too. Such fun as it was! But it was over in a flash, and they were high in the air in front of some winding marble steps leading up to the beggars' castle, which gleamed in the sun, a shining heap of pure gold.

"It's a bit gaudy," apologized the Pied Piper, "but it's their idea of happiness, and I humor them in it. There's nothing really to see except gold furniture and servants, but we'll have a peep, anyway."

HE TOOK the children into the castle, the richest-looking place they had ever seen, where a manservant in red velvet bowed low to them and showed them into the parlor. There, lolling in luxurious ease over the gold furniture, drinking tea out of gold goblets, eating beefsteak from gold plates, were the dirty, tattered beggars whose castle this was. And not the least of these were Rags and Tags and Velvet Gown, who were so completely occupied with being luxurious that they didn't see Santa at all.

It was almost funny to see beggars in their rags acting like princes, Santa thought, and it was almost sad too. Yet they did look happy, so it must be all right, he decided.

"They won't shave or dress up, of course," said the Pied Piper. "A beggar doesn't seem to be happy if he is clean. And they will eat such rich food and lie around so much, I must admit that they are not as healthy as they might be. Still, it's their castle and they can do as they like in it."

Next, said the Pied Piper, they would go see the orphans' castle in the air. In another minute they were in front of a big white house, with flower gardens on all sides, and Santa and Judy saw more children than they had ever seen in their lives, playing on the grass, looking out of the windows, running in and out of the doors. And always beside them were plump, pink-cheeked women in blue aprons.

"This castle is full of mothers," said the Pied Piper. "The orphans all want mothers; most of them have two or three! It

(Continued on Page 186)

Burpee's Sweet Peas

The first waved Sweet Pea in existence was introduced to America by Burpee. Burpee's Sweet Peas are a revelation of daintiness and beauty. They are recognized the world over as the standard of excellence.

Burpee's Dollar Box

of Sweet Peas contains sixteen regular large size packets of all the most popular varieties in separate colors. Burpee's Dollar Box is the greatest value it is possible to obtain in Sweet Peas. It contains a large packet each of the following:

King White	Glistening pure white	Margaret Atlee	Rich cream pink
Floradale Fairy	Duplex deep cream	Mrs. Townsend	White and blue picotee
Hercules	The finest deep pink	King Edward	A giant crimson
George Herbert	Magnificent rich rose	Margaret Madison	Large azure blue
Helen Lewis	Intense crimson orange	The President	Dazzling orange scarlet
Royal Purple	Truly a royal purple	Mrs. G. W. Bishop	Beautiful salmon cerise
Jack Cornwell, V. C.	Rich velvety blue	Orchid	The finest lavender
Mrs. A. G. Gentle	White edged scarlet pink	Rosina	Pastel rose

Burpee's Dollar Box

of Sweet Peas will be mailed postpaid for $1.00. If purchased separately these Sweet Pea seeds would cost $1.75. Send a dollar today and Burpee's Dollar Box of Sweet Peas will come to your door by return mail.

Burpee's Annual is the Leading American Seed Catalog. It will be mailed to you free upon request.

W. Atlee Burpee Co.
Seed Growers Philadelphia.

Kunderd's Marvelous Ruffled Gladioli offer something entirely new and original for your garden. Far removed from the common sorts in size and coloring, their ruffled beauty will make your garden distinctive.

Our 1922 Catalog

describes many new sorts introduced for the first time, and illustrates many of them (19 in colors). 52 pages of Gladioli descriptions and most complete cultural directions, including special instructions on how to grow show flowers. Send for a free copy of this most beautiful and instructive Gladiolus catalog ever issued.

A. E. KUNDERD
The Originator of the "Ruffled Gladiolus"

Box 8

Goshen, Indiana

U. S. A.

ALYSSUM ASTER ANDYTHIA DIANTHUS
CALIFORNIA POPPY
LARK SPUR AGERATUM
SWEET PEA MARIGOLD
ANTIRRHINUS (Snap Dragon)

This collection of 19 packages of our choicest flower seeds sent you for 25¢

As an introductory offer, to let you get acquainted with the superior quality of Salzer's Seeds, we will send you this splendid collection of our very finest flower seeds for 25¢, coin or stamps.

Here is a collection to make your garden bloom with loveliness all Summer long and keep you in flowers for the house until the snow flies. All the beloved varieties. Salzer's Seeds are sold under a positive money-back GUARANTEE.

All our seeds are tested at our great Clifford Farms where a corps of many experts, under the direction of a famous European garden specialist, constantly test, prove and improve the quality of our seeds.

Catalog FREE
Our big, beautiful 134-page catalog, illustrated in full colors, free if you write for it.

John A. Salzer Seed Co.
Established 1858
Dept. 10, La Crosse, Wis.

SOW SALZER'S SEEDS

CONARD ROSES BLOOM
or your money back

IT'S not the guarantee that makes our roses bloom, but the quality of the plants which enables us to make the guarantee. Hardy, field-grown roses backed by over 50 years' experience. Our illustrated catalog of nearly 200 kinds is free. Write for it today.

CONARD ROSES
A. J. Jones Co., Box 20
West Grove, Pa. Robt. Pyle, Pres.
A. Winter, V.-Pres. Backed by over 50 years' experience.

This celluloid star tag labels your growing rose and is the sign of our guarantee.

SLATE'S SEEDS

Each grown where it attains perfection

For everything that grows there is some spot where it attains greater perfection than anywhere else. Seeds grown in those places will produce much finer vegetables and flowers, than those grown under less favorable conditions. Fifty-five years of experience have taught us which sections are ideal for the production of each kind of seed and what growers are most careful in keeping varieties pure.

Write for Slate's Guide to Gardening—a helpful Seed Catalog. If you enclose ten cents in stamps, we will send you one packet each of Slate's Matchless Tomato, Scarlet Turnip Radish, Big Boston Lettuce, Dwarf Mixed Nasturtiums, Spencer Mixed Sweet Peas, and Shirley Poppy.

SLATE SEED COMPANY
Box 428, South Boston, Virginia

Carter-Thorburn Introductions

NEW HYBRID ESCHSCHOLTZIA—Contains many new shades of color not previously seen in Poppies; flesh-colored, pale rose, brilliant scarlet, slate and smoke colors.

EVERBLOOMING HOLLYHOCK—Blossoms from seed first year. July till late autumn. Profusely branching, filled with large double flowers; great variety of colors.

DOUBLE GODETIA, DOUBLE PINK—Very handsome. Send 10c and ask for Novelty Collection No. 302 and illustrated catalog of flowers and vegetable seeds, or send for the catalog alone. Mailed free.

CARTER'S TESTED SEEDS, Inc. 53 Barclay St., N. Y. City
(Consolidated with J. M. Thorburn & Co.)
Canadian Branch, 133 King St. E., Toronto, Ont.

Good Things for Your Flower Garden
Quality Annual Seeds. Finest Field Grown Perennial Plants, Gladioli, Over Three Hundred Varieties, 35 Acres. Perennial Seeds, Fresh and True, Over 200 Varieties. We are among the largest planters of our specialties.

RALPH E. HUNTINGTON, Painesville, Ohio

The Truth About the Pied Piper

(Continued from Page 185)

crowds things pretty badly, but I don't mind."

Santa and Judy went up on the porch and all the orphans came crowding around them and begged them to stay and play games. Santa looked at the Pied Piper, and he nodded his head.

With a whoop the orphans swarmed out on the green lawn and in a second they had Santa and Judy in their midst, playing the most riotous games you could think of. What fun it was! And how they laughed! Santa and Judy could now see why the children of Hamelin were not anxious to leave.

"Why not just stay forever?" suggested one orphan.

"Oh," said Santa, a bit scared at the thought; "we'd like to, but we're going back to Mother Goose and Pudding Lane. We really must."

"BUT the children of Hamelin are never going back," persisted the orphans.

"No," said the children of Hamelin, suddenly appearing at the doorway of the castle; "we're never going back. It's so much fun here, Santa Claus. Much more fun than Hamelin was. We never have to wash our ears here, and we can eat all the candy we like, and we don't even have to go to bed if we don't want to. Please, please stay."

"Come," whispered the Pied Piper. "Don't argue with them. They always talk like that. And, anyway, it's time to eat."

In another moment they had reached the Pied Piper's farmhouse. It was a tiny little place, vine-covered, and its mistress was a chubby dairymaid with red cheeks and white arms.

"Bring us some milk, Daisy," the Piper said to the dairymaid.

But the dairymaid, instead of going off for the milk, curtsied to the Piper and then went close to him and whispered something in his ear, at which he frowned anxiously.

"Again?" he asked her.

She nodded, a tiny worried frown in her white forehead too.

"Was there not enough to send to the orphans' castle to-day?" he inquired.

She shook her head.

"Dear, dear," said the Pied Piper, "this is distressing." He looked at the children. "It's the milk," he said. "It's running very low now. The supply has been poor for quite a while. I declare I don't know what to do."

"Can't you get a new cow?" asked the practical Santa. The Clauses once had trouble with their cow and Father Claus had simply bought a new one.

"Oh, we don't have cows, you know," came the astonishing reply. "Why, bless me, I haven't shown you the fountain, have I?"

VII—The Fountain

WITH that he hustled the children right out of the little vine-covered farmhouse, down the path and into a near-by grove of green young lime trees, where in a tiny open place they saw a thin little trickle of—well, of what, they didn't know. It looked like milk, but it acted like water, and nobody had ever heard of anything like that, of course.

The Pied Piper went up to it sadly. "Just a thin little trickle," he said. "It's the milk of human kindness," he explained, turning back to the children.

"The milk of human kindness?" they repeated. They didn't know in the least what he meant.

"Yes," he told them. "When the people in Pudding Lane and Hamelin and Banbury Cross are generous and kind and noble, this fountain gushes out in a torrent. It's a most beautiful sight, rushing, gushing milk, rising in jets and falling again, giving plenty for everybody. But lately it has flowed so feebly. My orphans will starve if the fountain doesn't begin to flow fast again. People aren't very good any more, I guess."

Just then the kitten that was asleep in Judy's arms woke up and gave a small squeak. At the same instant the puppy that Santa was carrying opened his eyes and let out a gruff, feeble little bark.

"They're hungry," said the Pied Piper. He looked at the fountain. "Isn't that too bad? There's only enough milk there for you children. The kitten and the puppy will have to wait until somebody does something kind somewhere, and the fountain flows again."

Santa looked at Judy and Judy looked at Santa. They both looked at the fountain and they looked at the kitten and the puppy. The milk looked mighty good and they were extremely hungry. But the poor little kitten and puppy were hungry too.

SANTA spoke.

"Let's do," agreed Judy before he got any further.

"We're going to give them the milk," cried Santa to the Pied Piper, and he ran to the fountain to get the milk.

But just as he had drained off the last drop for the hungry little animals, the fountain suddenly began to flow again, very fast, the milk rushing out in great streams.

"Why!" exclaimed Santa, greatly surprised.

"Goodness!" breathed Judy.

The Pied Piper laughed at their wonder. "You did a kind act, you see. Now drink to your hearts' content." When they had finished he peered through the lime trees at the sun. "Come," he commanded them. "Hurry! Your hour is up. We must run back as quickly as we can."

And sure enough, already Santa felt a tug at the string on his finger. Mother Goose was getting impatient and had pulled the string on the gander's leg. So they ran as quickly as they could and were soon at the door behind the spray of honeysuckle.

"Good-by," said the Pied Piper, smiling in his pleasant way at them.

"Good-by," said the children.

Judy put up her lips to be kissed, and Santa hugged the Pied Piper.

"Speak a good word for me to Mother Goose and King Cole," he asked them.

"Oh, we will, we will," promised Santa and Judy.

VIII—Santa Visits Old King Cole

YOU should have seen Mrs. Claus when Mother Goose and Santa reached home once more and told her where Santa had been. It was decided then and there that Santa should go see the king the next morning, to tell him the truth about the Pied Piper.

"For, of course," said Mother Goose, "when King Cole hears what a good-hearted man the Pied Piper is, he'll change his mind about hanging him."

What an exciting life Santa was having! First he had visited the Pied Piper, whom nobody else on Pudding Lane had ever visited before; and now he was going to see old King Cole all by himself!

Mrs. Claus sat up half the night to sew new white cotton trimming on his old red suit. She did wish Santa had a new suit in which to call on the king, but the Clauses couldn't buy new suits every whipstitch, as she put it.

Santa looked very well, however, when he was ready to start bright and early the next morning. But he was a trifle pale, for the truth of it was that the little boy was frightened half to death over the whole affair. Old King Cole was known to be in a dreadful mood just now. He might scold, Santa thought.

(Continued on Page 187)

Blue Lace Flower

Clusters of delicate light blue blossoms, in size and color like the Forget-me-not, borne on long slender stems. Texture resembles Queen Anne Lace. Exquisite with cut flowers.

Chinese Wool Flower, flower clusters, massive feathery balls of brilliant crimson, blooming till frost.

Aster Novelty Hybrids, will produce many new types and colors never offered.

ALSO 2 FAMOUS VEGETABLES

Matchless Lettuce, remarkable for crispness and juicy texture. Grows somewhat like Romaine.

Sweet Corn, 60-day Makegood. Earliest of all, large, sweet and tender.

All Five Packets for 25c

All tested novelties and easy to grow. Send for big colorplate catalog free. Complete stocks of seeds, bulbs, window plants, perennials, fruit, berries and special novelties. Values exceptional.

John Lewis Childs, Inc., Floral Park, N. Y.

BUIST'S SEEDS

PRODUCE QUICK & POSITIVE RESULTS

Buist's 1922 Garden Guide and Catalogue—now ready for mailing. Contains valuable information for the vegetable and flower garden.

Send for a Free Copy Today.

Buist's Record—Growing and Supplying Seeds of the Highest Grade since 1828.

If you have a garden you should have this book. It tells you what to plant and how to cultivate.

Free Flower Seeds with Orders of 50 Cents and Over

ROBERT BUIST CO., Dept. A, Philadelphia, Pa.

A WOMAN FLORIST

3 Hardy Roses 25¢

On their own roots

ALL WILL BLOOM THIS SUMMER

Sent to any address postpaid;

guaranteed to reach you in good growing condition.

GEM ROSE COLLECTION

Crimson Queen, rich velvety crimson.

Alexander Hill Gray, pure yellow.

Columbia, glowing pink.

SPECIAL BARGAINS

3 Carnations, the "Divine"

Flower, all colors, 25c

3 Choice Ferns, 25c

3 Chrysanthemums, 25c

4 Beautiful Coleus, 25c

3 Flowering Canna, 25c

2 Choice Dahlias, 25c

2 Choice Hardy Iris, 25c

5 Lovely Gladioli, 25c

5 Superb Pansy Plants, 25c

8 Pkts. Flower Seeds, all different, 25c

Any 5 Collections for $1. The Entire 11 Collections for $2. Postpaid.

Once a customer, always one. Catalog Free.

MISS ELLA V. BAINES, Box 155, SPRINGFIELD, OHIO

SEEDS Grown by a Woman

Everybody is delighted with my New Early June Asters. Largest, earliest and best. Continuous bloomers.

For 10c I will send 5 liberal packages, white, pink, lavender, crimson and purple. No better seeds grown.

Guaranteed to Please

Order today, send 10c to help pay postage and packing and receive the 5 new varieties of asters and my bargain Seed Book.

Charlotte M. Haines

Dept. 113, Rockford, Illinois

Wonderful BARGAINS in Fruits, Shrubs and Ornamental TREES

My Greenhouses, down to bedrock prices save you money. Never before have we offered such wonderful bargains, such as—20 Red or Black Raspberries, $1. 12 Blackberries, $1. 20 Gladioli

Balls, assorted, $1. 25 Asparagus, $1. 18 Carrots Green, $1. 12 Apple Trees 4 to 5 ft., $3.95. Star others. Big catalog shows fruits and ornamentals in actual colors. Also detail planting plans. Free.

EARL FERRIS NURSERY CO., 675 Bridge St., Hampton, Iowa

VICK'S Garden and Floral GUIDE

For 23 years the leading authority on Vegetable, Flower and Farm

Seeds, Plants and Bulbs. Better than ever. Send for free copy today.

JAMES VICK'S SONS Rochester, N. Y.

1 Stone Street The Flower City

Special GATES TOURS to Europe including 1922 Oberammergau

VERY moderate amounts cover all travelling, living and sightseeing expenses, give you 30 to 90 days of the most comfortable and delightful European travel. In addition to the Passion Play take in 36 old world cities. Sailings from May to September and optional dates of return and extensions may be arranged.

1922 Oberammergau

Only once in 10 years is this solemn religious pageant enacted. In 1922, to make up for the delay on account of the war, the Passion Play will be given in unsurpassed effects. Book today for Oberammergau and all European travel through Gates Tours. Founded in 1892, our Tours eliminate all the travel annoyances and provide world travel by groups of congenial companions. Prices $395 up.

Write today for a complete Gates Tours Booklet "E-15." Apply direct or to Raymond Whitcomb Co., General Agents in New York, Boston, Chicago, Philadelphia, Detroit and Toledo.

All Gates Tours without extra cost include Paris, the Argentine and the other American battlefields

GATES TOURS—Founded 1892

"World Travel at Reasonable Cost"
225 Fifth Avenue, New York
London—Paris—Rome

Dennison's

St. Patrick's is the day for parties—

And any party means the day for Dennison—because it needs the invitations, decorations and table novelties of Dennison to add a successful note to an otherwise everyday party. Dennison has a Party Book, full of good ideas for entertaining. Demand them. Send 10c. for the Party Book to DENNISON Dept. A 3 Framingham Mass.

What Next?

BETTER GARDENS

The sure way to have a more productive garden is to use as your guide—

The Maule FREE Seed Book

Send a postal today for your copy of the wonderful 176 page 1922 edition.
MAULE'S SEEDS
Once Grown Always Grown
Wm. Henry Maule, Inc.
2181 Arch St.
Philadelphia

TREES & PLANTS THAT GROW

CATALOG FREE
Great Bargains, Standard Varieties, Best Quality, Low Prices.
Satisfaction or money refunded.
60 years in business proof of our responsibility. Write for catalog now.
PETER BOHLENDER & SONS
Spring Hill Nursery
Box 103, Tippecanoe City (Miami County), Ohio

INGEE ROSES

On Own Roots
are always grown on their own roots. 11 years experience. Satisfaction and safe arrival guaranteed. Dinger "Guide to Rose Culture." Offers 100 Roses, other plants, bulbs and seeds, and tells how to grow them. It's free. Send today.
THE DINGER & CONARD CO., Box 324, West Grove, Pa.

strawberries 50 early, 50 midseason and 50 late Strawberry plants, delicious varieties, all for $2. Pack or Purple Raspberry plants 25 for $1, postage paid. Berry circular free. A. B. KATHAMER, Macedon, N. Y.

The Truth About the Pied Piper

(Continued from Page 186)

At the palace it was said that the king was asleep. You see, the Clauses had completely forgotten that kings don't have to arise as early as bakers.

"Why," said the fiddlers three, "he's only gone to bed."

But just at that minute in came the king, looking very sleepy and cross, his crown on backwards, his fur robe dragging behind. Santa jumped to his feet and made a low bow, almost tipping himself over on his nose in the effort.

"Who's this?" cried the king. "Turn him over to the queen. I declare, I can't sleep a wink, I'm so worried about this Piper fellow."

There was Santa's chance! He was afraid to speak, but he did, anyhow, standing up as straight as he could and looking the cross old king right in the eye. Old King Cole listened unwillingly at first, but as he listened the cross look gradually faded from his face and he began to look like his merry old self again.

"And you're telling me the truth, Santa Claus?" he asked. "Of course you are. I can see it shining in your honest little face. Ha, ha, this is great news! Ho, ho, ho, this is excellent news!"

He laughed so hard, the merry old soul, that Santa could not help joining in, and then the fiddlers three began to laugh too. How jolly it was!

But in the midst of his laughter old King Cole had an unpleasant thought.

"The children of Hamelin are still there," he said. "I'll never let the Pied Piper go until the children of Hamelin come back, Santa Claus."

"But the children of Hamelin won't come," pleaded Santa. "It isn't the Piper's fault. It was only a joke with him at first."

"But it's a poor joke," said the king. "The mothers of Hamelin are crying their eyes out right now for their children. No, I will not spare the Piper unless the children of Hamelin come back."

That was the king's last word on the subject, and a more disappointed family than the Claus family you have never heard of, when Santa went home with the sad news.

IX—Helping to Feed the Orphans

THE next day Mother Goose went away on her gander, and Santa ran down to see Judy. But he did not find her at home.

"She's gone over to see Mother Hubbard," the Old Woman told him. "She took the poor dog a bone, I believe."

Then Santa remembered. He had promised himself to do kind things so the fountain of the milk of human kindness would flow again. And Judy had already started, while he had been so busy feeling sorry for the Piper that he had completely forgotten the poor little orphans.

What should he do? He thought of everybody on Pudding Lane. He might go over and see Jack, who had broken his crown a few weeks before and was still in a rocking chair with a bandage over his head. He might pay a visit to Humpty Dumpty too. Humpty had had a great fall, one of the most serious cases Pudding Lane ever had. He might take some meat to the Spratts' cat. So he started right out, and he really did more kind things than you can possibly imagine.

Mrs. Claus was very proud of him.

X—The Fountain Overflows

ONE morning while Mr. Claus was snatching a nap and Santa was minding the shop, Mrs. Claus heard what she called a hullabaloo down Pudding Lane. With a twin on each hand and the rest of the children at her heels she ran to the front window. There, way down at the end of the lane, she saw a crowd gathering. Mrs. Claus could hear their cries and see their agitated gestures, but from her window she could see nothing else.

"Mercy on us! What can it be now?" she asked herself, and with one look at the baker, who was snoring at his best, she dashed out of the house, the five children hanging onto her at all ends.

She flew down Pudding Lane toward the little knot of excited, frightened people. "What is it?" she screamed.

They pointed toward Honeysuckle Hill, moaning and crying. She looked. Rising over the top of the hill was a great flood.

Mrs. Claus caught her breath. "What is it?" she asked again, terrified.

"It's the ocean," answered somebody.

"It's the flood," said somebody else.

"At first it was just a little thin stream," Mr. Horner told her.

"It's rising, rising, rising all the time," groaned Mrs. Muffett.

IT WAS rising, rising, rising all the time. Mrs. Claus could see that the waves had gotten bigger since she had been there—just a minute or two. Over the top of Honeysuckle Hill came the great billows; then breaking, down came the flood over the hill, right toward Pudding Lane.

But it didn't look like the ocean to Mrs. Claus. Mrs. Claus had never seen the ocean, but she had read about it, and the poets said it was green and blue. This ocean was white, creamy white, like chalk—no, like milk!

"It looks like milk," she cried out.

"It's the end of the world," said Mrs. Grundy solemnly.

But suddenly over the peak of the topmost wave there appeared a head, a curly little yellow head, and then another one, the head of a boy, stubby-haired and dark. It was a girl and a boy, and they were being flung down the side of the hill, riding the waves, shouting, laughing, enjoying the sport. More children followed, and more and more, as the round-eyed people of Pudding Lane watched.

"It's the children of Hamelin," shrieked Tom the Piper's Son.

And it was. They were tumbling down into Pudding Lane as fast as the great waves could fling them there, breathless and laughing. Before anybody had a chance to say another word, another head appeared over the top of the flood-covered Honeysuckle Hill. It was the Pied Piper, and he was waving to them with his old brown hat.

"Good-by!" he called. "We're sailing away—my beggars, and orphans and I—to another land. Thank you, Santa! Thank you, Judy! You are dear, good children. Almost too good, for you did so many kind things you made the fountain of the milk of human kindness flood over to-day. It has washed us out completely. But it washed the children of Hamelin out, too, so it's a blessing, after all—the best deed you ever did. Ask their mothers if they don't think so. Good-by!"

With that the Pied Piper disappeared. And gradually the great, white flood simmered down, and finally it stopped.

And so the children of Hamelin got back to their mothers, the Pied Piper escaped the wrath of old King Cole, and the people of Pudding Lane found out what a fine fellow the Pied Piper was after all. They never laid eyes on him again, but they talked about him the rest of their lives—even Mr. Claus, who had slept through the whole affair and didn't really know a thing about it.

AT LEAST one salad a day. For lunch if you're not positive you're going to have one for dinner.

The salad is rightly gaining importance in the everyday menu, not only because it is an appetizer and adds a refreshing note to meals, but because it introduces in the salad plants, the valuable minerals so necessary to health. At the same time, a salad dressing, made with Wesson Oil, is one of the fats necessary for a perfectly balanced meal.

Maternity

LANE BRYANT Maternity Clothes enable you to dress stylishly during all stages of maternity—and after baby comes, as well. Very latest modes, cleverly designed to conceal condition. Patented adjustments provide expansion.

Style Book FREE
76-page Style Book, picturing latest styles in Maternity Coats, Suits, Dresses, Skirts, Corsets. Write today.

Lane Bryant 36 West 5th St. New York

New Money-Making Plan

Do you want $2 an hour or more for your spare time—$25 to $50 a week for entire time? Our new sales system is making big money for men and women as factory agents in selling

Malloch-Knit Hose

Guaranteed for 6 months
and quality underwear—direct from mills to wearer. Let us start you in a business of your own with our Free Sample Outfit and new plans. We pay all expenses. Become our District Manager—appoint sub-agents and we pay you a commission on the goods they sell—WRITE TODAY.

Malloch Knitting Mills
423 Grant St. Grand Rapids, Mich.

GORHAM

SILVER POLISH
WILL CLEAN SILVER, IVORY AND CELLULOID
SELLING AGENTS, HAROLD F. RITCHIE & COMPANY, INC., 175 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK; ALSO OF LONDON, ENGLAND; - TORONTO, CANADA; - SYDNEY, AUSTRALIA.

What 15c Will Bring You

Only 15 cents gives you the Pathfinder 15 From the Nation's Capital weeks on trial. The Pathfinder is a cheerful illustrated weekly, published at the Nation's center for people everywhere. It contains the latest home paper that tells the story of the world's news in an interesting, understandable way. This splendid National weekly costs but $1 a year. The Pathfinder is the best of the publishing world. Splendid serial and short stories and miscellany. Question Box answers your questions and is a mine of information. Send 15 cents and we will send the Pathfinder on probation 13 weeks. The 15c does not pay us, but we are glad to invest in new friends. Address: The Pathfinder, 690 Langdon St., Washington, D. C.

"Mizpah" Baby Nipples

Do not collapse—Prevent much colic Free to Mothers and Doctors
Valve (A) prevents vacuum. Inside ribs (B) prevent collapsing when child bites nipple. Rim is made so nipple cannot be pulled off bottle. Guard your baby's health. Send no money! We send you a sample nipple free, postpaid on request. Write now to THE WALTER F. WARE CO., Dept. F Philadelphia, Pa.

YOU CAN

establish a good business of your own by taking the agency for our line of Aprons and Piece Goods. Easily sold. Good profits. Experience unnecessary. Samples free. Exclusive territory. Write now. DELMAR CO., 1475 Williamsbridge Road, New York can be turned into money. Let us tell you how hundreds of men and women earn a dollar an hour. Address The Curtis Publishing Company, 462 Independence Square, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

YOUR SPARE TIME

Something Worse

A KNIGHT of the road was rejoined by a companion who had been to a farmhouse prospecting.

"What luck?" the waiting one asked.

"Nothin' doin'," the other growled, and added grumblingly: "I don't like this business of askin' for bread and gettin' a stone."

"Aw," the other comforted him philosophically, "'taint as bad as askin' fur bread an' gettin' a bulldog."

The New Language That is Ours

WE USUALLY think of the English we speak as a language long established. Yet words that seem as familiar to us as breathing were unknown a comparatively short time ago, just as the civilizations of Egypt and Greece, which we are accustomed to regard as ancient, are really but of yesterday when their two or three thousand years of age are compared with the rude beginnings of man five hundred thousand years ago. Most people, for instance, probably think that the word "starvation" is as old as the language; but it isn't. It was first used—think of it!—in 1775 in a speech made in Parliament by Henry Dundas, who in consequence became widely known as Starvation Dundas.

"Intensify" and "outsider" are two words less than a hundred years old. The English poet, Coleridge, deliberately coined the former word because there was no other in existence to express the particular shade of meaning which he wished to convey; and "outsider" came into being in 1844, during the convention that nominated James K. Polk for President. The delegates were subjected to uncomfortable pressure by the throng of spectators gathered without the hall, and someone happily described it as a pressure from the "outsiders." The term was taken up by the reporters and at once became popular.

Other words unknown until the middle of the seventeenth century include such now-familiar ones as "sculptor," "umbrella," "opera," "suicide" and "peninsula," while Bentley in the eighteenth century had actually to defend himself for using such strange terms as "timid," "concede," "repudiate," "kiliom" and "vernacular," and George Campbell in 1776 hesitated to use such queer new words as "originate," "sentimental" and "criminality."

Poor Mother!

MY MOTHER often tells of times when it was daily her delight—Unless it rained—to roam the woods To try to find a prince or knight. The girls in books she read did that; 'Twas wonderful the luck they had. Poor Mother wore out lots of shoes, But—all she ever found was Dad!

—DAISY McLEOD WRIGHT.

Jolted

"I'D LIKE to go to a funeral this afternoon, sir," said the office boy.

"Oh, you would, would you?" the chief heartlessly replied. "Well, you won't!"

"No, sir; I know I won't," the boy murmured resignedly. "But I would like to all the same."

Something tragic and appealing in the youthful voice led the chief to ask: "Whose funeral?"

"Yours, sir," said the boy.

Not Only Sunday

AT TWO years old Billy thinks more than he talks, and when he does speak it is to the point. A visitor had asked the little fellow several questions and received no replies. At last the grown-up said ingratiatingly: "Won't you tell me your name? I think it must be Billy Sunday."

Billy pondered and at last replied slowly and firmly: "No, I isn't Billy Sunday. I's Billy ev'yday."

The Office Dog

Scraps That He Picks Up Here,
There and Everywhere

Her One Chance

"AUNTIE," romantic Annabel inquired of an unmarried elderly relative, "did you ever have a proposal?"

"Once, dear," the aunt replied. "A man asked me over the telephone to marry him, but he had the wrong number."

What He Would Get

"IF A FARMER has four thousand bushels of wheat," said the teacher, "and sells them at sixty cents a bushel, what would he get?"

To which a pupil enthusiastically replied: "An automobile."

Doubtless

A FASHIONABLE woman who collected her own rents in order to save expense found one of her tenants in an obviously discontented frame of mind and promptly decided to forestall complaints by making some. She ended with: "And the kitchen, Mr. James, is in a terrible condition."

"Yes, ma'am, it is," Mr. James agreed; "and you'd look the same way if you hadn't had any paint on you for six years."

Theodore's Resignation

THEODORE had been a very naughty boy, and his mother had told him that he must pray to be made better. So after praying for the various members of the family, as usual, the small voice humbly said: "And make me a better boy." Then, after a second's hesitation, he added in his best imitation of the grown-up manner: "Nevertheless, not my will, but Thine be done."

More Than a Thousand Years Ago!

ONE night in the eighth or ninth century, more than a thousand years ago, a young Chinaman named Po Chu-I, who became one of the great poets of the T'ang period, the Golden Age of Chinese poetry, was dreaming while on duty in the palace about the Hsien-yu Temple, where he used to spend his holidays, and presently he wrote a poem about it which he called "Night Duty at the Palace"; and here it is, done into English after almost eleven hundred years, by Mabel Lorenz Ives:

I sat at the window working,
Copying the emperor's laws.
Bamboos slept in the stillness;
Even my pen would pause.
The moon rose up from the garden
And a wind rose up from the pines;
Sudden it seemed an evening
In the hills when a new moon shines.

I dozed as I did night duty,
And I dreamed of the fair Southwest:
I was back at Hsien-yu Temple,
The temple that I love best.
And when I woke in the palace,
The drip of the water clock
I thought was a mountain streamlet
Going drip-drip-drip on a rock.

Thus from the dust of the ages the genius of Po Chu-I makes us feel the spell of that homesick hour as he felt it "in the solemn midnight, centuries ago!"

The Stork's Rival

"MOTHER," little Archie said, "it wasn't the stork that brought baby."

"Who was it, then?" his mother asked, curious to hear what idea her small son had in his head.

"It was the milkman," Archie replied with absolute positiveness. "He has a sign painted right on his wagon: 'Families Supplied Daily.'"

Just How Queer He Was

THE colored cook of the household had a "gem'man friend" who impressed the family as peculiar. "Sallie," one of them remarked to her, "Rastus is a queer sort of fellow, isn't he?"

"Yassum, Miss Dora; he shore is," Sallie admitted, shaking her head. "Why," she burst out, "dat dar man, he'd radder wuk dan git married!"

A Fair Exchange

A RICH elderly bachelor named Page found the dropped glove of a charming young lady and returned it with this note:

"If from your glove you take the letter, that glove is love, and that I have for thee."

In reply the young woman wrote:

"If from your name you take the letter A, then Page is age, and that won't do for me."

Table of Contents

	Page		Page
Editorials	26	FASHIONS (Continued)
FICTION		A Frock for Every Woman of Every
Four-square (In six parts): Part I—		Age	174
Grace S. Richmond	3	Nice for Both Easter and School	178
The Ghost Story (A One-Act Play)—		NEEDLEWORK
Booth Tarkington	6	The World's Needs Cry for Women's
Empty Arms—		Work in Lent	68
Roland Pertwee	10	Eat Your Cake and Have it Too—
Babe Grows Up—		Alice Van Leer Carrick	114
Sophie Kerr	12	Layette Features that a Baby Likes
In Strange Company—		to Have	121
Albert Payson Terhune	14	A Quickly Made Bedroom Set—
The Confessions of a Useless Wife		Laura L. Willis	123
(In two parts): Part I—		FOR CHILDREN
Margaretta Tuttle	15	The French Twins Go Exploring—
The Truth About the Pied Piper—		Lucy Flick Perkins	34
Sarah Addington	18	The French Twins (Paper Dolls)	37
The Unspeakable Gentleman: Part		ART FEATURES
II—J. P. Marquand	22	Gainsborough's Blue Boy	17
Bannertail: Part II—		He Shall Give His Angels Charge
Ernest Thompson Seton	141	Over Them—W. L. Taylor	20
SPECIAL ARTICLES		HOUSEHOLD
The Right Kind of Public School		House-Plan Contest Prize Winners	24
Teachers Needed—		The Complete Furnishing of the Lit-
Charles A. Selden	8	tle House—Ethel Carpenter	32
England's Only Princess Marries a		Dining-Room Lights—
Commoner—		Ethel Davis Seal	40
Catherine Van Dyke	9	Good Things Made from Yeast	69
Human Nature in the Bible—		Let's Have Lamb for Dinner—
William Lyon Phelps	21	Caroline B. King	79
How Thin Folks May Become		The French Flavor—
Plump—		Maria Jacques	82
Royal S. Copeland, M.D.	24	To Save You Two Dollars or More
My Years on the Stage: Part VI		Salt Fish and Smoked Fish—
(Conclusion)—John Drew	25	Mary Warren	88
Just a Beginning	27	ENTERTAINMENT
The Sins of the Parents—		Staging The Ghost Story—
Miriam Finn Scott	28	Glenn Hunter	132
Unnecessary Diseases of Childhood		POEMS
—S. Josephine Baker, M.D.	30	Sanctified—
Good Manners in the Home—		Lillian Gard	38
Nathalie Schenck Laimbeer	181	Dreaming—
FASHIONS		Winifred Lockhart Willis	50
Smart Fabrics in New and Youthful		Your House of Happiness—
Ways	162	B. V. Williams	62
Paris Hints of Spring	164	MISCELLANEOUS
Color is Everywhere	165	Your Garden in 1922—
Even the Youngest May Have Paris		J. Horace McFarland	106
Easter Clothes	167	Helpful Ladies' Home Journal Books	108
Paris Suits Have Narrow Skirts, But		Bumbleton Folks—
Jackets May be Flaring—		Claude Callan	111
Mary Brush Williams	168	Have You Enough Money?—
Here Careful Planning Makes Easy		Manager of The Girls' Club	137
Sewing	171	The Office Dog	188
Straw and Fabric Share Honors in Spring Hats	172

A Special Word to Subscribers

WHEN you receive notice that your subscription has expired renew it at once, using the blank inclosed in your final copy. Please sign your name exactly as it appears on your present address label.

A request for change of address must reach us at least 3 weeks before the date of the issue with which it is to take effect. Duplicate copies cannot be sent to replace those undelivered through failure to send this advance notice. Be sure to give your old address as well as the new one.

Should your subscription expire with this issue of the HOME JOURNAL your renewal should be sent promptly to insure receipt of the April issue before it is "sold out." We cannot begin subscriptions with back numbers. Subscribers should always use Postal or Express money orders or Bank drafts in remitting. All Rural Free Delivery carriers can supply Postal money orders.

Our Advertising Branch Offices

[For advertising business only. Subscriptions not received.]

PHILADELPHIA: Independence Square
NEW YORK: 366 Madison Avenue
BOSTON: Merchants' National Bank Building
CHICAGO: Home Insurance Building
SAN FRANCISCO: First National Bank Building

Not a Coward Among Them

Indian Head in twelve colors that will not run away! Think what it will mean to have the color of your favorite frock stand by you through the summer's attack of sun and washing.

We guarantee: If any garment made of Indian Head fails to give proper service because of the fading or running of Indian Head colors, we will make good the total cost of the garment.

The new colors are:

Ciel	Linen	Helio	Cadet
Pink	Tan	Reseda	Copen
Pearl	Biscuit	Rose	Brown

36 inches wide, only 59c. a yard.

Trim your white Indian Head dresses with colored Indian Head or your colored Indian Head dresses with white Indian Head. The weight and weave are alike, and under no circumstances will the colors run.

"The Girl Who Loved Pink" tells the story of colored Indian Head and has a sample and the complete color range. Free on request.

Amory, Browne & Co., Dept. 236, Box 1206
Boston, Mass.

Nashua Blankets Parkhill Fine Gingham
Gilbrae Gingham Lancaster Kalburnie Gingham
© 1911, Amory, Browne & Company, Boston and New York

INDIAN HEAD CLOTH
Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.
Always on the Selvage

Makes

Bathrooms Bright

Old Dutch quickly removes all scum and dirt from porcelain tubs and wash-bowls without marring the surface.

Economical—saves time and work

THE PRICE of the HOME JOURNAL

PUBLISHED once a month. 15 cents the copy from all newsdealers. By subscription: To the United States and Possessions, Cuba and Mexico, $1.50 the year. Remit by U. S. money order, express money order, check, or by draft payable in U. S. funds.

To Canada, by subscription, $2.00 the year. Single copies, 20 cents—Canadian or U. S. funds.

To Foreign Countries in the Postal Union, by subscription, postpaid, $3.00 the year, remittance to be by draft payable in U. S. funds.

The Ladies' HOME JOURNAL

THE FAMILY MAGAZINE OF AMERICA

Incorporating The Home Journal. Registered in the United States Patent Office and in Foreign Countries

PUBLISHED ON THE FIRST DAY OF EACH MONTH BY

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANYINDEPENDENCE SQUARE
PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIACYRUS H. K. CURTIS

PRESIDENT

C. H. LUDINGTON

TREASURER

PHILIP S. COLLINS

GENERAL BUSINESS MANAGER

WALTER D. FULLER

SECRETARY

WILLIAM BOYD

ADVERTISING DIRECTOR

BARTON W. CURRIE, EditorLORING A. SCHULER, WALTER H. DOWER,
MARTHA E. DODSON, Associate Editors

Copyright, 1922 (trade-mark registered), by The Curtis Publishing Company, in the United States and Great Britain. London Offices, 6, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W. C. All rights reserved. Entered as second-class matter May 6, 1911, at the Post Office at Philadelphia, Pa., under Act of March 3, 1879. Additional entry as second-class matter at Columbus, O., at Decatur, Ill., at Chicago, Ill., at Indianapolis, Ind., at San Francisco, Cal., at Seattle, Wash., and at Houston, Texas.

"OH, SIR KNIGHT,
YOU'VE RESCUED
YOUR DAMSEL IN DISTRESS, AND YOU MUST WEAR
HER FAVOR"

Illustrations by
Charles E. Chambers

The Prince Rides ByBy FRANCES NOYES HART

THE very small person seated under the very large tree sighed heavily, passing the tip of an industrious pink tongue over the point of her pencil as an indication to the recalcitrant muses that all was in readiness in so far as their handmaid was concerned. The muses remained obdurate, however, and the small person, scowling forbiddingly, pulled up her white socks, pulled down her green smock and pushed the copper-colored curls out of her eyes.

Then she settled herself more comfortably against the trunk of the beech tree, her vivid, small countenance once more assuming an expression of appropriate fervor.

The blank book that lay open on her knees stared up at her reproachfully; it had been lying there for almost an hour, and its pages were still scantily adorned. True, the first one could boast an entry; very black and somewhat uncertain letters announced that this was the "Private Property of Miss Penelope Thornton, Authoress. Play One, judging from the scowl which she bestowed on her maiden effort in drama, Nature had failed to dower her with the highly desirable attributes of patience and philosophy, peculiarly essential to authoresses of any age.

True, time pressed, and she had faithfully promised Garriek that the first act would be ready and waiting for Act One, Scene One. L.—Alas, to think that I, Lorraine de Montpensier, should be reduced to this. They say that love is blind, but alas, it is not. Alas——"

The lamentations of the unfortunate Lorraine had reached this indeterminate conclusion some forty minutes previously, when genius had abruptly ceased to burn. Miss Penelope Thornton, authoress, was encountering some of the hazards of her profession at the unduly tender age of eleven, and him that afternoon. At any minute now he might come swinging down that green lane, only to discover that the rôle of Raoul Etienne de Valois was still buried in the agitated mind of its creator—the rôle that she had fervently assured him would add fresh laurels to the thickly clustered brow of her Garrick, known to the world at large as Henry Morton and the greatest actor of his day! It seemed too horrible to be true that she could have failed him thus dismally.

Summer was drawing relentlessly to its close, and no later than yesterday he had confided to her (and incidentally to Madre Mia) that he had no play for the winter. And it was urgent, it was imperative that he should have a play, and a new play at that. His voice had underlined every other word in highly emphatic fashion, and Madre Mia had smiled consolingly at him over the teacups, properly sympathetic and bewilderingly pretty; but Pen had felt that this was no time for smiles and sympathy. Something more was needed—immediate action and plenty of it; and she had felt so sure that she was amply qualified to supply that need.

GARRICK should have his play, a perfectly new play, the play that he had been seeking frenziedly; and he should have it within the week. The enthralling character that she intended to present to the world in the form of Raoul Etienne de Valois was calculated to make Garrick's last year's triumph as Ruy Blas seem a rather tame and spiritless thing.

Garrick himself had been duly impressed and deeply grateful; he had very properly ignored Madre Mia's lovely laughter, and had made an engagement to meet his rescuer under the great beech tree at four o'clock in order to go over the first act. And now the little watch that he had given her last Christmas said five minutes to four, and she was there, and he was coming—but where, oh, where was Raoul Etienne de Valois? Where, indeed? She clutched the pencil despairingly, giving it a frantic little shake.

"Please, please," she implored. "Come on."

The galvanized pencil staggered, wobbled, pulled itself together and set off at a truly amazing pace.

Enter Raoul Etienne de Valois.
E. Why dost thou weep, beauteous wench? One so fair should shed only laughter, I dare swear. By my halidom, the hand, heart, sword, name and fame of Raoul Etienne de Valois are yours—are thine—are thine to command at any and all times. By my halidom they are, and I swear that thou wilt find them useful, comely creature. So prithee, pretty one, dry up those crystal—

"Ready, Queen Mab?"

The inspired authoress gave a violent start, clutching despairingly at the masterpiece. "Oh, Garrick darling, you did so make me jump! Well, I'm not quite exactly ready, but if you'll come back in just a little bit of a while, I'll prob'ly be absolutely through. It's getting better and better every minute, truly—"

"Never mind." There was a note in Garrick's voice that made her glance up swiftly, and something thrilled and eager in his face invited the wondering gaze.

WHAT had happened to her Garrick to give him that new look, that young, young look, sweeping away the years that had always lurked behind those brilliant eyes; what had happened?

"Never mind the play now! Listen, Mab—listen! This is better than any play ever written. Move over, sweetheart; lend me the beech tree too. There! Now your hand—now close your eyes—now hold your breath! Ready?"

"Is it—nice?" asked Pen in a small, cautious voice.

"Nice? Nice, Mab? It's marvelous, marvelous; it's incredible; it's a miracle! It's too exciting to stand just at first; that's why you must keep your eyes shut. Are you ready? One—two—three! Mab, Mab, Madre Mia is going to marry me."

Pen sat perfectly still for a moment, not moving, not breathing; and then she opened her eyes. In that brief moment they had gone pitch black; they stared at him strangely, two charred holes burned in the paper-white, small face.

"No," she whispered. "No, no, no! She isn't; she isn't—she can't."

"But I tell you that she is. I tell you that she can."

"No, no." The small fingers were cold against his, but the great eyes never wavered. "You said that it was me; you promised, you promised—you said that you would

"Ah, sweetheart," his laughter was about her, tender and mocking; "and after all the weary years of waiting, what would I have found at the journey's end? A lovers' meeting, but for another lover, little queen—for a young, young lover with blue eyes and a golden heart and two strong arms to hold you close and safe from poor, tired Garrick, who had come so far. Is that what you would wish for me?"

"You promised," said the stony little voice.

Garrick's mobile face was suddenly grave. "Mab, the little girl to whom I made that promise three years ago, the little, lost, tragic girl whom I found weeping out her heart because someone had told her there weren't any fairies—she has gone away forever, hasn't she? I couldn't have let her break her heart with weeping, could I? I could only swear to her that there were fairies, that there were fairy princes, that there was I, to be her fairy prince. Was that so wrong a thing to do?"

The small, stern face beside him quivered suddenly—broke—and his late fiancée was in his arms, a whirlwind of flying curls and sandaled feet. "Oh, Garrick, Garrick, won't you love me any more then?"

"Ah, little queen!" His arms were fast about her, as he brushed the ruffled glory of those curls with his lips. "I'll love you forever—and a day after. But no promise ever made could turn poor Garrick to a fairy prince; the best that he can manage is rather an elderly young man, who eager, vivid face. "How're you going to know this wonderful prince?"

"Why, by the blue velvet cloak, Garrick; weren't you listening? And golden curls and—"

"But what if he forgot them, Mab? Nowadays princes don't wear blue velvet and gold curls."

"He would wear them for me," said Penelope.

Garrick caught her closer, his face darkening.

"Ah, little Queen, how we clumsy fools are going to hurt you! When you break your heart weeping for your prince, as you wept on that day you found there were no fairies—"

Pen stiffened suddenly. "But there were fairies."

THE heedless Garrick laughed gently. "Oh, the great authoress! The great authoress who reads herself to sleep with Shakspeare and believes in fairies."

Pen clutched his sleeve convulsively, black fear in her heart. "But Shakspeare believes in them too; he does, he does—Ariel and Puck and Oberon—"

"Fairies of dreams and poetry and enchantment, little queen; great fairies of the mind—"

"No, no; little real fairies." Panic had her in its grip.

"Little real fairies that live in cowslips and ride on bats; he says so; he does—little, tiny ones that—"

A voice, clear and gay and distant, cut across her fear just then. "Hal-o-oh, Hal-o-oh, Hal!"

"It's only Madre Mia," she said. "Wait—wait, please, Garrick—"

"I must go, dear." He was on his feet already, his face turned to the happy voice. "Coming, Mab?"

"No." But he hardly heard her, so swiftly had he turned, so swiftly had he gone.

She stared after him blankly, incredulously, and then, reckless of the crumpled white blank book, reckless of the uncrumpled green smock, she flung herself flat on the velvet moss and wept aloud. She wept for all that she had lost—for Garrick and the fairies and her prince, for everything that had made a stale, flat and unprofitable world worth living in; and she wept with all of the profound despair of the very young and the very, very happy who know that they will never be happy again, and who are singing before the tears are dry on their lashes.

She sobbed on desperately, rubbing her feverish, small face deeper and deeper into the kind moss, reveling unconsciously in the green softness and earthy sweetness even while she wept, blind to all save sorrow, deaf to all save despair. The hoof beats were loud and near before she heard them; in an instant she was on her feet, poised like a little, wild thing for instant flight. Those fatal teardrops! And the hoof beats were coming nearer and nearer down the only path that made retreat possible, the path that cut through the woods from the main road beyond the house, the path down which the faithless Garrick had so recently disappeared.

THE thicket was too dense; no passage there; but she pressed back against it desperately, praying that the green smock would pass unheeded in the foliage, the flaming curls clean forgotten. Nearer and nearer, nearer still; around the corner swung a horse and rider, both obviously and aggressively enjoying themselves. The man was bareheaded, and he was singing at the top of his voice; a remarkably pleasant voice it was too.

"From the Desert I come to thee," he chanted jubilantly, "On a stallion shod with fire—"

And then the fire-shod stallion stood abruptly on its head. The rider transferred his seat to the ground with more emphasis than grace, and his song stopped. He stared blankly at his feet for a moment, and then, throwing back his golden head, burst into a peal of laughter that made the woods echo. A little stir from behind him caused him to shift his gaze from the boots, only to encounter a pair of panic-stricken gray eyes, belonging to an incredibly tiny being, apparently bent on instant flight.

"A dryad!" he remarked conversationally. "Don't run away, Dryad; I've been looking for you everywhere."

"There aren't any dryads," said the tiny being mournfully. "I am Penelope Thornton; and, if you don't mind, I am pretty miserable and I would like to go home. I'm sorry that I frightened your horse."

"I'm very glad that you did," he said, and he smiled so radiantly that Pen smiled back warily. He looked like has to wear glasses when he reads, and who is looking for laurels to hide the bare spots on his temples."

"I HAVEN'T ANYTHING THAT THE POOREST FAIRY PRINCE IN THE WORLD WOULD HAVE, MY DEAR. A DRAGON WOULD LAUGH IN MY FACE."

Pen touched his brow with fairy light fingers.

"I wouldn't have a hair more in your dear head; truly, darling. Of course you aren't exactly like the pictures in the fairy books—"

"I haven't anything that the poorest fairy prince in the world would have, my dear. A dragon would laugh in my face; an ogre would snap his fingers at me. It's no good, sweet; golden youth, dear and golden little youth must have her fairy prince, and Madre Mia and I will just have to make the best of it."

Penelope sighed heavily, shifting her curls to a more comfortable spot on Garrick's rough tweed shoulder. "Well, I'll wait," she said resignedly. "But I'll prob'ly get pretty tired waiting."

"Yes," said Garrick; "pretty tired." And then he brought the faraway eyes back again, to smile down into the

has to wear glasses when he reads, and who is looking for laurels to hide the bare spots on his temples."

Pen touched his brow with fairy light fingers.

"I wouldn't have a hair more in your dear head; truly, darling. Of course you aren't exactly like the pictures in the fairy books—"

"I haven't anything that the poorest fairy prince in the world would have, my dear. A dragon would laugh in my face; an ogre would snap his fingers at me. It's no good, sweet; golden youth, dear and golden little youth must have her fairy prince, and Madre Mia and I will just have to make the best of it."

Penelope sighed heavily, shifting her curls to a more comfortable spot on Garrick's rough tweed shoulder. "Well, I'll wait," she said resignedly. "But I'll prob'ly get pretty tired waiting."

"Yes," said Garrick; "pretty tired." And then he brought the faraway eyes back again, to smile down into the

The Most Powerful Lobby in Washington

DR.
V. H. PARKEREMMA
WOLDMRS.
ARTHUR C. WATKINSMRS.
E. A. YOST

MRS. E. P. COSTIGAN

HERE is, as all sight-seers and perhaps a few Washingtonians know, in the basement of the National Capitol a remarkable group statue of three women—Lucretia Mott, Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Susan B. Anthony—wrought in one block of stone as a monument to three pioneers in the struggle for suffrage. Whatever the reason may have been for relegating this piece of sculpture to the basement, there is a singular appropriateness in its being there. That which it symbolizes is far nearer to the foundations of the new tendencies in American life and government and to the activities of these days at Washington than are the jumbled company of bronze and stone politicians, soldiers, statesmen and favorite sons of many states in Statuary Hall on the floor above.

Statuary Hall itself is, for the most part, a museum of memorials to ideas and tendencies which the country rapidly is outgrowing. The one modern note, because it is the woman note, in the collection upstairs is in the figure of Frances E. Willard, placed there by Illinois, the only favorite daughter in a crowded circle of favorite sons. She is wedged in between John Corrie, M.D., of Florida, and Thomas Hart Benton, of Missouri.

Who remembers Corrie? Or is it Corrie? The stonecutter was careless in chiseling the first letter of the name. He was elected by Florida as her representative in this hall of fame because he had invented an ice machine. He is not in the books of American biography. And who, except the historian, remembers Benton? He was not so far back but that twenty years of his life overlapped the time of Miss Willard. But there is no man in Senate or House to-day who does not know all about her. The thing which she fought for, and which her successors won, is to-day still a great issue in Congress between those who would destroy it and those who know that the fight to keep it alive is not yet over.

However, the statue of Miss Willard in the hall and the group of three women in the basement do not fully and completely symbolize the beginnings of the entire present movement which, after generations of struggle, humiliation and ridicule, has become the greatest organized factor in changing the spirit of American lawmaking, which finally has put the unmistakable stamp of the woman on everything in Washington that counts for the welfare of the nation as a whole. That that stamp is there is admitted by every member of Congress, whether he be one of those who hate and oppose the activities of the women, because of their disturbing of things as they were, or whether

It is the Public Welfare Lobby Backed by Seven Million Organized American Women

By
CHARLES A. SELDEN

he be in the much larger and rapidly growing group who do the will of the women because either of sympathy or of fear. Whether honest hater or sincere sympathizer or one who truckles under because of his dread of the woman vote, the member of Congress now knows absolutely that these women organizations, with national headquarters at Washington, ramify to every township in the country. He knows that all these organizations with their differing activities, some of them superficially wide apart, have one uniform, fundamental purpose—human welfare—and that, when emergency requires it, they have the perfected machinery for mobilizing all their forces on a single point of attack or defense.

The congressman knows, too, that evasion has become a lost possibility, because of the wonderful system which the women have developed. He is card indexed from the beginning to the end of his political career. He is recorded on the books of the women not only as to how he votes and what he says, but as to how he looks and behaves when he says it. He cannot promise anything back home in his campaign for election which is not charged to his account in the offices of the women at Washington. He cannot deviate a hair's breadth from the honest fulfillment of that promise at Washington without the fact being reported to the women constituents in his congressional district, no matter how remote that district may be. He is classified psychologically as well as geographically; with reference to his sincerity and dependableness as with reference to his party affiliations. The least important although often the most amusing part of the member's record kept on file by the women is the sketch which he writes of himself for the official Congressional Directory.

Just one example, although I am getting a long way off from statuary and sources. Albert W. Jefferis, representative of the second congressional district of Nebraska, fifty-three years old, thought it of sufficient importance and public interest to write of himself in the current issue of the Congressional Directory that when in Michigan University he was a member of both the football and baseball teams.

That bit of autobiography is pasted in the women's record of Jefferis. But among the things they have added to it is the following fact: Jefferis, when home in Nebraska on a visit, addressed a meeting of women. He made no mention of the Sheppard-Towner Maternity Bill.

At the end of his speech one of his hearers asked him about that measure.

"Oh, that matter is still pending," he replied, "and I do not wish to touch upon it at this time."

But as a matter of fact that measure was not pending but already had been enacted into law, as Mrs. Draper Smith, the "flying grandmother" of Nebraska, informed the congressman right in meeting.

On the relentless score kept by the women in both Washington and Nebraska, the old baseball player's ignorance as to the measure which the women of the entire country had demanded gets put down unquestionably as an error and not a home run. It may affect his average if he runs for Congress again in November, or he may redeem himself; the watchers in Washington areas quick and ready to give deserved credit as demerit.

To return to the statues in the Capitol of the prohibition and the suffrage pioneers, they symbolize the beginnings of only two of the three great activities of American women, which began with nothing, apparently, in common but which finally merged into the great movement now in process of evolution and

MISS ETHEL SMITH

MISS ALICE PAUL

(Continued on Page 23)

THERE WERE TIMES WHEN BETTY HATED THE DIAMOND AND PLATINUM PIN. SOME WAY SHE CAME TO CONNECT TOM'S HARD WORK AND SHABBINESS WITH THIS EXPENSIVE TRINKET.

Peyton and Peyton

By

FANNIE KILBOURNE

Illustrations by H. R. Ballinger

IT WAS a common mistake for strangers to assume that the two Mrs. Peytons were sisters-in-law—a mistake naturally relished very much more by Mrs. Thomas Peyton, Senior, than by Mrs. Thomas Peyton, Junior.

"Oh no," Mrs. Peyton, Senior, always corrected it promptly. "Betty is my daughter, my son's wife. Yes, indeed, I am plenty old enough to have a married son. Why, I'm a grandmother, twice over."

She usually admitted, however, that she had been married out of the cradle. The amazed comments were always quite sincere. No matter how young she had been married, Mrs. Peyton did not seem a possible grandmother. She was small and slim and auburn haired, and she wore straight little belted suits of heather tweed, and on her way to the office in the merciless morning sunshine, she did not look a day over thirty-five. In merciless sunshine, Betty, who was only twenty-three, looked sometimes nearer thirty. It is only giving due recognition to sound feminine psychology to admit that this fact doubtless had a good deal to do with the other fact that Betty sometimes felt she disliked her mother-in-law—especially Wednesdays.

On Wednesdays Mr. and Mrs. Peyton, Senior, took dinner with Mr. and Mrs. Peyton, Junior. And it seemed to Betty that domestic difficulties were always more difficult on Wednesdays, that a real household catastrophe deliberately waited for Wednesday evening to happen.

Mrs. Peyton, Senior, of course could not have the comradely understanding of domestic catastrophes to be expected of another housewife. As active partner to her husband in an extremely successful brokerage and insurance business, she was both too prosperous and too busy to bother with house-keeping. She and Tom's father lived in the Dunwoody, an apartment hotel in which, it seemed to Betty, one enjoyed all the comforts with none of the discomforts of home.

WHEN the Junior Peytons took the two children to dine with their grandparents, dinner was served on a mahogany gate-leg table in the Senior Peytons' own attractive living room. It arrived piping hot from the hotel kitchen, was served by a deft waitress and removed to the last soiled dish and dropped crumb the instant the diners were finished.

When Betty's sister came to take care of the babies for the evening and Betty and Tom went to the Dunwoody alone, the four usually dined downstairs in the large dining room. There was an orchestra here which played just softly enough to give each group of diners a little oasis of privacy, there were flowers and rose-shaded lights on the small tables, there was a menu, bewildering in its number of elaborate and often delicious dishes from which to choose.

After dinner, Tom's father usually asked how they would all like to go to a show. He would telephone for seats at the Orpheum, only in case there was no really good play in town. Both he and Mrs. Peyton preferred a New York success in its first season on the road.

"No, I don't want box seats and I don't want anything in the balcony," Mr. Peyton would tell the box-office man. "Haven't you something downstairs, in about the eighth row? . . . Well, if you haven't anything else, give me the box. Is it one that you can see the stage from? It had better be, or I'll come out and smash up the box office personally. No, give me the whole box; I don't want a couple of strangers in with us."

WHENEVER there was a little time between dinner and time to leave for the theater, they went back upstairs to the Peytons' apartment. If it was winter, there was always an open fire burning in the showy marble grate, a new opera-star record to try. There were expensive cigars for Tom and his father; usually a freshly opened box of French chocolates or glacé nuts which Mr. Peyton had brought his wife. If it chanced to be raining or snowing when it was time to start, he scorned the street car which passed the Dunwoody's door and had the brass-buttoned boy at the door call a taxi.

Once Betty had seen him slip a half dollar into the boy's hand for this trifling service, and it slipped across her mind how she had walked clear down to the city market that morning, leading Jerry by the hand and pushing June in her baby carriage, in order to save three cents a head on lettuce, and to trade with the butcher who always "threw in" a soup bone.

This was dining at the Thomas Peyton, Seniors'. Dinner at the Thomas Peyton, Juniors', was a very different matter.

Sometimes, of course, the Wednesday evenings went easily and smoothly and were an all-around pleasure. They would always have been easier if they had not been made such "company" affairs. When big, blustering, jolly Father Peyton dropped in around noontime on a busy day, Betty would gayly set him down at one corner of the kitchen table and let him share Jerry's bread-and-milk or scrambled eggs and sugar cookies. But Mrs. Peyton, with her smart clothes, her well-groomed, obvious prosperity, always put her daughter-in-law on her mettle. So Wednesday evenings there was chilled grapefruit or oyster cocktail to start with, and salad with thin cheese wafers, an elaborate dessert, and coffee in the wedding-present demi-tasse cups to finish off with. And with a six-room house and two babies to take care of, a regular weekly dinner party occasionally becomes something of a strain.

There was the week, for instance, when the washerwoman, due to arrive every other Monday, was sick and recovered only in time to appear unexpectedly.

little late on Wednesday. The washerwoman was a popular person, the only one of her calling in the suburb, and Betty knew that if she sent her back to-day she might refuse to come altogether in the future. This alternative was too dark to chance. So Mrs. Lily White stayed, keeping the kitchen in a state of steamy disorder which took the curl out of Betty's hair and the gaiety out of her disposition.

At four o'clock, Betty, hot and tired, had just slipped a lemon pie, white-topped and fluffy, into the gas oven to brown the meringue, when a crash from the porch brought the sudden stopping of breath that all mothers of babies know. June's carriage, with June in it, had blown off the steps, tumbling sideways into a mass of shrubbery five feet below. There was an ominous stillness, not a frightened whimper from the baby as Betty, trembling with fright, rushed out upon the empty porch.

As a matter of fact, June was not hurt in the slightest. She was sitting up in her tip-tilted carriage among the bare branches, looking about with an air of puzzled, quizzical interest. It took some time for Betty to assure herself that her little daughter was really quite unharmed.

In the meantime, of course, the fluffy-topped lemon pie burned black.

There was nothing to do but to make another alone toward five, one eye on the clock and the other on the roast Jerry, left alone in the living room, proved to be keeping suspiciously quiet because he had turned on the gas log and was enjoying the smell. Oh, every housekeeper knows the kind of day it was!

FATHER PEYTON arrived at six o'clock and supervised Jerry's supper, while Betty slipped upstairs to change her dress. Her hair, which she tried to keep wavy, sagged limply over her forehead, but there was no time to help that. She daubed a bit of powdered rouge on each tired-looking cheek, hardly stopping to see that it landed anywhere near the places where the roses of youth are supposed to bloom. Then back to the kitchen.

"Hello, Betts, old girl!" It was Tom arriving, big, genial bundle laden, by way of the back door. "Say, was it grapefruit or grapefruit you wanted me to bring up from Cellini's? Oh, gee, I'm sorry! I couldn't remember for the life of me when I got there; I wish we had a phone. Gee, I'm awfully sorry!"

"Never mind, I'll manage." Betty's voice was tired, but determinedly good-tempered.

Tom was trotting back and forth to the dining room, filling the wedding-present goblets, distributing butter balls when his mother arrived.

"Oh, I do hope I haven't kept you waiting, Betty. I had no idea it would take the car so long to get out here. I was late leaving downtown, though. I stopped in at Celeste's to et a marcel, and I was tired. Once I get into a beauty parlor when I'm tired I'm lost. I let them do anything they suggest to me. They gave me an oil manicure—isn't that rich?—and a muscle lift, whatever that may be. Honestly, I think Mamie O'Grady, or whatever Celeste's real name is, sits up nights to think up new names for old treatments. "This one must be a dandy," her husband assured her allantly. "You're blooming like a peony; isn't she, Tom?" "Like two peonies," Tom agreed. "Mostly rouge," Mrs. Peyton gayly admitted. She could afford such admissions, knowing well that the skin under the rouge was as fine and fresh as a girl's.

BETTY, turning the gas flame low under the soup kettle, heard the conversation through the open kitchen door with a queer feeling of things being grotesquely reversed. It would seem more natural for the forties to be concerned with cups and workaday matters, for the twenties to be bantering with the men about beauty secrets.

Across the dinner table Betty faced her mother-in-law with a twinge of envious resentment. Mrs. Peyton's delicately shaped and shining nails made Betty keep her own hands under the table as much as possible, it was so evident how long it had been since she had given them even a hasty manicure. Her mother's freshly brushed hair swept back in listening waves to disclose her tiny white coral earrings.

"I don't believe I've had time to look at my back hair with a hand mirror a dozen times since Jerry was born," Betty thought rebelliously.

As the dinner progressed, Mrs. Peyton chattered gayly about the new play they had seen the night before, about the new book that everybody was reading; she told of a funny man who had been in the office that morning to assure his dog, she described with humor and spirit the university football game to which their friends, the Galts, had taken her and her husband the Saturday afternoon before. Betty, to whom university football games seemed part of a gay, irresponsible past, inexpressibly remote from her present workaday existence, listened politely. The feeling of things being grotesquely twisted grew stronger and stronger. A stranger overhearing the conversation from the next room would undoubtedly have believed that Mrs. Peyton was the daughter, Betty the mother. For a bitter instant Betty wondered, even seeing the two together, the stranger might not still labor under the same delusion.

AFTER dinner, Tom washed the dishes and Father Peyton dried them, ordering Betty into the easiest chair in the living room to rest. "But first, go see what I've got in my coat pocket, Betsy," he called, balancing two cups and saucers in each hand and departing kitchenward.

Betty found a big box of her favorite glacé fruits. That was Father Peyton.

It was never that Mrs. Peyton was deliberately unkind. In her way, she was more than kind. But it was a way that Betty sometimes found it hard to appreciate, a way whose selfish thoughtlessness seemed at times as hard to overlook as downright unkindness.

For instance, there was the time that June was born. June, though now adored, had not been very welcome. Jerry had been only a little over a year old and Tom had been out of a job. He was an excellent draftsman and could get in with another architectural firm, of course, but it might take a little time. And in the meantime there was the relentless march of expense, unavoidable, immediate.

"If I can get a high-school girl to come in afternoons maybe I can get along without a nurse after the first four or five days," Betty had suggested during one of their worried discussions.

"You're going to have a nurse as long as you need one," said Tom grimly, "if I have to go back and apologize to old Caxley."

"Oh, Tom, you can't do that! You were absolutely right. You can't go back and apologize to that great bully."

But Tom decided that, under the circumstances, he could, and he did. He was taken back in his old position and Betty's trained nurse stayed the traditional sixteen days. But Tom's humiliation rankled with Betty.

The morning after June's safe arrival the motor delivery van of the city's smartest shop stopped in front of the Junior Peytons' and deposited a gift for her. It was a bassinet, and it was marked "With much love for June and June's mother, from June's grandmother."

It was the most beautiful bassinet Betty had ever seen, ivory white on silent, rubber-tired wheels. It had little carved insets at the sides and a hood all shirred lace and ribbon. It was lined and tufted with apple-blossom satin; there were fine little hemstitched sheets, the softest of wool blankets and a white silk, pink-tied comforter; the little pillow was elaborately hand embroidered. Tom, dashing out home during his noon hour to see his wife and daughter, whistled through his teeth in appreciation.

"Some bed, isn't it! Say, it makes the rest of the furniture look like something we picked up at a rummage sale."

Well, young lady," bending over his sleeping daughter, "you're starting out life in style anyway." A little card dangled among the frills of the bassinet's hood and Tom pulled it out. "Hello, they forgot to take off the price tag. Mother'd be sore as a crab." Of course he should have tossed the tag carelessly into the wastebasket without looking at it, but Tom was human. "Whew!" He passed it over to his wife. A hundred and eighty-five dollars!

The nurse was downstairs having her luncheon. Tom and Betty were alone. They looked at the unnecessary apple-blossom daintiness, then at each other. Both were thinking of a hundred and eighty-five dollars in terms of grim necessities.

THE pink-and-white bassinet might have served as a symbol for all of Mrs. Peyton's gifts and kindnesses. They were all expensive, exquisitely tasteful, and as impractical for the Junior Peytons as a white satin bow on a wheelbarrow. There was the luxurious Chinese house robe that she gave Tom—poor Tom!—who had decided to wear his shabby overcoat for one more winter; the real lace fan Betty had admired in a shop window—as one admires the moon without the slightest desire to have it in one's own bureau drawer; the season tickets for the symphonies, which half the time the Junior Peytons could not use because they could not afford to hire a girl to stay with the babies.

Then there was Betty's diamond and platinum bar pin, a thing of finely cut, sparkling loveliness and almost wicked extravagance.

There were times when Betty hated the diamond and platinum pin. Some way she came to connect Tom's hard work and shabbiness with this expensive trinket of hers and often, as she was pinning it on her blouse, tears of yearning tenderness for her gay, boyish husband would come smarting to her eyes, and the blue-white stones would ray and sparkle through the mist as though they were mocking her with their useless, expensive beauty. It seemed almost disloyal to Tom for her to own this glittering thing, whose cost would balance all the extra money he could earn in a year, and pay for all the really necessary things he was going without. And yet it was Tom's mother who had given it to her!

There were times when Betty disliked pretty, kindly meaning, luxurious Mrs. Peyton with a hurt, contemptuous dislike.

IT WAS not one of these times, however—the snowy afternoon when she walked up Hartley Street, through the storm and into the building where Peyton and Peyton had an office. The sharp wind had stung her cheeks to scarlet, but the flame in her eyes burned from a deep inward exultation. Betty was on top of the world. She had found a way.

Mrs. Peyton, at Betty's knock, turned from the window where she had been watching the storm. "Oh, hello, Betts!" she exclaimed. "I was just waiting for time to go up for a fitting on my new coat. I'm making them cut the sleeves over; I think even a fur coat ought to fit you somewhere near, don't you? Come on up with me, and then we'll go somewhere for tea afterward."

"I do, and I think tea would be a lovely celebration," said Betty, dropping into a wicker armchair and slipping out of her own rough-and-ready coat.

"Good! And what in especial are we celebrating?"

"I'VE GOT TO TELL YOU SOMETHING. PLEASE TAKE OFF YOUR COAT, BETTY, AND STAY"

(Continued on Page 191)

Fulla-Pep!

By
PHYLLIS DUGANNE

Illustrations by
Frederic A. Anderson

WELL, I'm not such an old-fashioned antique, am I?" asked Virginia.
"Of course not." Jimmy Lyman took off his collar and stretched his neck, rolled his head luxuriously from side to side in the manner of men who wear stiff collars in hot weather. His wife regarded him, an alert expression in her brown eyes, like a puzzled puppy pricking up its ears at some suspicious object. She stood by the window, unconscious, yet not quite so sublimely unconscious as he, of the charming picture she made, outlined against the yellow curtains. She was a tall, slim girl with dark hair and brown eyes; pretty, yet more than that, for Virginia Lyman had that elusive charm by which homely women so often vanquish attractive ones.

"I believe you do think of me as the old wife and mother," she accused her husband.

Jimmy looked up vaguely. "What's the matter with you, Ginia?" He continued undressing methodically for a moment. "Going to stand there all night?"

She shook her head, but when she moved it was towards her dressing table, where she sat down and leaned her chin in the cup of her hands. They had dined at the home of Jimmy's partner, a man whom they had long accepted as a companion, a contemporary. Jimmy had been as surprised as she at the appearance of Arthur Talbot's daughter. Elaine Talbot was only fifteen years old, but she was the fifteen of the twentieth century, chic, sophisticated, her chin lifted and her lashes dropped in an eternal attitude of telling the world.

After she had whirled out of the living room in the company of an excessively young young man Jimmy had laughed. And as he leaned back in the armchair, recalling moments of Virginia's own flapperhood—the costume dance at which bell after bell that decorated her pierrette costume had been pruned by masculine jackknives until, at midnight, she looked like the flushed, happy beggar maid of Cophetua; the days when she used to shock all feminine Hendon and thrill its masculine population by never wearing simultaneously two hair ribbons of the same color; the August afternoon when she had rid herself forever of an unpleasing suitor by marching him on a twenty-mile walk—she put her hand up to her heavy, dark hair and wondered how she had overlooked the white patches that obviously must appear there.

"Well, I suppose it's all comparative," she remarked, more to herself than to Jimmy. "Once I'd have considered twenty-four the brink of the grave." She turned towards him defiantly. "But I don't see where you come in, you old Diogenes!" She was smiling as she undressed, but there was annoyance behind her smile that her husband was too sleepy to notice.

IN THE morning she leaped out of bed when she heard the rattling of the nursery door, picked up Jimmy Junior and held his thirty pounds high above her head.

"Junior, how old do you think mummie is?" she demanded as he descended rapidly to the crib, breathless and chuckling.

He rolled over and sat up, grinning at her. "A hundred?"

She pushed him back indignantly and piled the pillows on his head. In the dining room she heard Martha setting the table; the smell of coffee drifted from the kitchenette.

"Want your brekky?" As his face appeared from the pile of bedclothes she swooped down and kissed him. "Your faux pas is forgiven, old boy," she said. "After all, you're only three, and you have about as much tact as most of your sex at thirty-three."

Junior looked at her interrogatively.

"What?" he asked.

Hand in hand they crossed to the dining room, with its absurd gayly painted furniture. Virginia straightened the white cloth, rearranged the dishes and silver with a humorous glance at the maid through her eyelashes.

"My land, Mis' Lyman," Martha answered, unperturbed, looking appreciatively at her mistress' tumbled hair and flushed cheeks, "you don't look a day over eighteen."

Virginia shrugged; her mood of the previous night was deep in a letter, her white arms resting on the cloth, the wide sleeves of her chiffon negligee dropping from her elbows.

When Jimmy appeared at the head of the table she was deep in a letter, her white arms resting on the cloth, the wide sleeves of her chiffon negligee dropping from her elbows.

"Listen to this, old thing," she interrupted him suddenly, pushing his newspaper down on a pile of buttered toast. "It's from Pam. Wait a sec." She turned the pages of the pale pink note paper, disfigured by a round writing in violet ink. "There! 'The Wentworths have rented their house to some people named Tilden, and they have one daughter, Theodora, but she makes everyone call her Teddy, who's perfectly awful. We were all having such a lovely summer until she came, and now she's always taking the boys away. She's got Coby Dana now. Of course Coby's always been the kind of boy who swam with one girl for a whole week and then played tennis with another all the next. But now he never pays attention to anyone except her. She wears two stockings that aren't the same color, a black one and a white one, just like a costume party. She's always doing the silliest things. I wish you were only a year older than me, or something, so that you could stop her. Mrs. Evans was at the house the other day and she and mother were talking about Teddy and how when you were young you used to take boys away from girls like that. Mother says — That's all that's interesting, I guess."

Jimmy laughed. "Time softens everything," he said. "Now you're being hailed as the defender of the virtuous, Ginia, instead of the young Bolshevik and home wrecker."

Virginia's spoon clattered to the floor. "Jimmy Lyman, you old gorilla, you—you make me tired!"

"What now, queen of my breakfast table?"

She grinned reluctantly. "Time softens everything!" she quoted scornfully. "So many years ago, when I was young and charming, Junior, come here!" Her son walked uncertainly to her. "Junior, what's mummie full of?"

A gleam of joy crept into his solemn blue eyes. It was the trick that always brought down the house, a trick much superior to mere paddy-caking or standing on his head. "Fulla-pep!" he shrieked, his fat cheeks almost exploding as he brought out the word. As his father chuckled, he planted his legs farther apart and continued: "Free blind mouse—in the tree top—see how they run —"

VIRGINIA turned her eyes to her husband. "Junior needs the sea air," she said reflectively. "I think I'll go down to Hendon, Jimmy."

James Lyman held up his hands. "Oh, female woman! And one week ago when I was pleading with you to go you couldn't bear the separation or something. Said that if I had to stay in the city —"

"Well, that was a week ago," she answered quite logically. "I guess I can stagger along without you. And, anyway, I think Pam needs me more than you do."

Ever since drinking his first cup of coffee Jimmy had been watching his wife. He had not lived with Virginia for four years in vain; he was perfectly aware that something was up. Now a light broke in his eyes, solemn blue eyes like his son's, and he grinned at her across the table. "Oh, Virginia!" he said. "Going to break into the younger set?"

"Why not? I know you think I'm fighting off old age with every breath, but I bet —" She paused.

He roared at her earnestness. "You can't fool me," he said. "Something has displeased you." He looked at her unsmiling face and scratched his head thoughtfully. "Seriously, Virginia, are you planning —"

"I don't know that I'll mind leaving you so much," she interrupted him sweetly. "Now go and bread-win, like a dear old thing. I have lots to do."

For a few moments after he had gone she sat quietly at the table, fingering her sister's letter. Finally she got up and went into the nursery, where her son was playing with his blocks, waiting for the nurse to take him out.

"Junior, take a deep breath and consider deeply," she addressed him. "Much hangs on your decision. Be cautious as becomes your sex. Now then—ready?"

HIS eyes watched hers; he smiled uncertainly. It was rare that he understood anything his mother said to him.

"All set?"

"What?"

"All right. Now then, boy—what's mummie full of?"

Relief shone from his eyes. "Fulla—pep!" he proclaimed triumphantly.

Virginia laughed. "All right, son; the die is cast. We'll show 'em, won't we?" She pushed open the door. "Martha! Ask the janitor to bring up my trunks this afternoon."

Mrs. Garrison rocked back and forth comfortably while her grandson, clutched to her breast, munched a cookie and looked up at her peacefully.

"I don't see why I'm ever surprised at anything you do, Virginia," she said. "But after all your letters saying you couldn't come, to have you pop down like this without even a telegram! Well!"

Virginia laughed and shrugged her shoulders. "I'm the old nut, you know," she said lightly.

Her mother's eyes held the mixed disapproval and admiration with which she always regarded her older daughter. Virginia was sitting in the Gloucester hammock, still in her light gray traveling suit. "My! It's good to be here!" she said, smiling under her mother's scrutiny.

"It's good to have you. I'd about given up hoping." Mrs. Garrison leaned over to pull Junior more closely to her. "Won't your father and Pam be surprised?"

"Probably not as surprised as you are," said Virginia. "However"—she looked about at the landscape affectionately—"where is Pam?"

"Over at the Danas' court. They're playing some sort of tournament. Wait until you see the children, Virginia; they're as big as you are. Little Coburn Dana —" She hesitated.

"I've heard about little Coby," her daughter returned laughingly. "Regular he-vamp, isn't he?"

MRS. GARRISON winced. "His mother says he's simply girl crazy," she said solemnly. "And they're only children!"

Her eyes dropped from her daughter's grin to her grandson, and a bewildered expression clouded their mildness.

"It's so hard to realize that you're married and a mother, Virginia. I suppose Pam—but Pam is only a little girl."

"I imagine she'd rather resent that," Virginia jumped to her feet. "I think I'll wander across the hills and find her," she said. "I have my old room, I suppose?"

"No one else will ever have it, Virginia."

Virginia leaned and kissed her, a wave of tenderness sweeping over her. It was only recently that she had found sympathy towards her mother's gentle sentimentalities, had learned not to make the quick, destructive retorts that trembled on the tip of her tongue. If her mother wanted to keep her room, with all the absurd young-girl trappings of discarded dance programs and college pennants, intact, she should be allowed to do so. She hurried up the stairs and threw open the door. She had returned to it several times since her marriage, but never before alone, and she stood leaning against the closed door, looking about. The funny little painted dressing table with the burnt-wood design that Harry Wentworth had so painstakingly made for her still stood against the wall between the two windows, its short leg supplemented by a wad of paper, the oval mirror into which she had peered so many times — She remembered staring there at her reflection after Jimmy had kissed her for the first time.

Her eyes were bright as they leaped from one to another of the familiar pictures—a print of the young Queen Louisa of Prussia that she had so adored as a girl, "The Broken Pitcher," a small, green-framed water color of Robin Hood, with his brown eyes meeting hers as roguishly as they had when she was seventeen.

She undressed quickly and flung open the largest of the bags. When, fresh from her bath, she took the familiar seat before the dressing table, she laughed aloud at her reflection. She brushed her hair and arranged it carefully, fastened green earrings to her lobes. From another bag she pulled out a woven ribbon hat of brilliant green, a dipping, floppy hat that she pounded and pulled into shape. Last of all, she shook out her white organdie dress and laced the crisp green ribbons. From the mirror she turned, as she had turned through all her young girlhood, to flirt with the picture of Robin Hood. It had been an established ceremony with her, a tuning up of the orchestra.

HIS brown eyes met hers insolently, and she tilted her chin. "Hello, old boy," she said softly. The ends of his trim mustache seemed to quiver slightly. "When I think of all the things you know about me!" She wrinkled her nose in a little grimace. "So long!"

She was still grinning to herself when she joined her mother on the piazza.

"Junior's things are in the brown bag," she said lightly. "I carried it into the nursery. You might tumble him in bed for a nap pretty soon, like a dear." She looked at them fondly. "It is good to be here, mother."

At the foot of the path she broke off a long branch of elderberry, stripped it of its branches as she walked along the winding road toward the Dana house. As she mounted the hill that rose above the tennis court, a crisp green-and-white figure moving through the sunlight over the emerald grass, she was busily engaged in tearing the long strips of bark.

The group bunched at one side of the court looked up as she approached. She reached the wire fencing that inclosed it, turned the corner and crossed towards the benches.

Suddenly Pamela sprang to her feet. "Virginia Garrison!"

"Even so, my child," They stood for a moment in embrace, then turned and crossed slowly to the others, arms interlaced.

Pamela's smooth blond hair rose an inch or two above Virginia's hat, the soft rose in the younger girl's cheeks faded beside the brilliant coloring of her brunette sister.

"Why, there's Coby Dana!"

THE slender boy in white flannels who was playing on the court hesitated a moment before he crossed to them. Virginia was fully aware that it was as criminal to speak to a player as to converse with the motorman or feed and annoy the animals, and she was as fully confident that she could get away with it.

"Hello, Virginia!" Coby held out his hand and she smiled up into his eyes. She was immeasurably relieved to find him several inches the taller. "When did you get down?"

"Just a few minutes ago; but I couldn't wait to see you all." Her eyes left his face for a moment to take in the interested group at the side. "Run back to your game; I mustn't keep you. Don't you present me with the iron pansy or something for such behavior?"

"I think we'll forgive you," Coby answered, with the slightest stress on the "you."

"I'm sure you will," Virginia returned, accenting the pronoun as imperceptibly—and as flagrantly—as he had done. "Come over and talk to me when you've finished; I want to hear lots of things."

She smiled again, and again their eyes caught for an instant. "Gee, I'm the shameless old thing!" she said to herself as she and Pam crossed to the bench.

(Continued on Page 135)

"GINIA! THE THINGS I'VE BEEN HEARING ABOUT YOU!"

"THEY WILL NEVER SETTLE DOWN IN CRANBROOK. THERE IS NOTHING HERE FOR SUCH MEN AS YOU HAVE MADE THEM. THEY BELONG TO THE WORLD," HE SAID, GIVING HER A LOOK

The Pageant Widow

By CORRA HARRIS

Illustrations by Edward L. Chase

MRS. HARPETH was a widow, scarcely to be distinguished from others of this class, so often and always favorably mentioned in the Scriptures, until 1917, when she became, you may say, the top sergeant of a small, efficient, but widely scattered company in the United States Army. Her advancement to this rank was deserved, but irregular and recognized only by the members of this company. She missed the uniform and the citation "for gallant and meritorious service" by an accident of gender and other imperative duties. Her service record, therefore, will not be found in the annals of our Army but in this story, which will pass as fiction, although it is veracious and subject to proof.

When the Reverend John Harpeth passed out of the ministry into that Farther Region where there is no more preaching nor taking of collections, he left his widow, Fanny Harpeth, a "home" and three yearling boys to bring up. This happened in 1910. The widow lived in her little house, which was set upon the highest hill in the small and dingy town of Cranbrook. She let her poverty so shine up there that no one could mistake what kind of poverty it was. That is to say, it glistened and bloomed. It was whitewashed in places and green where it should be green. The house kept its paint because there had never been enough paint on it to peel off. The windows looked out upon every passer-by as if they believed in a blue sky, no matter what kind of day it was—and very personally at the stars, no matter what kind of night it was. They were not windows at all, but the clear eyes of a clean house where everything was worn out, scrubbed, dusted and in order.

THERE was, in fact, something perky, independent to the point of triumph about poverty on this hill with the house sitting to the front of it, like the persistent forelock on a bald man's head, thin but smartly brushed.

The "something" was the widow herself. She was a small woman, with an air—different airs at different periods of the day. She was very aggressive early in the morning. She was cooking breakfast, she was clearing away the dishes with a swiftness that made the dishes' teeth rattle. She had the broom, she was spying for dust in the corners. The broom might be seen whisking in and out of the door when you could not see the widow herself, but you knew that she was behind it by the furious clean sweep it made. She was never in a good humor until the house was in order and the boys off to school, each with a lunch in his pocket. Years later, when they had finished with schools and spelling lessons, she amused herself calculating the number of lunches she had prepared for them during this period. It reached far into the thousands, and included tens of thousands of biscuits with sugar spread on the butter.

THE boys gauged the maternal weather by the way her skirts swished. During this early morning period when these skirts flew after her like sails in a storm they were good little boys, doing their chores and asking no indulgences. This was no time for insubordination or any slackness whatsoever when the breakers of her temper rolled high. When the widow flew out of the kitchen door in the direction of a certain tree which produced singularly tough keen switches it was too late to retrieve the past. She would thrash one, or more, or all of them for a transgression which she would overlook later in the day after her stirring duties had been performed.

Then the weather of her spirit changed. She was still industrious, but calm. She had exchanged the broom for the needle. Sewing soothed her. The three boys straggling up the hill after school always found her seated before the fire if the day was cold, or behind her flowering boxes on the porch if it was summer weather, like a small, prim providence wearing a black dress, a lace collar and a thimble on her finger. They might ask whatsoever they would now, believing that they should receive it. And they usually did.

She was thirty-six years old at this time, not good-looking, but vaguely beautiful. This was in the nature of a miracle when you consider the facts of her countenance. She had fair hair which curled in her youth and would curl again, if she ever gave it the chance to do so. Her skin was pale, with the pallor of a tired blond. A narrow brow, not deeply wrinkled, but neatly and delicately lined, as if she had done this herself in order to mean what she meant, but not too harshly. In repose her mouth was a sad thing, but when she smiled her smile was imperishably young. Her eyes were deeply set beneath skimpy brows. They were blue, but could be gray and much darker if she had to do something that she could not really do but must do it, or if she had to say something which was beyond her to think but must be thought. Her expression produced the whole effect of beauty, feminine sweetness and that pale austerity which came from having done her duty for a long time.

There was a rumor to the effect that Mr. Harpeth had left a small sum of money besides the home. But this was merely a rumor which was never confirmed, because the widow evaded the most sympathetic inquiries concerning her financial affairs. Cranbrook folk decided that she would be obliged to take the boys out of school after the death of their father. And what Cranbrook has never been able to figure out to this day is how she kept the boys in school and paid her expenses. I am myself in the dark on this latter point. But there is proof in the Scriptures that the Lord himself frequently manages the financial affairs of widows who belong to the scriptural class. In no other way can we account for the singular pin-point prosperity of the widow during this period.

NOT even her thrift could have been equal to this situation, although she was so frugal that she took the flowers up by the roots from Mr. Harpeth's grave every autumn and kept them in her own sunny windows until the following spring, to save their delicate lives and the expense of buying other flowers for this grave. She was determined that her dear John should have blooming plants above him during the summer, but when it was cold he must do the best he could beneath the frost and snow. She was sensible about everything.

She was really at the head of a big business now, which has never been regarded as a business, although it requires more different kinds of ability and valor than it does to conduct a great corporation. She had no capital, only the raw material out of which three men must be made. And she was not dismayed.

She had no ambition, only a sense of duty. She had no time to autograph her deeds or to think of her own excellence. She was simply very busy doing what must be done. She could never see one of the boys idle without thinking of something he must do. She nagged these youngsters from morning until night. They must do this and do that. She saw to it that they washed behind their ears. They were all left-handed; therefore she compelled them to use their right hands until they became ambidextrous. She shed the dollars and even the quarters they earned to help with expenses. But what remained after this excess-profits tax was levied and collected they spent manfully without owing account to her. She kept them off the streets of the town and permitted them to court malaria in the near-by creek all summer.

"Boys are amphibious," she said. "If my washpan was big enough to drown in I should have no trouble getting them to bathe. They do not hate to be clean, they only hate little water in a little pan."

She allowed them to fight among themselves like growing others every day in the week except on Sundays. "They took off a lot of plus that way," she said (which was the most effective use of the word "plus" I ever heard); but on Sabbath Day they must keep the peace.

HE was determined to give them a working knowledge of the Ten Commandments. She harped on these commandments and on the multiplication table to the exclusion of all subsidiary information. The multiplication table fitted their business in this present world; and the commandments redressed them for any world.

"The Beatitudes are for Christians," she said, "who know how to submit to the inevitable, but boys are not Christians. They are cheerful young animals with no natural moral scruples. The best you can do is to teach them not to steal, not to lie, if you can; to earn what they want and not let what belongs to another."

She held to the simplicities and was a great teacher. She made her own proverbs, because Solomon was no kin to her sons and could not possibly have had them or this age in mind when he wrote his proverbs. She insisted that Solomon was a literary man, but not a good man, and that his wisdom was bitter, depressing, like the dregs in the cup of a dead old age.

Her second son, William, was a brilliant, willful, hot-tempered lad. She addressed most of her platitudes to him. They flew off him like sparks from an anvil and scorched the other boys. "Silence is the necessity of fools and the luxury of wise men. Keep your mouth shut and your eyes open," she would say when William had said too much.

She continually reminded them of the open doors to success. "It is not the opportunities that you do not have, but the ones you fail to meet that ruin you," she warned them.

She could make these little marching sentences with no effort at all. It was marvelous. Sometimes she said a really great thing. They were in the midst of life, but she was concerned that they should learn not to fear death. "Death is not terrible. It is only a change of season in the almighty soul of man," she would say.

Years later, one day in a shell hole on a battlefield in France, one of her sons repeated that saying to himself as one recites a litany.

She was also a biographer of no mean ability. The Harpeth boys grew up in the faith that they sprang from a brave and illustrious family, although there was not one page in history to prove this; so much the worse for history! She taught them that their forefathers had been great men without exception—and got away with it. The poor woman catered to their young, bloodthirsty imaginations by dwelling upon the war records of these forefathers. Presently she gathered the red fruits of her eloquence.

After the Harpeth boys finished school they went to work. The widow became slightly but obviously prosperous at once. She declared a dividend on her business for the first time. She entertained sedate visions of honor and ease. She was, in fact, about to dissolve partnership with poverty and thrift, go out of business and settle down in that pleasant, innocuous desuetude of being provided for, like other women, by her mankind.

THEN came the Great War. The three Harpeth boys were the first to volunteer for service from Cranbrook. The widow, along with other mothers in this country, saw the plans so carefully made for her sons swept away in the lurid flames of this war. She stared at the images she carried of them in her heart as prominent successful men as if these were already pictures of the dead.

She saw herself bereaved of them in her old age when she should need their companionship and support as they had needed her in their childhood and youth.

When Cranbrook heard that the Harpeth boys had volunteered for service there was sympathy for the widow and discreet condemnation of her sons. They need not have volunteered; only one was within the draft age, and he might have claimed exemption as the sole support of a widowed mother. It was practically desertion.

Mrs. Clanton went to call on her as one calls upon a person grievously afflicted. She was herself the only really prominent woman in Cranbrook, also a widow, rich, and by the same token she was not in the habit of calling on Mrs. Harpeth. She found the little widow sitting behind her flower boxes on the porch with her hands folded. "There is so little to do, now that the boys are gone," she said simply, as if anyone must wonder why she should be idle.

"Yes, I know how you must feel," Mrs. Clanton replied. "At first I was anxious about Robert," she went on, referring to her own son; "but fortunately some friends in Washington took care of that for me. He has a splendid clerical position and the rank of captain. It is the best thing that could have happened. He needed to get out of this little hole of a town."

DURING this speech Mrs. Harpeth regarded her with curious attention, as a person does who is slowly returning to consciousness after a terrific shock. As a matter of fact she did not really see Mrs. Clanton. She was thinking of something. She was coming up out of her dust of fear and defeat, a little dingy image of victory.

And Mrs. Clanton did not suspect that she was witnessing a miracle. "Boys are so impulsive," she began again. "They are swept off their feet by the excitement and enthusiasm for war. They do not know what it means. They do not think. That is what happened to your sons. You must not blame them too much."

"I do not blame them at all," the widow replied. "Well, of course you would not; mothers never do. Still we know how you must feel, and you have our sympathy."

"You do not know how I feel," the widow retorted, sitting primly erect. "I brought my sons up under a discipline as rigid as that of our Army. They have been taught the obligations of manhood, labor, thrift, honor, courage. Their home has simply been the barracks of their youth. They have always lived, you may say, on army rations, the plainest food. They were already soldiers, tough and brave. It is natural, inevitable, that they should have volunteered."

"Well, I had no idea you felt that way —" Mrs. Clanton began.

"You cannot know how I feel," the widow clipped in. "It is tremendous. I have crowns on my head. I am a pageant in honor of my sons."

(Continued on Page 116)

SHE HAD NO CAPITAL, ONLY THE RAW MATERIAL OUT OF WHICH THREE MEN MUST BE MADE. AND SHE WAS NOT DISMAYED

The Easter People

THE approach to old Salem of the old South is commonplace enough. Thirty miles of motoring roll away beneath our wheels. Prosperous fields to right and left spread to woody reaches that circle the horizon. The hesitant leaves of an early spring blur the stark outlines of trunk and branch. Gnarled orchard boughs are all in milk-white flower. Against dusky wood spaces the Judas tree hangs its veils of deep pink, and the dogwood is just beginning to show the glint of silver disks. On the railroad parallel to us a train thunders by. There is nothing anywhere to indicate that our machine is carrying us swiftly out from our dusty everyday lives straight into the living past. We dip down a slope, then climb again, and abruptly we are in another world—we are in old Salem. I shall never again forget that the word Salem means peace.

After two heavy, gray days, the sun, at noon of Good Friday, comes riding forth clear of all cloud. The boxwood in old gardens is crisp and glistening. House walls of ancient brick, freshened by the rain, yield their full of mellow color. Almost at once as we enter the town I am aware of an atmosphere vibrant with expectancy. Windows are being polished and dooryards clipped, and faces lifted to us brighten with unspoken welcome. In every recurrent springtime, thousands and thousands of visitors push into the old city, and at every Eastertide by some strange contagion of reverence Moravian Salem has the power to subdue these alien crowds to the very spirit of its own piety. Such is the alchemy of influence possessed by people who have made Easter the pivot of all the year, the very heart of all their faith and all their conduct.

We turn to our right at the timeworn square, a stretching rectangle of towering water-oaks, crossed by diagonal paths. We are facing the long, unbroken brick façade that forms the entire east side of the square. In the middle is the academy with its high white pillars, and at the south the Sisters' House with its two rows of dormer windows. At the north stands the old home church, with its staunch, ancient walls, dull red beneath bright ivy, its hooded door, its unfailing clock face in the gable beneath the domed white belfry. At the church we turn northward and get out of our car to search for the little cottage where we are to have rooms. Our motor cannot go farther, for all cars are barred from the long, quiet avenue that lies before us. The towering ancient trees that gave Cedar Avenue its name are themselves now dead, and their place is taken by slim young poplars freshly green with spring.

Solemnity Without Sadness

CEDAR AVENUE is to-day a broad, white, graveled path, lined by the swaying green shafts of the poplars and bordered on our left by a low stone wall and on our right by a high picket fence, almost covered by ivy, and broken by white-arched gateways on which, above the green-leaved pillars, are blazoned triumphant Easter texts. Within those portals, in sunshine that is dappled by the shadows of cedar and boxwood, stretches row after row of little, flat, white gravestones, all exactly alike.

Here is no distinction of persons or of families, but merely of groups, married men together, married women, single men and boys and boy babies, single women and girls and girl babies. This green spot is the center of Salem; it is the center of the Moravian faith. This is the graveyard where, near and dear and instant in the memory of the living, the dead lie, asleep in sunny peace.

Nestling close to the graves is the little cottage, cheery with nodding tulips and bright hyacinths, where we are to stay with Miss Dorcas Reitzer and her niece, Miss Bertha. Both are of old Moravian stock, tracing their ancestry back to German Herrnhut of 1722. Miss Dorcas is eighty; her feet are slow with rheumatism, but her mind and heart are alert for one more exultant Easter. There is but one way to know any creed, and that is by knowing the people who have lived it. It is because of the welcome in the little gray cottage, the hospitality I found waiting for every stranger in the quiet old square—in the bishop's home, in the Sisters' House, in the church, in the school—that I have wished to record one stranger's impression of a Salem Easter and of the Moravian faith.

I wish that I might have been present for all the church services of this reverent preparation week. Day by day the congregation has heard read the "Acts of Monday," the "Acts of Tuesday," and so on, the services consisting of the reading of the gospel record constantly interspersed with the rich singing of the old chorals. The afternoon service of Good Friday is my first introduction to the Moravian liturgy. I am familiar with the ceremony of palled altar and penitential abasement and despair, but this Moravian Good Friday is without a hint of gloom. Grown-ups and bright-faced children crowd the church, all quiet, yet with a stir of cheery friendliness. The organ rolls solemn yet not sad. The choir files in simply, and quite as simply the bishop in ordinary dress takes his seat below them, close to his people. My first impression of the Moravian service is of informality combined with profound, spontaneous reverence, and the second is its deep, pervasive joyousness. Is it this last that has kept burning so clear the lamp of the spirit in the bishop's eyes in spite of his eighty years?

As the bishop reads that old, cruel record of the lots cast for the seamless robe, and of the brutal spear, I perceive the strong triumph by which the light of Easter makes radiant even the blackness of the crucifixion. In all Moravian services congregational singing of chorals that are perhaps centuries old is the chief element. Even through the slow roll of the Good Friday hymns there seems to run as undercurrent the strong pean of the coming resurrection, so that the image before one's vision is not so much the torturing cruelty of the cross as the beauty of a willing sacrifice. The singing of selected stanzas of familiar hymns is as spontaneous as the informal Sunday night singing of some family group, and it is as if the bishop's prayer were uttered by one member of a great family fellowship—"Into Thy widespread arms, stretched out upon the cross, receive us all. Amen."

We pour out from the old hooded doorway down the much-trodden stone steps into the flooding westward sun shine. Many people go toward the graveyard, as if for a brief, passing greeting to those gentle, sunny mounds. A backward glance at the old church shows the weather vane arrow and glittering ball and the steadfast clock face beneath, all ashine. For more than a hundred years the have never failed to give back the unfailing sunset. Free that white belfry is always sounded the death announcement made triumphant in sonorous music. Either at noon or at fall of evening the trombones will peal forth the old familiar tunes informing the listeners whether it was child or grown-up, man or woman, married or single, that soul to whom, from high in air, the ancient horns blow a "voyage" on its passage skyward.

The Love Feast

THE mood of the afternoon service holds the mind until the evening love feast. We use the word love feast so often flippantly that I did not dream how instantly its deep significance would impress me. I begin to feel the spirit before we go to the church, in the hospitality with which Miss Bertha gathers five of us to accompany her. She gives each of us a little napkin in which we are to cover up the love-feast before when we first receive it. The fragrance of coffee meets us as we enter. Throughout the congregation there runs a low rustle of cordiality. The organ rolls forth slow and solemn beneath a master touch, then suddenly peals in triumph. The choir files in, and following, the bishop and the past take their seats facing behind a snowy table.

The pastor rises and briefly reviews the events of Passion Week, as one by one the services have commemorated them. At last the anguish is finished, he tells us, and to-night we gathered in a quiet garden before a sealed tomb. There is a brief prayer, then a hymn rings out, and at its close the choir begins an anthem, while a door at the side opens and through it, with a reverent decorum that somehow catches at the heart strings, there moves in a file of eight white-clad women some of them girls, some of them silver-headed. They carry great baskets of love-feast buns. The head "diener" serves first the bishop and pastor, and then the buns are distributed throughout the congregation, so quietly that one scarcely hears a rustle of movement throughout the entire church. Noiselessly the white procession passes back, and now comes a line of men carrying trays loaded with straight white mugs of coffee. Just as were the buns, so the mugs are given to each person present. The bun we have folded in our napkin, the mug we hold, for the moment has not arrived for tasting. The whole building is ringing with Watts' deathless stanza:

IN THE DEEP FIREPLACE THE COFFEE IS STILL BOILED FOR THE LOVE FEASTS OF THE PRESENT

When I survey the wondrous cross
On which the Prince of Glory died,
My richest gain I count but loss,
And pour contempt on all my pride.

Then the congregation yields place to the choir, and while a soprano voice soars sweet, telling of that green hill far away, the love feast is eaten. There follows more singing by the people while the elders reënter and collect the empty cups, to the accompaniment of the words:

Let us each for other care,
Each his brother's burden bear;
To Thy church a pattern give,
Showing how believers live.

The bishop rises to make the Good Friday address, but his words are not of death and burial, they are of life and heaven. To the creed which the bishop inherits, God

THE DEAD LIVE; THAT IS THE FUNDAMENTAL OF THE MORAVIAN CREED

Friday is but a transient gloom across the golden triumph of Easter. How many homegoings the bishop must have heard sounded by the trombones from the white belfry! That is why his words dwell so gladly upon our recognitions beyond the grave. We cannot guess, the bishop says, how near even this instant heaven may be. With a sudden flash of inspiration he drives home the love-feast truth: "At this very instant," so he begs each one of us, "pray for the person sitting to your left, the person sitting to your right, that together with you, all three may receive together God's singular blessing needed for each life." By such prayer, each for his neighbor, shall the current of love-feast blessing be strong and unbroken, uniting perhaps with the stream of affection flooding toward us from those passed on who live us still, for what earth-bound brain can fathom—so the bishop's rapt voice questions—the full meaning of those familiar words, "the communion of saints"?

Strangely near the stars seemed to me, near as eyes alight with deathless love, burning bright and clear above us as we stood forth, on that Good Friday evening, into the quiet square. Stars and sun were the lights of Easter on that long-ago Passover, stars that kept watch above a grave "wherein is never man yet laid," sun that saw the victory over the eve that man had never before conquered. Over God's rest, beyond my bedroom window on that Good Friday night, the Easter stars burned steadfast.

It is a sun-flooded Saturday, that of the "Great Sabbath," and astir with preparations. All day long the graveyard is a place of pilgrimage, as I look down from my window at its sunny reaches. The stones on the first green mounds are gray and old, the last are white and fresh, but today, on "Great Sabbath," they will all be scoured clean by loving hands, so that the simple epitaphs will show clear their dates, from 1771 to the present, and with their corded birthplaces of the long-ago dead—Saxony, Denmark, Sweden, Holland, England. In the bright morning breeze of four passes our gate, and we call out to her: "What are you going to do?"

She swings a little gaily as she answers: "Going to the graves." All day long that happy scouring is continued. There are no flowers

THIN THESE PORTALS, IN SUNSHINE THAT IS DAPED BY THE SHADOWS OF CEDAR AND BOXWOOD, REACHES ROW AFTER ROW OF LITTLE, FLAT, WHITE GRAVESTONES, ALL EXACTLY ALIKE

anted on any of the graves, but everywhere cut flowers and ever pieces are being heaped on the grassy mounds. At the foot of every stone is laid a bunch of ivy leaves. No one of the sleepers is forgotten by the living. Three visits that I make to-day emphasize the constant effort of all Moravians to keep alive the spirit and the life of its past. There is no barren extolling of dead days, rather a blending of them with the present, a conscious union with the traditions and the purposes of founders whose wise foresight has been amply proved.

Keeping Alive the Spirit of the Past

OLD Salem tradition continues as recurrent and as freshly green as the grass upon the Easter graves. The dead live; that is the fundamental of the Moravian creed, truth held so absolutely that it ramifies from dogma into every department of daily life, and accounts for the meticulous care with which the records of church and community life have been kept.

The little archive house of Salem is a mine of delight for student of history, being especially rich in human and social chronicles of the founding of this Moravian colony in North Carolina. It was in 1752 that Bishop Spangenberg, deputed by Count Zinzendorf, of Saxony, to select the hundred thousand acres that should comprise the Moravian tract purchased from Lord Granville. It cost Bishop Spangenberg and his companions a dozen weeks of ship and exploration in an unknown wilderness before they discovered a region suited to their purpose. Because it included them of the fertile meadows of their Saxon home, they named it Wachau, Wachovia.

Some months after the region had been thus selected and named, its first colonists set forth. Careful records made that first band of Moravian settlers tell us how they trudged out from Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, on October 8, 1752, twelve "Single Brethren" carefully selected to be pioneers of the wilderness as well as founders of a religious colony—pastor, farmers, carpenters, a baker, a doctor whose ministry was to spread over a radius of a hundred miles.

On Saturday evening, November seventeenth, the little procession—men, horses and one covered wagon—reached the empty cabin which was to be their wilderness shelter. There on that first Saturday night, while, as their own chronicles tell us, the wolves and panthers howled outside the door, they held their first love feast.

I could have lingered long among those carefully labeled chronicles, enshrining so many long-gone human personalities. Salem is a city that never forgets what it owes to its founders, and so in humble human imitation of a divine Easter gesture, rolls away the stone of oblivion that would restrain their resurgent influence. It is a little later in this day and at the scene of their first efforts that those sturdy old builders of the old Wachovian colony come forth from the past to my vision, all quick with life and energy.

It is a ten-mile drive from Salem, not founded until 1766, to Bethabara, or "Oldtown," the first village of Wachovia. Here the early colonists built the sturdy little church, which stands to-day, unchanged inside or out, as it was when consecrated in 1769. Church and parsonage form one building; the parsonage is now a parish house containing the love-feast kitchen; in the deep fireplace the coffee is still boiled for the love feasts of the present, and in the big cupboards the straight white mugs are stacked. Grouped about the church are old houses, their stucco walls a mellow buff against which are massed great green domes of boxwood.

Reverence for Childhood

THE hill-top burying ground of Oldtown, no one who has ever visited it could ever forget. It is the highest point of all the country round, so lofty that its trees served as watch-towers against Indian attack. The great chestnuts and oaks of 1750 still stand sentinel over the little flat, gray stones, hidden deep in grass and blue periwinkle. At the foot of one mighty trunk lies a tiny grave, the oldest grave in Wachovia. It was from a heart strong in deathless Easter hope that the old diarist wrote of the baby girl: "She was gathered in as the first flower in Wachovia by our Heavenly Gardener and her little tenement was sown as the first grain of wheat in this God's acre, which upon this occasion was consecrated."

Moravian creed and custom have always had a peculiar reverence for childhood. The boys and girls seem to grow up into the faith of their fathers as happily and loyally as spring blossoms develop into fruitage. In many a Southern family of to-day, grandmother, mother and daughter have all attended Salem Academy, and still in an unbroken tradition Salem Academy and Salem College will receive the daughters of to-morrow. As their grandmothers have done they will sit on late spring afternoons on the low steps beneath the white pillars, or in the beautiful grounds hidden behind the high, brick buildings that flank the square they will wander beneath the dreaming willows and linger by the little tinkling fountains.

At the southern end of the brick façade, but forming one continuous line with the newer buildings, is the old Sisters' House; here lives one whose life has formed an unbroken line of continuity between the old time and the new. For fifty years Miss L. was a teacher, watching the Academy grow from the standards of a grade school to those of a college, herself leading, directing, establishing those growing standards. Frail, alert, an eager flame lightly cased in the fragile seventies, I shall not soon forget the delicate, slim figure or the mobile face beneath the short, white curls. I wonder if the girls to-day going forth from Salem School will carry through life any deeper educative influence than that of Miss L.'s presence in an old room of many welcomes, a room still cordially open to anyone's knock.

These three visits on this "Great Sabbath"—to the archive house where the dead founders are still valiantly alive, to the Sisters' House, where past and present are one, to the Bethabara graveyard where the trees of two centuries are once more green with youth—have put my spirit in tune for the Easter vigil. Full of preparations Miss Bertha bustles us off to sleep early, but before we go upstairs she has made Miss Dorcas comfortable for the night, and has also arranged the couch for the little neighbor, Margaret Anne, who is to stay here to-night in order to go with us to the early service. Both fall asleep all eager expectancy, eight years old and eighty, side by side. Miss Bertha is briskly winding her alarm clock when we say good night. She assures us that she will call us in good time for coffee and sugar cake with her at five.

A BACKWARD GLANCE AT THE OLD CHURCH SHOWS THE WEATHER-VANE ARROW AND GLITTERING BALL AND THE STEADFAST CLOCK FACE BENEATH

Old Salem does not expect to sleep much on Easter Even. All night, steps crunch the gravel outside our windows. All night, motor cars pour into the old streets from all the country round. It is half past one when my friend's eager whisper rouses me, makes me hurry to kneel beside her at the dark window, for we must not miss the gathering of the trombone bands who shall go forth through all the sleeping streets announcing Easter. There is moving to and fro of shadowy forms assembling. Through the gloom bob the ruddy orbs of torches, the night is too still for any flaring streamers of light. The shapes of men and boys are indistinct, but the torch glow shines clear on the metal of the long horns. Every Moravian boy knows how to play the trombone. There are fathers and sons and uncles in the groups mustering now. Boys too small to sound a horn may carry the torches. They are all gathering quietly, reverently. The voice of the director sounds low and clear through the square, as one by one he dismisses a band of a score on its appointed march. Each band will have its particular tunes, its particular places for playing them. As the church clock chimes two the poignant horns ring out on the stillness.

Reminders of a Golden Morning

FOR some minutes we hear the measured beat of steps as band after band goes out from the old square. For two hours, sounding now here, now there, distant yet clear, the ancient horns will peal forth their message. From our window we watch one company march down Cedar Avenue. Beyond that quiet avenue we can hear the clang and rush of trolleys, the barking of automobiles. We watch the gleaming torches and dim-lit brass as the company tramps past the ivied gateposts and the arches with their texts of hope, while, white in the dust and the stars, the flowered grave-stones keep their measured march step by step accompanying the living. The torches bob to the rise and fall of those rhythmic feet, successors of feet that once, mad with unearthly joy, sped through dark streets to tell men, grief-bowed in black Jerusalem, of a golden morning.

The sweet Easter music rings at intervals through the few hours of sleep left. It does not seem long until we hear Miss Bertha stirring about, and presently we are on our way downstairs. The windows are still coal-black squares, and it is by electric light that we eat our delicious "sugar cake" and drink our fragrant coffee. The table

(Continued on Page 156)

THE BEAUTIFUL GROUNDS OF SALEM ACADEMY ARE HIDDEN BEHIND THE BUILDINGS THAT FLANK THE SQUARE

"DEAR MA
FLETCHER
HE SAID
"DO YOU
KNOW
OBJECT
TENSELY
BEING GARDED
A FOSSIL
YOU?"

HOW THE STORY BEGAN

Mary Fletcher, a distinguished author, back from war work in France, prepares to take up her writing again. The opinions of her close friends, Mark Fenn, professor in the small college town where Mary has lived, and John Kirkwood, editor of a popular magazine, are that Mary has not yet produced the big things she is capable of writing. Kirkwood wants Mary to stay in New York, where he feels she can do her best. Mary decides, however, to go back to live with her aunt in the little college town. Mark Fenn, seeing her the first evening after her return, fails to mention her last story and Mary knows he cannot praise it. Mary determines to do that "big thing," but the task appears discouraging. Then comes a letter from Kirkwood. He wants to come to see her.

IV (Continued)

MARY FLETCHER ended her reading of John Kirkwood's letter, she pulled out fountain pen and writing tablet and, sitting upon a log in the depths of her wood, replied to it even before she ate a bite of her lunch:

Dear John Kirkwood: I'm sorry not to share this particular portion of the countryside with you—or anybody—at this time. But June can be found anywhere, you know; and in other places you wouldn't be disturbing my train of thought. To be frank, I'm just getting at my work, and if you—or anybody—should come, it would most certainly distract my mind. I hate to seem ungracious, but —

In this vein she finished the letter. Six hours later, arriving at the house, she found a telegram awaiting her:

Unexpectedly summoned your way. Having received no prohibition in reply to letter, am venturing to call this evening. Hope for clemency. KIRKWOOD.

Mary ran up to her room. She had not mailed the letter she had written, and this eighth futile day of seeking had somehow weakened her resolution. It was impossible not to remember how often Kirkwood's presence had quickened the workings of her mind. Yet the actual news of his coming made her angry with him, that he had not waited for permission.

Down upon the porch, by and by, she awaited him, sitting on the step talking with Aunt Sara. When he came up the

Foursquare

By
GRACE S. RICHMOND

Illustrations by
John Alonzo Williams

walk she rose, and with one hand still in the pocket of her coat, gave the other to Mr. John Kirkwood. Her welcoming smile, through the May twilight, was carefully tempered by an edge of displeasure.

"Shall I go away again?" he inquired. "I'd have waited for an answer to my wire if there'd been time."

"Are you sure of that?"

"You distrust me. I can show evidence that I really had to see personally a most difficult and evasive author, within fifty miles. You couldn't expect me to let slip a chance like that, could you?"

When Miss Graham had left them after a decent interval, he and Mary came to grips with the situation.

"You have a most useful imagination," Mary said, her chin in her cupped hands, her elbows on her knees. "Doesn't that imagination help you to understand that you break the spell? Here I've been spending two months trying to get away from all suggestion of the old high-tension conditions, and you bring it all back. It's as if I were sitting on a quiet bank in the woods and a brass band went by."

"Great guns! If that's the effect of me must do something to tone myself down. What have I said, since I came, that has been of brass-band order?"

"Nothing. And yet you inevitably recall me the Big Town and all the world I know well and want to get away from."

"I'm sorry," he said. "I'd no idea it was bad as that. Why didn't you try a conversation? The walls are thicker, and I should have had permission from the Mother Superior."

She made an impatient movement. "Oh, do you understand?" she urged, a distinct note upon her low voice. "Something queer has happened to me. It happened before I came away or I shouldn't have come. I don't know who is myself. All I know is that I had to get away. I may not be able to do anything here, but at least —"

There was a silence of a full minute. Then Kirkwood spoke very quietly: "At least I understand myself forbidden to talk about your work. Only let me say that if the time comes when you're tired of fighting through alone, you'll let a fellow combatant direct a straight forward blow or two at your imaginary antagonist."

Now, if you can bear it to hear me talk at all, I'd like to tell you a tale or two of some experiences a friend of mine had or if you're too tired to see me at all to-night I'll call again in the morning."

MARY rose promptly. "I think that would be best," she agreed. "I admit I'm frightfully tired to-night and you would come in the morning instead —"

"Of course," Kirkwood shook hands in an entirely friendly manner. "Morning puts a brighter light on all troubles—and all moods."

Mary watched the tall figure stride away down the garden path, uncomfortably aware that she had been inexcusably ungracious, yet relieved at her present release.

Next morning, however, she woke to find herself looking forward to the editor's return with actual eagerness. She came downstairs early and found at her plate a note, written upon the stationery of the college inn:

On second thought I have decided not to bother you with a morning call, since I should be breaking in upon your best working hours.

I need hardly say that I am disappointed, but of course that doesn't count with me at all against your fitness for work. I promise not to come again until you summon me, if I find myself able to keep such promise in spite of my honest conviction that I could help. But I understand that I can't make a nuisance of myself at the present stage of your experience without prejudicing you hopelessly against ever calling upon me. Therefore, in perfectly good temper—in spite of the aforementioned keen regret—I take myself off, only asking you the recognition that here is one whose imagination does not let him clearly in your place, or he would most certainly not be writing this note instead of walking up the hill to find you at the top.

Well! She had what she wanted. She was free again to go off upon the ninth day of her quest for that elusive vision of which she had talked so gayly to Miss Graham. Nine days! What were nine days? Well might she look nine months for the thing she sought, if so be in the end she found it. But the trouble was that this inability to see some sort of light, though it were only a rush light, was new in Mary's experience. Always before had her active brain leaped at its task, eager to be used, ready to present to her any number of ideas for consideration, her part only to pick and choose. But now—now that rain seemed dumb, dumb, worthless. And he had refused to be very stimulus which so often before had set it pinning!

BUT she returned doggedly to her effort. She had not known before how persistent he could be in the face of discouragement; indeed, she had hardly known discouragement before. She knew now, and with each succeeding day her sense of something having "happened" to her, she knew not that, became more real.

On a June evening, idling up the path to the house, Mary heard the notes of a violoncello, coming from no great distance. She paused, listening eagerly; the strains proceeded from the open window of Mark Fenn's study. She crossed the lawn, passed through the opening in the hedge and, walking up to the window, stood well below it. The now, careful eyes were sure, the air being played an strain from a composer.

HAVING stood there for full minutes, listening to this air which seemed to press a feeling unlike her at the hour, Mary stole to the front door, opened without knocking, and came to a stand at the door of the study. Then she saw Mark Fenn, coat drawing the across the legs of the instrument held between his knees, thick locks streaming back from forehead, his intent upon the set of music perched precariously against a chair back. The desk light was canted to throw its rays upon the score, the doorway was thus left in shadow, and the performer had no knowledge of his audience until, finishing the page, he leaned forward to turn it over and a voice spoke.

"Why not come across the lawn and let me play the accompaniment to that? It's a great theme, isn't it?"

Mark looked up in astonishment. It was for the moment the Mary Fletcher he used to know, who smiled at him from the doorway, not the amazingly difficult young woman with whom he had not been able to get on of late. He smiled back, it was so good to see her like this.

"All right; must I put on my coat? It's hot to-night."

"Please don't. How do you come to be playing the cello to-night? I haven't heard a note of it since I came, and thought you didn't care for it any more."

"I still care, but haven't time to keep up practice. Once in a while I get it out—and wonder why I don't do it oftener."

They crossed the lawn together. Mary lighted the drawing-room and looked over the musical scores Mark had brought. In ten minutes the two were off playing away together and producing an effect by no means unworthy. At the end of the Handel "Largo," Mark lifted his bow with an air of satisfaction.

"That went fairly well for a first attempt," he said. "About the tenth time we played it together we might get something into it the composer meant to put there."

"Good gracious!" Mary cried. "I thought we got something into it this time! Art is long, from your point of view."

"Let's try it again, if you don't mind. We played it rather over-sentimentally, I think. Don't slow me up there and there, please"—he indicated the places by a tap of his bow. "I can't march ahead, with you hanging on to your chords."

"The professorial attitude!" murmured Mary saucily.

"What if I take charge and insist that it ought to be played with a proper observance of sentiment? Not that I intend to; you're quite right."

THEY tried it again, and this time Mary let the cello indicate its own reading of the stately measures, with a result decidedly more satisfying, even to her own ear. Then Mark selected another composition, and Mary a third, and presently the pair were so deep in the interest of the new association that neither noticed how late the hour was. Miss Graham, in another room, had heard, had come softly to the door and had stolen quickly away again, rejoicing, but afraid to break the spell.

"Oh, that was simply splendid!" Mary declared, breathless with the rapid reading of a difficult score, as the music ended on one after another of great final chords which had deeply satisfied something within her. "Somehow that blows off a tremendous amount of steam that was threatening to explode and wreck something. Don't you ever feel that way? I suppose not," she added, regarding searchingly the face before her. "And yet"—as an expression new to her observation crossed that face—"I almost think you do—a little."

MARK FENN looked back at her steadily for an instant. Then he laid down instrument and bow, rose to his feet, leaned against a corner of the piano and folded his arms.

"My dear Mary Fletcher," he said, "I think I shall have to make a statement or two to you. I dislike to be personal and call your attention to myself, but there seems no other way. Do you know I object intensely to being regarded as a fossil by you—or by any other human being for that matter? Just what I've said or

"REMEMBER," HE BADE HER, "HOW YOU HAVE STRUGGLED AND WORKED IN VAIN UP THERE IN THE COUNTRY. THE ATMOSPHERE THERE ISN'T THE ATMOSPHERE YOU NEED"

(Continued on Page 105)

VI

YOU have to be a doctor's wife or his office nurse before you realize how people want to tell you what's the matter with them. It was all right for Neal to say that it was unethical for a doctor to tell his wife about his patients; he didn't have to tell me. They did it for him. And if you think living in the midst of so much illness is depressing, you're mistaken; it's stimulating, because it doesn't stay with you.

These people just come and open a window for you to look out of, and they go away again, leaving you to your excellent health. Most people haven't enough different windows that they can open! A baby with a face like paper and little claws for hands, starving because the right food can't be found for it, who gets rosy almost under your fingers, is far more exciting than a debutante assembly or the first night of a play. I got so interested in the first gain in weight of Neal's first baby case that, when his books came, I read up on baby food all that afternoon.

THAT was a funny afternoon. I had thought and thought about the way Neal cleaned up after our picnic supper, and I had begun a desperate effort to pick up after myself. It was after Neal's office hours, when I was alone in the house, that I began to scrub the tile floors of the two bathrooms. My skirts got so in the way that I took them off, and I was dressed in crêpe de Chine, held over my shoulders and around my waist by satin ribbons, when Susy Landis and Sally McIntyre and Marian Belows came. I saw them out the upstairs window and called to them to come in and I'd be downstairs soon. But not Sally and Marian. I suppose their bet about my house wasn't settled yet, for they came right on up. Susy sat on the stairs, because she was tired and didn't want to climb them; it made her short of breath.

"You oughtn't to have made her climb that hill, Marian," said Sally. "You stay where you are, Susy. You look all white and fagged." And then Sally broke into the rippling laughter with which she accompanies her choicest criticisms. "Well, I wish you would look at the bride scrubbing in pink crêpe and satin ribbons."

I WAS tired of Sally McIntyre walking up my stairs. If ever a girl ought to be kept out of the intimacy of one's upstairs it was Sally.

"Well, what do you want me to do," I snapped, "take off my underwear when I scrub?"

The two girls looked puzzled. "Well, hardly," drawled Sally, "but why scrub in such finery?"

I looked down at it carelessly. "Where do you get your finery stuff? It's just underwear. I don't see why I should change it to keep my bathroom clean."

"She's a bride, Sally; you keep forgetting it," said Marian. "She's got to wear her trousseau out."

"You're wrong again," I said. "Neal and I got married so much sooner than we planned that I didn't have time for a trousseau. I had to bring the clothes I had, and these are they."

The girls looked at my garments and at each other. "All monogrammed and hand scalloped," said Marian. "I told you, Sally, that was what Mrs. Smithers said; and not an apron in the lot!"

Mrs. Smithers was the "perfect lady" who did our washing.

"Indeed!" I answered. "Why didn't you tell me these things interested you? I'd have shown them to you."

"Marian," called Susy from the stairway. "You're a billy goat!"

"SHE NEED NOT FEAR. HE WILL NOT—HE DOES NOT CHOOSE ME"

The Confessions of a Useless Wife

TO MARGARETTA TUTTLE

But I was too vexed to remember that I was a doctor's wife and might be alienating perfectly good patients. "As for aprons, I don't consider them sanitary. I wear paper aprons and burn them."

"Paper aprons!" It was a fact that I had been tying newspapers about my waist with a ribbon, but I didn't explain that. "Nobody wears cloth aprons now where I came from," I said. "We get them of white paper, trimmed if you like, in paper—paper such as you put on your shelves. And when they are soiled we burn them. I wish we could have paper dishes."

The girls were so silent I made up my mind my lack of aprons had been a topic of discussion elsewhere.

THEN Susy said something that made me ashamed: "I think that's a grand idea. Why don't we make paper aprons for the church bazaar? We could make some fancy ones—of that crêpe paper we had left over from the last bazaar—without its costing us a cent and we could sell them cheap. They'd go like hot cakes."

"Mrs. Gordon, show us one of your white paper aprons," said Sally.

Somebody rang the door bell at that moment, and I made a grab for my negligee, thanking fortune, while I looked out of the bathroom window, that the bell had rung.

"Oh, be careful," said Marian. "That window sill is wet. You'll ruin your pink satin robe."

I turned about. "Girls, that's one of the Fleming men downstairs. I can't go to the door. I'll talk to him from the downstairs hall window."

Susy grabbed me as I went down the steps. "Don't let him in, Mrs. Gordon. Those Flemings are the limit."

Illustrations by
Florence Gardiner

"We'll go down with you," said Marian, following close on my heels as I opened the hall window.

"I want the doctor," he said. "I'm sorry he isn't here just now. What do you want him for?"

"Well, I want him. Isn't this his hour for being here?"

"Yes, but he isn't here."

"Well, if I go back and say he isn't here in his office hours, they won't believe me. They'll say it's because I didn't want to come and that he was here. Will you let me in to see?"

"What would I say he wasn't here for if he was? You can come in and see if you want to."

I HEARD Susy gasp behind me: "Don't let him in." She had run down the stairs and was looking over my shoulder. "That's just an excuse."

"Oh, Susy, don't be silly," I said, and turned to the door. But Susy grabbed my hand and pulled me back. Then she slipped down to the floor.

"Susy's fainted," said Marian. "Sally, Susy's fainted."

"You can sit on the porch and wait for the doctor if you want to," I said to Jim Fleming. "We have a sick girl in here."

I ran for water and dashed it in Susy's face. It didn't do any good. She seemed to get whiter and whiter. Then her face took on a gray look. I got frightened. "I'm going to telephone for Neal."

Neal was in Sam Poyntz's office. Ever since his inquest into Mrs. Fleming's death, Sam Poyntz had been finding out things about Fleming, and Neal had been getting angrier and angrier about the case. It seemed a dreadfully long time before I got Neal on the telephone.

"NEAL, Susy Landis has fainted here at our house. Her face is gray; she—she looks dreadful."

"Leila, in the top drawer of the office desk is a leather box. In it is a hypodermic syringe all ready for use. You saw me give Anna a hypodermic at the hospital. Do you remember?"

"Yes, Neal."

"Think hard now and keep steady. There is a small bottle of tablets with the hypodermic. You have seen how I dissolve one in a spoonful of water and take it into the syringe. Fill it full; don't leave room for any air. Push the needle in on the upper side of the arm. Push the thing at the top halfway; hold it a moment; then draw out the needle. Have you got it?"

"Yes, Neal. Neal, Sally is here."

"I would rather trust it to you than to Sally. I'll be there in ten minutes."

"Leila," moaned Marian, "she looks as if she were dead. Shan't we lift her up on the couch?"

"No, let her stay."

I knelt beside her and I made some kind of prayer as I used that needle.

You would have, too, had you seen Susy and known yourself as inexperienced as I was.

Marian grabbed Sally's hand and watched. Presently she said: "Sally, see! That strange look is going; look! She's just white now; she's breathing better."

"Oh, Marian, keep still! Can't you do something else but talk?"

I knew what I thought both of them might do and do it silently, but I didn't know how to tell them.

It seemed centuries had passed when I heard Neal speaking outside: "I'll see you in a moment; don't keep me."

He flung open the door, and I handed him my hypodermic syringe. His fingers fell on Susy's pulse while he looked at the syringe and nodded. He put his head down on her heart. Then he looked up at me—a long, grave look. "You've saved her life, dear. Telephone for her mother. Tell her she'll have to stay here to-night. Sally, will you?"

he drug store and get an ice bag? Have we any ice, Neal?"

Not a bit, Neal."

Bring some ice then, Sally, will you? You have your here?"

VII

NEAL," I whispered the next night as I crept into my room too tired to undress, "how long have we got to Mrs. Landis here? I've had an awful day."

Neal was pretty tired himself. He had been out to Adam Fleming's to see Adam's sister Elsa. Fleming had sat doggy the night before and waited until Susy was in bed with ice bag on her heart and her mother beside her, and we were able to draw our breath. I positively wouldn't let Neal out to the Fleming place alone. I didn't see what they did of him there anyhow. He said they didn't want that it was Elsa Fleming who wanted him and who had tied on their getting him. I told him I'd go with him myself unless he got somebody else to go, and he finally had Poyntz go with him.

Neal was gone a long time, and when he came back he said nothing more than: "It's a whole family of man beaters."

When he went out to Adam Fleming's again next morning breakfast.

My troubles began with breakfast. It was one thing to get breakfast for Neal alone, but quite another to get breakfast for Mrs. Landis.

He didn't say anything, but even Neal got what she was king. I saw him look at me, and I wondered if he was trying my attempts at housekeeping through somebody's eyes for the first time or whether he was afraid my legs would be hurt.

You oughtn't to spoil this pretty dress with housework," Mrs. Landis as I prepared Susy's tray.

You Gordon City women," I answered, "have husbands leave you at eight o'clock and come home at five. But mine is here all the time, and I like to be prettily dressed while around him."

Mrs. Landis, whom I had forgotten for the moment had no husband at all, drew her lips tight and said nothing, not even when I tied white shelf paper around my waist before I took Susy's tray up to her. I had myself begun to think well of my paper aprons.

Susy examined the shelf paper as well as she could on the flat of her back. I thought she looked pretty hollow-eyed and white.

Mrs. Landis had her family doctor in the afternoon. They called it a consultation. Neal had grown up with this Doctor Garland as a friend of the family, and they liked each other.

But you wouldn't have thought Mrs. Landis liked either of them by the way she talked.

"It's singular," I heard her say, "that you didn't discover this, Doctor Garland, in all the years that you've been attending Susy."

"I HAVE not seen Susy since her tonsillitis. You know I cautioned you against letting her get out too soon. She was pretty sick."

"You didn't tell me anything about heart trouble. I think you should have warned me."

"I did warn you, Mrs. Landis." You could see that he was angry. Yet when he spoke to me he was quite delightful. "Mrs. Gordon," he said, "it is a pleasure to come upon a woman who does her housework looking like a fresh lilac bud."

Mrs. Landis took no delight in fresh lilac buds, especially as I did two unpardonable things for luncheon: I let the chops burn, and I did not boil the coffee long enough. But I had had to answer the telephone and the door bell while I was cooking luncheon, and as I cook with a book before me, an interruption is a serious matter to me. Mrs. Landis couldn't eat luncheon, and Neal asked her quite gravely if she would like to go home while he was keeping his office hours. He said he was afraid she was worrying about her affairs at home. And she went.

She returned with jellies and bread and dish towels; she had been frightfully worried over my using monogrammed towels for the dishes.

I HAD an easy dinner that night, with nothing that had to be shucked or taken out of the pod. So I had time and breath left to talk to Neal, and to Sam Poyntz and Mr. Symmes when they came in to see if they could help in what they called this new hazard.

"Oh, Leila's not done up," said Neal. "She's getting her second wind. She's off on a voyage of discovery to-night. She says there are lots more things you can feel than you can explain."

"Any doctor knows that," said Sam Poyntz.

Neal lighted his pipe. He hadn't been able to smoke while Mrs. Landis was around. "It's getting to be with a doctor a matter of sight and not of feeling or of touch. You take Garland or my father; in their time the sense of touch was a gift a doctor developed. If a man broke his arm, the old doctor knew where and how by his sense of touch. Now he doesn't even try his fingers, he uses an X-ray. And the 'movies' are reducing everything to sight."

Just then Mrs. Landis came to the door: "Doctor, will you come in to Susy a moment?"

Neal went inside, and I arose at once: "Excuse me, gentlemen; Mrs. Landis is in the habit of wanting something Neal never can find."

I followed Neal upstairs, but he had closed the door to Susy's room. So I sat in the front hall window waiting for him, if there should be anything he wanted me to get; and there Sam Poyntz's voice came up to me as distinctly as if I were by his side.

(Continued on Page 136)

NEAL WAS SITTING AT HIS DESK, HIS LEG PROPPED ON CUSHIONS. I TIPTOED IN AND CIRCLED HIS NECK WITH MY ARMS

Why Children Lie

By MIRIAM FINN SCOTT

Decorations by Clara L. Ernst

DO NOT CRUSH OR PUNISH A CHILD'S HONEST, UNSPOKEN OBSERVATION MERELY BECAUSE SOME ADULT'S VANITY MIGHT BE HURT BY A TRUE CRITICISM IT CONTAINS, LEST THE CHILD BE LED TO HYPOCRISY

"Can you tell me," the distressed mother asked, "why it seems to be so hard for Jane to tell the truth? I'm in despair about her; I simply cannot understand this terrible trait in her. I can see some reason for the big fibs she tells, but not for the little ones she is always telling." The mother went on to cite examples of her daughter's lies. The girl did seem an amazingly prolific liar, and the thinness and futility of most of her inventions made her seem indeed a mystery. But in the midst of this recital the telephone rang in the adjoining room, and mother called:

"Jane, will you please answer the telephone? If it's Mrs. X say that mother is not in."

The next moment the girl's voice was heard: "I'm sorry, Mrs. X, but mother is not in. . . . No, mother didn't leave word when she'd be back."

This telephone incident was instantly suggestive of an explanation of the mystery of the prevaricating Jane. Questions were put to the mother, which she readily answered, and presently all the mystery there was to Jane was no longer mysterious. The business of the telephone was a typical incident of the mother's relationship throughout her daily life. Here was a woman, charming, gracious, intensely well meaning, and yet her life was a fabric of petty untruths, which she was so accustomed to tell that she was not even aware of their character. And in the environment of these petty untruths Jane was growing up, getting her example, her inspiration.

"Why, I'd never thought of that!" exclaimed the mother as she realized this relation between cause and effect.

This mother represents a large class of women who go on telling social lies with never a thought of the influence of these untruths upon their children. The conventional standards of social politeness have so encroached upon their honest feelings that a social lie is uttered as a matter of course.

The Commonplace Untruths

IT IS a commonplace for such a woman to entertain friends at the house, outdoing herself in hospitality, urging them to come again, and the minute the friends are on the outside of the door to throw up her hands with: "At last they are gone; such bores!" It is a commonplace for her to accept a friend's telephoned invitation with seeming pleasure and the instant the receiver is hung up to exclaim: "Oh, how I hate to go there!" This woman flatters her friend's clothes and then just outside her hearing comments: "Hasn't she awful taste?" It is a commonplace to feign illness in order to escape an unpleasant duty. And the children hear all these untruths—and yet it is a mystery to these mothers why their Janes and Johns lie.

Here is one explanation—the supposedly harmless social lie—of why our children develop the deplored habit of telling untruths. For that we are to blame, but our guilt does not end there. If we parents will seek further, if we will closely examine all the facts of our relationship with our children and if we will be honest in acknowledging what we discover, we will admit that the great reason why children lie is that in various ways, usually unconscious of what we are doing, we parents stimulate them to lie. The child is essentially imitative in acquiring habits and knowledge, and therefore learns far more from our general behavior and our treatment of him than from our orders. The influence of our concrete example is tremendous; by comparison our well-intentioned commands are just vague words, without meaning and without effect. And then in addition to the harmful pattern we set for him to copy, we incite the growth of the evil habit in him by unconscious neglect, by unconscious injustice, by unconscious misunderstanding.

Is it unfair to place so great a blame upon ourselves? Let us look into the matter. If I do succeed in showing that the bulk of the blame for this failing of our children is our own I do it in the certain knowledge that all parents who read this will make haste to correct in themselves whatever fault may be an influence for evil in their children's lives.

Consider the child's instinct for self-protection and self-defense, and what happens when that instinct is aroused by hasty or unjust action. The following incident, so ordinary that it might have happened in any home, concretely illustrates how we parents, following a blind sense of right and wrong, are responsible for sowing the lie seed in our children.

Six-year-old John, sensitive, powerful, with a definite will of his own, was attacked by his impulsive sister, four years his senior, who violently snatched a ball from John's hand while he was playing with it. Her only excuse was that she happened to want to play with that ball at that moment. John, incensed by her interference, was determined to get his ball back. He put up a fight and, being at a disadvantage because of inferior weight and height, naturally resorted to the only available weapons at his command—his nails. As his nails dug into her cheeks Jane shouted frantically for help. The mother came hurrying in upon the scene and, seeing the scratched face of the sister, without stopping to investigate the cause of the trouble she got hold of John and insisted that he at once tell sister how sorry he was.

"But, mother, I am not sorry," John wept.

Are Your Directions Clear?

BUT in the mother's opinion John's own feelings had no place in the matter; he had to say he was sorry, and for thirty minutes the mother relentlessly kept at John. She threatened to tell father about it when he came home; that unless he said he was sorry he could get no supper. John held out, but realizing his helplessness, hungry and weary and fearing his father, he yielded and with his lips only muttered, "I am sorry." At once the mother picked him up, kissed him, told him he was a good boy, that they were friends again, served him his supper with an extra bit of cake as a reward, little dreaming that in exacting this insincere expression of regret from John she had taught him to lie and had proved to him that lying has its own reward.

Another practice by which we stimulate children's lying is our failure to give our children directions that are simple, clear and reasonable. We bury our directions in too many words; we give them hurriedly, inaccurately; and too often our directions are based upon so little thought that they strike even the childish mind as unfair. And then if the child does not instantly respond to what must sound to him a mere confusion of words, we grow impatient with him, we repeat our directions, perhaps this time using a new combination of words. The result is that often the only definite impression the child receives from all our talk is that he must or must not do something or he will be punished. Then to our question of whether or not he has done as he was told, the child guides his reply by what he thinks we expect it to be; his one thought is to save himself from punishment, and he answers accordingly, without regard for truth.

The following bit of conversation on a beach one summer afternoon between a mother and her eleven-year-old daughter will illustrate this particular point:

"Betty, did you dive to-day?"

The sharpness of the mother's voice, the look in her eye, prompted a frightened, defensive "No" from the lips of the little girl. But her denial did not save her.

"Why, Betty, you did so!" spoke up a small boy who had been on the raft with the little girl and who had seen her dive.

"Betty, I am ashamed of you for disobeying me and then lying about it," exclaimed the mother. "Did I not tell you not to dive?"

"But you said that when I had a cold, and I'm all right now," Betty tried to explain. "I thought you meant while I had a cold."

"I meant you to understand you were never to dive. Haven't I told you it is bad for you, that you overdo and get tired and chilled and that is why you get colds?"

"But, mother, you told me I could take part in the girls' diving contest on the Fourth of July."

"That is a different matter," the mother replied. "I did not tell you to dive outside of that."

"But I have to practice for that contest, mother. It's only a week from now, and you know I won't have any chance unless I practice."

"Don't try to argue with me. For this disobedience lying to me you cannot be in the diving contest or any of the Fourth-of-July games," was the mother's final decision. "You've got to learn to stop lying."

Betty was heartbroken, but she had lied and her mother was determined that she had to be punished. Yet it was mother's confused, incomplete and illogical directions that were responsible for Betty's lying. And unless Betty is unlike the average child, the punishment meted out to her will have little curative value. She will feel the injustice both directions and punishment, and the effect is likely to stimulate her to be shrewder in her lying.

Our children's lies often spring from our not understanding their needs, and our seeking to govern them by arbitrary rules and reiterated "don't's." Donald was such a liar—a source of bewildered misery to his mother and father.

"Can you explain," his mother asked, "why Donald always gives me garbled accounts of everything that happens to him? He does not seem to be able to tell the truth. For instance," the mother continued, "the other day he came home from school with his clothes torn, his hands face black, all evidences of his having played ball; and my question why he had played ball when I had told him not to play, he absolutely denied his playing; he told me he was just watching other boys play, that he had fallen in a puddle of water. He did not know how his sweater was torn; he guessed a boy must have torn it; the hole in the stocking was a total surprise to him; he did not know it happened."

"Then again, Donald lies when there is no reason for lying. Instead of riding to and from school, Donald walks both ways and saves his nickels. One day he appeared with a new top. When I asked him where he got it, he deliberately told me a neighbor's boy had given it to him. The next time I saw the boy I thanked him for giving Donald the top, and the boy in childish fashion said, 'I did not give it to Donald; he bought it himself.' Donald is obstinate and strong-willed, and his father and I insist on his obedience. We usually succeed in the end, but it is a terrific struggle all the time. As for his lying, we do seem to be able to do anything to cure that."

Examination proved eight-year-old Donald to be physically powerful boy with splendid mentality, original and with a powerful will of his own, doubtless a combination of both his father's and mother's wills. His life was ruled by the arbitrary orders from his two exacting parents with thought of the child's nature and how it should be treated and all his activities were restricted by thoughtless "don't's."

How a Boy Liar Was Made Over

DONALD naturally rebelled against this crushing suppression of his powers. He was afire inside with irritability and resentment; inwardly he lived in a world of emotional chaos. His lying was the logical consequence of the treatment he received from his parents. He was in such confusion and bewilderment himself that many times he himself was not conscious that in his speech he merely reflected his inward confusion. Many times he lied without being conscious of it.

The treatment this boy required was the removal of senseless autocratic dominance which ruled his life. The recommendation for the mother was that for a while at least she should discipline herself and give the boy greater freedom for self-expression, and stop all meaningless "don't's." If for good reason it were necessary to deprive Donald of certain opportunities for activity, others equally interesting should be substituted to give him outlet for his powers.

The mother at once saw her error and was frank enough to admit her mistreatment of her boy. She realized her needs, and in a persistent and content way went to work to meet them. To provide sufficient opportunities for his body and mind, the mother provided him with materials to work with. Donald had always wanted to do things with his hands, but his father would not let him mess up the house. Donald has a chest of tools of his own and a table was arranged for him in one corner of the father's garage and from it of wood, tin and wire all kinds of ingenious creations are invented by him. With the releasing of his own potential through constructive and satisfying channels, he has gained peace and self-confidence. He has nothing to hide and nobody to fear. It is the natural thing for him to tell the truth.

(Continued on Page 135)

Old Dog—New Tricks

By ALBERT PAYSON TERHUNE

Illustration by Frank Stick

A MILDEWED maxim runs: "You can't teach an old dog new tricks." In a sense it is true. In another it is not. To teach the average elderly dog to sit up and beg, or to roll over twice, or to do other of the asinine things with which humans stultify the natural good sense of their canine chums, is as hard as to teach a fifty-year-old bookkeeper to become a musical composer. No dog with a full set of brains is ever past learning new things which are actually needful for him to learn. And, sad to say, many an old dog on his own account picks up odd accomplishments, exploits which would never have occurred to him in his early prime. Nobody knows why. But it has happened numberless times. And so it was with Sunnybank Lad. Laddie had passed his twelfth birthday when, by some strange freak, he brought home one day a lace parasol he had found in the highroad on his way back to the Place after a late ramble in the forest. It was nothing new for the great dog to find missing articles belonging to the mistress or to the master. Every now and then he would lay at their feet a tobacco pouch or a handkerchief or a bunch of keys which had been carelessly dropped somewhere on the grounds and which Lad recognized by scent as belonging to one of the two humans loved. These bits of treasure-trove he delighted in finding and bringing. Yes, and—though those who had never seen him this were prone to doubt it—he was certain to lay the coveted object at the feet of whichever of the two had lost it. It never occurred to him to drop a filmy square of lace-cambric at the muddled feet of the master, or a smelly tobacco pouch at the mistress' little feet. There was nothing miraculous about this knowledge. To a high-bred dog every human of his acquaintance has a distinctive scent which cannot be mistaken. But the lace parasol was different. That presumably had fallen from some passing motorist, bound for Tuxedo or for the Berkshires. It did not come from the Place. Lad happened to see it lying there in the highway and he brought it forthwith to the house, carrying it daintily between his mighty jaws and laying it on the living-room floor in front of the astonished mistress. "Probably he laid it before her instead of before the master because she was the first of the two whom he happened to encounter," is doubtful if he realized that a parasol is purely feminine adjunct, although the mistress always declared he did.

HE picked up the gift and looked it over with real admiration. It was a flimsily beautiful and costly thing, with an ivory handle deftly carved and set with several stones and a deep fringe of lace of true Venetian point. "Why, Laddie!" she exclaimed in wonder-delight. "Where in the world did you find this? Look!" she went on as her husband came in from his study. "See what Laddie brought me." Now Laddie had lived on the Place for many more years than he could remember. He had spent the bulk of that time in dying the faces and the voices and the odds of these two people whom he worshiped. Moreover, he had an intelligence it is not given to most dogs, even to collies, and a queer psychic instinct to his brain that had guided his owners as much as it had delighted them. Teaching the mistress with classic head on one side and his deep-set eyes fixed on her eager face, he saw that his roadway gift had made her very happy. Also that her caressing hand on his head implied pride in what he had done. And, as ever, thrilled the dog to the very soul. "As long as motorists go round curves at forty miles an hour," decided the master, "so long are their set-up valuables likely to be jostled out of the tonneau. I found a satchel last week at the curve up there; I had that the week before." "Dear old Laddie!" cried the mistress, running her fingers through his silky ruff. "Good Laddie! Thank you ever so much. No dog but a very, very wonderful collie named Lad could have had the perfect taste to pick out such a parasol. And now we're going to have a whole handful of animal crackers for reward."

The crooningly sweet voice, the petting, the gift of animal crackers of which he was childishly fond—all these delighted Lad beyond measure.

And they confirmed him in the belief that he had done something most laudable.

What he had done was to pick up a stray object away from home and bring it to the mistress. He knew that. And that was all he knew.

But having won high praise for the deed he resolved then and there to repeat it—which proves that old dogs can be taught new tricks, and which started all the trouble.

That afternoon the mistress and the master went for a five-mile ramble through the woods and over the mountains back of the Place. With them went old Laddie, who paced gravely between them. With them also went Bruce, the magnificent, dark sable collie of kingly look and demeanor, who was second only to Lad in human traits and second, truly, to no living animal in beauty. With them, too, raced Lad's little golden son, Wolf.

Of old, Lad had led such runs. Now advancing age and increased weight had begun to make him chary of throwing away his fading energies. Wherefore he walked between his two deities and let the younger dogs do the galloping and rabbit chasing.

And he had his reward. For, as they crossed the highroad on the way home, Wolf and Bruce chanced to have loitered to explore a wood-chuck hole. Thus Lad was first to reach the road with the two humans. Suddenly he darted ahead of them and snatched up from the wayside the somewhat worn case of a thermos bottle which had been discarded there or had fallen from a car seat.

This he bore to the mistress, fairly vibrating with pride in his own exploit. And noting his joy in the deed, she made much of the shabby gift, praising and thanking Lad inordinately and forbearing to throw away the worn case until the collie was out of sight.

OF LATE as Laddie began to show signs of age, she and the master had taken to making more and more of him to atone for his growing feebleness and to anticipate the dark day which every dog owner must face—the day when his voice and his caress can no longer mean anything to the pet who once rejoiced so utterly in them.

All of which went to confirm Lad in the natural belief that anything found on the road and brought to the mistress would be looked on with joy and would earn him much gratitude. So, as might a human in like circumstances, he ceased to content himself with picking up such trifles as chanced to be lying in his path in the highway and fell to searching for flotsam and jetsam.

He began the hunt next morning. Pacing gravely along the center of the road, he headed toward the mile-distant village. By sheer luck such few automobiles as chanced along at that hour were driven by folk who had heart enough to slow down or to turn aside for the majestically strolling old dog. To the end of his long life Lad could never be made to understand that he was not entitled to walk at will in the exact middle of the road. Perhaps his lofty assurance in taking such a course made motorists check speed to spare him.

This morning he had fared but a half mile when he saw a car drawn up at the edge of the road, beside a shaded bit of turf. Several people had just descended from it and were making preparations for an early picnic lunch. One of them had finished depositing a basket on the ground, at the side of the car farthest from the strip of sward where the others were spreading a sea rug and setting an impromptu table.

The man put the basket down in the road. Then he dived back into the nether regions of the machine for more provender. And he was engaged in this groping when Lad came in view around a bend.

The big collie saw the basket standing there unprotected and, so far as he knew, ownerless. Gravely, without haste, he stepped forward, lifted the heavy receptacle by the handle and turned about with it, still moving with dignified slowness. The table setters were busy and the car was between him and them.

BY THE time the other member of the party succeeded in finding the things he was seeking under the rear seat, Lad had rounded the bend and was out of sight. To this day none of the motorists has the remotest solution to the mystery of the vanished lunch.

Lad had not stolen the basket. He would have suffered himself to be cut in three before sinking to that or any other sneaking act. He had found a basket standing alone in the highroad several feet away from the nearest humans. He had no way of guessing it belonged to them. So far as he was concerned this was as much a lost article as had been the gorgeous parasol. He had been praised to the skies for bringing the parasol and the thermos case to the mistress. He had every reason to expect the same meed of praise for this new gift.

Fragrant as were its contents, it did not occur to him to nose the cover off and sample them. There was no tinge of snooping in his make-up.

"See what Laddie brought me this time!" cried the mistress, coming into her husband's study a few minutes later and holding forth the new gift. "It's full of food too; and of course he never touched a mouthful of it. But I gave him two of the frosted cakes by way of reward. He's ridiculously happy over them and over the fuss I made about the basket."

Lad was standing in the study doorway, eyes alight, tail waving. The master called him over and petted him, praising this newest accomplishment of his and prophesying untold wealth for the Place if the graft should but continue long enough.

(Continued on Page 197)

NEITHER COULD GUESS HOW THIS PARTICULAR DOG HAPPENED TO BE STEALING THE TWICE-STOLEN BABY, YET NEITHER HAD THE REMOTEST FEAR OF TACKLING THE BEAST

Human Nature in the Bible

David—Shepherd, Poet, Soldier, Statesman

By WILLIAM LYON PHELPS

DAVID was neither a saint nor a superman; he was an epitome of manhood. He was a representative of masculinity, and had the virtues and vices that often accompany virility. Physically, mentally, spiritually he may stand as the genius of his race. Leave David out of the Bible, there would be vast empty spaces. In his own person he represents the athlete, the shepherd, the poet, the musician, the mystic, the man of war, the father, the friend and the statesman. His deeds, his poems and his prayers are alike immortal. In spite of his gross sins he had a certain greatness of heart that drew the love of men and women who knew him, that still commands the affection of those who read the story of his life. As a shepherd lad he was the incarnation of the strength, beauty and grace of youth. King Saul commanded his servants to bring to the court a first-class musician.

Then answered one of the servants, and said, Behold, I have seen a son of Jesse the Bethlehemite, that is cunning in playing, and a mighty valiant man, and a man of war, and prudent in matters, and a comely person, and the Lord is with him.

When Saul's incompetence became manifest, Samuel was forced by the divine voice to commit high treason, to anoint a new king while the throne was still occupied. It would seem that there was then a higher duty than obedience to the reigning power. Samuel called Jesse to a sacrifice, and passed his numerous sons in review. The first one, Eliab, was a superb creature, of such imposing face and figure that Samuel said to himself, This is the man. But the Voice whispered to him that the true value is not in outward appearance, but in the heart. It was a handsome family, the family of Jesse; and the proud father ordered his seven sons to stand in succession before the prophet. It is like a fairy story, where the obscure and neglected child turns out to be the favorite of fortune. Samuel was puzzled, and he asked Jesse if these were all the sons he had. It appeared that Jesse had not thought it worth while to bring the youngest, who was out keeping the sheep.

And he sent, and brought him in. Now he was ruddy, and withal of a beautiful countenance, and goodly to look to.

To the amazement of the brothers, who, however, seem to have behaved better than the brothers of Joseph, young David was anointed king in the presence of the family.

He Meets Goliath

DAVID had not wasted those long days in the pasture; he had become an accomplished musician, he had composed much poetry, and he had discovered his prodigious strength in killing a predatory lion and a bear with his own hands. Best of all, he had had many hours of quiet reflection and thought; in the solitude of nature, in communion with the hills, he had drawn close to God.

At the first interview Saul did not dream that the boy was to be his successor; he saw only a radiant youth, who had come to charm his sad mind with music. He loved him at first sight, kept him in his presence, and made him his armor-bearer.

David's first exploit was to destroy the Philistine heavyweight champion, Goliath. He was an enormous fellow. His height was six cubits and a span. Now we do not know exactly how long the Bible cubit is, but it is safe to call it about twenty inches; and the span was probably half a cubit, so that the gentleman from Gath was ten feet six, a tall man in any company. He was as strong as he was tall; for his breastplate weighed one hundred and fifty pounds, and the tip of his spear weighed twenty pounds. Standing upright in shining armor, it is safe to say that he would have attracted attention anywhere.

He came out in front of his countrymen every day for forty days, and each time he challenged the children of Israel to produce a champion to contend with him, that they might have a fight to a finish.

Every morning and every evening he made his little speech until the Israelites found the repetition extremely tiresome, but as no one seemed eager to accept Goliath's invitation, the situation continued without noticeable alteration.

David's three big brothers were in Saul's army; the boy had gone back to feed his father's sheep. Jesse sent him to the camp with food from the farm for his brothers, a fine present for their captain, and bade him return with news of the family. As David drew near to the trench he saw the host moving out in battle array, and their singing and shouting fired his young blood. Then, to his surprise, the big Philistine stepped out, made his customary remarks, and the Israelites fled from his presence. David shot questions right and left, and soon learned all there was to know; also of the glorious reward that would be given to anyone who could eliminate the giant. His oldest brother, Eliab, heard him talking, and was disgusted.

"This is no place for a boy; what do you mean by leaving your sheep? I know what's the matter with you; you have sneaked off from home and your work, to see the battle; now get back as fast as you can."

But this big-brother sneer made little impression on David, for he was full of a great plan. He talked so volubly that Saul sent for him; and the king must have laughed outright when David told him that he would fight the Philistine. But his boyish eloquence so moved the monarch that he gave him permission.

Goliath looked more like a fighting machine than a human being; but as we know to-day that a fifty-thousand-ton battleship can be destroyed by one torpedo, so David knew that if he could hit Goliath in an unprotected place with his sling shot, it would be all over with the big champion. He had had plenty of time to practice, and had become as skillful as many an American boy to-day; and he went forth with his small but dangerously offensive weapon. As for his defensive armor, that was in his feet; he took off Saul's cumbrous suit of mail, for if he did not succeed in hitting the Philistine he did not want anything to interfere with his speed in running away. He knew that Goliath was not dressed for sprinting.

The Cost of Popularity

THE disgust of the giant when he saw the fair-faced boy advancing found expression in words; but David was also a good talker, and after a slanging match he took careful aim and hit him in the face with the first shot, so that Goliath was knocked out. Before he could recover consciousness David was upon him and killed him with his own sword.

It must be granted that in his exploit David exhibited more skill than courage; but when you are in opposition to superior strength you must use your wits, like Jack-the-Giant-Killer.

The dismay of the Philistines was equalled only by the joy of the Israelites; and from that moment until his death David was a popular hero. Saul gave him a high command in the army and might have continued to love him if the women had not gone out to meet David with singing and dancing, and an odious comparison. "And Saul eyed David from that day forward." The very next day Saul had one of his attacks of melancholia and as David was playing music in his presence Saul hurled a javelin at him; but he was not so good a shot as the young man, for he missed him twice.

Like many another, David found his popularity embarrassing, for he knew that the king would never forgive him; he behaved with modesty and tact, and the splendid loyalty that he had perhaps inherited from his great-grandmother made him true to Saul to the end, but it was all in vain. The more modestly he behaved, the more the people loved him, and the more violent and uncontrollable became the royal jealousy.

For a time David lived at court; and there began that noble and beautiful friendship between Jonathan and David that has added to the beauty of the Bible and to the glory of human nature. Few things can exceed in duration true friendship between man and man; as it has no physical foundation it does not easily decay. It is interesting to remember that David's friendship with the king's son lasted forever; whereas his love for the king's daughter, whom he took in marriage, burned out and became extinct. Princess Michal loved David dearly, her maids told Saul about it, and he was pleased; for he saw a way of destroying him. He told his servants to let David know that he was to become the king's son-in-law; David, of course, made a modest disclaimer, saying that he could provide no worthy marriage settlement. Then, inspired by Saul, they told him that if he would kill a hundred Philistines the deed

(Continued on Page 51)

PHOTOGRAPH BY HARTSCOCK, FROM THE AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY

THE Bible is the book of all books I love," said Helen Keller, the world's most famous deaf and blind woman, recently. "I should like to have my picture taken with my Bible." But Miss Keller's Bible is not like yours, for she sees not with eyes but with her sensitive finger tips, and the volume of St. John's Gospel with which her photograph was taken for the American Bible Society was printed from American Braille type, a system of raised dots that indicate letters.

"What is your favorite chapter, Miss Keller?" she was asked.

Miss Keller joyously turned to the ninth chapter—the story of the opening of the eyes of a man born blind. Swiftly her fingers traced the raised dots until she reached her favorite fourth verse: "I must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day: the night cometh, when no man can work."

Then she turned to the first chapter and read aloud the fourth and the ninth verses: "In him was life; and the life was the light of men." "That was the true light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world."

When one of the Army and Navy Testaments was given to her by the society's representative, with a word concerning Bible distribution throughout the war, Miss Keller said: "I am so glad that the Bible is being distributed everywhere. When Christianity is spread throughout the world then brotherhood will come to the nations. I am so glad to do this for the Bible."

"NOT MY WILL, BUT THINE, BE DONE"—Luke xxii, 42

COPYRIGHT BY REINTHAL & NEWMAN, INC.

Gethsemane: By Heinrich Johann Hofmann

"IT IS HARD AFTER
M U C TROUBLE
BUT YOU
ARE M PRISONER
CAPTAIN
SHELTON

BRIEFLY

The Unspeakable Gentleman is a story of the time of the Napoleonic debacle. An American adventurer, Captain George Shelton, escapes from France, taking with him a document which is much wanted by the French Government. With him also is the daughter of one of France's prominent families. Arriving in Massachusetts Captain Shelton is visited by his son, who tells the story and who has been brought up to believe that his father is everything that is adventurously unsavory. Captain Shelton's brother-in-law calls and demands the much-wanted paper, threatening to deliver the Captain to the French authorities. Captain Shelton offers to sell the paper, but after receiving payment refuses to give it up. The son tries to get the paper and engages in a sword duel with his father in which Captain Shelton shows that he could easily have killed the young man. After a time the son concludes that the young French woman is in love with his father, and is jealous.

VII

WAS it possible that I cared? I asked myself as I sat before the fire watching my father and mademoiselle. There she was leaning toward him, the flames from the fire dancing softly before her face, giving her dark hair a hundred new lights and shadows. Her lips were parted and in her eyes was silent entreaty. I felt a sudden, unaccountable impulse to snatch up the volume of Rabelais, to face my father again, weapon or no weapon, to show her—

"Come, captain," said mademoiselle gently, "must you continue acting from pique, when the thing has been over for more years than you care to remember? Must you keep on now, because of a whim, to make your life and the lives of others miserable? Will you threaten fifty men with death and ruin because you once were called a thief? It is folly, sir, and you know it; utter, useless folly. Pray do not stare at me. It was easy enough to piece your story together. I guessed it long ago. I have listened too often to you and the marquis. Come, captain, give me back the paper."

With his old half smile my father turned to her and nodded in pleasant acknowledgment.

"Mademoiselle," he observed evenly, "I have gone farther through the world than most men, though to less purpose, and I have met many people, but none of them with an intuition like yours."

He paused to refill his glass. "You are right, mademoiselle. My wife called me a rogue and a scoundrel—mind you, I am

The Unspeakable Gentleman

By

J. P. MARQUAND

Illustrations by Arthur I. Keller

not saying she was mistaken—but my temper was hotter then than it is now. I have done my best to convince her she was not in error. And now, mademoiselle, it has become a habit with me, a habit even you cannot break. No, mademoiselle, I have the paper, and I intend to dispose of it as I see fit. Your mother, my son, need have had no cause for regret. She was right in everything she said. Brutus, tell Mr. Aiken I am ready to see him."

He must have been in the hall outside, for he entered the morning room almost as soon as my father had spoken,

Mr. Aiken, selected a chair by the fire, the with a comfortable sigh, he drew out his pipe and lighted it on an ember. "Yes, she'll be blowing before morning."

"You don't mean," inquired my father with glance out of the window, "that I can't launch small boat from the beach?"

"You could, captain, if you'd a mind to," said Ned Aiken, tamping down his tobacco, "but there lots who couldn't."

"Then I shall," said my father languidly. "Brutus and I will board the Sea Tern at eight o'clock tonight. You will stand off outside and put on your running lights."

"Yes," said Mr. Aiken, "it's time we was going. You mean they are taking steps?"

"A frigate's due in at midnight," said Mr. Aiken. "A frigate! Think of that!" said my father. "I last we seem to be making our mark on the world."

"We've never done the beat of this," said Mr. Aiken.

"And everything is quiet outside?"

"All right so far," said Mr. Aiken.

"How many men are watching the house?"

"There's four, sir," he answered.

"Ah," said my father, "and Mr. Lawton stops at the tavern?"

"Hasn't showed his head all morning," answered Mr. Aiken.

"And Mr. Jason Hill—he has been to call. No. Have you seen him since?"

"He's been walking out in the road, sir, all evening," replied Mr. Aiken. "And a schooner of his anchored upstream. And if you'll pardon the liberty, I bet that for Jason Hill, and he snapped his fingers."

"It may please you to know," said my father, "that quite agree with you. I am afraid," he went on, "that Jason does not take me seriously. I fear he will find he is wrong Brutus!"

Brutus, apparently anticipating something pleasant moved toward my father's chair.

"My pistols, Brutus. And it is growing dark. You best draw the shutters and bring in the candles. We're sitting very close to the wind this evening. Listen to me fully, Brutus: You will have the cutter by the bar at eight o'clock and in five minutes you will bring out my horse."

"What's the horse for?" asked Mr. Aiken.

My father settled himself back more comfortably in chair before he answered. A few drops had spilled on ogany. He touched them and held up his fingers and ed thoughtfully at the stain. "Because I propose to through them," he said. "I propose showing our friends I don't care a hang for the whole pack."

Gad!" murmured Mr. Aiken. "I might of known it. here I was thinking you'd be quiet and sensible. Are still going on with that blasted paper?"

he red stain seemed to please my father. He dipped his rs in again and drew them slowly across the back of his hand. "Precisely," he said. "I propose to deliver it ight before I sail. I leave it at Hixon's farm."

He's dead," said Mr. Aiken.

Exactly," said my father. "Only his shade will help me, ups it will be enough; who knows?"

There'll be half a dozen after you before you get through gate," said Mr. Aiken dubiously. "You can lay to it ton will be there before you make a turn."

That is why I say we're sailing very close to the wind."

"OOD gad, sir, burn it up," said Mr. Aiken plaintively.

I "What's it been doing but causing trouble ever since e got it? Running gear carried away—man wounded splinters—gad, sir, they're afraid to sleep to-night for you'll blow 'em out of bed. What's the use of it all? And here you go, risking getting a piece of lead thrown in all because of a few names scrawled on a piece of paper."

not forget it and burn it up? And then it's over just eat as neat, and then we're aboard and after the pearls n. Why, what must the boy be thinking of all this? must be thinking he's got a rascal for a father; he —"

That will do," said my father coldly, and he rose slowly his chair and stood squarely in front of me. "Tie that up, Brutus," he commanded. "It is a compliment, my

My opinion of you is steadily rising. Tie him up, us. You will find a rope on the chimney piece."

e stood close to me, evidently pleased at the convulsive r which had gripped me. Brutus was still fumbling on mantelpiece. Ned Aiken's pipe had dropped from his th. It was mademoiselle who was the first to intervene.

Are you out of your senses?" she demanded, seizing him he arm. "It is too much, captain. Think what you are g and send the black man off."

"I have been thinking the matter over for some time," replied my father tranquilly, "and I have determined to do the thing thoroughly. If he cannot like me it is better for him to hate me, and may save trouble. Tie him up, Brutus."

"Bear away!" cried Mr. Aiken. "Mind yourself, sir."

His warning, however, was late in coming. I had sprung at my father before the sentence was finished. It was almost the only time I knew him to miscalculate. He must have been taken unaware, for he stepped backward too quickly and collided with the chair he had quitted. It shook his balance for the moment, so that he thrust a hand behind him to recover himself, and in the same instant I had the volume of Rabelais. I leaped for the open doorway, but Ned Aiken was there to intercept me. Brutus was up behind me with his great hands clamping down on my shoulders. I turned and hurled the volume in the fireplace.

My father caught it out almost before it landed. With all the deliberation of a connoisseur examining an old and rare edition, he turned the pages with his slim fingers. There, as he had said, was the paper, with the same red seals that I had admired the previous evening. He placed it slowly in his inside pocket, and tossed the book on the floor.

"Now here's a pretty kettle of fish," said Mr. Aiken.

My father was watching me thoughtfully. "Take your hands off him, Brutus," he said, "and bring out the horse."

For a second longer we stood motionless, each watching the other. Then my father crossed to the long table near which I was standing, picked up the pistols that Brutus had left there and slipped them into his capacious side pockets.

"You disappoint me, Henry," he remarked. "You should have used those pistols."

"I had thought of them," I answered.

"I am glad of that," he said. "It is a relief to know you did not overlook them. You were right, mademoiselle. I should have known better than to treat him so. We have ceased to play the game, my son. It only remains to take my leave. I shall not trouble you again."

He was standing close beside me. Was it possible his eyes were a little wistful and his voice a trifle sad?

"I thought I should be glad to leave you," he said, "and somehow I am sorry. Odd that we can never properly gauge our emotions. I feel that you will be a very blithe and active gentleman in time, and there are not so many left in these drab days. Ah, well —"

His sword was lying on the table. He drew it and tucked the naked blade under his arm. In spite of the two candles which Brutus had left, the shadows had closed about us so that his figure alone remained distinct in the yellow light, slender and carelessly elegant. "It is growing dark, Mr. Aiken, and our position is not without its drawbacks. Call in the men from outside and take them aboard and give them a measure to drink. No one will disturb me before I leave, I think. You had better weigh at once, and never mind your running lights till it is time for them."

"So you're going to do it," said Mr. Aiken. "I might have known you wouldn't listen to reason."

"You should have sailed with me long enough," said my father, "to know I never do."

"And you not even dressed for it," added Mr. Aiken. "You might be going to a party, so you might."

"I think," replied my father, "the evening will be more interesting than a purely social affair. Keep the Sea Tern well off, and we shall meet only too soon again."

THE house door closed behind Mr. Aiken, and Brutus glided into the room.

"Mademoiselle," said my father bowing, "I am sorry that we must part. If you had as few pleasant things as I to remember, you also might understand how poignantly I regret it, even though I know it is for the best. It is time you were leaving such low company."

"I have found it pleasant sometimes," she replied a little wistfully. "It takes very little to please me, captain."

"Sometimes," he replied, smiling, "anything is pleasant, but only sometimes. Your brother has been notified, mademoiselle. You should hear from him in a little while now, when this hurry and bustle are over, and when you see him give him my regards and my regrets. And, mademoiselle —" he hesitated an instant — "would you think it insolent if I said I sometimes wished — Heaven, mademoiselle, do not take it so! It was entirely unpardonable of me."

Mademoiselle had hidden her face in her hands.

(Continued on Page 179)

HE FIRED INTO THE DARKNESS AND A RIDERLESS HORSE RAN ALMOST ON TOP OF US. WITH A SNORT OF FRIGHT HE REARED AND WHEELED, AND A SECOND SHOT ANSWERED MY FATHER'S

FROM THE PAINTING BY H. J. SOULEN

"From the harem point of view she is considered fortunate. She is the fourth and favorite wife; she is under twenty and her husband is over sixty. She has three sons, which is more than any of the other wives have. Her husband adores her. She was taken to this harem while she was still almost a child, and since her marriage she has been too closely guarded to have a chance to see any other man. But she is homesick; night and day she longs for the desert from which she sprang. She does not dare talk about it before the other wives; that would give them a feeling of superiority over her which she does not want them to have. Besides, they would tell her husband. The only person she can talk to is an old negro slave woman who accompanied her. But her heart is breaking for her father's tents and for the old wandering life with the flock."

The Women of the Desert

By

MAUDE RADFORD WARREN

Illustrations by H. J. Soulen

THE deep blue-black of the desert sky was pierced by myriads of stars, like the shining points of sheiks' swords. My English friend and I, driving from the city miles and miles, came suddenly upon a Bedouin camp. It had not been there the day before; it would not be there the following week. The black bulk of the tents rose from the sand like deeper shadows. In the foreground was a glimmering fire, about which sat huddled figures. But it was to a tent to the left that our gaze was caught and held. It must have been the women's tent. Within, close to the doorway, we could see dim shapes. Outside, an Arab singer, who played a sort of lute, was singing a love song. His voice—the usual Arab voice—was not musical; but we forgot the fact in the melody of the song and in the witchery of the night and of the vast, silent space about us. Which one of those listening women, I wondered, knew that the song was for her?

It was not only my first glimpse of the magic, the beauty and the mystery of the desert, but also of the women of the Bedouin. It was not until some time later that I came really close to any of them, and then it was not in the desert but in the town. I had, indeed, seen the Bedouin men come into the cities in their sweeping desert robes, walking like kings among the city Arabs, many of whom wore European dress. But I had never seen a Bedouin woman there.

Yet it was there, in the city and not in the desert, that I met the first Bedouin woman I had ever known. She was named Ayesha, the daughter of a sheik of an important tribe, and married to another sheik who, for some reason of policy or preference, had abandoned his nomadic existence and lived in the city. The Englishwoman who took me to see her warned me that I should find her very unhappy.

"From the harem point of view she is considered fortunate. She is the fourth and favorite wife; she is under twenty and her husband is over sixty. She has three sons, which is more than any of the other wives have. Her husband adores her; I don't think she cares about him, but that does not matter, because she does not know what love is. She was taken to this harem while she was still almost a child, and since her marriage she has been so closely guarded that she has had no chance to see any other man. But she is homesick; night and day she longs for the desert from which she sprang. She does not dare talk about it before the other wives; that would give them a feeling of superiority over her which she does not want them to have. Besides, they would tell her husband. The only person she can talk to is an old negro slave woman who accompanied her, and myself. But her heart is breaking for her father's tents and for the old wandering life with the flocks."

Ayesha did not look like any picture I had seen of the desert women when she received me in a room which held divans and cushions, on one of which she sat, wearing Parisian dress, but with a silken covering over her head. She was dark and lithe and languid, her temporary animation at seeing me soon sinking back into torpidity. The Englishwoman said something in Arabic; then Ayesha's inertia vanished; she rose to her feet and spoke rapidly and passionately.

The Longing for Home

TELL the lady," my friend translated, "that I am dying for my old home. Tell her that when I heard as a child that I was to be married to the Sheik Ibrahim I was proud, or I knew that the marriage would be a help to my father. He showed me very much more consideration after the agreement was made, and the women gave me my own way in everything, while the unmarried girls envied me. I knew that, because they were so spiteful, teasing me about my old's gray hairs and feeble arms. I knew that any one of them would have been glad to take my place. But not all that my husband gives me, not the envy of his other wives, not my three little sons make up for this life. I cannot breathe. How glad I should be to throw away these Parisian lips, and wear once more the anklets of a Bedouin! How glad to take off this short skirt, and dress once more like my sisters!"

"Oh," Ayesha cried, her eyes like murky stars, "to see my desert! To roam with the flocks when the grass comes, itching the tents where the pasturage is best! To see the sun come up like a ball of gold in the morning; to see the white heat of the noon! To watch the powdered dust rising from the feet of the camels and making a golden haze; to lie in the heat of the day under a black tent roof, separated from others by a blanket partition, slowly drinking sweetened water; to watch the camp fires burning at night, the smoke rising; to listen to the stories of the Bedouin tale-teller with a mouth of gold; even to hear the watchdogs barking in the night! Ah, Allah! I am dying for home!"

Long afterwards, when I had made the full circle of Arabia, from the Red Sea, around the Indian Ocean and the Persian Gulf, up by Basra and Bagdad and Mosul, down the Mediterranean as far as the Hauran and the Dead Sea, I met Ayesha once more. This time, though she was still in the harem, she wore the dress of a Bedouin. This time her eyes sparkled and she was wild with joy.

"Tell the lady," she said, "that I am going back to the desert. My husband has died, and his cousin, who is my father's cousin also, is going to take me into his tents. What though he has other wives younger than I? What though I shall lose the luxuries of the city? I shall be able to keep my sons in my cousin's tent and shall be at home."

My approach to the tents of the Bedouins was slow for political reasons. At the time of my first arrival it was winter and early spring; the Bedouins were moving with their flocks; and it was not considered safe for me to visit any encampment unless we knew exactly who our hosts were. I drove past them often enough, groups of anything from three or four to twenty tents, their tops made of lengths of thick black cloth woven from goats' wool. Some of them had no side walls; in others the side walls were made of a kind of matting.

Always as we passed there were tall, statuesque people standing straight and still to gaze at us. In front were the men; behind or at one side the women and children.

I loved to look at these people, who stood erect as reeds in their dark robes, their feet bare except for their silver anklets, their fine faces unveiled. They did not have the eager and yet empty look of the women of the harem; rather the high look of a hawk or an eagle. I felt as if the spirit of the desert had given them a freedom unknown to their sisters of the city. I suppose the lack of the veil symbolized too much for me.

A Tribal Settlement

NOT often did they smile, even when I waved at them. They put their little naked children behind them to protect them from the evil eye. Precious possessions, these children, the boys especially; why should not the woman from the West cast on them the eye of envious longing?

I began to learn the place women take in affairs of the desert on a day when I drove with a young political officer to see him settle a blood feud. He had never had any experience with the law beyond being in love once with a barrister's daughter, which would not take him very far. His chief case that morning had been in connection with a husband who had bitten his wife's nose off because she preferred someone else to him.

The feminist in me suspected the Turk in my friend and I asked suspiciously: "How did you punish him?"

"I let him off with a reprimand," he said; "a woman has no right to be unfaithful to her husband, I don't care what his race is."

It wasn't any use to ask him what punishment he would have given a woman who had bitten her husband's nose off because he had been unfaithful to her, for he was only twenty-five.

"Now notice what I do," he said to me when we arrived at the place where he held his court: "I won't have time to translate for you, because I'll have to watch them closely to see that they don't get out of hand. We want to stop this tribal killing. There are tribes here who have been at outs for generations, and it has been considered unworthy to do anything but pile up murders. We are trying to get them to take a different point of view. And really we are succeeding. Watch closely; there will be recriminations and accusations. I'll ask if there was murder in this year and in that year."

They'll have to tell me the truth; there are too many sitting by to check up. I'll sit there counting heads as they recite the murders. Finally we'll get to a point where one side has the better of the other by a head or two. Then I'll try to settle on a cash basis. I shall try to make the settlement generous enough so that the injured tribe may feel that it is making a good bargain."

We took our seats and then the officer signified to the Arab doorkeeper that the tribal representatives might come in. Some two score Arabs entered, armed to the teeth. Part took their seats on one side of the room and part on the other, where they sat eyeing each other suspiciously. The officer greeted them all ceremoniously, being careful to show no favoritism. Ensued a long, long palaver in Arabic. The Arabs were now impassive and now passionate. I could feel the rise and fall of the general emotion of the situation as the contestants came nearer a settlement. Finally the officer rose; there was ceremonious leave-taking, and the court was over.

"Done," said the officer, "for the price of a life—about ninety dollars. But we didn't settle in money; we settled in kind. Abdul Hassam, that old one-eyed villain, who is one murder short, has agreed to end the feud if he gets the equivalent of that one life. He's short of girls, so we've settled for one sheep, two girls, and the provisions for himself and his companions from the home of the girls to his own home. I suppose one of the girls is for himself—both, for all I know; but as they are just chattels he'll do as he pleases with them. It will be an interesting pilgrimage, conducted almost like a triumphal march."

"But the girls—what do they think of it?"

"What do the thoughts of a woman matter who is worth only thirty-seven dollars and a half in your currency? They're simply not consulted. Besides, they're used to it."

Girls as Chattels

I FOUND that the British and the Europeans in general had a way of dismissing the situation of the Bedouin women with that sentence: "They're used to it." Like our own expression, "That's business," it seems to be supposed to absolve one from the necessity of feeling sympathy or passing ethical judgments.

Once I was with a young military governor who was receiving a number of handsome Bedouin sheiks. There were two very impressive ones, one perhaps thirty, the other, his uncle, sixty-five.

The younger one had just come to announce that he was going to divorce his wife in three months, as soon as his next child was born. He wanted to wait to be sure of the sex, for if he sent his wife back to her father's tents she might pretend the child was a girl in order to have an excuse for keeping it. If it was a girl it would not be worth his while to keep it. His wife was good-natured, he said, and he liked that; but he had had her a long time now, eight years, and she was very old, all of twenty-three. He wanted a change.

"And do you know," said the governor animatedly, "that gave me an idea for the uncle, Abdul Kerim. For some time now he has been out of spirits. He says it is Allah's will that he shall hang withering in the world like a broken tamarisk bough. I've proposed that he take a new wife; it might cheer him up and give him an interest, and he's a splendid old chap. I know of a girl of fifteen, said to be pretty, that I think I can get for him. I'd love to do the old thing a good turn."

But apparently no one thought of doing a good turn to the fifteen-year-old girl. She was a chattel to be handed over, if the governor and her father could make a satisfactory arrangement.

At last the day came when I was able to go with an Englishwoman to visit a Bedouin encampment. Our host was a sheik of some prominence, very

"The Home I'd Like to Have"

What the Home Journal Learned from its House-Plan Contest

By

WILLIAM DRAPER BRINCKLOE

Here is the first prize winner in the Northwestern group—a farmhouse in which every convenience for the family and farm hands has been considered. The exterior is finished with stucco and the gambrel roof is shingled. Windows are plentiful, assuring lots of light and good ventilation.

LAST September THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL invited its readers to participate in a contest for plans of small, convenient houses—"The home I'd like to have." Six thousand persons answered the call within the specified time and submitted plans embodying the ideas and the ideals of the housewives of America. Every plan and every letter of explanation showed care and thought in preparation, and the editors take this opportunity to express their thanks to the contestants. Announcement of the five first-prize winners and the forty second-prize winners was made in the March issue of THE HOME JOURNAL.

Herewith we are presenting the plans and perspectives drawn from the plans of the five first-prize winners. They have been selected with the utmost care, and while there is no hope that they will suit everyone—certainly they should not if we are to maintain our individuality in home building—they do represent the best ideas that were presented for their respective sections of the country. The growing popularity of the bungalow was shown in a most interesting manner. It was to be expected that this type of house would carry the Far West and the South by large majorities, but the Central and Northwestern groups also favored it largely, and in the East it was only two hundred and fifty behind the favored two-story house. The grand totals showed more than 3000 bungalows, nearly 1200 one-and-a-half-story houses, and close to 1800 two-story houses. Houses of five, six and seven rooms practically divided the honors, with six rooms as a little the favorite.

Kitchen Gets Most Attention

IN ORDER of preference the favored materials were frame, stucco, brick and cement blocks, depending largely upon availability.

The living room was usually the largest in the house, and many contestants who eliminated the dining room entirely planned so that a dining table might be placed at one end. In the smaller houses there was a very definite tendency to leave out the dining room and replace it by a breakfast nook or breakfast porch. The demand for these breakfast nooks in all parts of the country was significant of the desire "to save steps, and to save the daily work of giving the dining room a thorough cleaning." Usually the nook was either in the kitchen or in an alcove opening on the kitchen. Very great stress was laid on plenty of electric outlets, so that percolator, toaster, grill, and so on, could all be attached.

Pantries seem to be going out, except in the East and South. Ample cupboards and cabinets, right in the kitchen, seem to be what the modern housewife wants. Provision was usually made in the plans for the refrigerator, and stress was laid on "keeping the ice man out of the kitchen," either by an outside ice door to the refrigerator or by setting the ice box in the entry or on the back porch. Also there was demand for some arrangement by which packages could be left when the house was locked up.

There were fewer bedrooms than in the old-time house, but they were planned for comfort, and there was shown a real demand for sleeping porches, for plenty of closet space, for children's playrooms, and for up-to-date, convenient bathrooms.

A laundry was provided in almost every house, except perhaps in the far South. Usually this was placed in the basement, for most women do not want the laundry tubs in the kitchen, and the basement saves the expense of building another room. Connections for electric washers were demanded, and the built-in ironing board was almost universal.

Sun rooms, dens and sewing rooms were called for often.

The most carefully studied room in the house, however, was in almost every instance the kitchen, and the plans showed a close approach to a standard type. It was generally of medium size—one hundred to one hundred and fifty square feet; well lighted and ventilated, equipped with all modern conveniences. The sink, thirty-four inches from the floor, was placed under a window with the sill four feet from the floor; drain boards extended to right and left, with drawers, pull-out bread boards, flour bins, and so on, under the drain boards. The space under the sink was usually left open for sanitary reasons and to hold the kitchen stool, fireless cooker, and the like. Near at hand were complete cupboards and cabinets. There was usually a place to keep brooms, mops and the vacuum cleaner. Linoleum covered the floor; sometimes there was a built-in worktable and generally a movable table, marble-topped or zinc-covered, as well. The "tea-wagon" serving table was frequently mentioned. Sometimes there was a built-in desk or bookcase to hold cookbooks and household accounts.

I noticed a radical change from the old-time conception of the kitchen. With the passing of the servant the housewife evidently realizes that her kitchen has become her workshop and office, where a great deal of her time must be passed; it is, in many instances, the most important room in the house to her. With a dainty little breakfast nook here she is not ashamed to bring her more intimate guests to lunch in the kitchen, though she will serve her more pretentious formal dinners in the dining or living room. However, eating in the kitchen is no longer a mark of ill-breeding—a thing to be done secretly; it is openly boasted of now. This being so she wants her kitchen to be as well kept, light, airy and attractive as any other room in the house, and she has said so in hundreds of letters accompanying plans.

Up-to-Date Equipment

SHE does not want unsightly things lying out in view; spots, pans and all such must have proper store cupboards where they may be put away out of sight, but at arm's length when wanted. Her sink must be as good-looking as any bathroom fixture; all her lockers and cupboards must be well designed architecturally. The walls and woodwork must be finished in beautiful but durable colors; everything must be easy to keep clean, yet very good to look upon.

The housewife's chief reason for wanting labor-saving equipment in her kitchen is naturally to save herself labor, but the letters seemed to show a secondary reason.

For instance, she wants electric equipment in the kitchen breakfast nook so that she can cook and serve a meal without disarranging the kitchen. With proper equipment she can keep her kitchen looking presentable at practically all times, or at any rate can get it into shape in a very few minutes.

Now considering her vastly increased pride in her kitchen, we may reasonably expect that she will eventually want this room to have a better situation, nearer the front of the house. And that is just what is happening; a number of plans showed the kitchen at the front of the house, alongside the living room, and the accompanying letters gave good, sensible reasons for this position. Many other plans showed the kitchen midway of the house; for example, in a five-room bungalow the dining room and living room will often occupy the front, with the kitchen directly behind the dining room, placing a bath or a bed room back of the kitchen. Perhaps the kitchen will be thrust out three feet or so to give better ventilation and a view of the street.

This tiny prize-winning plan for a Western bungalow utilizes every inch of space without sacrificing a single built-in convenience that a larger house might boast. The style is Spanish, the finish stucco and the roof red tile. The wood trim is painted a faded blue.

The house that won the first prize in the Eastern group is substantial, without frills or furbelows, and sedate enough to grace any New England town. The rooms are all carefully planned and will furnish attractively.

It is not possible to give other individual suggestions in detail here, but many of them are so well worth consideration that they will be embodied in HOME JOURNAL houses and bungalows to come. The editors feel that they have accomplished what they set out for in this contest—they have learned what the women want, and future architectural pages will be aimed at a definitely known demand.

The First-Prize Winners

NOW for the actual first-prize winners and what they say: In the Eastern group the twenty-five-dollar award went to W. Ellison Norton, of Springfield, Massachusetts, for his seven-room, two-story house. I feel certain that Mr. Norton's wife must have helped him, for I don't think a man could possibly have presented such a work-saving layout. Here is his letter:

"In planning this home I felt that I should carry out first of all the clause in the program which said 'The house must not be too large and costly for the average family, of average means.' So the whole general scheme was developed along the lines of economy, giving at the same time a great deal of thought to the housewife.

"One stairway for a house of this size is sufficient provided it is so placed as to be conveniently used from any part of the home. The cellar stairs, as you see, go down under the front stairs, with a grade entrance on the cellar landing. The attic stairs go up from the sewing room.

"The kitchen is only a step from the front door, and holds plenty of cupboards and closets. The omission of a pantry is to be praised and not blamed; this saves many useless steps. The laundry tubs are built in beneath the hinged drain board of the sink.

"The breakfast nook has stationary seats, with hinged covers, for storing linens; the table is movable. The bathroom is directly over the kitchen plumbing, which will minimize the cost.

One might look long and unsuccessfully in search for a prettier little bungalow than this one, the first prize winner in the Central group. It is frame with brick foundation and trim, and boasts a porte-cochère which may also serve as a porch.

"The plan will fit a fifty-foot lot, leaving space for the automobile driveway. The house will look very well if the outside walls are finished with shingles."

Mr. Norton might have said that the grade doorway, on the first landing of the cellar stairs, is an extremely good feature. Indeed, it had a great deal of weight in the final selection of this plan for first prize. This side door, opening right on the automobile driveway, makes a wonderfully convenient family entrance; it keeps a lot of dirt and muss out of the front hall. The children can come in here from school or play, and wash up at the little lavatory, leaving their wraps hanging in this lavatory closet. This frees the front coat closet, on the main stairway, for older folks' wraps.

The kitchen porch is perhaps a trifle too crowded; there is room for a refrigerator, not for a washing machine. So I have indicated, by dotted lines, how this porch might be enlarged; some persons want the laundry tubs out there too.

Mr. and Mrs. W. B. Livesay, of Port Neches, Texas, who submitted a six-room bungalow, won first prize in the Southern group. "We think the plan of our home is ideal," they wrote. "We can honestly and sincerely recommend it. We live in Texas and need all the fresh air we can get; the two sleeping porches are just what we want. In the daytime Mrs. Livesay uses one for a sewing room and sun room. The seats in the breakfast nook can be folded against the wall; this makes cleaning easy.

"The walls are hollow tile, stuccoed; the roof is green tile. We heat the house with a small hot-water heater, which stands in the kitchen."

Dining Room Close to Living Room

MISS ORDELLA M. SMITH, of Mt. Vernon, Indiana, whose five-room bungalow won first place in the Central group, let her plans speak for themselves. But she did call attention to "the private center hall, which gives the benefit of a rear stairway." Indeed, it was this hall and stairway with its grade entrance that finally turned the scale in her favor; there were other plans, equally good in all other respects, but with interior central halls. In this layout the man of the house and the children can come in by the grade door and go to bathroom or bedroom without tramping and tracking through the "best" rooms, or bothering the housekeeper in the kitchen. Also this hall gets light and ventilation from a window on the stairway.

The porte-cochère is an exceedingly good feature, especially for suburban folks; unloading the marketing or the family from the car in a drenching downpour isn't the most joyous thing.

The general position of the dining room is what many women seemed to want. It is very close to the living room, yet entirely shut off,

(Continued on Page 47)

A Southern house needs all the windows it can possibly have. Our Southern prize winner was planned with that thought in mind. The kitchen is almost a separate unit, which arrangement is agreeable to most Southern housewives.

The Ladies' HOME JOURNAL

BARTON W. CURRIE, Editor

Editorials

Woman, Why Weepest Thou?

IT WAS to a woman that the risen Christ appeared first on that Easter morning centuries ago, and it was to her that he spoke his first gentle words of comfort. Not to Peter, or James, or Matthew, or even the beloved John, but to Mary Magdalene, who loved most greatly, who trusted most fully, who wept most sorrowfully.

"Woman, why weepest thou?"

"Because they have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him."

"Mary." And then she knew him, and that great voice, that glorious presence dried her tears and gave back to her the happiness that had gone down with him into the grave.

We may not see that wondrous form this Easter time, nor hear that gentle voice, but by the guidance of some unseen hand the tears of womankind still are being wiped away. Not the tears of unexpected joy or racking grief—the expression of honest sentiment; nor yet the tears of maudlin sentimentality, which represent no more genuine feeling than the glycerin tears of the moving-picture screen. But the tears of pain and sorrow over the world's manifold ills—they are being dried as by the Master's kindly words.

"Woman, why weepest thou?"

"Because they have killed my only son—a sacrifice to war and greed and lust for power."

Within these past six months we have seen, we hope, the last of such tears as these. With navies scrapped, with armies reduced in size, with many of war's dreadful engines of destruction banned; with a League of Nations, or an Association—call it what you will; with such a Conference as that at Washington; the world draws nearer to an end of war, with all its death and tears, than at any time in the centuries since Jesus lived on earth. "Blessed are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted." Can we but enter upon an era of international good will, when the brother love that He taught shall be true in fact, the tears of women shall not have been shed in vain.

"Woman, why weepest thou?"

"Because my husband is a drunkard, who neglects his home and his children, wasting his means, ruining his health and his mind."

Even to-day, with an imperfect prohibition, her tears are being wiped away and many and many a home is brighter and better and happier. For more than two years the saloon has been closed, and though in big cities the bootlegger flourishes and the home brewer makes his blinding concoctions, the restriction of strong drink is seventy-five per cent effective, and the mother who faced the future of her son with fear and trembling can put away her apprehensions in the gradual total elimination of temptation.

"Woman, why weepest thou?"

"Because my daughter is carried away by jazz; because, outwardly at least, she has lost the virtues of good womanhood; because her dress, her speech, her behavior are those of indecency."

Some mothers well may weep for such daughters—and, if they but realized it, for themselves as well. But in the main the jazz daughters are a small minority—though a noisy and blatant and self-advertising minority, to be sure—even in the great cities where their kind will always flourish.

And through the power of such anti-jazz crusades as that recently conducted by THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL we are coming to our senses, and the girls who plunged into the giddy whirl are tiring of their folly and turning their energy to useful things.

May we never see the time when the tears of compassion shall be dried up; the world would be a hard, cold place indeed without them. But swiftly come the day when the wells of misery and woe shall be eliminated, and we shall face our Easter days with the joyous spirit of the Moravians of old Winston-Salem, whose wonderful observance of Christ's resurrection is described elsewhere in this issue under the title of The Easter People. To them the day of the risen Lord is one of peace and happiness, to be ushered in with trumpets, to be spent in reverence of the dead, but not with tears—save perhaps the tears that rise unbidden at sight or reading of this unusual celebration.

Charles Kingsley wrote that

*Men must work, and women must weep,
And there's little to earn, and many to keep,
Though the harbor bar be moaning.*

and for his time he was wholly right. But what he could not foresee was that in the bare half century since his day the weeping, clinging-vine, mid-Victorian woman would have grown to stalwart partnership with man, taking a well-earned place in business, in government, in the arts and professions, leading him in her vigorous crusades for right. If the tears of womanhood are being wiped away, it is largely by woman's own efforts that the good has been accomplished.

Quicksands of Filth

IT HAS been a hard winter for the purveyors of filth. Dirty plays, dirty movies and dirty books have not done so well. It is the fault of a dull, stubborn public unable to free itself from fetters of ancestral traditions and "taints" of puritanism, that still demands the clean and wholesome and will pay for none other.

The big theatrical successes of the season are plays that the most exacting parents would not hesitate to take their children to. There's "The Bat," for instance, crudely thrilling, but sufficiently clean to pass any Blue Law censorship test, running into its third year. There's Frank Bacon in "Lightnin'" going into its fourth year. There's "Miss Lulu Bett" and "The First Year," plays that failed to emphasize any degenerate or morbid sex motives.

Furthermore, this clean stuff that has been so hugely successful is distinctively American. It bears no foreign label, it does not reek of the Orientalism that has injected itself into the control and direction of American entertainment. It is anti-jazz. It pays honest respects to all the decencies in the old-fashioned American home. It is the sort of creation in entertainment that THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL is condemned for by that noisy but unimportant little group of professional pagans who would like to direct the literature and art of the present generation. It has succeeded preëminently where scores of bedroom farces have lost fortunes and been cast into the refuse bins. It has gone forward on the solid ground of so-called American prudery during the hard times of the past year, while the competing trash has been vanishing day after day through the quicksands of filth.

Alas, we are too crass and unrefined, too phlegmatic and too flat of the cranium to support the "artistic" nastiness that has been fed to us in book, play and movie since we began to settle down to our sober senses! Easy money and curiosity made a brief golden era for the profiteers in degeneracy, but it couldn't last.

These same profiteers are happily going bankrupt. It's too bad we can't deport a few shiploads of them. But we can educate their pocketbooks, which is the only sentient nerve possessed by the majority. We can boycott their rotten plays and their rotten movies and their rotten books, and we don't have to organize to do so. It's in our blood, those of us who are substantially American—and that is the most of us. We just haven't the palate for it, no matter how vile our secret thoughts may be in the fetid philosophy of the psychoanalysts.

Altogether, it's fine to take inventory this spring and find that we prefer the breath of new-mown hay and simple Colonial decorations to Oriental perfumes and the interior furnishings of brothels.

College Women and Race Suicide

Does Higher Education Unfit Them for Marriage and Motherhood?

By WILLIAM S. SADLER, M.D.

MOTHERCRAFT should be taught in season and out of season in our educational system. Motherhood should be elevated and extolled in the eyes of our young women from the later years of high school throughout their college careers. The young woman should be taught that she does not have to choose between marriage and a career, but that in a large number of cases a woman may have both. Many a professional woman to-day is successful in a career, and at the same time is rearing a reasonable-sized family and enjoying all the normal blessings of married life with home and children. This is one of the great reasons why the eugenicist favors coeducation, and the biologist sanctions every opportunity for superior young people to meet, fall in love, marry and raise families.

The first difficulty we confront is the failure of many women belonging to the supposedly superior classes to marry. Let us analyze the situation in this way: Of every two hundred babies born to first-class American stock, 103 will be boys and 97 girls. By the time these girls grow up to be twenty years of age, on an average, about 20 will have died, leaving only 77 women of marriageable age to whom we must look for the reproduction of the various racial elements of the nation.

A Little Matter of Statistics

BUT not all of these seventy-seven women will marry. The investigations made by Sprague and others in the consideration of this problem are very illuminating. For instance, in certain sections of New England studied the marriageable women between twenty and thirty-five were found to show one-fifth spinsters. On the other hand, in investigations in connection with agricultural colleges it was found that only about one-tenth of the marriageable women were spinsters, suggesting that the daughters of farmers marry more generally than those of some other classes.

From all investigations available it would seem that about fifteen per cent of native American women of the better class do not marry, at least during the child-bearing period. Now if we deduct this number from our supposed 77 possible wives out of approximately a hundred, it leaves us only 65. Now it has been further shown, for instance among the native married women of Massachusetts, that twenty per cent do not bear children. So, if we deduct these 13 childless women from our 65 possible wives, it leaves us 52 potential child-bearing women out of 97, among the superior classes of society, who are the sole hope of the future of the race.

If we further allow that four or five per cent of child-bearing women meet with such accidents as tendency toward premature birth, or become afflicted with some disease during the child-bearing period of life, or through surgical operations, after having borne one or more children, are rendered unable to bear more, it would necessitate a further deduction of two, thus leaving fifty women out of every one hundred who would probably be able to yield offspring throughout the child-bearing period of life. Thus having started out with two hundred children born to American parents, it turns out that only fifty of them can be depended upon for bearing our future citizens. In other words, of all the babies born in the country, only twenty-five per cent of them can and do become actual mothers in reproducing the next generation.

It is thus evident, in studying infant mortality rates, that every woman who does bear children must bear at least four to enable the race to hold its own. Race suicide confronts us if every child-bearing mother does not, on the average, produce these four offspring, for the production of three children apiece would not enable the race to quite hold its own.

Now we are aware of the more recent propaganda that quality is what is desired in offspring, not quantity, and while it is true in a general way, at the same time, after we have done our best to improve the quality of the next generation, we must see to it that a sufficient quantity is also afforded to provide for proper replacement of the preceding generation. Quantity is not so important, as compared with quality, until it reaches a certain minimum which presages race suicide if the decline is not arrested. The writer fears the result upon the race consciousness of the nation of this doctrine of quality versus quantity if the shortsighted and dangerous elements in it are not recognized and avoided. There is much plausible truth in the teaching, but it is obvious that it is highly dangerous if carried too far.

The Flaw in the Plea for Limitation

STRENGTH of inherited character and superior racial qualities are, of course, the most desirable elements to wish for in any state or nation; but if this element of supposed eugenic teaching is carried too far—for instance, if the superior families of this country average only one child apiece and we do nothing to restrict reproduction on the part of the inferior classes—where will this country be in a hundred years? Who will dominate and determine the character of our civilization two or three generations hence? No matter what the plea for this undue limiting of the size of the family, whether it be economic, social or ethical, the character of the pretense is of little consequence; the practical result will be the extinction of the stock of those who preach or practice this extreme doctrine of undue limitation of offspring in accordance with the modern slogan of quality of offspring versus quantity.

This does not mean that we are contending for a high birth rate as a virtue in and of itself. Eugenists are not advocating enormous families just for the sake of speedy quantitative increase in the population. Eugenics is satisfied with a moderate increase, a steady, gradual, healthy growth.

We would welcome a decline in the birth rate of some classes of the population, but the difficulty is that the tendency toward decline in reproduction is among the very classes that are necessary to national development and solidarity, whereas the inferior classes continue to reproduce in a vigorous fashion, showing no evidence at all of any decline in the birth rate.

The decline in birth rate at the present time is taking place in those strata of society from which we secure our leaders, the type of men and women who become pioneers and organizers in commerce, industry, politics, literature, art, religion, science, and so on. In other words, race suicide is starting in not among the lower social orders, but among the so-called native-American stock, from which in the past we have secured our eminent men and women.

The Important Question To-day

IF WE have only three children per family, it has been calculated that at the end of a hundred years each thousand persons to-day would then be represented by only 687 individuals. This is on the supposition that the death rate is 15 per 1000 of population.

Now let us look for a minute at the inferior strata of society. Even though they have a higher death rate—say, 20 per 1000 population—suppose they reproduce at only the moderate rate of 33 per thousand, which would be only thirteen more than are needed to balance their higher death rate; at the end of a hundred years each thousand persons now would be represented by 3600. If, then, the superior and inferior elements of society started out exactly equal, at the end of a century the ratio would be 1:6, while in two hundred years it would be 1:30. It is evident that it would require only a very few generations for the superior, and at present dominating, American stocks to commit race suicide, to be utterly and forever swamped in this biologic flood of predominant but inferior fertility.

The important question for us to ask to-day is, From what levels of society are we recruiting the race; who are the parents of the offspring who are to become the controlling factors of the next generation?

Until about fifty years ago it was the proper thing in all English-speaking countries for the better classes of society to have large families, but a gradual change has been taking place regarding this matter. Now large families are rare in the upper classes of the community, and even in the ranks of the skilled artisans, but the same old-fashioned large families still come to the homes of the thriftless, the unskilled laborer and the feeble-minded and lower classes of the social order. At least it has become true of the better classes of English-speaking peoples—and

(Continued on Page 58)

The Revolt of Julia LeClair

By ANNE GERTRUDE SNELLER

THE time is the present; the place, anywhere;
And the curtain arises on Julia LeClair.
Julia LeClair was a trainer of youth
In wisdom and truth,
With a college degree,
A hard-earned A. B.,
And a Phi Beta Kappa, including the key.
I confess she was short on the heroine dope;
You could view her without making plans to elope,
For whatever of knowledge she had in her head
Her hair remained red;
Her nose, somewhat freckled, turned up in surprise
Toward her kindly blue eyes;
Her mouth sat in judgment on conduct and creed
And betokened that word would be followed by deed;
But her friends and the children were firmly agreed,
Though no hunter of "Follies" would look at her twice,
Miss Julia was nice.

The house that she lived in stood next a garage
And scantily sheltered Miss Julia's ménage—
An elderly mother,
An invalid brother,
And at regular seasons some cousin or other;
And in keeping them cheerful and soothing their ills
And earning the money for paying the bills
And being their comfort, their prop and their stay,
Miss Julia was busy an eighteen-hour day.

Now leave we this near-proletariat section
And fly with our Muse in a different direction
To the City Hall towers—late Gothic, restored—
Where assemble the gentlemen forming the Board.
The Board was elected for three years' duration
On the classical platform in representation,
That it takes politicians
To fill such positions,
Since they best understand why we need education.

The Board was entitled to special renown
Through its genius in keeping the school taxes down
By contracts with teachers who lived in the town.
They said that it fostered municipal pride
(They never resigned, or got married, or died)
And since living at home is much cheaper, you know,
(And undoubtedly less for a woman than man)
You must use local talent as far as 'twill go,
And save when you can!
Their duty was clear:
Eight hundred a year
Was a proper reward for Miss Julia's career;
And out of eight hundred the members were sure
She could care for her mother and give to the poor.
So serene in the feeling of duty well done,
The Board motored off on a country-club run.

"How unfair," says the public, "that teachers are free
At half after three!
Why, just look at me!
I stay on till four
Or a few minutes more—
Unless there's a strike;
Then I quit when I like.
But teachers! I'll say
They don't earn their pay."

Behold now the pupils, assembled in row,
With Julia to train them the way they should go—
Isaac and Rastus and Tony and Pat,
Ivan and John Quincy Adams Dorratt,
Victorine, Angeline, Judith, Donnetta,
Chloe and Bridget and Mary Gambetta.
The Reds and the Blacks in the most approved manner
Saluted each morning The Star-Spangled Banner.

Miss Julia, believe me, found plenty to teach;
She straightened their shoulders, their morals, their speech;
The sun's early beams
Found her marking their themes;
She dramatized plays
For the school holidays,
And gave without price
The most expert advice
From the heavens above to the waters beneath—
The social advantage of brushing the teeth;
The books that they read and the movies they saw;
Respect for the law;
The feeding of babies that fell to their care;
Some general suggestions on washing the hair;
The treatment of immigrants just off the boat;
And the civic importance of going to vote.

But prices in peace times continued to rise,
While Miss Julia's eight hundred remained the same size.
Insurance and veal,
Tea and cornmeal,
Needles and rubbers and paper and rent,
Carfare and coal
Each made a hole,

And the lighting bill swallowed the very last cent.
Miss Julia was feeling a good deal depressed
When Cousin Eliza arrived for a rest,
The invalid brother developed a cough,
And—just as a climax—the ceilings came off.

Now it chanced that the paper on Saturday morn
Gave a list of the bargains of Curtis and Thorn.
Miss Julia was looking for something in shoes,
When a prominent headline stood out from the news:

SOCIETY LEADERS ARE TEARING THEIR HAIR!
NO COOKS ANYWHERE,
WELL DONE OR RARE,
TO PEEL OR TO PARE!
MRS. BURNS-LYMAN VOORHEES IS QUITE IN DESPAIR!

When seen at her home by a Post-Herald man
Mrs. Voorhees reclined on a pale-green divan
Becomingly gowned in a silk robe-de-chambre
Embroidered in fur—
A popular fashion created by her.
Mrs. Voorhees said frankly: "I fear from the looks
That the country is facing a shortage of cooks,
Since two hundred a month and a bonus for pay
Won't tempt them to stay.

Without shredded wheat
We'd have nothing to eat!
I myself am intensely distressed by the question,
For I'm writing a series of books on digestion.
I can't work on my book
Till I hunt up a cook.
I will pay any price to someone who will try it,
While I finish the chapter: Do Bolsheviks Diet?
I feel that the problem admits no delay
Or the homes of the nation will fall to decay."
Our readers remember,
No doubt, last December
The very delightful readings she gave
From her earlier volume: Do Bolsheviks Bathe?

Miss Julia read on to the very last word,
And wrath in her bosom was suddenly stirred:
If a cook earned the wage Mrs. Voorhees was giving,
Could it be that a teacher was not worth a living?
But just as she threw down the page with a sigh
The following item attracted her eye,
Tucked in with a number of trivial features:
"The Board meets at ten,
And will take up again
Their recent discussion of raises for teachers."

Miss Julia arose and put on her hat—
Not merely last season's, but five before that!
Her head was awhirl, and her pulses were dizzy,
But a clear, inward voice whispered: "Julia, get busy!"

The Board had recorded unanimous ayes
On certain commissions allowed on supplies,
When a vigorous knocking struck loud on the air,
And the office door opened on Julia LeClair.
The chairman came forward, extending his hand,
With a welcoming smile that was slightly too bland.
As a brewer of beer
And a war profiteer,
He had modestly garnered a million a year.
He gave her a seat where his colleagues could see
And urged her to tell what her errand might be.

They waited in silence for her to begin,
And Julia plunged in:
"I've a question or two
That I want to ask you.
I read in the paper, cooks constantly leave,
Though two hundred a month is what they receive.
Do you think it would take Much more effort to make

A salad and pudding and broil a beefsteak
Than to fit mind and soul
For their ultimate goal
Of living—each one for the good of the whole?
Do you think it is true
That concocting a stew
Is a matter of magic, confined to a few?
Do you think sinks and drains
Need superior brains,
While working with children is not worth the pains?
Do you really believe that a cook requires skill,
But that teaching's a job any person can fill?
And if you don't think so, why are you so slow
In giving the raise we earned long ago?"

The Board was unable to listen to more.
Had a Red Revolution walked in at the door?
Were people who teach
To have freedom of speech?
They all felt a horror undreamed of before.
The chairman first rallied, and then took the floor:

"But, my dear Miss LeClair,

Are you not aware
That taxes are high, and the public won't stand
To let us throw money about on demand?

I have listened with pain
To the socialist strain
That seems to suggest that your thoughts are on gain
Instead of on character, noble and great,
Which you train for the state.
Oh, think of the field
And the harvest 'twill yield
When you sow the desire
For things nobler and higher!
Your mission is something so great and divine,
No weak words of mine
Can express half the feelings that gush from my heart
When I think of your part
In guiding and guarding these earlier years —"
He paused, for his eloquence moved him to tears.

But said Julia LeClair,
Sitting firm in her chair:
"I'm not here for praise;
What I want is a raise."

The shocking rejoinder deprived him of speech.
Had the woman no heart that a tribute could reach?
He consulted the others what course to pursue,
Then turned to Miss Julia and started anew:
"The Board as a unit is willing to do
What is just to the teacher and taxpayer too;
And since we desire our teachers to be Contented, and free
From financial distress,
With an ample allowance for extras in dress—
Since everyone knows
That suitable clothes
Are bound to react on the taste of the scholars—
The Board will be glad,
For the next year, to add
An annual increase of twenty-five dollars."

Miss Julia LeClair
Got up from her chair
With the will to be heard and the courage to dare.
Her skirt had been dyed
And hung on one side;
Her shoes had been tapped;
And her fingers were wrapped
In gloves she had bought at a Thanksgiving sale;
Her stockings were frail
(It is scarcely worth while
To note—they were lisle);
But the spirit of Liberty blazed in her hair,
And the goddess had nothing on Julia LeClair.

"Such a generous increase I did not foresee;
But I can't have your consciences troubled for me.
Since cooking's important and also well paid,
And society women are calling for aid,
And since freedom from kitchens means writing a book,
Why," said Julia LeClair, "thank heaven, I can cook!
You may keep as home missions
Your teaching positions;
And someone may have mine—
For I herewith resign."

Mrs. Burns-Lyman Voorhees is quite at her ease;
Her dinners are famous, and so are her teas.
Her table is covered with sumptuous fare
Prepared by the fingers of Julia LeClair.
Mrs. Voorhees has finished The Bolshevik Church,
And will take up home topics for future research.
She plans a campaign to discover the reason
Why teachers are scarcer than ever this season;
She feels that the problem admits no delay,
Or the schools of the nation will fall to decay.

Here's Nature's prescription for every description
Of "fever" that comes in the Spring.
To fill you with vim, make you frisky and trim
This Vegetable Soup is the thing!

15 different vegetables nourishing cereals—rich beef broth

Enjoy them all in this delicious Vegetable Soup!

In every tempting plateful of this soup you get the iron of the green vegetables, the beneficial salts, the strength-giving cereals and the invigorating meat stock that your appetite relishes and your system needs. Nature's own spring tonic—healthful and delightful.

Choice white potatoes, Jersey "sweets," Chantenay carrots, tender yellow turnips—all daintily diced. Luscious tomatoes, sliced Dutch cabbage. Country Gentleman corn, baby lima beans, small peas, selected barley, alphabet macaroni—all blended with a rich stock made from fine beef, flavored with fresh herbs and tasty seasoning. Almost a whole meal—and what a good one!

21 kinds

12 cents a can

How to improve your appetite

Eat good soup at least once every day. Have it piping hot. You will notice in a short time that you are more hungry and that all your food tastes better. The hot soup causes the digestive fluids to flow freely. Your appetite is increased and your digestion is better.

Campbell's SOUPS

LOOK FOR THE RED AND WHITE LABEL

Why Do Our Mothers and Babies Die?

By S. JOSEPHINE BAKER, M.D.

Director, Bureau of Child Hygiene, Department of Health, New York City

A STRIKING cartoon appeared recently in a European paper. Three men, labeled Business, Reformer and Labor, are talking together, and out of the mouth of each comes the words: "We must plan for the future." Over in one corner, sick and neglected, is a baby, and below this tiny atom of humanity appears the statement: "Have you forgotten that I am the future?"

Isn't that just what we are forgetting in this country? Here we are, the most prosperous, the richest and industrially the most advanced nation in the world. Herbert Hoover said not long ago: "The attitude of a nation toward child welfare will soon become the test of its civilization." How do we in the United States stand this test? We have done a great deal for the child of school age. We have reduced the death rate of babies from digestive diseases to a considerable extent, but the death rate among our mothers, due to conditions relating to childbirth, and the deaths of babies during the first month of life have not been decreased; on the contrary, they have shown in many parts of the country a distinct increase. Of seventeen leading nations of the world, the United States stands at the bottom of the list as far as the death rate of its mothers from accidents and diseases of childbirth is concerned, and sixth in the list with regard to the death rate of its babies.

In a report issued by the Federal Children's Bureau some years ago, it was stated that of the large cities in the United States that were studied, the maternal death rate showed a distinct and decided increase in every one of the cities, with the exception of New York.

During the nineteen months we were at war, for every soldier who died as a result of wounds, one mother in the United States went down into the valley of the shadow and did not return. Whatever we may think of the necessity of war, we realize that, once started, it cannot be called a safe occupation; in fact, the risks and hazards of fighting are too well known to need more than mere recognition of their existence, but the risks that women take in fulfilling their destiny as mothers of the next generation are almost entirely unnecessary. These risks are being prevented in many other countries; they can be prevented in the United States.

A Poor Record for the United States

WHAT are those other nations doing for their women that we have neglected in this country? In countries like England, Wales, Scotland and New Zealand, where the public has recognized the common justice of protecting women and has formulated state-wide systems of public instruction of expectant mothers and provided for decent care at the time of confinement, the death rate of women from causes incident to the bearing of children has steadily declined, and the former high death rate of infants during the first month of life has shown a corresponding decrease. In the other countries that show a more favorable maternal death rate than the United States, there has been for many years a recognition that the midwives who attend so many of these women must be educated and supervised; consequently, in the countries where the use of these trained midwives is almost universal, the death rates of mothers are not so high as they are in the United States where the number of births reported by midwives varies from 30 per cent in some states to 70 per cent in others, where midwives are untrained, unsupervised, ignorant and harmful. The standard of medical practice is just as high in the United States as it is in any of the foreign countries. The difficulty, therefore, would seem to be in the lack of opportunity to secure good medical care from physicians, and the consequent dependence upon untrained care at this most important period in a woman's life.

Conditions in the United States, as they exist to-day, are certainly not to our credit. More women between the ages of fifteen and forty-five years die each year from accidents and diseases connected with childbirth than from any other cause except tuberculosis. Moreover, throughout the United States, out of every one hundred babies who die during the first year of life, forty do not live through the first month of their existence. This is a situation of neglect. Women who are anxious for information, who want to live and to bring up their children to be strong men and women, often have no opportunity of getting the simple information that will help them. In many of our large cities where this information is available there are still vast groups of women who make no effort to inform themselves regarding the simple methods of care that are necessary to insure their own health and the health of their little ones. Throughout the United States there are areas where women are living thirty to forty miles from a doctor; there are many counties where there are no hospital facilities whatever, and there are remote residences so inaccessible that little or no aid can ever be given personally; therefore there are thousands of women who at the present time are going through all the experiences of bearing and rearing families without any help other than the untrained assistance that can be given by some member of the family or a near neighbor.

The time has come when we should no longer make a mystery or secret of the facts that mean life and health to so many of our mothers toward first birthdays is baby comes we acknowledge. The proudest new father and mother, first baby, but during mother should be filled the thought that she is world, when everyone honor her for her condition have a mind that is free knowingly or unknowingly surround her with a mental attitude that is not conducive to that serenity of mind and joy in the future that makes for her own and her baby's well-being.

Bringing children into the world is a normal process. There is no reason why the great majority of mothers who are now subjected to risks at the time of childbirth should not live and be strong and well, and there is also no reason why the great majority of babies who are born should not live. Those babies who give up the struggle for existence during the first month of life are those who have not had a chance to live, because their existence invariably depends upon the health of the mother before the baby is born. Of the three hundred thousand babies under one year of age who died in the United States last year, one hundred and twenty thousand died because their mothers were not well and strong enough themselves to give their children strength and vitality to live longer than one month.

The lowest maternal mortality rate in the world is that of Italy, where for every one thousand births, two mothers died. Certainly, we can afford our American mothers the same protection Italian mothers receive. In Germany and Japan, seven mothers died for every two thousand babies born. In England there were eight maternal deaths for every two thousand births, while France had nine deaths of mothers for every two thousand babies born. In the United States there were thirteen mothers who died for every two thousand births. It is difficult to establish a standard in this respect, but the ideal to be reached by any community certainly should not be more than the two maternal deaths per thousand births which are now recorded by Italy.

Reducing Maternity Risks

AS FAR as death rates from accidents and diseases of childbirth are concerned, one feels that there should be no death rate at all. As a matter of fact, there probably will always be some risk, just as there is always some risk at any time of life, but the risk and hazard should not be any greater at the time of maternity than it is at any other time.

The problem is not confined to any one section of the country. From one coast to the other mothers are asking for help for themselves and for their unborn children. Curiously enough, this situation is one that varies in our different race groups, but is not affected by what is known as "social position." The highest baby death rate we have during the first month of life is among the babies of American mothers. Every race group of foreign birth we have in this country shows a better record in this respect than our native born. As far as their own health and welfare are concerned, mothers of the well-to-do classes seem to have the best chance, but this is because they often have the opportunity of obtaining the best possible maternity care. The same good record does not hold true with their babies, for while mothers who have little, if any, money to spend may suffer because they cannot have the services of good doctors and nurses, it is also true that ignorance of proper methods of personal hygiene and baby care bear very little relation to the possession of wealth or even moderate means. The rich mother may be just as ignorant as the poor one, and ignorance must bear an equal share of blame with lack of facilities for proper care.

The methods of reducing the risks of maternity and the baby deaths during the early part of life are so well known and have been so well proved that it is difficult to understand why every woman has not had the advantage of them long before this, and why we have been so neglectful of our own that our country occupies its present humiliating position with regard to its lack of care of its mothers and children.

What is known as "prenatal care," which should be available to every mother in the country, means the kind of instruction that may be given to them so that they may keep themselves in good physical condition before the baby comes, be assured of competent maternity care at the time of birth and give to the baby in its early life every possible chance of health and strength. In all the states and cities where the public health authorities have assumed responsibility for this problem and have sent out literature on maternity and prenatal care, where they have provided nurses to go into the homes, on request, and instruct mothers in the simple methods that are necessary to keep them well, where they have raised the standards of maternity care so that women need no longer fear the unnecessary perils of this time, the results have been truly marvelous.

Conditions in New York City may be mentioned to show what can be done. The city of New York has a lower death rate of mothers than any of the other large cities of the United States where proper statistics are available for study, and a lower death rate of mothers from preventable causes than any of those cities in the United States or any of the cities of Europe where the facts and data are available. This is due to the fact that for many years New York City has maintained supervision over the practice of midwives, requiring them to be educated in a municipal school maintained for the purpose, and issuing permits to practice only to women who show that they are educated, competent and clean. It is now as safe for both mother and child for a baby to be born in New York City as anywhere else in the world.

Federal Aid for Maternity

AGAIN, in New York City, Boston, Chicago, Philadelphia, and other places where prenatal work has been carried on, it has been found that if mothers can be given the necessary health instruction along simple lines during the months before the baby comes, their own health can be assured and this appallingly high death rate of babies in the first month can be reduced at least one-half and frequently two-thirds. This condition stands out in striking contrast to conditions in the United States as a whole. William Travis Howard, Jr., of Johns Hopkins University, in commenting upon the maternal death rates in this country, states: "Maternal death rates [in the United States], whether viewed in comparison with the rates for England and Wales or considered alone, are appallingly high. . . . These rates . . . are probably unparalleled in modern times in a civilized country. They are 120 per cent greater than the average rate for England and Wales for 1911 to 1915."

The first public recognition of the great need of mothers and babies in this country was brought out by the Federal Children's Bureau, under the wise and efficient leadership of Miss Julia C. Lathrop. A bill for Federal aid for the protection of maternity and infancy was introduced in the Sixty-fifth Congress by Miss Jeannette Rankin, the first woman member of Congress of the United States. The bill was favorably reported out of committee, but did not pass. It was again introduced in the Sixty-sixth Congress by a Democratic member of the Senate and a Republican member of the House of Representatives. It passed the Senate, went to the House, was favorably reported out of the House Committee, but was not voted upon. Again, in April, 1921, in the first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress, the bill was introduced and was passed by the Senate in July, 1921. It was passed by the House in November, 1921. This bill was known as the Sheppard-Towner Bill.

The act provides that the United States shall give to every state in the nation ten thousand dollars to start a system of maternity and infant care, and shall thereafter give to each state, in proportion to its inhabitants, a pro-rata part of the one million dollars to be appropriated by the bill, provided each state raises an equal amount. A central Federal committee, consisting of the Secretary of Agriculture, the Surgeon-General of the United States Public Health Service, the United States Commissioner of Education and the Chief of the Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor, are required to pass upon all plans made by the states for their maternal and child welfare work. When the plans are approved, however, the money is paid to the state with the sole requirement that it shall be spent under the authority of its state division of child hygiene, or, if there is no such division, under a special state agency created for such purpose.

There was nothing in the Sheppard-Towner Bill that warranted the criticism that was made of it or the opposition that was brought out. The act does not allow a health visitor to go uninvited into any home, nor does it take

(Continued on Page 174)

Doctor Baker, who, as Director of the Bureau of Child Hygiene of the New York City Department of Health, has been responsible for an unprecedented reduction in the infant mortality rate of the city, has prepared for the Home Journal a series of nine letters to the expectant mother, with exceedingly valuable timely advice as to health, clothing and necessary preparations. On receipt of your name and address, together with 25 cents to cover the costs of printing and postage, these letters will be mailed monthly. Address Service Department, Ladies' Home Journal, Philadelphia, Pa.

Two New Nail Polishes—just perfected

Entirely new formulas that give a quicker, higher brilliance—that lasts

"We have made good polishes before, as have other manufacturers, but in these two new polishes we have introduced entirely new improvements that place them far ahead of anything of their kind."

Northam Warren
ORIGINATOR OF CUTEX

NOW, two new nail polishes that you will hail instantly as something distinctly beyond any you have ever used. They are in the two most popular forms of the moment—Powder Polish and Liquid Polish.

The Powder Polish is practically instantaneous. Just a few strokes of the nails across the soft part of the hand are sufficient to bring out the shine—a dazzling, jewel-like luster that is more brilliant and lasts better than any you have ever had before! It resists frequent washing—in fact, soap and water only improve it.

The texture of the powder itself is exceptionally smooth—the unpleasantly gritty quality that is so characteristic of powder polishes having been entirely overcome. And it has a "body" and firmness that prevent it from scattering wastefully. It is not in the least drying in its effect and will, therefore, never roughen the cuticle or make the nails brittle.

On account of the present vogue for pink finger tips, we have given it a somewhat stronger tint than our former polishes. And finally, we have added to it a delicate elusive fragrance.

The new Powder Polish
At last—a powder polish that is practically instantaneous and that retains its brilliance despite frequent washings.

The new Liquid Polish
Just stroke each nail daintily with the rosy fluid, and behold—a jewel-like luster that will last a week. A wonderful protection to the nails.

In the new Liquid Polish we have one that is entirely free from the objections to all former liquid polishes. It flows over the nail from the brush with an absolutely uniform smoothness, it dries instantly and leaves the most brilliant, delicately tinted luster—just like the inside of a sea-shell. It requires no buffing, of course, and it will keep its even brilliance for at least a week. When it begins to grow dull, you do not have to use a separate preparation to remove it. You simply put on a fresh coat of the polish, taking one nail at a time, and wipe it off quickly before it dries. This will leave the nail clean and ready for the new application. The Liquid Polish is the best possible protection to the nails. Used as a finishing touch, it will make a manicure last three times as long.

Really, you should try these two new polishes. Geraldine Farrar said when she tried them: "They are a revelation of what a nail polish should be." You will be amazed and delighted with their quickness, their brilliancy and their lasting quality. The Powder Polish is 35c a box and the Liquid Polish 35c a bottle.

The new Cutex Five-Minute Set at $1.00, announced below, contains the two new polishes. Other Cutex Sets come at 60c, $1.50 and $3.00. Or any Cutex article may be bought separately at 35c. At all drug and department stores in the United States and Canada and at chemist shops in England.

Send 5c today for samples of these two new polishes

We want you to try these two new polishes without delay. Fill out this coupon and mail it to us with five cents in coin or postage to cover cost of packing and mailing and we will send you samples of both. Address Northam Warren, 114 West 17th Street, New York. Or, if you live in Canada, Dept. 104, 200 Mountain Street, Montreal.

MAIL THIS COUPON WITH 5 CENTS TODAY

Northam Warren,
Dept. 104, 114 West 17th Street,
New York City.

Name _____

Street _____

City and State _____

The new Cutex Five-Minute Set with these two new polishes

Cutex announces a new assortment called the Five-Minute Set containing full-sized packages of these two new polishes, with a full-sized bottle of the Cutex Cuticle Remover, orange stick, and package of emery boards—exactly what you need for the quickest, easiest manicure. The price is $1.00.

PARAMOUNT PICTURES

listed in order of release

March 1, 1922, to May 1, 1922

Ask your theatre manager when he will show themWm. S. Hart in
"Travelin' On"
By William S. Hart
A William S. Hart Production.Elsie Ferguson and Wallace Reid in "Peter Ibbetson"
By George DuMaurier
A George Fitzmaurice Production."The Mistress of the World"
A Series of Four Paramount Pictures
With Mia May. Directed by Joe May
From the novel by Carl Higgler.Wallace Reid in
"The World's Champion"
Based on the play "The Champion"
By A. E. Thomas and Thomas Loudon.Gloria Swanson in "Her Husband's Trademark"
By Clara Beranger.Wanda Hawley in
"Bobbed Hair"
By Hector Turnbull
A Realart Production.Cecil B. DeMille's Production
"Fool's Paradise"
Suggested by Leonard Merrick's story
"The Laurels and the Lady."Constance Binney in
"The Sleep Walker"
By Aubrey Stauffer
A Realart Production.Marion Davies in
"The Young Diana"
By Marie Corelli
A Cosmopolitan Production.Betty Compson in A William D. Taylor Production
"The Green Temptation"
From the story "The Noose"
By Constance Lindsay Skinner.May McAvoy in
"Through a Glass Window"
By Olga Printzlau
A Realart Production."Find the Woman"
With Alma Rubens
By Arthur Somers Roche
A Cosmopolitan Production.Ethel Clayton in
"The Cradle"
Adapted from the play
By Eugene Brieux.Mary Miles Minter in
"The Heart Specialist"
By Mary Morison
A Realart Production.Agnes Ayres and Jack Holt in
"Bought and Paid For"
A William DeMille Production
Adapted from the play by George Broadhurst.Pola Negri in
"The Devil's Pawn."Dorothy Dalton in
"Tharon of Lost Valley."Wanda Hawley in
"The Truthful Liar"
By Will Payne
A Realart Production.John S. Robertson's Production
"The Spanish Jade"
By Maurice Hewlett."Is Matrimony a Failure?"
With T. Roy Barnes, Lila Lee, Lois Wilson and Walter Hiers.In Production, two Great Paramount PicturesCecil B. DeMille's
"Manslaughter"
From the novel by Alice Duer MillerGeorge Melford's
"Burning Sands"
From the novel by Arthur Weigall.
A Man's Answer to Mrs. E. M. Hull's
"The Sheikh"

*"I have just phoned the theatre—
there's a Paramount Picture on tonight.
We're all going; come on and join us!"*

HERE is the way to be sure of a great evening.

If the box office says Paramount,
all further questions are wasted breath.

This is the smart, modern way of buying entertainment, the way of avoiding the tedium and exasperation of wasting a couple of hours looking at film below your standard of taste.

The up-to-the-minute way is to buy by name in everything.

The name in motion pictures—the standard, guaranteeing the finest screen art, the foremost direction, acting, presentation, is Paramount.

Ten years of motion picture leadership are represented in that one name, the ten years it has taken Paramount to lift the screen from a stunt to the national entertainment.

Discriminate as to where and when you see photoplays—choose the Paramount occasions—and you are all set for a great time.

Telephone the box office and ask the question straight, "Is it a Paramount Picture tonight?"

If the answer is "Yes", you will know without asking that Star, Plot, Direction, Presentation, and everything that goes into a picture, are the very best.

Famous Players-Lasky Corporation is continuing to spend millions of dollars to draw to its ranks all the greatest talent to keep Paramount foremost.

Take advantage of this when you buy entertainment. Don't be a guesser.

Paramount Pictures

If it's a Paramount Picture it's the best show in town

If cretonne schemes, in all their magnificence, were duplicated more often, what gorgeous and expensive-looking homes we would have, to be sure!

Furnishing the Small Apartment for One Thousand Dollars

By Ethel Davis Seal: Drawings by Marion Dismant

THERE is rarely anyone who does not desire a home that is, from some point of view, remarkable. Joy may be added to life in just such proportion as we surround ourselves with refinement and beauty, and as we and our things are appreciated. If we have achieved a beautiful home, the certain remarks of admiring friends, such as "What an adorable room this is!" and "If only I were as clever at fixing things up as you are!" and "Where do you get the ideas for your stunning effects?" and "What lovely furniture you have!" all leave our hearts quite warm with pleasure, and fired with the desire to work harder than ever to continue to beautify this home that has been so auspiciously begun, this home that is remarkable already for its color harmony or its fine furniture, its restful backgrounds and gay curtains, its cheerful hearthfires—its whole cozy and homelike atmosphere.

But for the past few years there has been a growing belief that the furnishing that can be compassed by the modest income does not include any but the barest and most uninteresting necessities, which almost always seem fated to be bare of beauty too: stern library tables; smug, tufted tapestry sofas; uninviting and shiny cane inset chairs; hopelessly round pedestal dining tables, accompanied by most usual chairs with leather seats; maybe, even, beds of polished brass! Not a single imaginatively alluring thing to bless ourselves with, when all the while our mouths are watering for chintzy overstuffs, dropleafs, ruffles and paint!

You who long for modern magnificence, take heart! You who would have the full equal of choicest decorated eggshell enamels, up-to-date daybeds, taffeta bedspreads, floor reading lights, colors rich and daring, and so often the prerogative of wealth—in a single word, "smartness"—just show the tiniest tip-corner of your thousand dollars, and begin to-morrow the gayest and most effective of tiny homes. . . . And while we all know that without careful planning a thousand dollars doesn't accomplish the miracle toward setting up housekeeping that it used to do, in the hands of a clever and capable woman who has informed herself about the latest furniture offerings and values, and who is backed by an artistic inspiration, it may go amazingly far.

More than ever, young couples are deciding in favor of the small apartment: it is convenient, and cozy, and, oh, joy! there are not so many rooms to furnish! If the thousand dollars is spread over just three important rooms—the living room, the dining room and the bedroom—one has something worth while when moving to more spacious habitations.

(Continued on Page 102)

The dining room furniture may be bought in the suite and may be had in walnut for $275.00, including buffet, extension dropleaf table, with three extension leaves, and five chairs.

The bedroom furniture is enameled in white with soft blue beadings and decorations, and is extremely low priced at $48.00 for the double bed, and $45.00 for the bureau.

The Eskimo Twins in the Winter Night

(A story to be read in connection with the Eskimo Twin paper dolls on page 38.)

By LUCY FITCH PERKINS

Illustrated by the Author

IF ONE cold day last winter you had flown away northward on the wings of the wind, clear across the day and over the boundaries of the Arctic night, you would have found on the shores of the frozen sea a little Eskimo village of five igloos. To be sure, it would have taken sharp eyes to find it, for at this particular time the moon and stars were blotted out by whirling snowflakes, the wind blew in great gusts over the whole region, and the five huts were nothing but five white mounds strung in a row along a strip of snow-covered beach.

It would have seemed as if no human being could possibly live and be happy in such a desolate place; yet if you had been able to peep inside of the first of the five little snow-covered huts, this is what you might have seen: Tumbling about on the piled-up skins of the stone platform which was their bed were twin children, a boy and a girl about six years old, and tumbling about with them were their two little dogs, Nip and Tup. The children were laughing and the dogs were barking so you would hardly have been able to hear yourself think. Nip pretended there was a hare down a chink between the stones of the igloo, and scratched and barked and jumped about with his ears cocked until he really came to believe himself that there was one there.

Koollee, the twins' mother, was seated in a snug nest of furs at one end of the stone bed sewing on a coat of blue and white fox skins for Monnie, the little girl. She hadn't many clothes on for the igloo was warm, and her bare toes stuck up out of the white bear skin she was sitting on. Tup saw them wiggle and barked and nipped at them with his sharp teeth for a joke until Koollee boxed his ears and sent him howling back to the other end of the bed where sat Keshoo, the twins' father, making a fine new sling shot for Menie, the little boy. Here he seized the leather thong of the sling shot and shook it, growling as fiercely as if he were engaged in a heroic battle with some wild beast, until Keshoo also boxed his ears and sent him howling back to where Nip was still barking down the crack, where there wasn't any hare.

THEN Menie and Monnie each seized a dog by the back of his neck, and Menie said, "Come on, let's go over to Koko's hut"—Koko was their best friend—"and make a harness for Nip and Tup. We'll take them along."

"You'll do nothing of the sort," said Koollee promptly. "The snow is up to your necks now and you couldn't take a single step in it, much less go clear to the other end of the village."

"But what can we do then?" cried Menie. "We're tired of playing with Nip and Tup and it isn't time to sleep again! We just woke up a little bit of a while ago."

Now Keshoo, the father, was a great story-teller as well as a great hunter and a wonderful kayak man; in fact, there were very few things that have to be done by the Eskimo that Keshoo could not do better than anyone else in the village.

"You keep quiet like good children, and keep the dogs still, too, and I will tell you a story," said Keshoo.

Menie immediately snuggled Nip in his lap and Monnie cuddled Tup in hers and the story began. The little dogs were not interested and went to sleep almost at once but the twins sat up with their ears and mouths both wide open and listened with all their ears; and this is the story they heard:

"Once upon a time," said Keshoo, "there was a season of great hunger among the Innuits. That is the Eskimo name for human beings. The winter had been long and hard, but few bears had been killed and there were not enough seals stored away to feed the people. The salmon which they had caught in summer and kept frozen for winter use were all gone, and starvation stared them in the face."

"The wise men of the village met together to consider what should be done."

"I TELL you what we should do," said the wisest man. "In a village to the south I have heard there is a powerful Angakok who understands all magic and can work miracles. Let us send for him to come, and if he can break the evil spell that is laid upon us and bring back the seals to our shores we will pay him well."

"You'll have to pay him anyway, or he will not come," said another.

"What have we to give?" said a third. "There is no meat."

"We can give him a fine reindeer skin," said the wisest man.

"So they sent for the Angakok, the great medicine man from the south, and when he came all the people met together in one of the houses, the lights were put out and everybody sat in silence and darkness for the length of a long sleep while he made magic to bring back the seals."

"The sky was red when at last the Angakok broke the long silence, saying in a loud voice: 'Open your eyes, my children. I have been on a long journey with my Tornak as guide. Your troubles are over. Go now to your hunting.'"

"It was still too early in the season for the sun to come up over the rim of the world, but the hunters set off at once in the red dawn light with joy in their hearts, expecting to come home laden with seal meat for their hungry wives and children. But, alas, though they searched far inland and went far out on the ice, they came home empty handed. There were no seals, no bears had been seen, and as for reindeer, it was as if none had ever been.

"Meantime the Angakok had taken his fine reindeer skin and gone away to his home in the south. The people grew hungrier and hungrier. Again and again the hunters went out to search for game, and as often they came back with nothing. At last in despair the wise men of the village met together once more and sent for still another Angakok, and again when he came the people all sat obediently in silence and darkness while he worked his spells."

"Just as the other magician had done, he told the people that they must keep their eyes shut tight until he returned from his journey to the ends of the earth to bring back with him the seals."

"Now," said Keshoo, and his voice grew very low and impressive, "there were in that company two little orphans, a boy and a girl, just about as big as you, Menie and Monnie, and although no one knew it at the time, they were really great Angakoks themselves. Think of it! Two little children no bigger than you could do magic!"

"WHEN the magician had taken his place in the middle of the igloo and all the people had shut their eyes he said in a loud voice, 'Now, my children, I am going away. I am going to disappear through the earth. Even if you were to disobey and open your eyes you would not find me. With my Tornak I shall go on a journey to the ends of the world. Now I am on my way, I am sinking, sinking through the floor! While I am gone let no one so much as peep through his fingers! I am almost gone! Good-by, good-by!' His voice grew fainter and fainter, there was a rustling sound in the middle of the room and then all was still."

"Now the two orphans, being Angakoks themselves, had never so much as winked their eyes, and they saw that instead of disappearing through the earth the old impostor was lying on the floor all the time. So one of them called out, 'Look, look! The Angakok has not gone away at all. He's lying on the floor. Bring a light!'"

"Hi," shouted Menie, "that was just what Koko did to our own Angakok! Don't you remember the time he got stuck in the tunnel and then afterwards when he said he could go through the earth or fly through the air any time he liked, Koko called right out loud, 'Why did he get stuck in the tunnel then?'"

The twins laughed aloud, for they remembered how funny their own Angakok had looked stuck in the entrance of their igloo with Nip and Tup barking at him; and then Menie said, "Do you suppose Koko is an Angakok too?"

His father chuckled a little at that. "I've never seen any signs of it," said he. And Koollee said, "Children, you must not laugh at the Angakok. It isn't safe. He might lay a spell on you."

THE twins stopped laughing at once and Keshoo went on with the tale: "When the lamp was brought in, there was the Angakok, just as the orphans had said, and he was a very angry Angakok too. He got up off the floor and pointed his finger at the two children and said, 'Very well, if you believe these two wicked, impertinent young ones know more than I do let them get back the seals and find food for you! Let them try to make magic!'"

"Of course he never thought they would do it, and neither did anyone else; so you can just think how astonished all the people were when one of the orphans said, 'Very well then, bring in the boat skins!'"

"The skins were brought in at once and placed on the floor. Then the two orphans put out the lights, put on their bird skin garments, got down on the floor and ran about in circles around the edge of the skins, and what do you think?"

"Away they went right through the earth! The Innuits watched through the window and saw them come up through the sand on the beach and disappear over the ice."

"For a long time the people waited and at last in the dawn the orphans came back through the floor of the igloo and took off their bird skin garments."

"Look!" they cried. "Seals in great numbers are coming, but no one must kill two. You may capture one apiece and no more, or the supply will give out."

"Away went the hunters like the wind. It was a miracle! There was a great herd of seals sprawling about on the ice, and in a little while each man came back bringing one with him. For a time the whole village gave itself up to feasting and rejoicing, but when their stomachs were full they asked the children to tell them about the marvelous journey they had taken to the ends of the earth, and how they had found the seals."

"When we had gone a very long distance," said the little girl orphan, "we came to a great chasm which we could not cross. At last after much labor we bridged it with a seal and passed over it to the other side. In the distance we saw a house. It was the home of the Water Witch. We went to her house and entered. There sat the witch. She was fearful to look at. Her hair was dirty and hanging about her ugly face. Everything about her was in disorder and she herself was as angry as she was ugly."

"We went boldly up to her, washed her hair and set things to rights for her. This pleased the old witch so well that she stopped being angry and said: 'What do you want? It is a long time since I have seen any human beings.'"

"Then we said, 'Our people are all starving; we beg you to let us have some seals.'"

"THERE were two beds in the old witch's room. She called under one bed 'Many seals come forth,' and under the other she called, 'Many white whales come forth.' Soon a pretty little seal came out from under the bed. I seized it, pulled off some of its hairs and wound them around my finger."

"When the girl orphan reached this point in her story, one of the women called out, 'My husband brought home a pretty little seal. Maybe it is the same one.'"

"The seal was brought in and if you will believe it, there on its skin was the very spot where the little girl orphan had pulled out the hairs. So the woman gave the skin to her for a coat."

"What did the boy get?" asked Menie.

"I suppose he got another skin," said Keshoo.

"What happened next?" said Menie.

"Well," said Keshoo, "of course, the old Angakok was very angry and said the children were not really Angakoks. But the people believed them because they had brought back the seals; so the wisest man said: 'Let's see what can make the best magic, the old Angakok or the children.'"

"Then they had a great magic match. The old Angakok did his greatest marvels, but each time the orphans did something more wonderful still. Finally the old Angakok wanted to stop the game but the children said: 'No, let us see if you can do this.' Then the boy took a seal lance in his hand and glided right out over the sea without sinking in at all! The people stood on the shore watching him."

"You do it! You do it!" they cried to the old Angakok. He was afraid to try, but finally, because they kept showing at him, he took his seal lance in his hand and started to follow the orphan, who was now quite a distance from shore and watching too."

"He ran down to the water but instead of gliding out as he fell in with a great splash. Then everybody laughed at him, and that was the end of the Angakok business for him, and that is the end of the story too."

"Tell us another," said Monnie.

"NOT now," said Koollee, putting away her needle. "It is time to get something to eat." She climbed down from her seat and put some seal meat to warm in the stone pot hanging over the lamp. "You children can go out and see if it is still snowing as hard as ever," she said.

Menie and Monnie jumped down off the bed, the little dogs jumped, too, and began to bark, and all four scuttled down into the tunnel. There was just enough space about the snow level at the mouth of the tunnel so they could look out. It had stopped snowing and the moon was sailing the sky like a great round boat, and the stars were winking down at them.

"The storm is over," they shouted back.

Then Keshoo came scraping along through the tunnel with the big snow shovel in his hand. "We can begin to clear a path to the dog house," he said. "They haven't been fed for two days and they'll be hungry enough to eat the bones off of us. Get your little snow shovels and help."

The twins crept back to the igloo where Koollee was busy keeping the moss wicks of the lamp burning brightly, and soon they were out in the snow with their father.

When the dogs had been freed from their snowy prison and fed with frozen salmon Koollee's voice came rolling through the tunnel. "Come in to your dinner," she called.

Keshoo and the twins dropped their shovels and dashed into the tunnel, and in a few minutes each was gnawing at a piece of seal meat with a face all wreathed in smiles.

NOTE—The folk tale given in this story is adapted from an Eskimo legend given by William Thalheimer in his book on the Eskimo.

What Proper Shampooing Will Do for Your Hair

HOW YOU CAN MAKE YOUR HAIR BEAUTIFUL—KEEP IT SOFT and SILKY, BRIGHT, FRESH LOOKING and LUXURIANT

Get up a big, thick lather by first wetting the hair and then applying Mulsified. Rub in thoroughly.

The final rinsing should leave the hair soft and silky in the water.

When thoroughly clean, wet hair fairly squeaks when you pull it through your fingers.

When the hair is dry always give it a good, thorough brushing.

THE beauty of your hair depends upon the care you give it.

Shampooing it properly is always most important thing.

It is the shampooing which brings out real life and lustre, natural wave and ring, and makes your hair soft, fresh looking and luxuriant.

When your hair is dry, dull and heavy, stiff and gummy, and the strands stick together, and it feels harsh and greasy to the touch, it is because your hair has not been shampooed properly.

When your hair has been shampooed properly, and thoroughly clean, it will be glossy, smooth and bright, naturally fresh looking, soft and silky.

While your hair must have frequent and regular washing to keep it beautiful, it cannot stand the harsh effect of free alkali which is common in ordinary soaps.

Free alkali soon dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle and ruins it.

That is why discriminating women everywhere now use Mulsified coconut oil shampoo. This clear, pure, entirely greaseless product cannot possibly injure, it does not dry the scalp or make the hair brittle, no matter how often you use it.

If you want to see how really beautiful you can make your hair look, just follow this simple method:

A Simple, Easy Method

FIRST, wet the hair and scalp in clear, warm water. Then apply a little Mulsified coconut oil shampoo, rubbing it in thoroughly all over the scalp and throughout the entire length down to the ends of the hair.

Two or three teaspoonfuls will make an abundance of rich, creamy lather. This should be rubbed in thoroughly and briskly with the finger tips, so as to remove the dandruff and small particles of dust and that stick to the scalp.

After rubbing in the rich, creamy Mulsified lather, wash the hair and scalp thoroughly, always using clear, warm water.

Then use another application of Mulsified, again rubbing up a lather and rubbing it in briskly as before. Two waters are usually sufficient for washing the hair, but sometimes the third is necessary.

You can easily tell, for when the hair is perfectly clean it will be soft and silky in the water, the strands fall apart easily, each separate hair floating alone in the water, and the entire mass, even while wet, will feel loose, fluffy and light to the touch and be so clean it will fairly squeak when you pull it through your fingers.

Rinse the Hair Thoroughly

THIS is very important. After the final washing, the hair and scalp should be rinsed in at least two changes of good warm water and followed with a rinsing in cold water.

When you have rinsed the hair thoroughly, wring it as dry as you can; finish by rubbing it with a towel, shaking it and fluffing it until it is dry. Then give it a good brushing.

After a Mulsified shampoo you will find the hair will dry quickly and evenly and have the appearance of being much thicker and heavier than it is.

If you want to always be remembered for your beautiful, well-kept hair, make it a rule to set a certain day each week for a Mulsified coconut oil shampoo. This regular weekly shampooing will keep the scalp soft and the hair fine and silky, bright, fresh looking and fluffy, wavy and easy to manage, and it will be noticed and admired by everyone.

You can get Mulsified at any drug store or toilet goods counter, anywhere in the world. A 4-ounce bottle should last for months.

WHAT A CHILD'S HAIR NEEDS

CHILDREN should be taught, early in life, that proper care of the hair is essential.

The hair and scalp should be kept perfectly clean to insure a healthy, vigorous scalp and a fine, thick, heavy head of hair.

Get your children into the habit of shampooing their hair regularly once a week. A boy's hair being short, shampooing takes but a few minutes. For either a boy or a girl, simply moisten the hair with warm water, pour on a little Mulsified and rub vigorously with the tips of the fingers. This will stimulate the scalp, make an abundance of rich, creamy lather and cleanse the hair thoroughly. It takes only a few seconds to rinse it all out when through.

You will be surprised how this regular weekly shampooing with Mulsified will improve the appearance of the hair, and you will be teaching your child a habit that will be appreciated in after-life, for a luxurious head of hair is something every man and woman feels mighty proud of.

Makes Your Hair Beautiful

WATKINS
MULSIFIED
COCOANUT OIL SHAMPOO

The Eskimo Twins

By LUCY FITCH PERKINS

(The story of the Twins is on page 36.)

Fold-A-Way Dolls
Designed by
Jessie Louise Taylor

DIRECTIONS FOR MAKING FOLD-A-WAY DOLLS

Mount dolls on old magazine cover or letterhead. When thoroughly dry cut out all around dark outline and cut into lines on base to make the locks, also cut slits in body into which the dress tabs fit. Fold over directly on the dotted lines at the top of the head and the dotted lines at the feet, but in opposite directions, as shown on the little figures. Bring boxes together and slide locks from one side into the slits on the opposite side. Doll will then stand alone. The clothes need not be mounted, but will last longer if mounted on light paper before cutting out. Cut into the slits and fold directly on the dotted lines; clothes will then go on and off almost like your own garments. The tabs on the back of the boots should be fitted into the slits in the back of the coat.

In cutting out the dress follow the same method as with the dolls.

Jessie Louise Taylor

Every normal skin needs two creams

*One for protection and to hold the powder
A wholly different cream to cleanse at night*

To protect the skin against wind and dust, apply Pond's Vanishing Cream each time before you go out

*To cleanse the skin thoroughly use
Pond's Cold Cream before retiring*

ONE cream alone cannot supply the skin with all the elements that are needed to keep it in perfect condition. Certain flaws to which the skin is subject can be prevented only by a softening, protective cream. Other flaws need a cream rich in oil, that cleanses and stimulates.

Flaws that require a daytime cream without oil

If you do not protect the skin against sun and wind, it will protect itself by developing a rough coarse surface. To give the needed protection apply a little Pond's Vanishing Cream before going out. This cream is based on an ingredient famous for its softening effect. It leaves the skin fresh and invisibly shielded. Dust cannot work into the pores, wind and sun cannot dry out the skin and make it rough and coarse.

Before you powder, smooth a little Pond's Vanishing Cream on the face. It is absorbed instantly, removing any shine there may be on the skin.

Moreover, it cannot come out in a shine later, for there is not a drop of oil in it. With this softening cream as a base you will find that the powder lasts many times longer and that it shows less, for there are no rough places for it to catch on.

Whenever your face feels drawn and tight, as if the muscles under it were tied in little knots, touch it lightly with Pond's Vanishing Cream. It brings instant relief to a tired skin, relaxing the muscles, softening the hard, set lines, giving the whole face a fresher color and added vigor.

Flaws that need an oil cream at night

Have you begun to notice little fine lines under the eyes, depressions at the corners of the mouth and the base of the nose, a tendency to flabbiness under the chin? Fine lines become wrinkles before you know it, and wrinkles are almost impossible to erase. The way to prevent them is to give your skin regularly a tonic rousing with an oil cream.

Pond's Cold Cream stimulates the skin, lubricating it and restoring its elasticity. Smooth the cream into the little fine lines, rubbing gently with the lines, not across them. Use a gentle motion always, for too strenuous rubbing is apt to be harmful. By the faithful use of this rich cream, you can keep the lines from fastening themselves on the skin and forming real wrinkles.

The dust and dirt that clog the pores, working their way under the surface of the skin, help to form blackheads. Ordinary washing will not remove them. They demand a deeper, more thorough cleansing. After washing the face with warm water and pure soap, rub Pond's Cold Cream into the skin until the pores are saturated with it. Let the cream remain on a few moments, then wipe it off with a soft cloth. This rich cream contains the oil necessary to penetrate the pores and rid them of every particle of dirt.

Begin using both these creams today

Use regularly these two creams that every normal skin needs. Neither will clog the pores nor encourage the growth of hair. Your druggist and the department stores carry both jars and tubes in convenient sizes. The Pond's Extract Co., New York.

POND'S
Cold Cream for cleansing
Vanishing Cream to prevent chapping and to hold the powder

GENEROUS TUBES—MAIL COUPON TODAY

The Pond's Extract Co.,
109 Hudson St., New York.
Ten cents (10c) is enclosed for your special introductory tubes of the two creams every normal skin needs—enough of each cream for two weeks' ordinary toilet uses.

Name _____
Street _____
City _____ State _____

In the stroke of a brush

A Week's Nail Beauty

For the Fashionable Manicure, without Buffing

Thousands of women with little time for the infinite details of the modern toilette are keeping their nails fashionably manicured by merely brushing them once or twice a week with Glazo.

Lightly stroked on with a brush, and with no buffing whatever, this simple, new liquid nail polish dries instantly, and gives your nails a beautiful, lasting lustre. In between times, no matter how stained or soiled the nails may become, a simple washing will restore their freshly manicured beauty.

For a perfect and even cuticle

For the cuticle there's gentle magic in the beautifying touch of Glazo Cuticle Massage, a dainty cream that's used with your orange stick to shape the cuticle before applying the polish. Massage it in now and then and leave it overnight. It will preserve the soft, velvety charm of your nail sheaths, and hang-nails will never trouble them.

You'll find the Complete Glazo Manicure at almost any good toilet counter—place it first on your shopping list today.

Write Today for this Chat about the Hands

A charming little booklet telling how you may have lovely hands, always, without being a slave to your toilet table, will be mailed you free, if you'll simply send your name and address. The Glazo Company, 27 Blair Avenue, Cincinnati, Ohio.

GLAZO

Glazo Liquid Polish with Remover - 50c
Glazo Cuticle Massage - 50c
Combination Set, 75c

John A. Huston Co., Selling Agents for Canada
60-62 Front St. West, Toronto

IN A LETTER of a Yale student to his father that I came across in a bundle of old papers the other afternoon I found this sentence, heavily underscored:

The greatest day of my life so far was Tap Day! And I've been "tapped," so now I can go in and out of the same door that you went in and out of when you were a junior! Come up and let us go in together.

Tap Day at Yale University when that boy and his father were young was, I am told, more trying to the nerves and more dramatic than the Tap Day of the present, because there was more publicity about both the successes and the failures of the boys to "make" the secret societies which on that occasion notify the upper classmen of their election by a tap from one of their members in passing.

To wait for that tap to come in the crowded campus, that friendly yet peremptory tap that is the open sesame to a much-coveted honor, and to wait in vain, is a great blow to young ambition; just as to wait with a humble sense that it isn't for you and yet feel it tingling from your shoulder to your heels makes a moment in life that few men would care to forfeit.

Fortunately it is not his only great hour even in the university, and for those that miss the "Tap" in their college career there are greater and more momentous taps ahead which life itself provides. Only, and this is the great difference between Tap Day at Yale and Tap Day in the world, the boy on the campus recognizes it as a command, to be accepted or refused right there on the spot; out in the world when we receive our taps we often do not recognize them as having been a summons until long afterwards.

If we have failed to respond we call them "lost chances," and are forever perplexed at our blindness and dullness in not having understood what they meant; if we have responded we often speak of them as "lucky chances" and are half amazed that we had the wit or daring or sheer luck to take them up.

For my part I've come to the conclusion that "nothing just happens" in life. A door does not open before you or close back of you without a hand that opens and shuts! Not your hand or mine. Not blind Fate. But One Who Knows.

"Nothing Just Happens"

IT IS this knowledge that it is One Who knows which makes life so dramatic a sensation and which turns the common, everyday episode of our weeks and days into momentous parts of a great whole.

Looking back I remember the day and the hour when this belief that "nothing just happens" became for me a certainty.

It was the spring after my mother died, and I was for the first time in my life responsible for the affairs of a household and all the hundred and one outside connections of a household that make it a part of the community. Coming downstairs to go out one afternoon, I was given a message from a colored woman who had worked for my mother, off and on, for years back as a sort of general stand-by for extra occasions, house cleaning, company, sickness, sewing, and so on.

The message just briefly informed me, "Louisa is very sick"—that was all.

Ours was not the only family that employed Louisa, and I had a pretty full afternoon and the little street upon which she lived was quite in the other direction from my errands. So I felt that I had three very good excuses for letting her summons wait over until the next day. For although her message only said that she was very sick, I realized that her sending it to me was in itself a summons. I also knew that if it had been my mother who had received it she would have gone at once to see Louisa in her emergency, just as Louisa had always dropped anything that she was doing to come to us in our times of stress.

But I said to myself: "I am not my mother, nor am I the only friend that employs Louisa. She must have sent this message to all of us. To-morrow will be time enough for me to go to her help." And with that I left it or, rather, tried to leave it.

Life's Pathways

I was late, as it was, in getting started with my afternoon of engagements; this interruption of Louisa's message had delayed me.

It is a curious thing about us humans who ask and expect God to plan our lives for us that we reserve the privilege of planning our days for ourselves, and that we always speak of any outside interference with those daily plans as an interruption. I did not realize at the moment that Louisa's interruption was a summons to me that had anything to do with the life that I had put into God's keeping to plan for me. I did not recognize it as a tap on the shoulder, only as an interruption not to be considered in the stress of the afternoon's activities.

I went about those other errands, those important errands, until four o'clock, when something that had been working in my heart and made me very half-hearted in their performance suddenly brought me to a full stop. I could not get Louisa out of my mind. That something in my heart grew in insistence till I gave up disregarding it and turned and went to see Louisa.

I knocked and I knocked at her house, with no answer. Finally a woman next door but one opened an upper window and called down to me that the house was empty. "The woman is sick and gone away," she said.

I asked her where she had gone, and she said an ambulance had come and taken her to the hospital. She slammed down the window before I could ask her to what hospital, and I stood puzzled and considering on the dingy step. There were so many hospitals that it would take hours to find out which. There was a colored hospital, however, in the next block and to that I went, on a chance, before going home. Yes, Louisa was there! Yes, she was very ill, and was to be operated on at once. The clerk glanced up at the clock in the office; the operation was scheduled for four-thirty and it lacked only a few minutes of that. Louisa was up in the surgical ward being got ready.

How the Lesson Was Learned

OF COURSE I knew that I could not see her; visiting hour was over for all patients in the wards, the clerk assured me, so I made no attempt. But I asked to send a message up, which the office nurse agreed to take in person. When I came to my own name in the message both the clerk and the nurse looked at each other and smiled.

"Oh, you've come, then," said the nurse; "we did not know it was you, ma'am."

"You are expected, and the doctor gave permission for her to see you no matter when you came," the clerk explained. They were both hurrying me out of the office to the stairway.

"Expected!" was all I could say. "Expected by whom?"

"She said she had sent you word, and that you would be here. She has something on her mind that you were to attend to when you came," they both explained.

All through my interview with that pain-racked, work-worn figure on the bed that whispered to me so trustingly her anxious last-moment preparations for the financial stress that was before her in her sudden withdrawal from work, I was saying to myself: "Oh, suppose I had disappointed her trust and had not come!"

It was very easy for me to arrange her affairs and to put her case in such a way to her other employers that her place was kept ready for her return and certain sums paid her in advance. She had not wanted charity, she had not known how to ask for a loan, and she had been too ill and weak all of a sudden to explain to several people what I, bending over her, could see at a glance and put into words for her. Quite obviously I was the person she should have sent for in her extremity. If I had failed her she would have gone into her life-or-death struggle with pain and weakness handicapped by anxiety. She had been so completely sure that I would be there that to this day, years afterwards, I tremble at the thought of how near I was to failing her. And not only failing her, but failing the Being to whose keeping I had given the planning of my life.

For, lacking that afternoon's experience of the significance and the far-reaching effect of casual decisions and unconscious acts, I might very well have lost the chance to learn once and for all that "nothing just happens."

I was trying to explain in simple terms how I had grown to feel about our acts having the greatest consequences for ourselves and for others to a young chauffeur the other day, who in these days of hard times had come upon lower wages. He was for putting his own failure to succeed down to the hardness of employers' passing him by without a chance. He assured me that he had answered every kind of advertisement and applied at every sort of garage. I said that in my experience one's chances came mostly from persons needing help, who did not advertise and in some cases could not employ. He stared heavily at me and remarked that he wasn't "working for nothing, and never had."

Christ's "Chance Encounter"

I SAW a letter from a farmer's wife a while ago complaining of the terrific sameness of her life. It was a Western farm of the big type. Her husband was young and ambitious; her children were little; her neighbors were few and distant; she felt that she had much to learn. She wondered if going to the city in the off season and taking special courses in the state college might not lift "the sameness." I find myself often thinking about her. With two little children and an ambitious husband and a score of employees, and with neighbors, even though they are distant, she has more already in her life than most college women. Is she possibly missing her great chance because, in scanning the far horizon, she misses the creative part she has offered to her on her own threshold?

I sometimes read for my solace and inspiration the story of Jesus of Nazareth and the woman of Samaria in the fourth chapter of the Gospel of St. John, because in it are all the human conditions that go to make up the drama of what we are wont to call our "chance encounters," and because, in His recognition of the opportunity that chance encounter afforded Him, Jesus proved that He of all men believed that "nothing just happens."

The situation of Jesus when the woman of Samaria came out to draw water at the well by which He was resting was a very human situation. If ever He had an excuse for standing aloof from a woman, one would think that He had one there. But He received her as a direct summons from His Father. He trusted her with a great truth, and He sent her into her town as His spokesman. The story and its results make it plain that her being where she was and at the hour she came was part of the great drama of love and forgiveness to which time has not yet put the finishing act.

If Jesus had refused that chance He would have lost some loyal friends, the woman and her townfolk would have lost the great moment of their lives, and the world would have lost a supreme truth.

So much depends on—so little: our recognition of a summoning touch.

Sarah D. Louisa

700 letters from those who are eating Fleischmann's Yeast

Doctors, mechanics, stenographers, housewives—teachers, nurses, clergymen—farmers, policemen, architects—in all, men and women in 113 different occupations recently wrote about their experiences with eating fresh yeast.

THE reports came from all parts of the United States. Lawyers, artists, lumbermen, wrote in. Housemaids and private secretaries. Dressmakers. Even a boxer told how he had added Fleischmann's Yeast to his daily diet.

These 700 letters reflect the growing realization of men and women all over the country that American meals are often lacking in certain essential food factors.

"We now know definitely," writes one of our greatest authorities, "that the regular diet of a large portion of the people of the United States is falling short of maintaining satisfactory nutrition."

This is what has caused fresh yeast to assume such a new and startling importance in our food.

Today men and women are getting from Fleischmann's Yeast exactly the food factors they need. For yeast is the richest known source of the necessary vitamin-B.

Fleischmann's Yeast contains elements which build up the body tissues, keep the body more resistant to disease. Also, because of its freshness, it helps in eliminating poisonous waste matter. Fresh compressed yeast is recommended in American medical literature.

Why the body needs fresh yeast

It is well known that many of the things we eat have lost their valuable food properties through refining and other such commercial preparation. Fresh yeast has not been subjected to any such process. Fresh yeast gives you the health essential food factors in all the potency of their fresh form. This is what your body tissues crave.

What laxatives can never do

Doctors are agreed that laxatives never remove the cause of the trouble. Indeed one physician says that one of its chief causes is probably the indiscriminate use of cathartics. Fleischmann's Yeast as a fresh food is just the natural corrective you need. Fresh yeast, says a noted doctor, should be much more frequently given in intestinal disturbance, especially if it requires the constant use of laxatives.

Hundreds of men and women who have long been in bondage to laxatives are now free. The addition of Fleischmann's Yeast to their daily diet has restored normal action of the intestines.

The natural way to improve digestion

More and more science is coming to look on digestive disturbance not as a separate ailment for which one takes a drug but as a danger signal that something is fundamentally wrong with the habits of eating. The food factors which Fleischmann's Yeast contains in fresh form improve the appetite, stimulate the digestion, and strengthen the entire digestive process.

Because of its wonderful effect on the digestion and its laxative action Fleischmann's Yeast clears up skin disorders, ailments so often due to faulty eating.

Skin disorders cleared up

Many physicians and hospitals are prescribing Fleischmann's Yeast for impurities of the skin. It has yielded remarkable results. In one series of tests forty-one out of forty-two such cases were improved or cured, in some instances in a remarkably short time.

The ways they liked to eat it best

Some of these 700 men and women did not like the taste of yeast at first. Almost all grew to like it. Most people took it in water. A number liked it in milk. It tastes something like an egg-nog. Many of the men liked it plain. Women liked to make sandwiches with it, or they took it in fruit juices. Two or three liked it in ice cream. One took it in soup. Several liked it in coffee.

Add 2 or 3 cakes of Fleischmann's Yeast to your own daily diet and notice the difference.

Place a standing order with your grocer. 200,000 grocers carry Fleischmann's Yeast. If your grocer is not among them, write to the Fleischmann agency in your nearest city—they will supply you.

Send for free booklet telling what yeast can do for you. Use coupon addressing THE FLEISCHMANN COMPANY, Dept. 104, 701 Washington St., New York City.

Fleischmann's Yeast is a fresh food which builds up the system naturally

Mail this coupon today

THE FLEISCHMANN COMPANY
Dept. 104, 701 Washington St., New York, N.Y.
Please send me "The New Importance of Yeast in Diet"
(Please write plainly)

Name _____
Street _____
City _____ State _____

Wringer
Dry-without a wringer

"If it has a Wringer
it isn't a
Laun-Dry-
Ette"

The electric washing machine that does more than wash

THE Laun-Dry-Ette dries a tubful, (averaging six sheets or thirty pieces) wringer-dry in one minute without a wringer.

It washes linens and lingerie, or rag rugs, blankets and comforts with equal facility and without adjustment—and dries them all "wringer-dry" in one minute. It even washes feather pillows and extracts the water from them. Its versatility is amazing.

Doesn't smash buttons, hooks nor fasteners

One user writes "not a button to sew on in a year". Clothes washed "The Laun-Dry-Ette Way" are easier to iron because there are no creases to iron out.

Prevents Red Hands

No need to put hand in the water at any stage of the wash. This wins enthusiastic approval from those who appreciate good looking, well groomed hands.

Extra tubs not required because washing, rinsing and bluing are all done in the Laun-Dry-Ette. This saves the cost of extra tubs and saves space. Many use the Laun-Dry-Ette in kitchen or bathroom.

Yet with these exclusive advantages it costs you no more than ordinary machines. The Laun-Dry-Ette is in its seventh successful year and bears the approval seal of the Good Housekeeping Institute. You take no chances when you buy a Laun-Dry-Ette.

Write for "The Washing Machine That Does More"

—a booklet that tells all, sent free on request with "The Laun-Dry-Ette Way" which describes this modern way of washing in detail.

Any Laun-Dry-Ette dealer will demonstrate for you. If there is none in your town take this advertisement to the nearest electrical or hardware dealer and have him order for you. We guarantee satisfaction. Authorized dealer wanted in every city. Write.

The Laundryette Mfg. Co.
1193 East 152nd St., Cleveland, O.

LAUN-DRY-ETTE
electric washing machine
WASHES AND DRIES WITHOUT A WRINGER

Easter Morning: By Anice Terhune

Allegretto.

1. Do you know why the flow'rs are so gay, lit - tle child? Why we've
2. In the tops of the trees, far and near, lit - tle child, There's a
3. All the day—like the flow'rs and the birds, lit - tle child— You can lit - ties in bright - est ar - ray, lit - tle child? 'Tis an hour set a - part In each cho - rus of song full and clear, lit - tle child. For each flute - throat - ed bird A soft make the world sweet with kind words, lit - tle child. And so this you must do, For Christ dew - la - den heart! 'Tis the dawn of a glad Eas - ter Day, lit - tle child.

whis - per has heard That an - oth - er bright Eas - ter is here, lit - tle child.
rose for you, too! Yes, for you, and the flow'rs, and the birds, lit - tle child.

EASTER CHILDREN: I wonder just what Easter means to each one of you.

Of course we all know that when Easter comes we have vacation—school vacation for a week, sometimes two weeks. And our big brothers and sisters come back from college or boarding school for a few days, looking and acting a little more grown up, somehow, than they did in Christmas vacation.

They seem almost like strangers and we stand a little bit in awe of them just at first—until we find that as soon as their newness wears off they are just the same as they always were.

Then at Easter time there are such fascinating baby rabbits in the store windows—live bunnies with wiggly noses. One always flattens one's own nose against the window pane to watch them, and hopes that Daddy or someone will give us such a pretty Easter present—and more often than not Daddy or someone does.

And besides the rabbits and the downy baby ducks there are always Easter eggs—the kind one colors oneself, with mother's help, and the frosty, hard kind one buys, that looks like twinkling snow crust; that is the kind I like best. It has a little magnifying glass at the end, and a wonderful picture inside; so that when you shut one eye and look through the bit of glass with the other you seem to be in a beautiful garden, with people in lace collars and large sashes; and with dogs and kittens walking all around.

Once, when I was your age, I had an Easter egg like that. It was as big as a casaba melon! I wish you could have seen the picture inside!

In those days they didn't have the lovely chocolate eggs that they have now, with soft cream inside, that one eats to the very end and then feels like licking one's fingers so as not to lose a scrap!

Nicest of all, there are the ice-cream eggs, in the spun sugar nest, for dessert at Easter Sunday dinner.

But, though these things are delightful and it is right that we should have a good time and enjoy them, Easter means more.

DID you ever notice, if you live far enough south to hear the birds in the trees at Easter, how much more sweetly they sing than at other times? And if you live in the North and go to a church where, during Easter service, they sometimes have canary birds in cages hidden among the flowers—have you noticed how loudly and joyously they sing? It seems as if they must burst their little fluffy yellow throats with happiness.

Now something makes them sing like that. What is it?

I'll tell you in a moment; but first I want to speak about the flowers at Easter. You know, without my telling you, that they are more lovely than at any other time during the year. I don't mean just because there are so many of them in all the windows and in the churches; but they hold their heads so high and are so sweet and fresh, and lovely in color.

There is a special reason for it; it is because, like the birds, they know and understand the wonderful meaning of Easter.

THEY know that each year, at Easter, Christ gives us another chance. That if you have been naughty, or lazy, or forgetful, or selfish, all you have to do is to be truly sorry for it and put it all behind you. Then, on Easter Sunday, make a brand-new start—fresh and clean and sweet—like the flowers, and with a song in your heart like the birds, to make those around you happy.

When Christ rose for us all on Resurrection Morning everything received a fresh start, and that meant that each Easter we could start again. And that is what is so very wonderful about it all. If you fail in your lessons at school the teacher puts a mark against your name. But Christ does not do that; he gives you another chance!

So if you understand these things—and no matter how little you are you can understand if you really try—this will be the happiest Easter morning you have ever known in all your life.

And if sometimes—even after Easter has gone by for this year—you will sing the little song I have written for you, it will help you to remember just what Easter means "for you, and the flowers, and the birds."

Libby's Peaches—big, golden, juicy, ripe

Have them tonight! Libby makes this summer delight one you can enjoy the whole year 'round

PERHAPS where you live the peach trees are covered now with clouds of soft pink blossoms—fragrant—fairylike! But for your fill of peaches and cream, you need not wait till August, till the ripened fruit loads down the boughs.

Libby has made it possible for you to serve peaches and cream at any time of the year—whether you live close to city markets or on a Western cattle ranch.

From the Pacific Coast—to you

In the sheltered valleys of the Pacific Coast, Libby picks peaches for you the minute they are fully ripe—big, sound, fine-flavored peaches that have come to juicy perfection in the sunshine of long summer days.

And right in the heart of the orchard land there are spotless Libby kitchens. There the peaches are packed for you in all their first freshness—these perfect peaches—these golden balls of summer's sweetness. And you can have them now!

Such interesting ways to serve them

You will like these delightful new ways of serving Libby Peaches that the Libby chefs have worked out for you.

Try the Dutch Peach Cake. Just a tender piece of pastry, topped with golden halves of Libby Peaches, sprinkled with sugar and nutmeg and baked to a tempting glaze.

And here's a salad and dessert in one—these delicious peaches with a delightful dressing made of cheese and Libby's Evaporated Milk!

This milk, Libby's chefs have used in all these recipes because they can be sure of its richness, its purity.

Try it in your own household once—and you, too, will be delighted with its creaminess and its convenience.

Pure cow's milk—rich enough to whip!

Libby's Milk is just cow's milk, rich and pure—cow's milk evaporated to the consistency of cream. And what gives it its cream-like richness? Simply this:

Libby condenseries, located in the richest dairy sections of the country, get each day a supply of tested milk from the herds of sleek, well-cared-for cows on the big dairy farms near by. And half the moisture is removed from this milk! Nothing at all is added. Then it is sealed in air-tight cans so it will keep fresh and sweet till you are ready to use it.

Libby's Evaporated Milk is so rich it whips like cream and it costs not half as much.

Milk and cream from one Libby can

Libby's Milk is delicious in coffee, or tea, on cereals, or fruit! It adds such creamy richness to soups and sauces, such tenderness to cake. Use it in all your cooking—for cream, just as it comes from the can—for milk, diluted with an equal quantity of water. It is so convenient, so economical.

Order a supply of Libby's Evaporated Milk and Libby's Peaches from your grocer today. He has them or will get them for you. Surprise the family with peaches and whipped cream tonight!

Libby, McNeill & Libby, 104 Welfare Bldg., Chicago
Libby, McNeill & Libby of Canada, Ltd.
Chatham, Ontario, Canada

Libby's Dutch Peach Cake

Mix and sift 1 teaspoon salt, 4 teaspoons baking powder and 2 cups flour; add 5 tablespoons butter or substitute and work into the flour, then add $\frac{1}{2}$ cup Libby's Evaporated Milk and $\frac{1}{2}$ cup water. Roll $\frac{1}{4}$ inch thick and cut with a biscuit cutter; make a depression in the center of each round and place in them halves of Libby's Peaches. Sprinkle generously with sugar and nutmeg and bake in a hot oven eight to ten minutes. Serve with a lemon sauce.

Peach Salad

Mix $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon sugar, 1 teaspoon salt and 1 tablespoon flour; add $\frac{1}{2}$ cup Libby's Evaporated Milk and $\frac{1}{2}$ cup water, boil two minutes. Pour over the beaten yolks of two eggs and cook one minute, then add $\frac{1}{2}$ tablespoon butter. When cool add $\frac{1}{4}$ cup of vinegar and 1 pkg. cream (Neufchâtel) cheese which has been put through a sieve. Serve halves of Libby's Peaches on crisp lettuce and fill the center of each with this cheese dressing.

To whip Libby's Evaporated Milk

Put the milk in a bowl and set it in a larger one that's filled with cracked ice and salt. Chill for 5 minutes, then beat 10 minutes with an egg-beater. Soak one-half teaspoon gelatine in one tablespoon cold water and place over boiling water to dissolve. Add this to one and one-half cups of the cream whip; beat again for a few minutes and chill.

*Puffed Rice with cream and sugar.
The queen of breakfast dainties.*

Puffed Wheat in milk—for supper, for luncheon, for bedtime.

Add melted butter, for hungry children to eat like peanuts after school.

Try New Delights

Learn all the joys that Bubble Grains can bring

Puffed Grains are both foods and confections. You can use them in countless ways.

They have a nut-like flavor, due to intense heat. So they add what nut-meats add to candy or desserts.

They are as flimsy as snowflakes. They crush at a touch. So they add delight to any fruit dish, fresh or stewed.

They form crisp, toasted wafers, almost light as air. And that adds many uses.

The scientific side

Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice are whole grains steam exploded. They are made by Prof. Anderson's process.

The object is to fit all food cells to digest.

The grains are sealed in guns, then revolved for one hour in a fearful heat. The bit of moisture in each food cell is thus changed to steam.

When the guns are shot the steam explodes. Over 100 million steam explosions are caused in every kernel.

Every food cell is thus blasted. Digestion is made easy and complete. Every element is made available as food.

The delightful side

The grains are puffed to bubbles, eight times normal size. They come out crisp and flimsy, almond-like in flavor. So, when you add cream and sugar, fruit or butter, they form delicious tidbits.

As a cereal dish, morning, noon or night, there is nothing else that children love so well. Millions of mothers know that.

But use them in other ways, at other times, as well. Let these whole-grain dainties take the place of things less good for children.

Try all the ways suggested by the pictures.

Puffed Rice

Puffed to 8 times normal size

Puffed Wheat

Whole grains steam exploded

Flimsy, flavorful bubble grains to blend with any dish of fruit.

Use as garnish on desserts—like toasted nut meats puffed.

Use as toasted wafers in your soups—crisp, flaky, flimsy bubbles.

The Quaker Oats Company Sole Makers

Programs for Children's Week

By H. AUGUSTINE SMITH

THE overwhelming responsibility for building a new world rests on the children of to-day, twenty-five million American boys and girls. If they be not clean-eyed, pure of heart and courageous unto death, to-morrow is cataclysm. Juvenile crime, the child pervert of eight, the immoral girl of thirteen, the bandit gang of boys in their teens, thirteen million American children without ethical or religious instruction of any kind—is this the loose and violent mob to which we are to pin our hopes for a new America and a new world? And what of the twelve million other children whose spiritual nurture is limited to thirty minutes out of ten thousand minutes a week—a half hour sandwiched in between a belated preaching service and an American Sunday dinner? Has religious education no finer and larger place in their lives?

Children's Week is strategic for Protestant, Catholic and Jew alike. It holds eight days for the evaluation of child life, when homes, schools, churches and communities are to work together, to arrange mass meetings, to organize festivals of song, pageantry, pictures, story-telling, to conduct surveys and exhibits, to parade to the music of children's voices and the zigzag of their pennants. Children's Week this year is dated April thirtieth to May seventh.

Four Kinds of Programs

PROGRAMS for Children's Week should include, first, Sunday services, with special mass meetings and conferences on adult training for child leadership; second, church and church-school festivals of music, pageantry, pictures and story-telling; third, community parades, exhibits, booths and week-day schools of religion; fourth, survey of the homes of the community with particular reference to children.

The following program material for Sundays at home combines variety, novelty, self-expression, education and religion:

1. A family sing of famous hymns—Hymns from many lands and many centuries:
Asia Minor, second century—Gloria Patri.
Egypt—Shepherd of Tender Youth.
Japan—Let There Be Light.
Lord God of Hosts.
China—In the Cross of Christ I Glory.
India—I Would Be True.
America—O Beautiful for Spacious Skies.

Marching songs of the church—pilgrimages, processions, crusades:
Ninth century—All Glory, Laud and Honor.
Seventeenth century—Fairest Lord Jesus.
Nineteenth century—Onward, Christian Soldiers.

Hymns associated with our Presidents:

Abraham Lincoln—If You Cannot on the Ocean.
William McKinley—Nearer, My God, to Thee.
William Howard Taft—The Battle Hymn of the Republic.
Andrew Jackson—How Firm a Foundation.
Theodore Roosevelt—How Firm a Foundation.

2. Singing and dramatizing folk songs, in costume:
La Marseillaise.
Santa Lucia.
Song of the Volga Boatmen.
Tannenbaum.
Comin' Through the Rye.
Old Black Joe.

3. Characterization of person or event whose anniversary falls on or near the Sunday:
Sunday, April 2—Return of the Mayflower, 1621. See Boughton's picture of the event.
Sunday, April 9—Lee and Grant at Appomattox, 1865. A timely characterization, as this year marks the hundredth anniversary of the birth of General Grant—April 27, 1822.

Sunday, April 16—Easter, a day for caroling and for nature music.
A guessing contest on themes or melodies from classic springtime music.

Mendelssohn—Spring Song.
Rubinstein—Melody in F.
Nevin—Narcissus.
MacDowell—To a Wild Rose.
Cadman—From the Land of the Sky-Blue Water.

Sunday, April 23—Shakspeare's birthday.
Sunday, April 30—The Inauguration of Children's Week throughout America.

4. The Story Hour should feature lessons in obedience, unselfishness, helpfulness—the rubrics of daily living. These stories should lead to self-expression on the part of the children. Pictures and music should be used as the basis of story material and interpretation.
5. Stereopticon pictures with the interpolation of music have immense possibilities. Stereopticon machines can easily be connected with electric-light current, and travelogues and nature studies, industrial welfare and manufacturing processes are accessible through thousands of well-colored slides.
6. Clean, wholesome games and experiments have their place in the Sunday program.

Drama and Pageantry

THE second agency for the proper observance of Children's Week is the church and the church school. The Christian church still makes the mistake of buying her music when she has youth yearning for drama and pageantry. Here is a program of the fine arts in the service of religion:

1. A program of music, including congregational singing and choirs of children and adults.
2. A story cycle with the accompaniment of music and pictures.
3. A visualization program including:
(a) Stereopticon slides of famous children's pictures and their messages to adults on behalf of child life:
Caritas—Thayer.
The Children's Hour, Sweet and Low, Now I Lay Me Down to Sleep, Children are an Heritage of the Lord—all by W. L. Taylor.
Wisdom Teaches—Walker.
Madame Lebrun and Daughter—Lebrun.
A Child's Grace—Jessie Willcox Smith.
The Hope of the World—Copping.
Boy and Rabbit—Raeburn.
(b) Living Pictures or the posing of art masterpieces:
Reynolds' Samuel—signifying Obedience.
Benouville's Joan of Arc Listening to the Spirits—Vision.
Watts' Sir Galahad—Purity.
Renl's St. Michael and Dragon—Courage.
Renoul's A Helping Hand—Helpfulness.
Willard's Spirit of '76—Patriotism.
Johnson's The Boy Lincoln—Industry.
Breton's Song of the Lark—Happiness.

Smith's Dawn—Reverence.
Abbey's Oath of Knighthood—Loyalty.

4. A Pageant of Child Rights, of Religious Education.

The community is the third interested party in the propaganda for a sane Children's Week observance. Her appeal to adults in behalf of childhood will be made through:

1. A parade of all Sunday schools of the city, showing by orderly units, by flags and transparencies, by floats and pantomime, by bands and choruses, the strength of the religious forces of the city. Certain pictures may be posed with telling effect, such as Walker's The Wisdom of the Law, Simmons' Justice and Copping's The Hope of the World, with a Sunday-school teacher taking the center of this latter picture.
2. Booths and store-window exhibits will further emphasize the varied influences at work.
3. The week-day schools of religion will have large place in the parade, the exhibit and the conferences, showing how a new moral force is at work with the children of school grade.
4. A house-to-house canvass will finally reveal the weak spots in the life of the community—the unchurched child, the spiritual illiterate, the family without a conscience or spiritual guide.

Why Millions eat them

HEINZ

OVEN BAKED BEANS

HERE's the real baked bean flavor and real bean nutriment assured by the Heinz method of real baking by dry heat in real ovens.

And a distinctively different good taste—that flavor of the delicious tomato sauce famous for its use in Heinz Oven Baked Beans.

Eat them often, instead of many other foods that are not so good for you, not so completely satisfying, and cost so much more.

You will save money. You will save time and fuss in the kitchen. You will better your health. First of all, you will like the Beans, like them so well that you will never tire of them.

Some of the 57

Vinegars
Spaghetti
Apple Butter
Tomato Ketchup

Blackheads indicate your cleansing method is wrong

MANY a girl is unaware that her skin is disfigured by blackheads—for she does not see her skin as other people see it.

The ordinary shaded light of indoors never shows you your skin as it really is.

Can your complexion stand the test of outdoor light? Take a hand glass to the window, raise the shade as high as it will go—and what do you find? Is your skin faultlessly clear? or do ugly little blackheads, whose presence you never suspected, become visible?

Blackheads are an indication that you are not using the right method of cleansing for your type of skin. Use the following simple treatment and see how quickly you can overcome this defect:

EVERY NIGHT before retiring, apply hot cloths to your face until the skin is reddened. Then with a rough washcloth work up a heavy lather of Woodbury's Facial Soap and rub it into the pores thoroughly, always with an upward and outward motion. Rinse with clear hot water, then with cold. If possible rub your face for thirty seconds with a piece of ice.

To remove blackheads already formed, substitute a flesh brush for the washcloth in this treatment. Then protect the fingers with a handkerchief and press out the blackheads.

The first time you use this treatment it will leave your skin with a slightly drawn, tight feeling. Do not regard this as a disadvantage—it means that your skin is responding, in the right way, to a more thorough and stimulating form of cleansing. After you have used Woodbury's once or twice this drawn sensation will disappear. At the same time you will begin to notice how much firmer and clearer your skin is becoming.

Special treatments for each one of the commoner skin troubles are given in the booklet of famous skin treatments that is wrapped around each cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap.

Get a cake of Woodbury's today—begin tonight the treatment your skin needs.

The same qualities that give Woodbury's its beneficial effect on the skin make it ideal for general use—for keeping the skin in good condition. A 25 cent cake lasts a month or six weeks for general toilet use, including any of the special Woodbury treatments.

A complete miniature set of the Woodbury skin preparations

For 25 cents we will send you a complete miniature set of the Woodbury skin preparations, containing:

A trial size cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap
A sample tube of the new Woodbury's Facial Cream
A sample tube of Woodbury's Cold Cream
A sample box of Woodbury's Facial Powder
Together with the treatment booklet, "A Skin You Love to Touch."

Send for this set today. Address The Andrew Jergens Co., 104 Spring Grove Ave., Cincinnati, Ohio. If you live in Canada, address The Andrew Jergens Co., Limited, 104 Sherbrooke St., Perth, Ontario. English agents: H. C. Quelch & Co., 4 Ludgate Square, London, E. C. 4.

Resurrection: By Alma Adams Wiley

O LIFE that leads us by the ways of death!
O death that crowds life into glorious bloom!
These Easter lilies bring on incensed breath
The oft-told message from an unsealed tomb;
"Now Life the Victor rolls the stone away!
Arise! It is the Resurrection Day!"

Too long the world has looked upon its crosses,
Too long stood impotent before its tombs,
Mourning its vanished dreams, its poignant losses;
With eyes bent earthward, dulled by funeral glooms,
It cannot count the three steps of the Way—
The Cross, the Tomb, the Resurrection Day.

What is this surging at the heart of life,
This giving up that thereby we may hold,
Except the law of growth be one-half strife?
These lilies—were they seeds cast in black mold?
So waxen white, so pure, "To you," they say,
"Love waits to bring the Resurrection Day."

The cross whereon was nailed some hope, some dream,
Who has not borne? Despair's last numbing blow
Who has not felt? And yet One found the gleam
That lights the dark, by which our souls must grow!
Freely, O lilies, spend your incensed breath
To tell all doubting ones there is no death!

"The Home I'd Like to Have"

(Continued from Page 27)

giving perfect privacy while preparing to serve a meal, or clearing the table, no matter who may be in the living room. The French doors from dining room to porch give the housewife a direct view, through the glass peephole of the kitchen-dining-room door, of anyone standing at the living-room door. And the distance from kitchen to porch is only the width of one room.

The basement holds laundry and heating plant. The attic is floored but not finished. In winter the front porch is glass-enclosed, making a delightful sun room. If more porch is wanted a flat-roofed affair, giving a pergola effect, like the porte-cochère, may be built across the front.

Miss Smith suggests "wide siding and green shingles," for this bungalow; so I have developed it thus. But almost any material might be used with very good results.

A Modern Farmhouse

BURNETT PETERSON is a North Dakota farmer; and his prize-winning Northwestern one-and-a-half-story, eight-room farmhouse is everything that a modern farm home should be. Very few of us realize that a farmhouse must be planned quite differently from any other sort of home; it must serve as workshop, boarding house and farm office. Mr. Peterson's letter makes that very clear:

"The farmhouse plan presented here is large enough to accommodate the average family one usually has to have on a farm. Bearing this in mind the washroom was planned to eliminate the annoyance of having the men standing around the kitchen when one is about to serve a meal. This room is accessible from the outside, and opens to the hall, so that any room in the house may be reached. The office is a necessity on any modern farm. It may be entered by way of the wash room, without disturbing the privacy of the family or tracking dirt through the front of the house.

"There is ample wall space in the kitchen, where cabinets and cupboards may be built to suit the taste of the housewife; no matter where a pantry may be placed it increases the number of steps that she must take. The double cupboard opening to dining room and kitchen saves steps, both in setting the table and putting away the dishes.

"The large screened porch, with doors to kitchen and to dining room, is very necessary. In hot weather meals are served on it; preparing vegetables, canning and preserving may be done here.

"Upstairs are four good bedrooms, also a little sewing room. The balcony is very convenient for airing bedclothing, shaking rugs and so on. The first story and gable walls may be given a stucco finish, using hollow tile or concrete block as a base."

The Western bungalow is a wonderfully clever little home of the general type that one sees in the bungalow courts of Pasadena or San Diego. Only three real rooms, but these three do double duty.

"I prefer a few large rooms to several small ones," says Mrs. H. H. Cox, of Los Angeles. "By combining three rooms in one the expense is lessened—and also the housework. The disappearing bed, beneath the bookcase buffet, takes care of the overnight guest; the big closet, with the floor raised two and a half feet, is large enough for a dressing and sewing room. A gate-leg dining table stands at one end, though most meals will be served in the breakfast nook.

"The cooler has slat or wire-net shelves opening at top and bottom to give the necessary draft of cool air."

The Heating Question

A PAIR of curtained French doors connect the bedroom with the living room; for large social affairs these two rooms may be thrown together. Later another room may be built on at the left as outlined.

Mrs. Cox does not say what materials she prefers, so I have developed the design in the typical Southern California style, with hollow tile walls, stuccoed; flat roof, lined with heat-proof fabric, red-tile copings, casement windows, and so on. The kitchen porch, where the laundry trays stand, is screened for summer and glass-enclosed for winter.

The plans do not show any cellar or heating plant; Californians shiver through the chilly winter mornings and evenings, hovering over oilstoves and fireplaces, and protesting that "We don't need heat out here!" A cast-iron wood-stove, built into the fireplace, is very comforting at certain seasons in such a bungalow; the cellarless heating plant, with a tiny furnace in the kitchen or even the living room, from which pipes lead to radiators in other rooms, is advocated by many and is thoroughly practical; or you may have a gas-fired pipeless furnace, with pilot light and first-floor control. Such a furnace needs a cellar; you can have one if you choose with stairs going down from the screened porch, through the closet, as the dotted lines indicate.

NOTE—We can furnish working blue-prints of any prize house at one dollar per set. Write to the House Plan Contest Editor, THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. Enclose check or money-order for one dollar. Specifications are not furnished because your local builder can help you write these to suit your local conditions.

A Delightful Test To bring you prettier teeth

This offers you a ten-day test which will be a revelation to you. It will show you the way to whiter, cleaner, safer teeth.

Millions of people of some forty races now employ this method. Leading dentists everywhere advise it. Now you should learn how much it means to you and yours.

Clouded by a film

Your teeth are clouded more or less by film. The fresh film is viscous—you can feel it with your tongue. It clings to teeth, enters crevices and stays. And it forms the basis of dingy coats.

The film absorbs stains, so the teeth look discolored. Film is the basis of tartar. These coats, more or less discolored, spoil the luster of the teeth.

How it ruins teeth

That film holds food substance which ferments and forms acids. It holds the acids in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They are the chief cause of many troubles, local and internal. So most tooth troubles are now traced to that film, and they are almost universal.

Pepsodent
REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

The New-Day Dentifrice

Endorsed by modern authorities and now advised by leading dentists nearly all the world over. All druggists supply the large tubes.

Now we combat it

Dental science, after long research, has found two film combatants. Many careful tests have proved their efficiency. Modern authorities endorse them. Leading dentists everywhere urge their daily use.

A new-day tooth paste has been created, called Pepsodent. It complies with modern requirements. And these two great film combatants are embodied in it.

Two other effects

Pepsodent brings two other effects which authority now deems essential. It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva. That is there to digest starch deposits which may otherwise remain to form acids.

It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva. That is Nature's neutralizer for acids which cause decay.

An ideal diet, rich in acid-bearing fruit, would bring like effects. But Pepsodent brings them regularly.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube and watch these effects for a while. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear.

Then judge the benefits by what you see and feel. You will be amazed.

10-Day Tube Free ⁸²⁷

THE PEPSODENT COMPANY,
Dept. 724, 1104 S. Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill.
Mail 10-day tube of Pepsodent to

ONLY ONE TUBE TO A FAMILY

The Dance of the Perfumes

OUT of the hush of the vast and slumberous Orient teeming with fragrance and romance come the inspiration and the essence of Win-Sum Flowers, Vantine's modern most elaborate step in the evolution of the age-old Witch Dance of the Perfumes. The murmur and scent of the mysterious East, the veritable brooding soul of Asia is caught and held in the sweet imprisonment of Vantine's Win-Sum Flowers.

This 4 oz. bottle of Win-Sum Flowers Toilet Water and the 1 oz. bottle of Win-Sum Flowers Extract in six alluring effects: Pagoda Rose, White Lilac, Violet of Siam, Nile Lily, Heliotrope and Orchid. $1.00 the bottle.

Never has the Vantine Buddha of Perfumes placed a choicer offering upon the altar of imperious beauty. Over Rajputana's burning desert sands and through ice-bound fastnesses of Himalayan heights toil caravans and hardy bands wresting from nature the priceless elements of rich exotic Win-Sum Flowers products. In Vantine's perfume studios, masters of aromatic art blend craftily and bind tenaciously together the haughty, haunting and elusive fragrances that enter into Win-Sum Flowers toilet waters and perfumes.

At Stores and Departments where toilet goods are sold your individuality will find its echo and its faultlessly harmonious note somewhere in the grand scale of Vantine's perfumes, toilet waters, incenses and boudoir requisites.

Vantine's
The Buddha of Perfumes

68 Hunters Point Avenue, L. I. City
NEW YORK

Bumbleton Folks

By CLAUDE CALLAN

Illustration by Thomas Fogarty

"OLD UNCLE FRANK STEVENS, WHO HAS THE REPUTATION OF BEING DEAF, IS A HAPPY MAN. BOTH MEN AND WOMEN WILL TELL ANYTHING IN HIS PRESENCE AND HE ALWAYS KNOWS THE BEST NEWS IN TOWN."

MR. McSPAT doesn't like to receive a letter from his sister. In fact, he doesn't like anything to happen that will upset Mrs. McSpat. When he reached home yesterday afternoon he immediately saw that his wife was angry and that it was the worst form of anger. For a moment she was silent, and then in an injured tone she said to him: "There is a letter on the table from Mattie." Poor Mr. McSpat shuddered. He knew he would have to answer for Mattie's mistakes. He read the letter hurriedly, threw it aside and began talking about something else, but Mrs. McSpat could think only of the letter. "Your sister is very much concerned about your health," she said. "She doesn't seem to think that I am interested in your health or that I am competent to take proper care of you. And I see that as usual she omitted inquiring about my health. My health that I have broken down waiting on you and these children is of no concern to Mattie or to any of the rest of your people. It is always John's health. If John is all right they don't care what becomes of his wife. That is the McSpats for you. They want to know that the McSpats are doing well, and they don't care for another soul on this earth. I see that they are keeping two cows now, and that Mattie wishes you could be there to get all the sweet milk you could drink. That is a hint to me to see that you get plenty of milk and the proper kind of foods. She doesn't think I am intelligent enough to feed you, unless she reminds me of it occasionally. I think I'll write and thank her for her hint and tell her I will see that her dear brother gets enough to eat. I noticed that when she was about to close the letter she happened to think of me. She wants you to give me her love, but you needn't mind about doing it. I can get along without Mattie McSpat's love."

MRS. GRISTHOPPER is the best hand in the world to get the whole story, and a young wife especially is helpless in her hands. Mrs. Gristhopper's plan is to take the part of the other woman's husband and his people in a half-hearted manner, and by this means compel the other woman to submit all her evidence. One day last week, after Mrs. George Barker had told a lot of things about George and his mother and sisters, Mrs. Gristhopper said to her: "Well, now, don't you think it is possible that you are mistaken? I agree that it isn't right for Mr. Barker to deny you things in order to help his people, but it may be that he hasn't actually given them any money since he has had his salary reduced." The helpless Mrs. Barker was so determined to carry her point that she told Mrs. Gristhopper just how much money George had given to his folks. "Well, that may be true," said Mrs. Gristhopper, "but I am sure Mr. Barker is proud of you and that he would be glad to have you fix up and look nice all the time. I just know he would." In order to convince Mrs. Gristhopper that she was wrong, Mrs. Barker quoted several mean things that George said to her recently, and added that he actually tried to get her to go to work and earn money to pay for her clothes. "Now, I want to tell you, Mrs. Barker," said Mrs. Gristhopper, "that I am sure he was only joking about that. He doesn't want you to go to work. I just know that if it came right down to your going to work he wouldn't bear to it at all." This brought from Mrs. Barker the information that he already had asked her to try to get a position in one of the stores. When Mrs. Barker left, Mrs. Gristhopper knew all that was worth knowing about the Barkers.

MRS. NATHANIEL RIPPLE began a general housecleaning Tuesday, following a visit to the doctor Monday, at which time he advised her to take a good rest. Monday evening Mrs. Ripple told her husband what the doctor had said and that he had given her a prescription for a tonic, and early the following morning she plunged into the housecleaning. Mrs. Ripple felt that if she got down Mr. Ripple would be to blame for it, and she wanted to make it plain to him that he cared nothing for her health or happiness. The further she went the madder she got at Mr. Ripple and the more determined she was to humiliate him by having a long sick spell which he and everybody else would know was brought about by his allowing her to clean that big house when she should have been in bed. She took down curtains that had been washed only a few weeks ago, and when it looked as if there wasn't enough work in the main part of the house to put her in bed she began cleaning the attic. She kept count of the number of times she went up and down the stairs so she could tell her husband about it and make him feel ashamed of himself. In the evening when Mr. Ripple reached home he found the doctor's prescription on the table in the front room and asked his wife why she had not had it filled. "We are at so much expense," she said, "that I thought it would be best for me to do without the medicine. I guess I can pull through without it and I don't want to be any more of a burden to anybody than I can help." Mr. Ripple said he thought it would be best to economize on something else, but she was determined to economize on medicine. For three days Mrs. Ripple tried hard to bring on a long sick spell, but fate was against her, and now she feels that the result of her efforts has been to make Mr. Ripple expect more of her.

THE time china closets were the rage in Bumbleton, Mrs. Trundle was happier than she ever expects to be again. Mr. Trundle was very poor, but he was a young man with his future before him and he and his wife did not doubt that he would some day be very wealthy. They lived in a small house that they rented for ten dollars a month and hoped some day to own, and they made it as comfortable as his limited means would permit.

This was the state of affairs when the china-closet craze reached the town. Nobody seemed to know where the craze came from, but all of a sudden everybody in Bumbleton wanted a china closet. One family bought the only closet that the furniture dealer had on hand and the dealer then began ordering closets for his customers. At first any kind of china closet would do, but in a few weeks each family was anxious to get a nicer one than other people had, and finally the Silverspoons ordered a massive closet that put all the other closets to shame. Mrs. Trundle saw this china closet at the store before it was delivered to the Silverspoon home and she asked her husband to take a look at it. When Mr. Trundle saw it he made up his mind to do something rash. He realized that it was foolish for him to spend a lot of money, but he wanted his young wife to have some one thing in their home that would be just as fine as anyone else in town owned. Even if he had to make out with very ordinary things as a general rule, he wanted to stand on his toes and touch luxury just once. And so for the sake of his young wife he ordered a china closet just as massive as the one the Silverspoons had bought, but he paid five dollars more to have leaded glass in the doors. When the beautiful closet came some people thought it was not in keeping with the rest of the furniture in the Trundle home, or even with the house itself, but it was a source of great satisfaction to Mr. and Mrs. Trundle to have the reputation of being the owners of the best china closet in Bumbleton.

Old Uncle Frank Stevens, who has the reputation of being deaf, is a happy man. Both men and women will tell anything in his presence and he always knows the best news in town.

When Mr. Buttercup finally bought the white china his wife had been wanting ever since they married, she decided not to paint it. She was afraid it might not show up well because her old art teacher would not be there to touch it up a little.

After Floss Potter wore a boy's ring one day she was sure of one thing—her parents had to treat her right or she would leave home.

Dad Darnier thinks people who ride on trains all the time must be miserable. It is bad enough to get a cinder in your eye once every year or two.

Mrs. Henry Nimble has asked Henry to take a good look at Mrs. Will Nimble's hands the next time he sees her. It is an important matter because Mrs. Will claims to wear size six gloves, and Mrs. Henry just knows that Mrs. Will's hands are larger than hers.

The bachelor uncle's marriage will prove a great blow to the children's toy banks.

SPEED + SAFETY

DO you know that the two universally desired qualities in laundry soap—speed and safety—qualities that always seemed as far apart as the poles—are now available in a single cake?

Your clothes are on the line earlier without hard rubbing, and with or without boiling, as you wish. The work is done with all the speed and ease of naphtha soap.

But you sacrifice nothing to obtain this freedom from washday drudgery. Not a thread is harmed. Not a color that you would wash in the ordinary way is faded. Not a fabric that you always put in the regular washing is shrunk or injured in any way. Your clothes enjoy the complete safety of the best white laundry soap. Every piece is sweet, clean and beautiful, yet you have saved your time and strength. This combination of speed and safety in washing clothes and in all other house work is now a demonstrated fact every day in millions of homes. P and G The White Naphtha Soap is the single cake that gives you all the advantages of naphtha soap and white laundry soap. Do you use it?

*Not merely a white laundry soap;
Not merely a naphtha soap;
But the best features of both, combined.*

Used in more homes than any other laundry soap in America.

The immense demand for P and G The White Naphtha Soap reduces its cost to the minimum. Raw materials are bought in tremendous quantities and, therefore, at lowest prices. Factories located in different parts of the country make for short hauls and less freight expense. Millions of housekeepers use P and G The White Naphtha Soap because they consider it the best value on the market.

Armstrong's Linoleum

for Every Floor in the House

For Your Sun Porch Inset-Tile Linoleum

ALL your ideas about linoleum will change when you see the new kind of linoleum that good stores are offering as permanent floors for modern homes.

The sun porch in the picture has a floor of Armstrong's Inset-Tile Linoleum—one of the newest and most distinctive designs in which this improved type of linoleum is made.

Here is a typical case where the floor blends right in with the color scheme. The pattern is simple, and the furnishings can be changed to suit the season.

This floor is easily cleaned, and an occasional waxing keeps it in perfect condition.

A sun porch of average size, 12 x 14 ft., can be floored with the Inset-Tile Linoleum shown in the illustration at a cost of about $75.00 (slightly higher in the far West). This linoleum is cemented down firmly over builders' deadening felt—the most satisfactory way to lay linoleum as a permanent floor.

You can identify Armstrong's Linoleum by the Circle "A" trademark on the burlap back. All Armstrong's Linoleum is guaranteed to give satisfaction.

Write to our Bureau of Interior Decoration for advice as to proper patterns and colors for use in any scheme of home decoration. No charge for this service.

"The Art of Home Furnishing and Decoration" (Second Edition)

By Frank Alvah Parsons, President of the New York School of Fine and Applied Art. Sent, with de luxe colorplates of fine home interiors, on receipt of twenty cents.

Armstrong's Linoleum Rugs

You can also buy rugs of Armstrong's Linoleum, suitable for kitchen, dining-room, or bedroom, and fully guaranteed to give satisfactory service. Send for free booklet, "Armstrong's Linoleum Rugs," showing colorplates of pleasing and artistic designs.

ARMSTRONG CORK COMPANY
LINOLEUM DEPARTMENT
925 Mary St., Lancaster, Penna.

If you prefer any of these Armstrong patterns for your sun porch, order by number from your linoleum merchant. The design in the picture is No. T43.

Look for the CIRCLE "A" trademark on the burlap back

T40

M62

783

The Sun Porch

The grey wicker furniture and blue chintz coverings are just the furnishings this floor of Inset-Tile Linoleum calls for.

Human Nature in the Bible

(Continued from Page 20)

would be accepted as dowry. The intention was, of course, to have the rash young man lose his life in the attempt. But David went out with his own company and slew two hundred; so Michal became his wife. His popularity increased enormously; in the quaint Bible phrase, "his name was much set by."

It is a pity that this marriage, which began as a love match, should have ended in a quarrel; but the cause of the separation was quite natural. King David was coming from a victory, bringing back the ark of God. He was in such high spirits that he danced before the Lord with all his might, very scantily dressed; as the procession entered the city, Michal looked out of a window, and saw her husband the king leaping and dancing in the street. With that regard for conventional decency so much stronger in women than in men, she despised him; she thought he was making a fool of himself. It is easy to understand her rage and shame; no woman likes to have her husband make himself ridiculous.

David came into the house in bright glee and wholly satisfied with himself. His wife greeted him in a manner that first amazed and then infuriated him. She told him acidly that he had made a vulgar and silly exhibition, that everyone was secretly laughing at him. "You thought you were just wonderful, didn't you? Well, you made an ass out of yourself." David's male pride was horribly hurt; he answered brutally, and as so often happens in domestic quarrels, he insulted her family, reminding her that he had been chosen over her father; that he was better than any person in her father's house. Now he was going to do as he pleased; he would dance even more vilely than she had seen him. This was the end; he never spoke to her again. Unfortunate, but human.

When David saw that everything he did only increased Saul's anger, he had a long talk with Jonathan about it, and the two young men swore eternal friendship, Jonathan begging David not to forget his children when they were fatherless. He seems to have been certain of the speedy approach of disaster to the king, and he knew that he must fall with his father, like a loyal prince of the house.

It is pleasant to observe that he never joined David in public opposition to the king, though doubtless he wished to do so.

Jonathan Proves a True Friend

AT THIS time they arranged a system of signals. The next day was the feast of the new moon; and David knew that his absence from table would be observed, though he did not dare to be present. The dinner-time came; Saul took his accustomed seat by the wall, and Abner, the captain of the host, sat at his side; the king glared at David's empty place, but said nothing. On the second day, however, he asked Jonathan what had become of David, for he knew well enough that Jonathan could tell him, if he would. The prince began to defend his friend, and Saul threw a javelin across the table at him; Jonathan rose, wild with rage, and walked out, leaving his dinner untasted.

The following day, by a previously arranged signal, Jonathan went out in the field with a lad carrying his arrows, ostensibly to practice marksmanship, but David was hidden. When Jonathan shot the arrows beyond the place where his friend lay, and told the boy to pick them up, David knew that the king was obdurate. The boy took the bow and arrows and returned to the city. No sooner had he disappeared than David sprang up; the two friends embraced and renewed their vows of friendship in one of the most deeply affecting scenes to be found in literature. Jonathan returned to the city, and David wandered off into exile; it is impossible to say which of them suffered most.

Although David behaved toward Saul with forbearance and loyalty, the king was determined to make it a case of civil war. He proclaimed David to be a public enemy and pursued him with the royal army.

While still in exile, David, in a dramatic manner, obtained a new and beautiful wife. It seems that he and his followers had protected the vast property of a rich farmer named Nabal; being in need of food, David sent his young men to this plutocrat, requesting assistance. Nabal was a hard-bitten old skinflint, and he said: "Who is David? Am I going to hand over my goods to a runaway servant?" When this message was brought back, the impulsive and passionate young leader flew into a tempest of rage and sallied out to destroy Nabal, his family and his entire possessions. There was no doubt that he would have done this, if it had not been for Nabal's pretty wife, Abigail. She secretly took an enormous heap of costly provisions and went to meet the avenger. David was extremely susceptible to beauty, and when this "woman of good understanding and of a beautiful countenance" looked him in the eyes and spoke flatteringly and soothingly, he melted like snow in the sunshine. She was as fair in speech as in face; she said: "The soul of my lord shall be bound in the bundle of life with the Lord thy God."

David blessed her for coming, and for saving him from the guilt of murder. She returned home.

"How are the Mighty Fallen"

THAT night old Nabal gave a big dinner and got dead drunk. He was feeling bad the next morning, but so much worse when his wife told him of her doings that he had a stroke and in ten days was dead. David shouted with delight when he heard of this and immediately asked Abigail to become his wife. She accepted with alacrity.

There were two fine qualities in David that were never understood even by those closest to him; one was his reverential loyalty to King Saul, the other the strength of his family affection. Both were greater than his concern for his personal glory or safety. David was at Ziklag one day when a messenger came from the field of battle bearing the news that Saul was dead and saying that he, the messenger, had at the king's request killed him. To the astonishment of the visitor, David was struck with horror. "Wast thou not afraid to stretch forth thine hand to destroy the Lord's anointed?" And he had the man killed on the spot.

Then he composed an elegiac poem for Saul and Jonathan, which in immortal phrases sets forth the passion of loyalty and friendship:

The beauty of Israel is slain upon thy high places; how are the mighty fallen!
Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon; lest the daughters of the Philistines rejoice, lest the daughters of the uncircumcised triumph.

Saul and Jonathan were lovely and pleasant in their lives, and in their death they were not divided: they were swifter than eagles, they were stronger than lions.

How are the mighty fallen in the midst of the battle! O Jonathan, thou wast slain in thine high places.

(Continued on Page 52)

Aunt Belle's Comfort Letters

I'd Like to Nail This Sign in Every Nursery

Mothers—please be regular. Baby's tiny anatomy should keep time like a watch. If it is fed at any convenient hour, bathed when you feel like it and allowed to sleep or wake at irregular intervals, you are bound to have a badly disorganized little anatomy to care for.

A baby is so logical. When everything is right—food, sleep, skin—baby is no more trouble than a kitten. But upset the schedule and everything is all wrong.

Take such an ordinary thing as talcum. You know that Mennen Borated is right, just as your Mother and Grandmother knew it was right. But suppose you experiment with a very cheap talcum or one without a properly balanced formula, or with one too strongly scented, or one which doesn't adhere to the skin. Baby's petal skin will show the difference very quickly.

While we are on this matter of skin, I want to tell you all over again about wonderful Kora-Konia. I'm sorry for any baby whose mother doesn't know about Kora-Konia. It's the most amazing remedy I have ever employed in my years of baby raising. Almost unbelievable, are the results I have observed in cases of prickly heat, teething rashes, or inflammation caused by damp diapers.

Kora-Konia is not just another talcum. It isn't talcum at all, but possesses remarkable protective and curative virtues. It lays on raw inflamed flesh a velvety film of healing powder which clings for hours, protecting while it soothes and heals. Please try it. And do send your 25 cents at once for my Baby Book (35 cents in Canada). I know you will like it and get a lot of help from it.

Lovingly,

BELLE.

THE MENNEN COMPANY
NEWARK, N.J. U.S.A.

THE MENNEN COMPANY, LIMITED
Montreal, Quebec

Have you written for Aunt Belle's BABY BOOK?

It's the most helpful, scientific, comforting little book that ever guided a young mother through the wonderful trials of her first baby.

Thousands and thousands of babies are stronger and happier and will be more useful in the world, more successful, just because of Aunt Belle's practical day by day advice. Aunt Belle's only ambition is to be the world's greatest mother. She wants millions of babies.

That is why this invaluable book, beautifully printed, bound in stiff board covers, is sold for only 25 cents, 35 cents in Canada.

Send the coupon for your copy.

The Mennen Company,
331 Central Avenue,
Newark, N. J.

I enclose 25 cents (Canada, 35 cents) for Aunt Belle's Baby Book.

Name _____

Address _____

One Bushel

yields only three packages of these extra-flavorful oats

From a bushel of choice oats we get only three large packages of Quaker.

That's because we use the queen grains only—just the rich, plump, flavorful oats. All unripe grains—the puny and insipid—are discarded.

You get just the cream of the oats—just the luscious flakes—when you order Quaker Oats. And that extra flavor costs no extra price.

That's why oat lovers, all the world over, have flocked to Quaker Oats. Many of them send ten thousand miles to get it.

Many millions of children have derived their love of oats from these delicious flakes.

The oat dish is important. As a vim-food and a body-builder nothing matches oats.

It supplies 16 needed elements in almost ideal form.

Why not serve such a food at its best?

When you order oat flakes, specify the brand.

Quaker Oats

The favorite of fifty nations

An oat confection— Quaker Macaroons

1 cup sugar, 1 tablespoon butter, 2 eggs, 2½ cups Quaker Oats, 2 teaspoons baking powder, 1 teaspoon vanilla.

Cream butter and sugar. Add yolks of eggs. Add Quaker Oats, to which baking powder has been added, and add vanilla. Beat whites of eggs stiff and add last. Drop on buttered tins with teaspoon, but very few on each tin, as they spread. Bake in slow oven. Makes about 65 cookies.

Packed in sealed round packages with removable cover

Human Nature in the Bible

(Continued from Page 51)

I am distressed for thee, my brother Jonathan; very pleasant hast thou been unto me: thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women.

How are the mighty fallen, and the weapons of war perished!

Saul's son, Ishbosheth, was crowned king of Israel, and David king of Judah. Civil war began, and nearly all the forty years of David's reign were filled with fighting against foreign and domestic foes.

King Ishbosheth was assassinated and the murderers brought his head to the horrified David, who reminded them of what he had done to the messenger who came from dead Saul, "who thought that I would have given him a reward for his tidings." He gave orders; the messengers were killed and their bodies hanged over the pool in Hebron.

David was then anointed king of Israel; he reigned seven years over Judah and thirty-three years over the united countries. Jerusalem became the seat of the monarchy and the city of David.

It is pleasant to remember King David's kindness to a son of Jonathan, who was a cripple. This was Mephibosheth, who was permanently injured, as so many babies have been, by the carelessness of a nurse. He was five years old when the news of the death of his father and grandfather came; his nurse picked him up and started to run and in her haste dropped him. As a result he was incurably lame. Years later David inquired if there was anyone left of the house of Saul to whom he might show a kindness for Jonathan's sake; a man named Ziba appeared and told the king of Mephibosheth. The lame young man appeared in the royal presence with fear and trembling and did obeisance; but David told him that he would always care for him for his father's sake; he should receive back the property that he would have inherited from Saul, and he should be a perpetual guest at the king's own table.

It turned out later that either Mephibosheth or Ziba was a liar; it was one of those innumerable cases that depend on human testimony, the least dependable thing in the whole world; the testimony is flatly contradictory, and both puzzled and disgusted David, so that he finally settled the matter with a contemptuous gesture.

Was Mephibosheth Ungrateful?

IT SEEMS incredible after David's kindness that Mephibosheth should have behaved with rank and treacherous ingratitude; but it would not be the first or last time in history.

When David was in sore distress during the rebellion of Absalom, and the opportunists were in doubt which side to support, Ziba appeared before the king with an immense store of provisions, and in response to David's question as to Mephibosheth, Ziba replied that the lame man stayed in Jerusalem, rejoicing in David's downfall, and believing that the house of Saul soon would regain the throne. This sounds like a huge lie; but David apparently believed it, for he told Ziba that the property of Mephibosheth should thenceforth belong to him.

After Absalom's death, when King David reentered Jerusalem, who should come to meet him but Mephibosheth, looking like a vagabond; he had neither dressed his feet, nor trimmed his beard, nor washed his clothes from the day David had fled. This looked like sincerity of mourning; and the king inquired: "Why did you not go with me, Mephibosheth?" And he answered that he had planned to ride to the king, but that Ziba had slandered him. In this mental morass the king floundered, and then said impatiently that the property must be divided between Ziba and Mephibosheth. The latter answered humbly that he was willing to have Ziba take all, he was so happy at the king's successful return.

All we can say is, somebody lied.

Later, when David thought it necessary to hang seven of Saul's sons, he spared Mephibosheth, apparently not out of pity or friendship, but solely because of the oath he had made years before to Jonathan.

It is sad that after recording the fidelity of David to the memory of his best friend, we should have also to write down one of the blackest crimes of his life. But although David is one of the heroes of Israelitish history, the honest old chronicler set down the most damaging facts, for only one reason—because they were the truth. David's adultery and murder have made a tremendous impression on the world, just as Napoleon's murder of the Duc d'Enghien has shocked people more than the hundred thousand murders he committed to satisfy his selfish ambition; what should one be among so many? But most readers have so little imagination that the fate of one well-known person of high social position stirs them more than thousands of nameless sufferers.

"Thou Art the Man"

TOWARD the close of a summer day, David walked on the roof of the royal palace; and in the dusk he saw a woman bathing. He sent a messenger to inquire her name, and upon learning that she was married to Uriah the Hittite, he took her himself. It has often been the royal prerogative to take anything that happens at the moment to seem attractive; one reason why so many kings have no true appreciation of beauty is because admiration with them is always mingled with predatory desire; they have about as much artistic discernment of beauty as a thief has of the beauty of the plate and jewels he steals.

David sent Bathsheba home again, and after a time she sent him word that she was with child. Her husband Uriah was away with the army, fighting for his country, which does not add to the attractiveness of David's conduct. The king sent word to General Joab that he wished to speak with Uriah. Accordingly the soldier, who seems to have been a rugged, upstanding man at arms, came into the presence of the king. In vain did David attempt to persuade Uriah to go to his house; Uriah said that his comrades were fighting at the field, and he would be ashamed to sleep in comfort while they were in hardship and peril.

Doubtless this was not the real reason; he must have suspected the truth the moment he looked into the king's face.

So David sent the brave fellow back to the camp, with instructions to Joab to put him in the most dangerous position in the battle. Joab knew what was expected and why; and in the dispatch he sent home it appeared that among the casualties was Uriah the Hittite. The greedy monarch then married Bathsheba; but although he forgot God, God did not forget him.

Nathan, the prophet of Jehovah, appeared before David and told him a pathetic story of the cupidity and cruelty of a rich man in dealing with a poor and defenseless person; the king's anger was aroused—we always despise our own wickedness when we see it in others or on the stage—and said that the rich man must die. Then Nathan pointed his finger at the king, and said, "Thou art the man." He prophesied three evils that would come upon David, because of his sin: the sword should never depart from his house; his own wives should be publicly

(Continued on Page 54)

Keep the story with a KODAK

Today it's a picture of Grandmother reading to the children. Tomorrow it may be Bobbie playing traffic policeman or Aunt Edna at the wheel of her new car or Brother Bill back from college for the week-end or—

There's always another story waiting for your Kodak.

Free at your dealer's or from us—"At Home with the Kodak," a well illustrated little book that will help in picture-making at your house.

Autographic Kodaks $6.50 up

Eastman Kodak Company, Rochester, N. Y., The Kodak City

GIFTS THAT LAST

"Boys, if I could say anything, I'd say it!"

The familiar faces of the old crowd gave no inkling of what was about to happen—when, suddenly, one of the boys set before him a Chest of Holmes & Edwards silverware!

My, what a gift! How the eyes of the bride-to-be will shine when she sees it.

The quiet distinctiveness of the exquisite Hostess pattern, in its handsome Haddon Hall Chest, brings to mind a vision of pride and happiness in the years to come.

In Silver-Inlaid, solid silver where it wears:

Tea Spoons, set of six, $4.50

In Super-Plate, protected against wear:

Tea Spoons, set of six, $3.75

At the Better Dealers in Silverware

THE HOLMES & EDWARDS SILVER CO.

INTERNATIONAL SILVER CO., Successors

Bridgeport, Connecticut

Manufactured in Canada by

STANDARD SILVER CO.

of TORONTO, L.M.

The HOSTESS PATTERN

HADDON HALL CHEST
in illustration

English Finish Paneled chest with soft gray chamois lining; contains 26 pieces dinner set.

In Silver-Inlaid - $46.00

In Super-Plate - $40.00

The House of HOLMES & EDWARDS

© H. & E. 1922

INTERNATIONAL SILVER CO.

Human Nature in the Bible

(Continued from Page 52)

dishonored by another man; and his child by Bathsheba should die. All three came true.

The only creditable part of this melancholy story is David's behavior to Nathan. Instead of striking him down, or rebuking him, or trying to explain his own conduct, he said frankly, "I have sinned." He confessed and he repented. In spite of the care of the royal specialists, the child died, and David said: "I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me."

He kept his wife Bathsheba, for what would have been her position if he had sent her away? She always retained her influence over him, and later became the mother of King Solomon.

Little pleasure had David in his children; little pleasure in anything. As in the life of Saul, the careless days of his youth were the only happy ones he knew. In order to retain his throne and to save Israel from foreign domination, he could never sheathe the sword; bloodshed was chronic.

The Traitorous Son

PRINCE ABSALOM inherited all the manly beauty of the house of Jesse; "from the sole of his foot even to the crown of his head there was no blemish in him." Especially noticeable was his magnificent hair; it was so thick and glossy that every year when he had it cut, it was like taking a harvest off a field. But he had no more moral sense than Alcibiades; he was a traitor to his father and to the nation. He stole away the hearts of the people by promises as fair as his face; and finally he felt himself strong enough to organize open rebellion.

The uprising was so general that David left the holy city in shame and disgrace, like a hunted man with a price on his head. But in a decisive battle, in which the king's forces were led by the two sons of Zeruiah, Joab and Abishai, Absalom's forces were routed. Before the battle, David gave public orders that no harm must come to the person of Absalom; as so often happens in tragic quarrels between fathers and sons, the father loved his child with a passionate intensity greater than in harmonious days. Anyone who has observed life must have seen this, which, if we did not know something of the strange workings of the human heart, would be indeed a mystery.

Joab was a plain fighting man; he saw in Absalom the most dangerous foe of the state and, when the retreating prince was caught by the thick hair of his head in the boughs of a great oak, Joab slew him with no more compunction than one would kill a rattlesnake.

The king sat between the two gates, awaiting news from the front; he was far more interested in the welfare of Absalom than in his own kingdom. The watchman, standing aloft, saw a man running alone, followed soon by another. Ahimaaz arrived first, and shouted joyously the news of the great victory; but the king inquired, "Is the young man Absalom safe?" Ahimaaz did not dare tell him, but muttered something about a great tumult, the significance of which he had not waited to know.

Then Cushai arrived in the same spirit of exultation; and the king asked, "Is the young man Absalom safe?" Cushai, with diplomatic tact, replied, "May the enemies of the king all be as that young man now is." The overwhelming grief in David's heart left no room for any other emotion; all his personal gain was forgotten in the loss of his selfish and cruel son. No cry of anguish that has come down from the immeasurable woe of the past is more poignant than David's lamentation:

O my son Absalom, my son, my son Absalom! would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!

The years of imperial pride and glory, which have made monsters out of so many men, had never hardened the nature of David; the tenderness of his heart was ever greater than his ambition.

General Joab was disgusted with David's behavior, and he told him exactly what he thought of it. David had never liked Joab or his family, and he did not forget this speech, which was like a knife in a green wound. He appointed Amasa in Joab's place; but he did not live to take it. Joab came up to Amasa affectionately and said, "Art thou in health, my brother?" and took him by the beard to kiss him, and with the other hand ran him through. Amasa wallowed in blood in the midst of the highway; a crowd gathered about his dead body, for this cold-hearted and treacherous murder shocked the whole nation.

Joab retained his position as captain of the host, and David seems to have been afraid of him; but after a long career of fighting loyally for the king, his good sense deserted the old soldier at last, and he made the fatal mistake of supporting Prince Adonijah, who, in David's old age, rebelled against his father and announced himself king. David was too feeble to exert himself; but Bathsheba came in and reminded him of his promise that Solomon should be his heir. He therefore made a public proclamation to that effect, which caused such general rejoicing that the followers of Adonijah disappeared like a mist and left him in ridiculous isolation.

On his deathbed David sent for Solomon and said, as Joshua had said before him:

I go the way of all the earth: be thou strong therefore, and shew thyself a man;

And keep the charge of the Lord thy God, to walk in his ways . . . as it is written in the law of Moses.

He left two death warrants for Solomon to execute—one for Joab and one for Shimei, a blackguard who had cursed him during the temporary success of Absalom. But those who then stood by him were to be remembered in kindness by his son.

He Holds a Big Place in History

NO FIGURE in history is more real than David; he stands before us with his grandeur and his littleness, his virtues and his crimes. No warrior was ever more beloved by the mighty men who fought for him, and the episode where he refused to drink of the water that his captains had brought to him at the risk of their lives—for they had to fight their way to the well, and then fight their way back, spilling blood without spilling water—is perhaps the most charming in his career; for it shows not only the greatness but the fineness of his nature. In view of his immense achievements as a leader and statesman, in view of his magnificent contributions to literature, it seems strange that Mr. H. G. Wells, in his "Outline of History," should speak of him with contempt. He passes him over with a few words. "The long intrigues of the adventurer David against Saul are told in the rest of the first book of Samuel." And after speaking of the death of Saul, "David (900 B.C. roughly) was more politic and successful than his predecessor, and seems to have placed himself under the protection of Hiram, King of Tyre. This Phœnician alliance sustained him, and was the essential element in the greatness of his son Solomon. His story, with its constant assassinations and executions, reads rather like the history of some savage chief than of a civilized monarch." There are many who will read H. G. Wells who will not read the Bible; would they obtain from this meager and slighting reference a fair estimate of David the poet, the statesman, the soldier, the friend and the father?

Is his loyalty to Saul correctly reported in the words, "the long intrigues of the adventurer David against Saul?"

No modern historian, whatever his personal bias, can injure David or blacken his memory, for the simple reason that we already know the worst that can be said against him; the Bible does not spare him. But in the opinion of most unprejudiced readers, David is not only an imposing but an attractive personality; we admire the great king and we love the true-hearted man.

NOTE—In the next, the seventh, article of this series Professor Phelps will tell of Solomon in all his glory, the Queen of Sheba and the temple, the romantic figure of Elijah, and the chariot of fire.

Makes paint look like new

The real naphtha in Fels-Naptha makes the dirt let go, and brings back the bright, fresh, clean appearance to painted woodwork.

Helps the washing-machine

It pays you to chip Fels-Naptha into the washing-machine to get the benefit of naphtha. The real naphtha in Fels-Naptha loosens the dirt before the washing-machine starts its work. Then the Fels-Naptha soapy water flushes away all the dirt.

For fine lace curtains

With no other soap can you wash lace curtains so snowy white and with so little effort as with Fels-Naptha. It soaks the dirt loose, and safely makes all filmy fabrics thoroughly clean.

Be sure the soap you use has real naphtha in it. Smell it! The clean naphtha odor proves there is real naphtha in Fels-Naptha.

Takes spots from rugs

How easily and quickly Fels-Naptha cleans and brightens rugs, carpets and draperies! The naphtha dissolves grease, loosens dirt, and restores perfect cleanliness.

The double cleaner for easier housecleaning

Quickly, thoroughly, and safely, Fels-Naptha makes everything it touches clean, sweet, sanitary. And a thoroughly clean home means better health for the family.

Because Fels-Naptha is splendid soap and real naphtha, combined by the original Fels-Naptha method, it gives a soap-and-water cleaning and a naphtha cleaning at the same time. That makes it different from all other soaps.

The only way you can get the benefit of this double cleansing-value in soap is to be sure you get Fels-Naptha—the original and genuine naphtha soap—of your grocer. The clean naphtha odor and the red-and-green wrapper are your guides.

Soft blankets and woolens

White and fluffy they come from a Fels-Naptha wash! The real naphtha in Fels-Naptha loosens the dirt; the soapy water flushes all dirt away; the naphtha vanishes, carrying all odors with it. Then the woolens are clean through and through.

FREE

If you haven't had an opportunity to prove that Fels-Naptha is a superior soap for the laundry and all household cleaning, send for free sample. Write Fels-Naptha Soap, Philadelphia.

© 1922 Fels Co. Philadelphia

The golden bar with the clean naphtha odor

The Happiest Time of Her Life

Admiration, attention—groups of eager young men awaiting her appearance, and more partners than she can dance with—this makes girlhood days the happiest time of a woman's life.

To miss this popularity is a tragedy. Yet many girls are socially unsuccessful because of some lack in charm.

What constitutes this charm is hard to define—but one thing is certain. The popular girl, the successful girl, the gay, happy, all-admired girl is always distinguished by a fresh, radiant skin.

How to have this perfect complexion is the problem of many girls, but we can solve it for you. It's a simple secret, discovered many thousand years ago.

What spoils complexions

Every day your skin accumulates a coating of dust, dirt and general soil. Every day you apply powder, and every day most women use a little or much cold cream. This dirt, powder and cold cream penetrate the tiny skin pores and fill them. Perspiration completes the clogging. You can judge for yourself what happens if you fail to wash these accumulations away.

Once a day your skin needs careful, thorough cleansing to remove these clogging deposits. Otherwise you will soon be afflicted with coarseness, blackheads and blotches.

How soap beautifies

Mild, pure, soothing soap, such as Palmolive, is a simple yet certain beautifier. Its profuse, creamy lather penetrates the network of skin pores and dissolves all dangerous deposits. Gentle rinsing carries them away.

When your skin is thus cleansed, it quickly responds with fresh, smooth radiance. The healthful stimulation results in natural, becoming color.

And the lotion-like qualities of the Palmolive lather keep your complexion delightfully soft.

Now, when your skin is healthfully clean, is the time to apply cold cream. Now, powder and that touch of rouge are harmless.

You can perfect your good complexion and beautify one not so good by the means of this simple cosmetic cleansing.

Cleopatra's way

With all classic peoples, bathing was a daily rite never neglected. The ruins of Cleopatra's sumptuous marble bath are ample proof of her faith in this ancient beauty secret.

Palm and olive oils were the cleansers used—the same bland oriental oils we blend scientifically in Palmolive.

The lotion-like qualities which made them the most highly prized of all old world beautifiers, are imparted to Palmolive Soap.

A 10-cent luxury

The vast volume in which we produce Palmolive to supply the world-wide demand naturally lowers cost. If made in small quantities the price would be at least 25 cents. Manufacturing economy permits us to offer this finest facial soap for only 10 cents. Thus you can afford to share Cleopatra's favorite luxury.

Use Palmolive for bathing and let it do for your body what it does for your face.

THE PALMOLIVE COMPANY, Milwaukee, U. S. A.

THE PALMOLIVE COMPANY OF CANADA, Limited, Toronto, Ont.

Also makers of a complete line of toilet articles

Volume and efficiency produce
25-cent quality for only

10c

Copyright 1922—The Palmolive Co. 1164

A Shower of Showers

IF THERE is any truth in that familiar old adage about burning ears, Elizabeth Sayre's must have been pinker than ever that day in early spring when her friends gathered at Polly Ewer's to discuss her newly announced engagement to young Tom Wythe.

"Well, I'm going to give the first shower," popped out Lois Wilson.

"I guess we'll all want to do something for her," Ruth said, "so we'd better decide right now to keep things simple and inexpensive; then it won't be a drag on us all and make us sorry Bess is engaged."

"You're right, Ruthie. Let's try to make it as much fun as expense, but still give Bess things she can use later."

And they did just that. Two mornings after the conversation at Polly's, ten of Bess Sayre's best friends received the following invitation from Lois:

By CLARE WALLIS
and
UTHAI VINCENT WILCOX

At last I've found something different in showers!

Whatever you bring Bess, please "Say it with flowers."

Prepare it as if a bouquet you had brought her.

And don't let it cost you more than a quarter.

As Lois knew they would, each girl tried her best to outdo the others in clever wrappings, and she arranged each "bouquet" in a vase on the living-room table. Then she called Bess and the girls from the sun parlor where they sat sewing and asked them to be judges at a flower show. It was some seconds before Bess discovered what the "show" really was. The girls were told to pin a bit of blue ribbon to the cleverest bloom. The most artistic bore Ruthie's card. She had folded diagonally a small American-beauty-colored linen handkerchief and rolled it into a gorgeous rose attached to a stem and leaves from her millinery box. Nancy Merton's offering was a stiff old-timey bouquet made from a small hammer wrapped in green paper, the head in pink paper, and having attached to it with picture wire small bunches of various-sized tacks and screws, each bunch wrapped in a different-colored paper. A lace doily and tinfoil on the hammer handle made it most realistic. But the prize was Polly Ewer's calla lily. It grew out of a pot of earth, three gorgeous blossoms of washcloths folded in cornucopias and sewed to tall sticks.

Judith Wakefield, who taught "math" with Bess in the high school and boarded at Mrs. Pepper's, invited Bess and the girls to lunch on Saturday afternoon at the country club. She asked each girl to send her beforehand a handkerchief for the guest of honor. Then she bought a small notebook, covered it with pink paper, pasted a Cupid on the cover, drew a border of geometrical figures around him, and labeled it "Love's Geometry." Each handkerchief she folded and pressed into a geometrical figure, pinning it to one page of the book. Two were folded into long strips and laid parallel to each other, and under them was written "Love's lines always run side by side"; under the triangle was "This is the figure that causes trouble. Beware!" and under the circle, "Like true love it has no end." Showering Bess in this way made no confusion in the public dining room, but plenty of fun for the tableful of guests and the delighted Bess.

A Shower of Tin

HENRIETTA GORDON'S tin shower was another success. "Henry" wrote the invitations in her best Spencerian manner to formally announce the marriage of Mr. Thrift and Miss Romance and invite the girls to the reception. Some of the mothers came, too, so there were over twenty guests. They had been asked to send their gifts the day before, and "Henry" and Judith spent a whole evening putting them on display in one of the bedrooms. Each had a card with white ribbon tied to it to look like the traditional wedding gift. Six tin teaspoons, for instance, were wonderful on their bed of crimson velvet. Judith's cross-stitched towels were hung on the wall and marked "From the Gobelin looms." Polly's egg beater lay in a berry-spoon box, while Sybil Fairbanks and her mother contrived a marvelous compote from a deep fluted mold and a small funnel. When Bess had been properly surprised, tea was served from a typical bride's table with white flowers and a big decorated cake. Bess had to cut the cake—which contained fortune symbols and couplets—with a new kitchen knife tied with long white streamers.

"I expect Bess will quite put my nose out of joint when she becomes the town bride," Nancy Merton told her husband the morning after Helen's riotous party. "But to show there are no hard feelings I'm going to give her a shower."

"Why don't you let the men in on these once in a while?" David asked.

Men Also Invited

SO THAT Bess knew the younger married crowd that Bess day received invitations for a How-to-Keep-Your-Husband's-Love shower. They read like this:

To shower our Bess with advice is my plan,
Bring a gift that will help her to hold her new man.

And to prove that you know well whereof
you may talk,
Bring the best man you know by eight of the clock.

Each girl brought her husband or the beau of the minute and something that she guaranteed would keep a man's love. They found the living room arranged like a lecture hall, and when they were seated Nancy ushered in David dressed as the typical old maid who would give a lecture and exhibit on "How to Keep a Man When You Get Him." He singled out Betty to come up on his platform and unwrap his exhibits. He then improvised as he went along, inspired by the articles in the bundles, presenting each to Bess with a line of good advice. There was a cookbook with a white oilcloth cover that Dave called "a learned treatise on the short cut to a man's cardiac region," a frilly little kitchen apron, a set of hair curlers "to be used in daytime only," a bag of buttons and a box of patches, a budget book, an alarm clock, a box of checkers, and a subscription to the morning paper to begin the day after the wedding.

Ruthie Miller's invitations to all but Bess had a big black S O S at the top, and written under it:

Emergencies will happen in the best families, not excepting Betty's. But we can prepare her to meet them with courage. Bring the makings of your favorite emergency dish to my house next Wednesday afternoon and the recipe for it.

When they arrived each girl was given a notebook and pencil in which to record the recipes. Then to Bess's very honest surprise

Ruth brought in a pretty enameled-metal shelf and presented it to Bess, telling her to keep it filled and she need never fear the visits of the unexpected guest. The girls then gave their recipes one by one, each one at the same time telling a harrowing experience of how her pet recipe had saved her life.

By the time Polly Ewer's turn came to entertain for Bess, she began to feel that there was very little left for her to give. She planned a luncheon and, as the weather by that time was getting very warm, drew inspiration from the thermometer. Her table was lovely; in the center was a big cube of ice which she had had the iceman split exactly in half, had hollowed out with a warm iron enough to hold a bouquet of flowers and had then put the halves together again. The first course was frapped fruit, the pièce de résistance chicken in aspic jelly, the salad frozen.

After what Bess thought merely a very pretty and original luncheon they took their sewing to the porch, only to have their chatter interrupted by loud cries of "Ice!" It was Bud Ewer, Polly's brother, dressed like an iceman and carrying by the tongs a big square hat box wrapped in white paper, sprinkled with Christmas frost and dripping with paper icicles. He dropped it at Bess's feet and in it she found all sorts of fittings for her refrigerator. There were a nest of glass bowls, some square agate pans, ice pick, tongs, ice shaver, ice blanket, a brush for the drainpipe, cheesecloth bags for green things, a butter dish, and a bag and mallet for breaking ice for the freezer.

It was Aunt Hetty Lewis who had asked to give Bess her linen shower. She sent word around that a woman was coming to demonstrate a new washing machine, and she thought they would all be interested. No one dreamed that the shower for which she collected the linen would be given at the same time, so that all the guests, including Bess, were surprised to find a sure-enough washing machine decorated with big ribbon bows and flowers holding the place of honor in the living room.

Aunt Hetty's dearest friend, Laura Chester, acted the part of a very talkative professional demonstrator. To illustrate the merits of the machine she put into it a pile of much soiled old rags and then, asking Betty to help her, she proceeded to turn out the neatly folded pieces donated to the shower.

It was about this point in the succession of festivities that Tom showed signs of getting jealous of Bess's popularity. "Never see half enough of her," he grumbled; "always going to something or other. Silly things, these showers. Glad nobody ever gives a man a shower," and so on.

"Let's show him what fun a shower can be," laughed Mrs. Billy Pratt when Doctor Pratt repeated it to her. If you'll round up the men, I'll rustle the eats."

Giving Tom a Shower

DOCTOR BILLY agreed; he got the artist of the crowd to draw a caricature of Tom peeping inside a circus tent, and had it printed on folders with the words "Peep inside" underneath. Inside the folder was a long humorous harangue, telling how they would give Tom a helping hand, "lubricate his way by a copious shower of neckties (gaudy but neat), socks (9½ or 10), collars (14½), handkerchiefs, and anything to make his voyage of discovery easier. The local downpour will be at the home of Bill Pratt, Wednesday evening, May 21. It is an absolute secret—that's what we hope anyway. Come early so the attack can be made en masse."

The men arrived early, burdened with their gifts. They included not only things for Tom's personal adornment, but foolish trifles also, wrapped in yards of paper and much advice. When Tom, unsuspecting, paused in the doorway of what seemed an empty living room, he was met by a barrage of packages from every corner. At first he was naturally combative, but soon his good humor asserted itself and he was grinning sheepishly over the gifts and the humor that went with them.

Get Thin -to music!

You can. It's easy. I'll prove it in five days' time—free. In your own home with your own phonograph. Read my offer.

My safe and sane method of reducing makes any figure normal, in surprisingly short time. In over five thousand cases, I have not had a single failure.

Reducing the Wallace way is play. A 20-minute lesson daily—to music. You simply cannot resist this interesting, resultful method.

How I Reduce You

Food does not cause fat. Many stout men and women eat less than a child of ten. My method lets you eat, but your system uses all your food for blood, bone and sinew. Nothing is left from which Nature can make fat.

Ten or fifteen pounds reduction is nothing. If you are 50, 60, 75 lbs. overweight I require a little longer. But the results are the same; a normal figure, symmetric body and limbs, remaining flesh firm and smooth, and a glorious state of health.

Read These Letters

(Printed by Permission)

I spent hundreds of dollars trying to get thin, but your first lesson took off 12 lbs. and I eat everything I want. It is all so wonderful, music and all! You have brought a blessing into my life—(Mrs.) Mildred M. Sykes, 300 N. Florida Ave., Atlantic City, N. J.

Having reduced 60 lbs., my friends pass me without recognizing who it is. I feel and appear ten years younger. —(Mrs.) Grace Horschler, 4625 Indiana Ave., Chicago, Ill.

In twenty-two days I have reduced 11 lbs. I love the lessons, and am feeling better than in months—(Mrs.) V. W. Skinkle, 914 N. 40th St., Omaha, Neb.

I have reduced 15 lbs. in two lessons and you are free to use my letter—(Mrs.) Esta Arbaugh, Mandamin, Ia.

Free Proof I have no books to sell. No pamphlets that deal with starvation. But I can reduce you by Nature's own laws, with perfect and permanent results. I'll prove that I can—before you pay a penny. Fill in coupon and I'll send free and prepaid, plainly wrapped, full-size record for five-day trial. Use it, and note the result. That's all I ask!

Wallace

WALLACE, 630 S. Wabash Ave., Chicago

Please send record for first reducing lesson, free and prepaid. I will either enroll, or return your record at the end of a five-day trial. This does not obligate me to buy.

Name _____ 158

St. & No. _____

P. O. _____ State _____

A Loveliness that is American

YOUR PERFUME enfolds you as does your cloak and always about you is its fugitive loveliness. The fragrance you wear is an expression of yourself which you have made a part of you. This is true only if you have really chosen a favorite perfume—a single flower, or the mingling odors of a bouquet.

A way to find your choice in perfume was recently offered by the International Perfume Test.

Many women used to be prejudiced against American perfumes because of the foreign perfume tradition. They didn't know that a great American perfume house searches the world for the finest flower essences, rare spices, precious oils—to be blended into perfumes. They didn't know that the house of Colgate uses the same lovely floral essences—from southern France, from Far Eastern hillside, from blossoming valleys all over the world—which the great foreign perfumers use. But the imported perfumes cost more—therefore, many women put them on a higher plane than American perfumes.

It took the International Perfume Test to overthrow this tradition. This is how it was done:

Two men, prominent in New York City, conducted the Test, with the assistance of 103 women acting as jurors. The two judges purchased three of the most popular imported perfumes and three Colgate perfumes—all in original unopened bottles. They poured the contents into six plain bottles, numbered from one to six, and kept a record by which they alone knew which number represented each perfume.

Each of the jury of 103 women chose her favorite from six slips of Perfumers Blotting Paper, scented from the numbered bottles under the supervision of the judges. Each indicated her first choice, her second, her third, etc. A careful record was kept of all selections.

The result, when perfumes were thus judged by preference alone, was most interesting. Many of the women had stated—before the Test—a decided preference for some foreign brand. Yet in the Test—Colgate's Florient (Flowers of the Orient) won first choice.

Many thousands of women have since made the Test and found how true was the perfume judgment of the impartial jury. You, also, can make it, and find in Florient a true expression of American loveliness.

COLGATE'S Florient Perfume Flowers of the Orient

The 103 women who made the International Perfume Test were chosen from among professional and business women, college women at Smith, Vassar, Wellesley and Bryn Mawr, distinguished women of the stage then playing in New York, women of prominence—all fastidious about their perfume.

For details of the Test and a miniature Test Set by which you yourself may compare the delightful Colgate perfumes with whatever you are using, send 2c in stamps to Colgate & Co., Dept. H, 199 Fulton Street, New York City. If in Canada, address 137 McGill Street, Montreal. Offer good only in United States and Canada.

College Women and Race Suicide

(Continued from Page 29)

it has become the national menace of France—that we have "more coffins than cradles."

The birth rate, however, has not declined among "the idle who will not work, the unskillful who cannot work, and the criminal classes who cannot be trusted."

In a survey of different sections of London it was found that in three of the better-class boroughs the birth rate was 20 per 1000; in nineteen intermediate boroughs, 24 per 1000; while in a group of seven of the poorest districts of the city the birth rate was 30 per 1000. It is obvious that this will not have to proceed very far until we shall have a repetition on a vast scale of Pharaoh's dream, wherein the lean kine ate up the fat kine.

While this phenomenon of the suppression of the best blood of the nation is an alarming eugenic malady which has appeared in this country only during the last generation, nevertheless it is not a new phenomenon in the annals of history. The historian calls our attention to the fact that an analogous condition of affairs has been the prelude to the decline and fall of every great civilization of the past.

While numerous influences have been assigned from time to time to explain the downfall of nations, such as slavery, avarice, militarism, disease, ethical decadence, and so on, and while these influences may have been minor factors contributing to national weakness; nevertheless, the last analysis always shows a marked decline in the racial status of a nation just before its end. That is, the superior social elements inaugurated a régime of race suicide, while the inferior racial elements continued to reproduce at the same old rate.

This arrangement requires only two or three generations to bring about such a high degree of racial decadence as to result in sudden national collapse.

Heron has called attention to the fact that the birth rate is particularly declining among the professional classes, whereas in all districts characterized by pawnbrokers, child labor and pauperism, not to mention overcrowding and tuberculosis, the birth rate is higher.

English-speaking peoples are reproducing themselves from the bottom, not from the top. Of course the death rate is higher among these lower classes of society, but it is not enough higher in any way to offset their exceedingly high birth rates. In other words, the net fertility of the undesirable classes is greatly in excess of the net fertility of the desirable classes.

Declining Birth Rate in College Women

THE lessened birth rate among college graduates is typical of the declining fecundity of the better classes of American society. A study of the graduates of Wellesley yields the astounding information that the graduates of that old and exclusive woman's college contribute less than one child apiece for the next generation. In fact, instead of reproducing the four children apiece required to maintain a stationary status for the race, they do not produce on the average quite one child apiece. And it would seem, the better the student the less showing they make in regard to offspring. For instance, "The Wellesley alumnae who are members of Phi Beta Kappa—that is, the superior scholars—have not .86 of a child each, but only .65 of a child; while the holders of the Durant and Wellesley scholarships, awarded for intellectual superiority, make a pathetic showing in comparison with the whole class."

We have not singled out Wellesley as an exception in this race suicide tendency. Other schools make just as bad a showing. For instance, look at the figures that have been compiled for Mount Holyoke, as shown in the following table:

DECADRE OF GRADUATION	CHILDREN PER MARRIED GRADUATE	CHILDREN PER GRADUATE
1842-1849	2.77	2.37
1850-1859	3.38	2.55
1860-1869	2.64	1.60
1870-1879	2.75	1.63
1880-1889	2.54	1.16
1890-1892	1.91	0.95

In Bryn Mawr College less than half of its able graduates marry, and of the married graduates there is less than one child per family (.84), making only .37 of a child per graduate.

Professor Sprague's study of Vassar graduates deserves consideration at length, as his analysis is so complete that it sheds great light on the conduct of the students of this type of college subsequent to graduation. His figures covering the period from 1867 to 1900 are as follows:

CLASSES FROM 1867 TO 1900
Number of graduates	1739
Number that taught (46 per cent)	800
Number that married (49 per cent)	854
Number that did not marry (51 per cent)	885
Number that taught and afterward married (31 per cent)	294
Number that taught, married and had children (69 per cent of all who taught and married)	203
Number that taught, married and were childless (31 per cent)	91
Number of children of those who taught and had children (1.57 children per family)	463
Number of children of those who married, but did not teach (2 each)	1025
Total number of children of all graduates (.8 child per graduate)	1488
Average number of children per married graduate	1.74
Average number of children per graduate	0.8

Taking the Vassar figures from 1867 to 1920, which of course embraces all recent marriages, many of which are so recent as to afford no opportunity for study from the standpoint of the size of the possible family which may ultimately develop from these unions, these up-to-date figures are as follows:

CLASSES FROM 1867 TO 1900
Number of graduates	5790
Number that married (46.7 per cent)	2704
Number that did not marry (53.3 per cent)	3086
Total number of children of all graduates	3779
Average number of children per married graduate	1.45
Average number of children per graduate	0.65

One thing is certain, something is radically wrong. The graduates of an ideal woman's college should show at least a higher marriage rate; and if not a higher birth rate than the average of the population, at least a rate of reproduction equal to that of the better classes of society. There can be no excuse urged or explanation offered to justify the fact that our exclusive women's colleges actually disqualify their graduates for motherhood. The American people should see to it, and that immediately, that the girls' schools of this country have their curriculum reformed.

We do not mean to place all the blame upon the woman's schools, for the exclusively masculine educational institutions are not free from fault in this respect, as witnessed by the investigations of Miss Smith, who found that: "Among the college graduates of the eighteenth century in New England, only two per cent remained unmarried, while in the Yale classes of 1861-1879, 21 per cent never married, and of the Harvard graduates from 1870-1879, 26 per cent remained

(Continued on Page 60)

AN EVERYDAY FRIEND WITH A SILKEN CARESS

WHEN you hold the world's whitest soap in your hand there instinctively flashes across your mind the thought that here is a soap which embodies to the uttermost the spirit of white cleanliness.

It is an interesting fact that more and more particular people everywhere are coming to Fairy Soap for the toilet and bath because of its very simplicity.

The immaculate whiteness of Fairy Soap is due to the pure ingredients which are cleansing and beneficial to the skin. Fairy, the whitest soap in the world, represents soap purity in the highest degree.

Simple, thorough cleanliness is expressed in every cake of Fairy Soap. Its purity whiteness needs no fanciful coloring. After using, no heavy perfume lingers to tell its story to the world. Fairy purity needs no hot-house bouquet.

And just as Fairy Soap is the whitest soap for toilet and bath, so is it the safest for laundering your finest fabrics as well as for the more particular cleansing uses about the home. It is an everyday friend with a silken caress, the choice of discerning people to whom white cleanliness is a natural habit.

THE N.K. FAIRBANK COMPANY

FAIRY SOAP

PURE  FLOATING  WHITE

The White
Spirit of Purity
Lives in
FAIRY SOAP

"It's a beautiful trunk with wonderful strength"

Everything about an Indestructo trunk is good looking—the sturdy round corners, the flawless finish, the substantial polished hardware anticipate a still more charming interior where packing is a pleasure and there is ample room to pack.

Linings of velour, cretonne, repp or fabrikoid are employed to produce an atmosphere in keeping with whatever luxurious surroundings the trunk may encounter.

Nor have your personal comforts been overlooked—many refinements tend to produce an intimate relationship between your own home and the fashionable hotels and resorts you may visit.

Indestructo trunks are built in all reasonable styles and sizes and are only sold by better dealers.

What you pay for your Indestructo depends entirely upon you—the arch corner models, insured for 5 years, sell from $60 up to $250, according to the interior arrangements—a square corner Indestructo Z model, of equal size and finish, costs from $45 to $125—it is insured for 3 years.

Let us send you a remarkable book—"How to pack a trunk"—it is free for the asking.

Indestructo fine hand luggage and sanitary household hampers are carried in stock by dealers everywhere

INDESTRUCTO

TRUNK INDESTRUCTO MAKERS

MISHAWAKA - INDIANA

College Women and Race Suicide

(Continued from Page 58)

single. The average number of children per Harvard graduate of the earlier period was found to be 3.44; for the latest period, 1.92. Among the Yale graduates it was found that the number of children per father had declined from 5.16 to 2.55. Other studies of Amherst graduates, while not complete, suggest the number of children per married man to be 1.72, while the graduates of Wesleyan averaged 2.31 children apiece.

Phillips, who made a careful study of the graduates of Yale and Harvard, summarized his findings as follows: "Roughly, the number of children born per capita per married graduate has fallen from about 3.25 in the first decade to 2.5 in the last decade. The per cent of graduates marrying has remained about the same for forty years, and is a trifle higher for Yale; but the low figure, 68 per cent for the first decade of Harvard, is probably due to faulty records, and must not be taken as significant."

Marriage Rate of College Graduates

THE next most interesting figure is the "Children Surviving per Capita per Graduate." "This has fallen from over 2.5 to about 1.9. The per cent of childless marriages increased very markedly during the first two decades and held nearly level for the last two decades. For the last decade at Yale it has dropped slightly, an encouraging sign. The number of children born to Yale graduates is almost constantly a trifle higher than that for Harvard, while the number of childless marriages is slightly less."

Not only are the exclusive men's and women's colleges yielding an increasingly lower birth rate, but the birth rates of the graduates of even coeducational institutions are not at all satisfactory. Banker, in an analysis of the graduates of Syracuse University, one of our oldest coeducational institutions, found that the number of children born to these graduates decreased with each decade: "Thus married women graduates, prior to the Civil War, had two surviving children each; in the last decade of the nineteenth century they had only one. For married men graduates, the number of surviving children had fallen in the same length of time from 2.62 to 1.38. When all graduates, married or not, are counted, in the decade 1892-1901, it is found that the men of Syracuse have contributed to the next generation one surviving child each, the women only half a child apiece."

Since the superior individual is not marrying as often as formerly nor as early, and since the marriage statistics of the nation show no decrease but a slight improvement as before noted, then it must be that the shortcomings of the better class of society in this direction are more than made up by the increased matrimonial activities of the less desirable classes of society. If this is true, it presents at least a forbidding aspect from the standpoint of the future upbuilding of our national stock.

Our concern in this matter is further aggravated by a study of the women college graduates of the country. Going back a number of years, figures from Wellesley College suggest that only about 35 per cent of graduates were married within ten years after their graduation, whereas within twenty years 48 per cent, almost half, had married. A study of Mount Holyoke College over a period of half a century showed that whereas 85 per cent of the graduates married at the beginning of this period, only 50 per cent married at the end, showing a gradual decrease from one decade to the other in the number of women college graduates who marry.

"Bryn Mawr College, between 1888 and 1900, graduated 376 girls, of whom 165, or 43.9 per cent, had married up to January 1, 1913." Studying the Vassar College graduates between 1867 and 1892, Robert J. Sprague found that 509 of the total 959 had married, leaving 47 per cent celibate. Adding the classes up to 1900, it was found that less than half of the total number of graduates of the institution had married.

The eugenist suspects that women's colleges of this country are not conducted with a view to turning out wives and mothers, and he fully recognizes that their influences, in addition to college training, have been operative in lessening the number of marriages among this class of women.

It has been asserted recently that college women marry as early and as frequently as other members of their families, even though they may not compare favorably in this respect with women from the lower social levels; but these facts are hardly borne out by statistics compiled by Miss Smith, who, after making a thorough investigation, makes the following report as to the age at which college graduates and members of their families marry:

	YEARS
College women	26.3
Their sisters	24.2
Their cousins	24.7
Their friends	24.2

	PERCENTAGE OF MARRIED	COLLEGE	EQUIVALENT NON-COLLEGE
Under 23 years	8.6		30.1
23-32 years	83.2		64.9
33 and over	8.0		5.0

From all sections of the country it seems that for a period of about fifty years the marriage rate for college women has steadily declined. Castle's investigation of the ages at which eminent women of various periods have married is interesting in this connection, in spite of the small number of individuals with which it deals:

CENTURY	AVERAGE AGE	RANGE	NUMBER OF CASES
12	16.2	8-30	5
13	16.6	12-29	5
14	13.8	6-18	11
15	17.6	13-26	20
16	21.7	12-50	28
17	20.0	13-43	30
18	23.1	13-53	127
19	26.2	15-67	189

Even the women in the educational institutions in the Central and Western States show a decline in marriage. Forty years ago, in the Iowa State College, 95 per cent of the women graduates married; twenty years ago, 69 per cent. During the same period the women graduates of Oberlin declined from a marriage rate of 65 to 55 per cent. In the University of Illinois from 1880 to 1905, 54 per cent of the women married, and this is about the same percentage to be found in both Ohio and Wisconsin—and mind, that means ten years after graduation. Something is wrong when only a trifle over half of such superior individuals are married ten years after they are graduated, and remember that, as university courses are conducted at the present time, they are well along in the twenties before they graduate.

Comparisons

IT WILL be seen that men are doing some better, for from the available data from the study of Harvard, about 74 per cent marry, 78 per cent of Yale, and during the last half of the nineteenth century the age of marriage advanced only about one year, that is, from 30 to 31.

Statistics from Stanford University offer an interesting comparison, because they are available for both men and women. Of 670 male graduates, classes 1892 to 1900 inclusive, 490, or 73.2 per cent, were reported as married in 1910. Of 330 women, 160, or 48.5

(Continued on Page 63)

Pompeian Beauty powder

They Turn to Admire

What is it they admire so much—the radiance of her lovely coloring? Yes, but even more the sparkle of her eyes, the glow of her expression, that come from knowing her skin is like a rose and that she is looking her very best.

One bit of magic gives her this enviable position—this radiant confidence. She knows the secret of Instant Beauty—the complete "Pompeian Beauty Toilette."

First, a touch of fragrant Pompeian DAY Cream (vanishing). It softens the skin and holds the powder. Work the cream well into the skin so the powder adheres evenly.

Then apply Pompeian BEAUTY Powder. It makes the skin beautifully fair and adds the charm of delicate fragrance. Now a touch of Pompeian BLOOM for youthful color. Do you know that a bit of color in the cheeks makes the eyes sparkle with a new beauty?

Lastly, dust over again with the powder in order to subdue the Bloom. Presto! The face is beautified and youth-i-fied in an instant! (Above 3 preparations may be used separately or together. At all druggists', 60c each.)

TRY NEW POWDER SHADES. The correct powder shade is more important than the color of dress you wear. Our new NATURELLE shade is a more delicate tone than our Flesh shade, and blends exquisitely with a medium complexion. New RACHEL shade is a rich cream tone for brunettes.

"Don't Envy Beauty—Use Pompeian"

Day Cream (60c) vanishing, holds the powder Beauty Powder (60c) . . . stays on unusually long Bloom (60c) a rouge that won't break Massage Cream (60c) clears up the complexion Night Cream (50c) the cold cream for beauty Fragrance (30c) a talc with an exquisite odor Vanity Case ($1.00) powder and rouge compact Lip Stick (25c) makes lips beautiful

TEAR OFF NOW

To mail or put in purse as shopping-reminder

THE POMPEIAN COMPANY

2001 Payne Avenue, Cleveland, Ohio

Gentlemen: I enclose 10c (a dime preferred) for 1922 Art Panel. Also please send me five samples named in offer.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____

State _____

Naturelle shade powder sent unless you write another below.

GUARANTEE

The name Pompeian on any package is your guarantee of quality and safety. Should you not be completely satisfied, the purchase price will be gladly refunded by The Pompeian Co., at Cleveland, Ohio.

© 1922, The Pompeian Co.

Get 1922 Panel—Five Samples Sent With It

"Honeymooning in Venice." What romance! The golden moonlit balcony! The blue lagoon! The swift-gliding gondola! The serenading gondoliers! Tinkling mandolins! The sighing winds of evening! Ah, the memories of a thousand Venetian years! Such is the story revealed in the new 1922 Pompeian panel. Size 28 x 7 1/4 inches. In beautiful colors. Sent for only 10c. This is the most beautiful and expensive panel we have ever offered. Art store value 50c to $1. Money gladly refunded if not wholly satisfactory. With each order for an Art Panel we will send samples of Pompeian BEAUTY Powder, DAY Cream (vanishing), BLOOM, NIGHT Cream (an improved cold cream), and Pompeian FRAGRANCE (a talc). With these samples you can make many interesting beauty experiments. Please tear off coupon now and enclose a dime.

THE POMPEIAN COMPANY, 2001 Payne Avenue, Cleveland, Ohio

Also Made in Canada

Genuine
Fuller Brushes
carry this tag in addition to the trade mark. Look for both!

Fuller

The Dust Collector

Here is a soft, fluffy duster, generous in size, with dust-absorbing strands that reach the tiniest crevices. The long handle gives a hold and makes it easy to get at the under parts of furniture. It may be washed and wrung, dries out like new and retains all its dust-gathering qualities. The Fuller Duster is one of forty-five "Fuller Necessities" for household and personal use. All carry the Fuller Red Tip Tag—your means of identification.

Fuller Brushes are not sold in stores. They are brought right to the home and demonstrated by courteous representatives who understand modern housekeeping efficiency. These men are a never-ending surprise—their knowledge of the care of the home is so complete—the short-cut methods they suggest are so thorough and time-saving. Identify the Fuller Man by the Fuller Trade-Mark Button he wears. He will never over-urge anyone to buy. He serves by showing how brushes can be used to daily—almost hourly—advantage.

We are the largest buyers of brush material in the world, therefore get better quality at lower prices. So do the users of Fuller Brushes.

May we send a Fuller Man to see you—and also send you a copy of "The Handy Brush Book"? Write us.

The Fuller Brush Company
Hartford, Connecticut

Fuller Brush Company, Limited
Hamilton, Canada

Branch Offices in over 150 cities—consult telephone directory

FULLER BRUSHES

69 USES—HEAD TO FOOT—CELLAR TO ATTIC

College Women and Race Suicide

(Continued from Page 60)

per cent, were married. These figures are not complete, as some of the graduates in the later classes must have married since 1910.

The conditions existing at Stanford are likewise found at Syracuse, on the opposite side of the continent. Here, as H. J. Banker has shown, the men graduates marry most frequently 4.5 years after taking their degrees, and the women 4.7 years. Of the women, 57 per cent marry; of the men, 81 per cent. The women marry at the average age of 27.7 years and the men at 28.8. Less than a quarter of the marrying men married women within the college.

Says one writer: "Particularly pernicious in tending to prevent marriage is the influence of certain professional schools, some of which have come to require a college degree for entrance. In such a case, the aspiring physician, for example, can hardly hope to obtain a license to practice until he has reached the age of 27, since four years are required in medical college and one year in a hospital. His marriage must, in almost every case, be postponed until a number of years after that of the young men of his own class who have followed business careers."

This brief survey is enough to prove that the best educated young women—and to a less extent young men—of the United States, who for many reasons may be considered superior, are in many cases avoiding marriage altogether, and in other cases postponing it longer than is desirable. The women in the separate colleges of the East have the worst record in this respect, but that of the women graduates of some of the coeducational schools leaves much to be desired.

Since it is desirable to increase the number of superior marriages in the nation, it may be well to consider some things which may promote such marriages, and such influences may be summarized as follows:

1. IMPROVED SEX INSTRUCTION. There must be brought about a changed attitude concerning sex matters. In our efforts to teach chastity and purity, care must be taken not to present sex as an evil thing in and of itself. The sex-hygiene movement of recent years was a well-meant propaganda, but it has not always been wisely and helpfully carried on. Unfortunately some phases of it have been more or less antieugenic. False ideas of sex and sex relations have undoubtedly directly contributed to increasing celibacy on the part of many sensitive young women. Especially is this true when they have been unfortunately taught by unhappy mothers on the one hand, or abnormal teachers on the other. How much better it would be discreetly to present our teachings regarding sex ethics in such a way as to lift the whole subject upon a high level, and thus be able everlastingly to glorify parenthood?

2. BETTER UNDERSTANDING OF MARRIED LIFE. Superior marriages would be promoted if we could have a better understanding of what married life really is. There is too much coarse joking about matrimony. Not but that it has its comedy features, but the whole question is not properly dignified, particularly in the minds of our youth.

3. EQUAL RIGHTS OF WOMEN. The young man must be taught a greater personal regard for the individuality and rights of the wife. There was a time when men bought their wives. Later, in early Babylonia and Assyria, they gave valuable presents for them. It has required several thousand years to bring about feminine emancipation from the thralldom of servitude, and more high-class women are going to marry to-day if the men will prove willing to give them suitable recognition as equals in the partnership of matrimony, and recognize them as "pals" while they play the game of life. The well-educated girl shrinks from the prospect of becoming a domestic servant, purely and simply, for life, without even the assurance of a stated and dependable compensation.

4. WRONG RELATIVE VALUATIONS. Inordinate ambition, overworking, dollar chasing interfere with marriage on the part of both men and women. The greed for wealth, the craze for luxury, the desire for amusement, the determination to have a good time are exerting a decidedly unhealthy influence upon the cause of matrimony, particularly as it concerns the better classes, the superior biologic strains. The author was right who said: "Love is so undervalued as a source of happiness, a means of grace and a completion of being that many men would sooner work to keep a motor car than to marry."

5. MORE MARRIED TEACHERS. Our system of higher education needs to be reorganized, the time to complete the courses reduced, and more men need to be put on the teaching staff of not only the public schools but in particular the women's colleges. The author feels, very strongly, that more married men and women need to be employed as teachers in all educational institutions, and further that these married people should be of the average, common type of the fairly happy married folks, whose very presence would be a recommendation to marriage, and whose teaching would indirectly exalt matrimony as the normal and much-to-be-desired goal of all education and training—yes, as the goal of life itself.

For instance, Sprague calls attention to the fact that in one woman's college with 114 instructors and professors, 100 are women, only two of whom were ever married. How can we expect graduates of such a school to go out and seek matrimony as the chief object and great purpose in life? As this writer says: "Is it to be expected that the curriculum created by such a staff would idealize and prepare for family and home life as the greatest work of the world and the highest goal of women, and teach race survival as a patriotic duty? Or would it be expected that these bachelor staffs would glorify the independent vocation and life for women? The latter seems to be what occurs."

6. PROMOTION OF EARLY MARRIAGES. To increase the opportunity for young people of the better class to meet each other, and to seek to change the attitude of public opinion about early marriages, we must come to adopt the view expressed by Gallichan, who says: "The promotion of marriage in early adult life, as a part of social hygiene, must begin with a new canonization of marriage. This is equally the task of the fervent poet and the scientific thinker, whose respective labors for humanity are never at variance in essentials. . . . The sentiment for marriage can be deepened by a rational understanding of the passion that attracts and unites the sexes. We need an apotheosis of conjugal love as a basis for a new appreciation of marriage. Reverence for love should be fostered from the outset of the adolescent period by parents and pedagogues."

7. SIMPLE STANDARDS OF LIVING. We must bring about an economic readjustment and a reform in our standards of living, which will make it possible and agreeable for young people to be married upon a modest income, and make an end of this notion that they must be able to live in high style and exquisite luxury, that the head of the family must have an enormous income before he has a right to get married. We should glorify the spirit of adventure which would characterize a young couple of good stock who would dare to marry at a reasonably early age on a very modest income.

The little hidden hollow of the underarm decides your daintiness

Odorono—the underarm toilette—furnishes a new conception of cleanliness which women everywhere now practice regularly

LAST year it was told in several magazines how I first started making, in my home, a physician's formula for a toilet water to correct the disagreeable odor and moisture of perspiration.

The letters and inquiries I have received since then make me realize more than ever how generally women need and how keenly they want such a corrective.

As one letter declares: "You have set up a new standard of personal cleanliness, Miss Miller; and every day women are accepting the necessity of the underarm toilette as they do that of the teeth, the skin and hair."

The plain physiological facts about perspiration

While most women now know the facts about underarm perspiration, there are still many who do not recognize it as the subtle mischief-maker it is.

There is a peculiar physiological condition to cope with here. The underarm perspiration glands are easily stimulated to unusual activity by excitement, heat or nervousness. Clothing and the hollow of the underarm make evaporation difficult.

The insidious danger is that you may so easily offend unconsciously. For it seems impossible to detect the disagreeable odor about oneself, while others are instantly conscious of it.

Soap and water cannot safeguard you from this subtle offense. Immaculate cleanliness is not enough. Your personal daintiness can be insured only by the regular and special care given to this little hidden hollow—care easily and daintily found in Odorono, the underarm toilette.

The dependability of Odorono

Odorono was the first perspiration corrective to be perfected.

And now it has a permanent place on more than a million dressing tables. Thousands of men are also using it.

Originally a physician's prescription, years of exhaustive research work and hundreds of tests by the chemists in our laboratories and other leading chemists of the country have made it as perfect as modern science can.

Physicians and nurses recommend it as the safe and most effective means of relieving perspiration trouble.

Dr. Lewis B. Allyn of the famous Westfield Laboratories, Westfield, Mass., says: "Experimental and practical tests show that Odorono is harmless, economical and effective when employed as directed and will injure neither the skin nor the health."

A clear, clean, antiseptic liquid, Odorono is easy and delightful to use.

One application assures complete underarm daintiness for at least three days. Regularly used twice a week, Odorono will keep your underarms always dry and odorless in any weather, under any circumstances. And your dainty lingerie and frocks will always be protected from perspiration taint.

Odorono is obtainable at all toilet counters in the United States and Canada. 35c, 60c and $1.00, or by mail prepaid.

It helps me in my work to know of your experiences with perspiration annoyance. If you will write, I will gladly advise you or send you free, our new booklet of information on the subject, together with a sample of "After Cream."

Address Ruth Miller, The Odorono Company, 717 Blair Avenue, Cincinnati, Ohio. Canadian address, The Odorono Co., Ltd., 60-62 Front Avenue, Toronto, Ont.

Odorono—the underarm toilette, is also used on the hands and feet wherever excessive perspiration annoys

The Summer Bride and Her Belongings

ALL during the cold winter months and even when March winds are blowing, the bride is reconciled to marriage in her going-away suit or an afternoon frock, but with the first spring days of April there comes a sudden demand for orange blossoms, bridesmaids, satin ribbons and all the delightful nonessentials of a formal wedding. The conventional white satin demanded by such a wedding is, fortunately, becoming to almost every bride, but it must not be forgotten that in the making of the frock the beauty of the satin can be either greatly enhanced or entirely lost. The happier of these results is perhaps more often obtained when the satin is combined with chiffon or lace, provided simplicity is never sacrificed to over-elaboration. The lovely wedding gown sketched above has a simple foundation of lace, a satin skirt draped and tied on one side over the lace, and a straight train of chiffon-lined satin, which hangs from the shoulders. Later the train may be removed and the dress becomes an informal evening frock. Simplicity of arrangement marks also the long tulle veil, which is caught at each side of the head with a small cluster of orange blossoms.

For spring bridesmaids the youthful frock of orchid-colored silk crêpe over silver cloth, sketched at the extreme left above, is appropriate to both season and occasion. The girdle marks an interesting trimming note, with its embroidery of crocheted two-toned orchid metal ribbon. Two long, looped streamers of crêpe over a side opening reveal, panelwise, the silver.

Chiffon in orchid and the palest of the harmonizing fuchsia shades conceals only partially the shadow lace of the bodice lining in the maid-of-honor frock sketched in the center above. Silver cloth makes the sash ends and the girdle, which is closed with a small bunch of chiffon flowers in two shades of orchid. Graceful hats of orchid-colored horsehair faced with flesh-colored chiffon or with silver cloth are worn by bridesmaids and maid-of-honor. For later spring or June weddings, both frocks and hats could be worked out most attractively in soft shades of rose.

Fluffy white chiffon for the cunning flower girl and a glorified sailor suit of white satin for the page make these small but important persons a delightful addition to any bridal procession.

The bride's trousseau might well include for formal afternoon wear the good-looking frock of reseda-green silk crêpe, with open sleeves and inserts of self-colored embroidered mousseline de soie, which appears between the bridesmaid and maid-of-honor on the preceding page. The Paris hat which accompanies it was designed by Lewis, and is of soft brown rice straw with flowers of brown cellophane.

When planning a trousseau, the bride who is wise will choose clothes which accord with the newest mode, but avoid so carefully its extremes and exaggerations that she can wear them for more than one season with a comfortable consciousness of being well dressed. All the clothes on these pages are of a mode that is both smart and lasting.

Those who do not find a skirt and separate blouse becoming will welcome a "going-away" suit such as is sketched second from the right above, for on removing the loose jacket one has the good-looking frock at the extreme left. Navy-blue wool rep is the material used for the coat and for the bottom of the one-piece dress. The upper part of the dress is of tan-printed radium silk, gay with bright reds and blues and touches of black. The coat is lined with plain tan radium, and its sleeves are slit several inches up from the cuff at the back, so that the figured sleeves of the blouse are revealed at each movement of one's arms. The seated figure wears a small hat of navy satin straw, while that which accompanies the suit is of navy Milan, with loops of sand-colored ribbon, and was designed by Lewis of Paris.

For informal dancing or restaurant dining, the bride will feel delightfully matronly and sophisticated in the dinner dress of Oriental metal brocaded chiffon sketched above. Panel ends and inserts of royal blue crêpe de Chine give warmth and color. It is the sleeves, however, caught together only at the inside of the elbow and extending themselves into most amazing panels, which reach, when the arms are lowered, almost to the floor, that make the frock distinctive.

When dignified maturity begins to pall, a sports dress of red flannel, trimmed with red ice-wool lace, will convince the very young matron that life still holds much of fun and frolic. Such a dress demands youth and good looks—and rewards them accordingly. The crocheted trimming, which is used as inserts on the sleeves and the aproned skirt, and also as edging, is a new note that promises to be repeated many times upon the sports clothes of this spring and summer season. A narrow string sash of self-material, tied tightly about the hips, gives the slight but necessary blouse to the upper part of the frock.

Blue serge with borders printed in white is a fabric sponsored by Rodier. At the extreme right above it makes a smart little frock of the type which every bride needs in her trousseau, since it can be worn for everything from shopping to a tennis match. The front panel and collar of white piqué, the narrow black patent-leather belt and the tie of black grosgrain ribbon all add to its youthfulness and charm. The good-looking hat is of black vegetable straw with an oddly shaped pin of tortoise shell. It was designed by Jeanne Vivet of Paris.

Often a bridesmaid but never a bride

THE case of Geraldine Proctor was really pathetic. Most of the girls in her set were married, or about to be. Yet not one of them possessed more grace or charm or beauty than she.

And as Miss Proctor's birthdays crept gradually toward that tragic thirty-mark, marriage seemed farther away from her life than ever.

She was often a bridesmaid but never a bride.

* * *

Your mirror can't tell you when your breath is not right. And even your most intimate friends probably won't.

That's the insidious thing about halitosis (the medical term for unpleasant breath). Halitosis creeps upon you unawares. You may even have it for years without knowing so yourself.

That of course is when halitosis is a symptom of some deep-seated organic trouble a doctor must correct. Or maybe a dentist.

But so commonly halitosis is rather a temporary or local condition that will yield to more simple treatment.

Listerine, the well-known liquid antiseptic, possesses wonderful properties as a mouth deodorant. When regularly used, it arrests food fermentation and leaves the breath sweet, fresh and clean.

As such it becomes an indispensable friend to people who wish to enjoy the comfortable assurance that their breath is always beyond reproach.

Listerine will put you on the safe and polite side. Provide yourself with a bottle today and use it regularly as a gargle and mouth wash.

Your druggist has handled Listerine for years, and regards it as a safe, effective antiseptic of great merit.

Start using Listerine today. Don't be in doubt another day about your breath—Lambert Pharmacal Company, Saint Louis, Mo.

For
HALITOSIS
USE
LISTERINE

Minimum of Seams With Maximum of Style

SO SURELY as April showers bring May flowers, the sudden appearance of new fashion magazines, the snipping of scissors and the busy whirl of mother's sewing machine mean jolly new spring clothes for all good children. Even the youngest understands and tries not to wiggle while being "tried on."

Of first importance to the modern child is the bloomer dress, for play or school. This is most acceptable under any circumstances, but when it is made of woodsy-brown Japanese crepe and has cuffs and collar embroidered in orange wool and an orange worsted-cord tie—as in the sketch at the left—one hates to take it off even at bedtime. Linen, in brown, tan, blue or green, or checked gingham with plain collar and cuffs, would also be fine for this pattern, which may be had in sizes 2 to 10.

The boy of the family will consider a suit of navy or brown Devonshire cloth or linen, with straight-hanging blouse and separate straight trousers, quite in accord with his newly developed sense of masculine dignity. The pattern comes in sizes 2 to 10 and provides for short sleeves—which would be nice for the smallest boys—as well as long.

Spring parties will be doubly enjoyed if one has a new frock of white batiste, Persian lawn or voile, made with deep scallops on aproned skirt and sleeves. The scalloped aprons may be attached to the narrow sash and the dress worn either with or without them. Made in a flowered voile, with the scallops of plain material matching in color the flower in the voile, this would be most attractive in pale pink or daffodil yellow and white. The pattern comes in sizes 4 to 14.

In batiste, Persian lawn or nainsook, with narrow lace edging around neck and sleeves, the frock above is a most becoming one in which to be crowned Queen of the May. If flowered dimity or dotted swiss is used—and either would be charming—the edgings should be of matching plain material, used as bias bands or, better still, if one is all of six, as the pointed trimming originated by Renée, which is illustrated on page 172. For every day, checked gingham might well be finished with rickrack braid. The pattern comes in six months' size, and one, two, four and six years'.

Various combinations of material and color are possible in the good-looking dress at the extreme right above. A jacket of plaid woolen material, dress and tucked vest of navy serge, white linen collar and cuffs and a belt of black patent leather would be smart, as would also a jacket of navy serge over white linen or all linen in two different colors. The pattern comes in sizes 6 to 14.

Patterns may be secured from any store selling Home Patterns; or by mail, postage prepaid, from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City. Dresses, 35 cents; Coats, 35 cents; Blouses or Skirts, 30 cents; Children's Patterns, 25 cents.

Armour's

"SIMON PURE" LEAF LARD

Make It with Leaf Lard

TO get delicate flavor and light flaky texture in white, chocolate, spice or fruit cake, use leaf lard. It has a richness and delicacy unsurpassed for making fine cakes and pastries.

Simon Pure is 100% leaf lard. It is made from that choice, firm, creamy-white leaf fat, of which we obtain only a very small portion from each Government Inspected porker. You probably have "tried out" leaf fat in your own kitchen when you wanted an exceptionally choice cooking fat. But this extra work and uncertainty of results are avoided by asking for "Armour's

Simon Pure Leaf Lard." (In small pails and cartons.)

"Simon Pure" is rendered in open kettles. It is a slow method, but it prevents scorching or undercooking, allows all moisture to escape, and brings you leaf lard at its best—with the incomparable "Simon Pure" flavor. Tell your grocer or market man you want pure leaf lard—"SIMON PURE."

Write our Department of Food Economics for a copy of "Pastry Wrinkles"—sent on request

ARMOUR AND COMPANY, CHICAGO

Ask your dealer for these:

STAR HAM
STAR BACON best CANNED MEATS best POULTRY best EVAPORATED MILK
DRY AND FRESH SAUSAGE
CLOVERBLOOM BUTTER
best PORK AND BEANS best SALAD OIL best LOAF CHEESE best OLEOMARGARINE best EGGS

Open the airtight can and find SNOWDRIFT as fresh as the day it was made.

Just melt a bit of Snowdrift on a dish of piping hot peas—and see how much richer they are and how their flavor is improved.

We would like to send you a copy of the new Snowdrift Cook Book, with our compliments. Just write "Cook Book" and your name and address on a postal to

SNOWDRIFT
120 Broadway, New York City

Drawings by
Torre-Beuans

Lingerie from Premet for American Brides

IT IS only the Chinese who really understand the paradoxical femininity of trousers, so it is to them that the great French houses turn for inspiration when bifurcated lingerie is to be designed. In the glorified pajamas sketched above washable Chinese brocade in a golden yellow is combined with trousers and trimming bands of soft, plain gray. She who is so fortunate as to wear them will surely dream of dragon boats and poppies!

At the left above, washable pink satin is trimmed with cream lace and caught together at the sides with ribbon bows in a knicker combination as French as it is feminine. Premet, who is the designer, proclaims his nationality in clusters of tiny tucks; for even a French laundress, unless you forbid her, will return your plainest, straightest nightgown daintily tucked. In America garters may be substituted, if one wishes, and fine nainsook or dimity used instead of satin. The piquant cap is of flowered muslin, printed batiste or lawn, and is edged with plaited fans of plain material.

The cleverness of the Premet negligée of pink crêpe Georgette at the right above lies in its ability to suggest the charm of youth without straying into insipid prettiness. Rows of narrow tucks and inserts of lace about the sleeves and the deep V-shaped neck are the only trimming. Lavender, pale apricot or any of the pastel shades would of course be quite as lovely as pink for this negligée.

The attractive and ingenuous dressing jacket on page 70 may become, when one analyzes it, simply four straight pieces of coral crêpe de Chine banded with écarle lace and tasseled at intervals; but in order that we should discover this, it was first necessary that one of the great French designers should put those four pieces together. The simplicity of the process being understood, we may well adapt it to our own uses in many colors and many materials. With the jacket is worn a cunning boudoir cap made from a man's fine linen handkerchief and trimmed, rather in the manner of a Jack Horner pudding, with narrow coral ribbons, which tie in a bow on top and hang in long streamers down one's back. Colored lawn may be substituted for the ribbons.

The nightgown of plaited pink crêpe de Chine sketched on page 70 owes its reputation—and that a most excellent one—to the quaint yoke and tiny flaring sleeves of écarle lace. Premet, who is again the designer, places a cluster of small silk flowers on each shoulder, just where the yoke and sleeve

(Continued on Page 70)

Intangibly alluring, exquisitely delicate, "Flowers of Love" is a charming thought which only the most exquisite fragrance may express. It is the fragrance of a sweet and abiding memory, once known, never to be forgotten.

Fleurs d'Amour is not an accident. It is the supreme result of three generations of continuous, artistic effort on the part of an old firm of Parisian parfumeurs, famous the world over—the house of Roger & Gallet.

Fleurs d'Amour
(FLOWERS OF LOVE)

The Most Luxurious
Perfume in the World

In all the most necessary
toilet articles:—Extrait,
Eau de Toilette, Poudre,
Talc, Sachet, Savon,
Bath Crystals, Brillantine

For the chapping winds of early Spring use Roger & Gallet Lip Sticks. Absolutely pure they protect and beautify the lips. In various containers and colors.

ROGER & GALLET
PARIS
25 WEST 32ND STREET
NEW YORK

CREATORS OF RARE
PERFUMES

Our Guide to the most exquisite "Parisian Toilet Specialties" on request.

Best Dealers
Everywhere

BERKEY & GAY Furniture

"The Winthrop"— A Demonstration Value

You never pay more for Berkey & Gay quality—often less—than for makes of unknown worth. As striking evidence of this, foremost furniture stores invite you to see this Puritan dining suite.

In it is reflected the spirit of the Mayflower. The sturdy honesty, the simplicity, the insistence upon genuine goodness that characterized the Puritan home.

Native oak, typical of the period, is the wood used—embellished with walnut and fancy ash burls. Mouldings, carvings, and turnings are softly fashioned by hand. Mellow coloring suggests generations of loving usage.

During April, "The Winthrop" is featured in a nation-wide quality demonstration. Its special value creates a buying opportunity of rare interest.

Our Brochures, describing "The Winthrop" and other Berkey & Gay Furniture, together with name of nearest dealer, sent on request.

BERKEY & GAY FURNITURE COMPANY
440 Monroe Avenue Grand Rapids, Michigan
New York Wholesale Showroom, 119 West 40th Street

This shopmark is inset in every Berkey & Gay production. It is the customer's protection when buying and his pride ever after.

Drawings by Torre-Bevans

Lingerie from Premet for American Brides

(Continued from Page 69)

are joined. In any of the fine white materials with embroidery or a washable lace, this nightgown would also be delightful. Two pieces of white muslin or batiste are edged with narrow plaiting and trimmed with ribbon to match one's negligée for the frivolous cap sketched below.

In connection with lingerie, it is interesting to note that the uncorseted effect still prevails here, as abroad. The effect, however, is more often than not deceptive, for there is in reality a corset, but it is so low and soft and pliable that it is the last word in comfort. In Paris corsets are little more than close-fitting silk tricot bands, which, curiously enough, are worn next to the skin under the combination, and are often trimmed with the tiniest silk flowers.

Even Paris is beginning to admit the necessity of a petticoat with the fuller skirts of our new frocks, but, since almost everything still hangs from the shoulders, it has a top to it and is a near relation of the slip we wear under costume blouses and sheer frocks. Chiffon linen is the fabric most liked by the French for evening petticoats, either in black, plaited upon a tiny waist of ochre lace, for instance, or in such gay colors as emerald green, flag blue, cerise or red. When this slip-like petticoat is worn under a transparent frock, the material chosen for it is, of course, a supple satin or soft taffeta. The plaits are then confined to panels under the arms, or directly in the front and in the back. The brassière is almost invariably of a fine white net.

Germ show no mercy— show none to them

Kills Germs

DISEASE germs are dangerous enemies. They attack unseen, unfelt, without warning. The first notice of their presence comes when someone in the family falls sick.

Can you afford to show mercy to an enemy that fights in such a deadly way? Start at once to guard against this real menace. Proper disinfection is the weapon to use.

Sprinkle a few drops of Lysol Disinfectant, mixed with water, into sinks, drains, toilet bowls, garbage cans, dark, out-of-the-way corners, on dust-covered surfaces, and all such spots where germ life breeds. Do this at least twice a week. Lysol Disinfectant kills germs.

When cleaning, pour a little Lysol Disinfectant into your scrubbing water. Being a soapy substance, Lysol Disinfectant helps to clean as it disinfects.

Use it in solution according to directions on the package. A 50c bottle makes 5 gallons of germ-killing solution. A 25c bottle makes 2 gallons.

Lysol Disinfectant is also invaluable for personal hygiene.

Send for free samples of other Lysol products

You can purchase a 25c bottle of Lysol Disinfectant for trial purposes at any drug store. We shall be glad to mail you free samples of the other Lysol products.

Shall we send a sample of Lysol Shaving Cream for the men folks? Protects the health of the skin. Renders small cuts aseptically clean. We will also include a sample of Lysol Toilet Soap. Refreshingly soothing, healing, and helpful for improving the skin.

Send name and address on a postcard.

LEHN & FINK, INC.
635 Greenwich Street, New York
Makers of Pebecco Tooth Paste

Canadian Agents: Harold F. Ritchie & Company, Limited, 10 McCaul Street, Toronto

Jack Tar Togs

Rub 'em - Tub 'em - Scrub 'em They come up Smiling!

"THANK GOODNESS! They are made for boys now!" myriads of mothers are saying with a smile.

For years the accepted standard regulation wear for girls, Jack Tar Togs for boys are now ready for your choice in America's better stores.

Jack Tar are real, honest-to-goodness boys' togs, made in a variety of absolutely guaranteed, fast-color fabrics, tailored perfectly.

Make a "regular fellow" of your boy — put him in Jack Tar Togs! Write for Style Book and dealer's name, addressing Dept. F-2.

THE STROUSE-BAER COMPANY
Baltimore, Md., U. S. A.

The Label
of Honor

The Bride and Two of Her Guests

MOST becoming to the spring bride is a wedding gown in which heavy white crêpe de Chine is used for the bodice, side panels and train, and fine thread lace for the sleeves and flounced skirt. After the wedding she need only cut the train to length of side panels to have an attractive frock for informal evening wear. The pattern comes in sizes 16, and 36 to 42. For attending a wedding, one may well choose the frock of silk crêpe and lace sketched above, in all black, gray or yellow or in navy with copper-colored sleeves. Pattern comes in sizes 16, and 36 to 44. Equally appropriate is the good-looking frock of smoke-gray crêpe de Chine and embroidered chiffon sketched at the right. Pattern comes in sizes 16, and 36 to 44.

Patterns may be secured from any store selling Home Patterns; or by mail, postage prepaid, from The Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City. Dresses, 35 cents; Coats, 35 cents; Blouses or skirts, 30 cents; Children's Patterns, 25 cents; Transfer, 30 cents.

"Mary, let's go out this evening."
 "Why, John, you seem a new person; you used to want to stay home every night."
 "Oh, but I am feeling so much better, and I am so much more alert and energetic since I began eating Yeast Foam."

Is it modern life that exhausts folks so quickly?

No, it is modern foods, medical experts say

MANY people wrongly think that hard work and long hours are responsible for the physical and mental exhaustion which we see everywhere we go.

What is wrong? The trouble, according to the very highest authorities, lies in the food we eat.

Such world renowned bodies as the Lister Institute and the British Medical Research Committee assert emphatically that modern foods are responsible for ill health of many and serious kinds.

By this they mean that many modern foods, prepared by processes of drying, heating, freezing, sterilization, etc., are in these very processes deprived of their vitality. Their vitamins are lost.

Vitamins are indispensable to health. Do not be misled into thinking that you will be well and strong simply by eating large quantities of even carefully selected food. Unless your food contains sufficient vitamins you can enjoy neither health nor strength.

Yeast contains more of this essential vitamin than does any other known food. We can therefore recommend Yeast Foam, for the purposes indicated, as a nutritional aid of extraordinary merit.

Eat a third, half or whole cake three times a day before meals

It's the same Yeast Foam you know so well as a bread raiser.

Yeast Foam is easily eaten; it is a wholesome, edible food and you'll soon like the taste.

Many eat the cake plain. Some follow it with a little water or milk.

Some mash it fine with a rolling pin and mix it with other foods.

Others dissolve the cake and drink off the water containing the yeast.

You'll find it convenient to carry a package of Yeast Foam around with you, eating a cake at convenient times.

Begin eating Yeast Foam today while awaiting more interesting information which we shall be glad to send free.

Magic Yeast—Yeast Foam
 —just the same except in name.
 At your grocer's—10c package.

NORTHWESTERN YEAST CO., Dept. M-16.
 1750 N. Ashland Ave., Chicago, Ill.
 Please send free instructive booklet, "Dry Yeast as an Aid to Health," telling the interesting story of the wonderful new use of Yeast Foam.

Name _____
 Address _____

Great silk manufacturer makes tests and finds safest way to wash silks

TODAY silk is used almost as much as cotton in making women's washable garments. Silk blouses and silk stockings every woman owns—usually many of her underclothes are of silk as well.

Silk can so easily be ruined in the very first laundering that the safe way to wash it is a real problem to the manufacturer as well as the wearer.

William Skinner & Sons, the largest satin manufacturers in the country, felt it was so important to solve this laundering problem, that they had thorough tests made to work out the safest way to wash silks.

Read the letter from William Skinner & Sons. It tells you many interesting things these tests showed about washing silks, and why, as a result of them, they unqualifiedly recommend Lux.

William Skinner & Sons

Lever Bros. Co.
Cambridge, Mass.

Gentlemen:

We had samples of our various wash silks laundered in Lux—Peau de Cygnes, Charmeuse, all silk satins, etc. Each sample was given the number of washings the average silk garment gets in a year.

We found that at the end of the washings none of the silks had stiffened and in no instance did the delicate threads fray or rough up. We noticed particularly that the Peau de Cygnes did not "pull" or become wiry as frequently happens after washing, and that the satins retained their suppleness.

All the silks showed so few signs of wear that it was hard to believe they had been washed so often. This we think is undoubtedly due to the fact that it is not only unnecessary to rub with Lux, but that the Lux lather is absolutely mild and pure.

These experiments have definitely proved to us that if water alone won't hurt a silk, Lux can't, and we are glad to give it an unqualified endorsement.

Very truly yours,

William Skinner, Pres.
WILLIAM SKINNER & SONS.

How to launder silks

Whisk one tablespoonful of Lux into a thick lather in half a bowlful of very hot water. Add cold water till lukewarm. Dip the garment up and down pressing suds repeatedly through soiled spots. Rinse in 3 lukewarm waters. Squeeze water out—do not wring. Roll in towel or lay flat between Turkish towel, so that the excess moisture will be absorbed. When nearly dry, press with a warm iron—never a hot one. Be careful to press satins with the nap.

For colored things, make suds and rinsing waters almost cool. Wash very quickly to keep colors from running.

Send today for booklet of expert laundering advice—it is free. Address Dept. A-4, Lever Bros. Co., Cambridge, Mass.

LUX

*Won't injure anything
pure water alone won't harm*

Matrons' Frocks With Youthful Lines

A FROCK of wool cashmere or crepe for afternoon is a good-looking and eminently satisfactory addition to the young matron's spring wardrobe. In the sketch just above, cream-colored material is used for the upper part of the frock and a woody brown for the skirt and the cuffs. Brier-stitching in brown wool covers the seams. Linen, in two colors, or checked and plain ginghams are also good materials of which to make this attractive dress. The pattern comes in sizes 16, and 36 to 44.

For sports wear, the frock at the center above is distinctive in brown homespun with sleeves, collar and pockets of bright silk crepe, and a fancy girdle of metal or bone, or in cream-colored rough wool crepe trimmed with canna-red handkerchief linen. Equally smart, and very generally wearable, is the combination of light tan homespun and dark brown silk crepe. The pattern comes in sizes 16, and 36 to 42.

Reseda green, a color that is much worn on the Riviera this season and promises to be very smart for summer, is especially lovely in silk crepe, as at the right above. The frock is of a type generally becoming, and is well suited to afternoon wear by the young matron throughout the spring and summer. The pattern, which may be had in sizes 16, and 36 to 42, provides also for V-neck, long bishop sleeves and a straight hemline, should any of these variations be desired.

At the left, gray crepe de Chine studded with tiny steel nailheads makes an afternoon frock of much distinction for the matron. The bishop sleeves of gray chiffon have a cape effect at the back that is both new and smart, and the skirt is in four pieces, each piece having a point, so that an uneven hemline results. The pattern may be had in sizes 16, and 36 to 44.

Patterns may be secured from any store selling Home Patterns; or by mail, postage prepaid, from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City. Dresses, 35 cents; Coats, 35 cents; Blouses or Skirts, 30 cents; Children's Patterns, 25 cents.

Light-weight smooth-fitting cool, absorbent

Women who get the most out of life—are not necessarily those with the most money to spend, but those who, as the English say, know how to "do themselves well" on what they have.

These women know it is difficult to look well dressed unless one feels comfortable, and that dress comfort starts with underwear. They can appreciate the many advantages of Lawrence Tailored-Knit Underwear.

The celebrated Lawrence Union Suits, Shirts and Drawers for men are the ideal all-season underwear.

This wonderful underwear is made of combed yarn—a Lawrence process that eliminates all but the long, perfect, silk-like fibres, which make garments as soft as silk and much less costly, as dainty as nainsook, yet absorbent.

You know how unpleasant certain kinds of undergarments are on warm days. Lawrence keeps the skin dry and cool.

Lawrence Knit Underwear is elastic—its smooth, slender lines are a joy. It is cut by hand to individual patterns, so is absolutely correct in size and proportions. Though daintily finished it will wear amazingly and launder easily. You will wonder at its moderate price when you see its quality.

In the newest and most approved styles, including:—

Union suits with round or bodice top—in white and pink. Loose or ribbed-cuff knee—closing flap made wide. No buttons.

Under-vests with round or bodice top. Bloomers roomy and comfortable.

Look for the Lawrence label on each garment. If your dealer hasn't the style you want, write to us.

LAWRENCE MFG. CO., LOWELL, MASS.

Established 1831

America's Largest Manufacturers of Men's and Women's Light and Medium Weight Knit Underwear, from the raw cotton to the finished garment.

E. M. Townsend & Co., Selling Agents, New York City.

LAWRENCE

Tailored Knit

UNDERWEAR

Why Ipana is good for gums

IPANA tooth paste contains Ziratol, a healing agent to the gums.

This unique property has made Ipana a favorite tooth paste with dentists, who, better than all others, know how vital gum health is.

Over 2000 dentists have told us that Ipana makes firm, healthy gums that can resist danger—and they have told their patients too, and that's how Ipana got its first great start.

Ipana, in addition, does everything that a good, pure tooth paste can do—and its smooth, snappy and delightful flavor is something you will think of as a treat.

IPANA TOOTH PASTE

Your druggist has it in generous tubes at 50 cents. A sample, enough for a week, may be had for ten cents from Bristol-Myers Co., 44 Rector Street, New York City.

To think that Paris fashions are extreme and only for city wear is a mistake that many of us make. As a matter of fact, Paris leads the world in clothes, and every detail, from the bateau neckline of our gingham house dress to the side drapery on our best gown, originated with or was inspired by the fashion creators of Paris.

Sketch Book

Here is a Powder your skin specialist will approve

First of all, your skin specialist will tell you, a face powder must be pure. He will insist, too, that its ingredients be carefully selected, properly balanced, blended with exact nicety, and that it be scented delicately, with natural flower essences.

Skin specialists approve Freeman's because, from its introduction almost fifty years ago, it has adhered to these standards. Fluffy stearate of zinc, so soothing to the most tender skins, and the finest of air-floated talc, are combined with the fleeting fragrance of fifty different blossoms to make Freeman's the ideal powder for every complexion.

To know for yourself the genuine goodness of Freeman's, send us ten cents in stamps for four dainty samples. With them we'll include our new beauty booklet, "The Etiquette of the Powder Puff," which will tell you much you should know of your skin and its care.

Know your skin and the care it needs—send for this booklet today

Freeman's, velvety soft and smooth, awaits you at any of the better drug stores, department stores, or beauty shops.

—Since 1876—
Freeman's
FACE POWDER Talc-Rouge

For a Charming Complexion
Mail This Coupon—TODAY

THE FREEMAN PERFUME CO.
2004 Norwood Avenue, Cincinnati, Ohio

Gentlemen:—I am enclosing ten cents in stamps for four samples of Freeman's and a copy of your new beauty booklet, "The Etiquette of the Powder Puff."

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____

The Paris decree of low waistlines, wide sleeves and straight, bouffant or side-draped skirts will be more or less in evidence in everything we purchase. In gloves we shall be more conservative, though the Paris suggestions are amusingly interesting.

Fit for a Queen— Priced for a Housewife

THE SECRET of distinction in "QUEEN MAKE" wash dresses lies in the fact that they are dresses so smartly tailored and so modish that you naturally appropriate them for street wear. Frocks which create for you that chic daintiness that all women desire.

You may choose from the "QUEEN MAKE" wardrobe for Spring a frilly frock of dainty tissue trimmed with organdy—a simple straight line, one-piece slip of linen—or veritably any kind of dress fashioned from the new cottons in the happiest designs and colors.

A cotton frock to hold its style, color and freshness must be just twice as well-made as one of cloth or silk. "QUEEN MAKE" dresses retain their daintiness and charm after repeated laundering and the hardest usage.

Queen Make
WASH DRESSES

The leading stores of the country sell "QUEEN MAKE" dresses. If yours has not your choice of these three styles, send us a money order and we will see you are supplied.

Send for attractive booklet A showing many other styles. Mailed free.

"THE HOUSE OF QUEEN MAKE"

L. GINSBERG & BROS., 102 Madison Ave., New York
Makers of "QUEEN MAKE" Wash Dresses, Aprons, Nurses' and Maids' Uniforms.

The Three Smartest Sports Costumes

VERY smart for sports or general wear is the dress at the upper left, which boasts a slip-on blouse and a separate side-plaited skirt. Many combinations in both colors and materials are possible: a white cotton or linen blouse over a skirt of English print or cretonne; canna-red crêpe de Chine over white flannel; or silk or wool jersey all in one color. A light-weight éponge would also be most attractive. The pattern is in sizes 16 years, and 36 to 42.

For sports wear, too, is the sleeveless jacket above at right, which was so much worn on the Riviera abroad and at our own Southern winter resorts. It may be of the same material and color as the skirt, or may contrast as in the sketch above. The pattern, which comes in sizes 16 years, and 36 to 40, also provides for a collar and long bell sleeves if one wishes them. In the cape and frock at the lower left the new dandelion-yellow silk crêpe is bound with the same material in dark brown; or tan wool crêpe may be trimmed with brown, or green with black, or white with canna. The cape is No. 3516, and comes in small, medium and large sizes, while the chemise frock is No. 3326, in sizes 14 and 16, and 36 to 44 inches.

Black taffeta is edged and sashed with canna red or jade in the bathing suit above. The neck may be oval or V-shaped. Sizes are 16 years, and 36, 40, 44, 48 and 52 inches.

Patterns may be secured from any store selling Home Patterns; or by mail, postage prepaid, from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City. Dresses, 35 cents; Coats, 35 cents; Bathing Suits, 35 cents; Blouses or Skirts, 30 cents; Children's Patterns, 25 cents.

Interesting side panels form the new uneven hem line. Double collars and cuffs of white organdy. In green, blue, brown and red checked gingham. (Top)

No. 576. $5.75

Organdy inserts give the slightly bouffant effect of the skirt. Collar and cuffs of white organdy. In heliotrope, blue, brown and black checked gingham. (Bottom)

No. 505. $7.95

Fashioned of pure linen—finished with cord binding—this smartly tailored dress may be had in rose, blue, heliotrope, brown and gray—trimmed with white of the same material. (Bottom)

No. 506. $12.75

All three dresses may be had in sizes 16-18-20 and 36-46.

Painted by Worth Brehm. © E. L. W. of G. E. Co.

The first night away from home

A BIG strange room—a big strange bed—a big strange house full of big strange sounds—

And such a little mite of a girl.

But the good fairies stand guard while you sleep, little girl. And if you wake in the darkness, stretch out your hand. A touch and the big room is smiling with friendly light.

ARE there any rooms in your home that still need the friendly cheer of Edison MAZDA Lamps? Nothing will add so much to the beauty of your other furnishings at so little cost; nothing will add so much to the convenience of your daily life at so little trouble.

Step into the store which has the Edison MAZDA Lamp Girl in the window. The merchant who owns the store has accurate standards from which to prescribe just the right lamp for every room and every sort of fixture.

THE mark MAZDA on a lamp is your guarantee that it is the most perfect which Science has thus far developed. And when MAZDA Service, working in the Research Laboratories of the General Electric Company, develops a better lamp, that, too, will be an Edison MAZDA Lamp.

EDISON MAZDA LAMPS

EDISON LAMP WORKS OF GENERAL ELECTRIC COMPANY

Deep Brushing

DEEP brushing—when you can feel the brush on your scalp—that is the sort of brushing that stimulates the scalp, keeps it free from dandruff, and promotes the health and beauty of the hair.

The Pro-phy-lac-tic Pen-e-tra-tor is the brush designed to give you all the benefits of thorough brushing and scalp massage.

The bristles in this brush are set in tufts widely separated so that they penetrate clear through the hair to the scalp.

Daily brushing with the Pro-phy-lac-tic Pen-e-tra-tor will show good results in a short time.

And it makes hair dressing so much easier. It guides every hair, every wayward lock, into position.

Made in several different styles and finishes. Always sold in the yellow box.

For sale at any store where hair brushes are sold

FLORENCE MANUFACTURING CO., Florence, Mass.
Canadian Agency: 247 St. Paul Street West, Montreal

Pro-phy-lac-tic Brushes

Fashion Decrees the Two-Piece Suit

3484

3473

3483

THE wearing of a one-piece dress beneath one's jacket, instead of a skirt and blouse, has a foundation of common sense and economy, as well as of smartness. It eliminates the "initial cost and upkeep" of numerous crêpe de Chine and Georgette blouses, and provides a costume that is becoming and in good taste when one's coat is removed; whereas the suit with separate blouse is coming more and more to be considered appropriate only for street wear.

Another decree of the season is that the entire suit need not be of the same material. This makes possible such delightful combinations as a jacket of navy wool cloth over a Canton crêpe frock of navy or contrasting color; a dress of plain navy serge with its coat of navy serge plaided in white; or, for midsummer wear, a jacket of bright red flannel over white crêpe de Chine, Canton crêpe or linen. Another possibility is to have the jacket and dress skirt of the same material—gaberdine or heavy silk crêpe—and the upper part of the dress of a colorful printed crêpe or radium silk. Among the best materials for both coats and suits this spring are gaberdines, tricôtes, homespun, heavy silk or wool crêpes and the various charmois-like weaves.

When the first spring breezes lure one out of doors a suit of sand-colored tricotine, such as is sketched at the upper left of the preceding page, is distinctly in keeping with the joyousness of the occasion. A pattern for the jacket is provided in sizes 16, and 36 to 44. Any simple skirt pattern or chemise dress may be used, although a skirt with inverted plaits which comes just beneath the openings in the coat, as in the sketch, is particularly attractive.

Patterns may be secured from any store selling Home Patterns; or by mail, postage prepaid, from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City. Dresses, 35 cents; Coats, 35 cents; Blouses or Skirts, 30 cents; Children's Patterns, 25 cents; Jackets, 30 cents.

Navy serge will always be a favorite material for spring, but the smart lines of the suit at the right of the opposite page and the trimming of flat black silk-braid lattice-work give new strength to this favoritism. The pattern for the coat comes in sizes 16, and 36 to 46, and may be combined with any plain skirt pattern or worn over a simple one-piece dress of serge.

Made of soft duvetyn or a kindred material in a woodsy brown, the graceful coat on the opposite page conforms to all that is newest in the French mode. The oddly shaped narrow panel attached on its shorter side down the right-side back is an interesting French touch, but may be omitted if one prefers. Pattern comes in sizes 16, and 36 to 44.

For the smart blouse sketched below, which is of henna crêpe de Chine with a braided trimming, the pattern may be had in sizes 16, and 36 to 42. The color may of course be varied to match one's suit or to afford the most effective contrast. In every case, however, the braiding should be done in self-color.

A double-breasted coat with raglan sleeves and a convertible collar, such as is shown below, is of the type best suited to sports and general-utility wear, and at the same time is not difficult to make. In waterproof gaberdine it would make a splendid raincoat and motor coat, and be both serviceable and good-looking. It would look well also in gaberdine, tricotine, homespun, or one of the chamoislike fabrics, in brown, tan, gray, or any shade of blue, or in a tweed mixture. The patch pockets may be omitted if one wishes, but they help to give the somewhat masculine effect that is considered so good this season. The pattern may be had in sizes 16, and 36 to 46.

The navy tricotine jacket below could be worn to good effect over a one-piece dress of tricotine or Canton crêpe. It is attractive either with or without the trimming of narrow flat silk braid. The kimono sleeves, cut in one with the side sections, the narrow shawl collar lapped in front to give a surplice effect, and the long, slightly bloused waistline, marked by a narrow belt of the material, all identify the coat as distinctly of this season's mode and at the same time emphasize the youthfulness of its lines. The pattern comes in sizes 16, and 36 to 42.

Patterns may be secured from any store selling Home Patterns; or by mail, postage prepaid, from The Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City. Dresses, 35 cents; Coats, 35 cents; Blouses or Skirts, 30 cents; Suit Coats, 30 cents.

Another Bed in Your Home

You would be proud of a davenport such as this in your home. Faultless in design, construction and workmanship and rich in finish and materials it is really a beautiful piece of furniture. At 5:16 no one would ever suspect its night-time usefulness—yet when the occasion demands, it is quickly converted into a full size, restful bed.

Northfield Bed Davenports

There is a Northfield for your home—whether you expect to use the bed feature frequently or not. Primarily a davenport, you feel secure in the knowledge that with your Northfield an extra bed always awaits the extra guest—the emergency.

Made in period styles in walnut, oak and mahogany, as well as attractive models in popular fibre-reed, Northfield Bed-Davenports are designed, finished and constructed appropriately for every home. A chair and rocker match each davenport.

Before you buy any bed-davenport see the Northfield showing. There is a dealer in your town.

Let us send you "The Davenport with a Secret"—a little booklet illustrating several attractive styles—a revelation in bed-davenport beauty and usefulness.

The Northfield Company
Makers of Good Furniture
SHEBOYGAN WISCONSIN

GOLD DUST

WINDOWS

How Gold Dust does banish the haze! Leaves glass sparkling. Clear as crystal. No rubbing. Clean in a jiffy.

© 1922,
N. K. F. Co.

BATHROOMS

Tiles and tubs kept shimmering white. It's easy with Gold Dust.

FLOORS

A little Gold Dust in the cleaning water keeps them like new.

Cleaner Cleaning

The Mop's Best Friend

WOOD floors and tile floors! Woodwork and windows! Bathroom and bedroom! Kitchen and parlor! Gold Dust spreads springtime all through the house. Removes all the dirt and grime of winter. Brings a wonderful, sweet cleansing to everything it touches. Leaves the whole house sanitary because it purifies as it thoroughly cleanses. Be certain to have Gold Dust on hand this housecleaning time. You'll find it your most helpful friend.

It's wonderfully simple. A little Gold Dust and warm water—and you're ready. Be sure it really is Gold Dust you buy. Look for the name Fairbank's and the Twins on the package.

THE N. K. FAIRBANK COMPANY

Let the Gold Dust

Twins do your work

Jersey-by-the-Yard Makes the Blouses

But the Trimming is Handmade

THE smart sports skirt revealed beneath the bulletin board in the sketch above is of gray cloth, with checks of scarlet wool embroidered above the hem and a fringed edging that is often a part of this season's sports clothes. The pattern comes in sizes 16, and 28 to 36. The sweater-blouse having been enthusiastically sponsored by Paris now appears in an interesting variety of styles. Two of the most attractive of these blouses are sketched above and patterns are provided for them, in sizes 16, and 36 to 42. They may be made of either wool or silk Jersey in any of becoming spring and summer colors, with matching trimming of silk or wool looped fringe. The tight hip band of the blouse at the right is a new feature that is seen also in many of the spring suits.

When cutting Jersey, it is well to remember that generous seams should be allowed and the seam line stitched with fine basting thread, to provide for the raveling that inevitably occurs in this material while it is being worked upon. In sewing Jersey on the machine always have a loose tension, for it will pull badly if too tightly sewed.

The looped trimming used to such good effect in both of the blouses above may be either knitted or crocheted. For the knitted loops cast on eight stitches, knit across. Second needle: Insert needle in stitch, as if to knit, wind wool over the needle and around forefinger of left hand four times, bring wool up and around right hand needle, then knit the stitch which will appear like four stitches in one. Repeat this in every stitch. If a less heavy loop is desired, wind only twice. Repeat the first and second needle until the necessary length is made. Cast on more stitches, if a wider band is desired.

To make the crocheted trimming, chain ten, and work one row of single crochet stitches. Always chain one for turning. Second row: Use a pencil or a thick knitting needle, hold this at the back of the piece you are working on, insert needle in stitch, having yarn over and around thick needle, thereby forming loop. Finish single crochet as usual. Work next row in plain single crochet without loops. The thickness of the needle, over which loops are made, will determine the length of loops.

Patterns may be secured from any store selling Home Patterns; or by mail, postage prepaid, from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City. Dresses, 35 cents; Coats, 35 cents; Blouses or Skirts, 30 cents; Children's Patterns, 25 cents.

A Necklace of 250,000 words

Ever at hand, hanging by its ring on the attractive ribbon guard, is her EVERSARP Pencil. She uses this handy pencil at home, for office writing, for the jotting down of countless daily items that are not to be forgotten. In EVERSARP is lead enough for a quarter of a million words.

EVERSHARP has helped to emancipate woman. It has multiplied her business efficiency. No more pencil sharpening; no more hunting for a pencil. Women carry EVERSARP with them, as they would a watch. It indicates alertness and efficiency. And like a watch, it is mechanically perfect.

No other pencil can be like Eversharp

EVERSHARP Pencils are in gold, silver and enamel, in many styles; priced from 50c to $50. Each is matched in writing perfection by the Wahl Fountain Pen, with the all-metal barrel that holds more ink. Factory-tailored to fit your hand. Sold everywhere.

THE WAHL COMPANY, CHICAGO

EVERSHARP matched by
WAHL PEN

Use only Eversharp Leads—12 in a box. They fit accurately. Seven grades from extra soft to very hard; also indelible. Look for the name Eversharp on the red-topped box.

Even the woman who knows all there is to know about Black Cat Hosiery, appreciates the purpose of the Allen A Brand

The wearers of Allen A Black Cat Hosiery constitute the largest and most substantial group of fine Hosiery buyers in America.

This means also that they are the keenest on money's worth. Careful buyers. More than a little critical, but quick to respond to integrity in manufacturer and merchant.

By adding the Allen A Brand to the Black Cat name on every piece of genuine Black Cat Hosiery—the makers put on record their personal responsibility for every detail of money's worth in this celebrated Hosiery.

Always full size; always full length; always at the top of the style; always beyond comparison in value.

In Silk, in Lisle, in Wool, in Cotton—for Men, Women and Children.

Allen A Black Cat Hosiery For Women

For dress wear, business, street and sport's wear and Knickerbocker use. Silk, Lisle, Wool and Cotton.

Look for this Master Brand—Allen A.

It carries with it the personal pledge of the maker's responsibility for uniform high quality and money's worth. Allen A is the maker's Mark of Identification on the genuine

BLACK CAT Hosiery

COOPER'S-BENNINGTON
Spring Needle Underwear

ALLEN A Summerwear

The Allen A Company

Kenosha, Wisconsin

Copyright, 1922, The Allen A Company

The School Clothes of the Well-Dressed Child

BOUND for school on a sunny spring morning, the youngster at the left above wears a good-looking coat of homespun, which is quite smart enough to serve also as her "Sunday best." The shawl collar may be worn open, as in the sketch, or rolled high about the neck, and the wide, set-in sleeves need not have cuffs unless she wishes them. The pockets, too, may be omitted without detracting from the appearance of the coat. Navy, tan and brown are good colors for spring; the pattern comes in sizes 4 to 14. In cravenette or similar showerproof material, the double-breasted coat at the right above is splendid for April weather. With its raglan sleeves and convertible collar it is a most becoming type of sports coat and can be made with equally good effect in serge, covert cloth, cheviot, tweed or camel's hair. The pattern comes in sizes 6 to 14. For the small boy a suit which combines a box-plaited waist of tan linen and straight little trousers of brown wool is most attractive. Interesting color combinations are always possible in a suit of this sort, even if one prefers to make blouse and trousers of the same material. The pattern comes in sizes from 2 to 12 and can be varied to suit the individual requirements of the heir apparent by omitting box plaits, adding a pocket to the blouse or substituting elbow sleeves. In addition to possessing the simplicity and good lines that are always essential parts of the clothes of the well-dressed child, the top coats and little suit above offer little or no difficulty to the home dressmaker.

Patterns may be secured from any store selling Home Patterns; or by mail, postage prepaid, from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East Eighteenth Street, New York City. Dresses, 35 cents; Coats, 35 cents; Blouses or Skirts, 30 cents; Children's Patterns, 25 cents; Lingerie, 25 cents.

Insist on

Gainsborough

Genuine HAIR NET

The Net of the Life-Like Lustre

Matchless in Quality
Yet only 10 cents
Everywhere

THE WESTERN COMPANY
402 W. Randolph St.
Chicago

Gainsborough Double
Cap, 15 cents each or 2
for 25 cents.

Gainsborough Double
Fringe, 15 cents each or
2 for 25 cents.

Gainsborough White or Gray, 20 cents each.

Ask for this package.
For sale by the better
stores everywhere.

If your dealer can't supply
you, write your name and address on margin below, enclose 10 cents—mentioning color and shape desired.

Completes the Hairdress

Mary Brush Williams Writes of Paris Hats

And Irene Castle Poses in Them

To wear with a suit or one-piece cloth dress, one may well choose, as does Mrs. Treman in the photograph above, a small hat of black satin cloth trimmed most becomingly with tan uncurled ostrich.

A large and jaunty bow of navy grosgrain ribbon is the outstanding feature of the smart hat of navy Italian Milan worn by Irene Castle Treman in the photograph at the left.

Photos. by Nicholas Muray

The draped turban of black satin haircloth trimmed with self fringe, worn by Mrs. Treman in the circle photograph, would look particularly well with one's spring suit.

In the good-looking red Milan hat photographed at the left, navy taffeta faces the right side of the brim and finishes in a wing effect on the opposite side on the top of brim.

The large hat at the extreme left is of black Milan trimmed with jet and burnt ostrich. In the lower center photograph, black satin cloth has a draped crown and two quills at the back.

At the right, black visca straw is topped with a latticework of black moiré ribbon and worn well down over the eyes, as are all the smartest hats this spring season.

Since white will be a favorite color for spring and summer, a white haircloth hat trimmed on one side with a fringe of narrow grosgrain ribbons is almost a necessity.

Second from the left, a hat of the popular canna-red satin haircloth with a canna-colored wing across the front proves that distinction in millinery is not dependent upon the bizarre in shape or trimming.

NOW is the open season for observing the vast panorama of Paris buying its summer hat. All areas included between the Seine and the Marne, with special emphasis on neighborhoods round Montparnasse, Montmartre, well as the fashionable Bois region, afford vantage points in which to view the scene. Madame Lebrun, who under circumstances pays more than eight dollars for her better linery, "waits in" all one morning and is awfully cross out it, because her little milliner does not limp up the flights of stairs to her apartment to keep her devious. This grande dame lives on a side street the Avenue du Bois, in an apartment which does enjoy the advantages of steam heat and a bath, she is thought by some to disseminate more chic in the Avenue than many of those who live on it drive in their motors to the seat of the original dels, which Madame Lebrun has copied. She does this by employing a little milliner who pays fifty dollars a year rent for a flat, the interior which no customer has ever penetrated. She has showroom and nothing to show. She is a "visit-milliner" who for models patrols shop windows fashion magazines. She comes upon an illustration of one by Reboux, prematurely printed, and she tents with the magazine by fastest bus to Madame Lebrun's apartment. Together the two consider it

(Continued on Page 90)

3 months . . . 12 to 13 pounds
 6 months . . . 15 to 16 pounds
 9 months . . . 17 to 18 pounds
 1 year . . . 20 to 22 pounds

Notice how different is the appearance of the skin of these two babies. That of the tiny baby, but a few hours old, is dark, rather rough and exceedingly tender. That of the older baby shows the result of regular and careful methods of bathing, in its fairness, its fine texture and firm quality.

Send for a set of our Wool Soap Toy Blocks—20 to the set, round-cornered, $1\frac{3}{4}$ inches square attractively embossed. The children will love them as a plaything of delightful and instructive amusement. Send 5 Wool Soap wrappers, together with 25c in stamps or cash.

A Fleecy Lather

The new science of bathing babies

Methods followed in large maternity hospitals that mothers can practice at home

HOW do you bathe your baby? While the extreme care used in great maternity hospitals is not always possible or necessary in the home, their general methods should be practiced as far as possible by mothers. In equipment, system and practice, the nurseries of large maternity hospitals are models. Here the bathing of babies is almost equal in importance to feeding.

The hours from 8 to 10 o'clock—before the mid-morning feeding and nap—are considered best for the bath. They are busy hours, full of interest, human and scientific.

The light, sunny bathroom is put in efficient readiness before the bathing begins. The temperature is carefully gauged; the high bath-tables are supplied with every possible needed article, within quick reach.

Dexterous hands quickly accomplish the bath

Each tiny occupant of the little basket nursery beds is carried into the connecting bathroom, stripped and weighed. He is then placed upon the conveniently high bath-table where the nurse's dexterous hands quickly accomplish the bath.

A very soft cloth or piece of absorbent cotton wrapped in cloth, is used for washing. The bath water is just warm enough to feel comfortable to the elbow.

The head and face are first bathed gently without soap. Then the little body is quickly bathed with mild, pure soap suds and patted dry with a smooth, absorbent towel.

A floating white soap

Eyes, ears and nose are each cleansed with separate boracic swabs, after which baby is dressed in fresh garments, ready and eager for his feeding and nap.

Every article used has first been made completely sterile, from bath basin to the tiny garments he is dressed in. Scrupulous care is exercised down to the minutest detail; that not too much nor too strong soap is used on the tender skin; that the rinsing is thorough; the drying gentle.

Importance of the soap used

The soap is of prime importance. A perfectly pure, mild soap, suited to the fine texture of a baby's skin, is a necessity.

Wool Soap is a children's soap, particularly adapted to their delicate needs.

Every ingredient used in it is the purest obtainable; the fats, upon which soap quality depends, are practically edible.

It makes a soft, fleecy lather that leaves the skin soft, pliant and firm, as Nature made it. It cleanses and soothes; softens and strengthens baby's tender skin. What the old imported Castile soap, now so rarely obtainable, did for babies' skins, Wool Soap does today.

A trial cake for baby's bath

Try bathing your baby with Wool Soap, following as far as possible these hospital methods. Send 2c in stamps with the coupon for a trial cake, Baby Bath Size. Swift & Company, U. S. A.

4285

Swift & Company, Chicago:

Enclosed find 2c in stamps for which send me a Trial Cake of Wool Soap.

Name _____

Address _____

For Toilet and Bath

For Children's Skins

A wonderful Invention Makes any sewing machine an electric

There is no secret of dressing well at little cost. It's really ridiculously simple, as every woman knows. She merely does the sewing herself, and has many more pretty things to wear, than another who spends much more.

But sewing on the old fashioned foot-pumping machine is a wearisome drudgery, and to many women, a positive danger. Now this is all changed. One motion of the hand places the Hamilton Beach Home Motor next to the hand wheel of your ordinary sewing machine and makes it a speedy electric.

No tools or screws or belts required. Absolutely no holes to drill or clamps to attach. Your machine is unmarred. And you sew as long as you like without effort or exertion, at a cost for current of less than one cent an hour. You never touch the wheel; the machine always starts the right way; you never break a thread. Just a silent, steady motion, that is exactly as fast as you wish—no faster—controlled by your toe on the speed pedal.

Hamilton Beach Home Motor

A great home helper

The Hamilton Beach Home Motor is only about as big as your clenched fist, yet is so vigorous and sturdy, you just can't heap too much work on it. Heavy material, thick seams, many plies—it's all one to you—just as easy to sew as the sheerest silks. And the very first dress you make, saves you its small first-cost.

Besides, as these illustrations show, with the convenient attachments, the same motor also serves as a wonderful fan in the hot weather, sharpens knives, polishes silver, and whips cream. Change from one use to any other in a moment. Nearly 1,000,000 homes now use it to save time, labor, and health. Absolutely guaranteed by Hamilton Beach.

$18.50

Attachments Extra

At all good

Electrical, Hardware,
Sewing Machine, and Department Stores

Hamilton Beach
Vacuum Sweeper

$58.50

Except West of Rockies

It adds a gale of 219 cubic feet of air per minute to the motor driven brush

Naturally, it gives double efficiency
Write for FREE folder and full facts

HAMILTON BEACH MFG. CO., Racine, Wisconsin

Mary Brush Williams Writes of Paris Hats

(Continued from Page 87)

and others, until at length the little milliner takes a bus back to make foundations for the models chosen. They are in white crinoline, and she comes again with them and samples of materials. Madame Lebrun tries them on and decides which make her look not the prettiest, and not the youngest, but the most chic. It hardly ever happens that the samples will do the first time, and so the little milliner limps round the shops again.

The day when she did not come there was a fire that held up the AB busses, and she could just about as easily think of walking as to afford a taxicab.

She used to walk before the bus accident which made it necessary to amputate her leg. Now she wears an American wooden leg, suspended from her shoulder. And so it was that Madame Lebrun's Easter was momentarily endangered. But the little milliner never disappoints anyone. She arrived at the last moment, with one model "lifted" from Reboux, and the other from a less conspicuous artist. The crown of the latter was a little big. It did not shape to the head nicely. But that was not the fault of the little milliner. The crown of the original did not shape nicely.

So few of them do! It is the significant feature of your hat. By it you can tell whether your head covering was made by a mere milliner or an artist. It must be big enough to envelop easily even our rather large heads, and yet look small. It must be long enough to include that wad of hair that settles on the back of almost every American girl's neck, and yet look round. I have seen them look as long as if they were made for a horse's head. It must go down almost to the nape of the neck in the back and to the eyes in front, and yet look low at the top. It must be stiff enough to hold its shape forever, and yet look soft. No domestic-science school can lay too much emphasis on this feature. To produce it requires both art and brawn. Did you ever see a French milliner excavating into crinoline for a crown? You would say she was giving an imitation of digging the Panama Canal.

Sports Clothes Will be Much Worn

THE little visiting milliner does this only when the hats she copies bear evidences of such ground and spade work. She does not seek to improve upon originals, no matter by whom. She never creates and she never falls below her own standard for almost uncanny imitation—and therefore her place in the economic history of humanity is fixed.

Madame Lebrun blames herself for ever filching from any but the best houses, and will console herself on Easter morning by appearing on the Avenue in her perfect imitation of the greater artist's production before that artist's customers have had a chance to see it in her shop.

One of the beauties of her system is that she does not have to work as hard for results as the grandes dames who buy the original models. Nobody carries any millinery to them. They spend hours of the most grinding work to get their Easter head raiment. I was in at Reboux's this afternoon, and it was a lot of fun for everybody except those having hats made. It was like a reception, with men present, and there was a chatter and cigarette smoke, such as you don't associate with an American millinery shop in any city.

From two young women in Reboux's I can tell you to a nicety what some of the spring styles will be. Sports clothes will be awfully smart, even in cities. The French have only just recently heard of sports, and they will eventually beat the world at least on the costuming of them. These young women sat at looking-glasses on each side of a wide door and between tryings-on visited each other.

Silk Jersey Smart for Blouses

ONE had on a very smart slate-colored tailored suit of smooth material, without a touch of garnishment on it anywhere, not even a belt. When she got up she pulled it wide open to adjust her blouse, which was of slate-colored silk jersey, with a long V-shaped collar that rolled. Paris has really gone a little out of its mind over these jerseys, many of them of vegetable silk, and some of them striped in silk and wool mixed.

As for the blouses, they no longer have boat-shaped necks, nor yet do they have the wide sailor collar of old, but they fall very loosely round the waist, sometimes gently belted, and spread into that rolling V at the neck. This girl got too warm in the course of all the cigarette smoking going on round her, and while visiting with her friend she took off her coat. The sleeves of her blouse were long and fitted very smoothly over the shoulders, like a man's. Sleeves of elbow length and shorter are less in the ascendant this year.

When the hat maker returned with the crown she had been excavating, the young woman returned to her seat to try it on.

(Continued on Page 152)

PHOTOS BY NICKOLAS MURPHY

In the circle above, Irene Castle Treman wears a matron's hat of black Milan trimmed with sand-colored ostrich. The hat at the left of the lower photograph is of red Italian Milan and has a canna wing on the upturned front; that at the right has a black Milan crown and a five-petaled taffeta brim, each petal edged with taffeta plaiting. All three of these hats are excellent to wear all during the spring and summer with suits or cloth dresses. Canna-red is the new color.

Emergency Cake

1 1/4 cupfuls SWANS DOWN CAKE FLOUR, after sifting once
1 cupful sugar
1/4 teaspoonful grated nutmeg (or other flavoring)
2 teaspoonfuls baking powder
2 egg whites
Soft butter or other shortening
1/2 cupful milk

Sift together the flour, sugar, and baking powder. To the egg whites in a measuring cup add enough soft (not melted) butter to half fill the cup; add milk to fill the cup; turn into dry ingredients, add flavoring and beat vigorously 7 minutes. Bake in two layers. Put layers together and cover with the following quick frosting:

Seven Minute Marshmallow Frosting

1 egg white (unbeaten)
1/4 cupful sugar
3 tablespoonfuls water
12 marshmallows
1 teaspoonful vanilla

Put the egg white, sugar and water in the upper part of a double boiler and set it over rapidly boiling water. Begin beating immediately with a Dover egg beater and beat constantly for seven minutes. Remove from stove and add the vanilla and marshmallows, cut in small pieces. Beat until of the proper consistency to spread. Double recipe if more icing is needed.

One-Egg Cake

1/4 cupful shortening
1/4 cupful sugar
1 egg, well beaten
1/4 cupful milk
1 1/4 cupfuls SWANS DOWN CAKE FLOUR
2 teaspoonfuls baking powder
1/2 teaspoonful vanilla

Cream the shortening; add the sugar gradually, beating mixture hard, then add the beaten egg; sift flour, measure, add baking powder and sift several times, add alternately with the milk, a little at a time. Add vanilla. Bake in a shallow pan in a moderate oven about 30 minutes. Cover with a chocolate frosting.

Marble Cake

1/4 cupful shortening
1/4 cupful sugar
2 cupfuls SWANS DOWN CAKE FLOUR
3 level teaspoonfuls baking powder
1/2 cupful milk
3 egg whites
1/2 teaspoonful flavoring extract

Cream shortening, add sugar gradually, creaming the mixture thoroughly. Sift flour, measure, add baking powder, and sift several times, then add alternately with milk to the first mixture, beating batter hard meanwhile. Add flavoring; fold in the well beaten egg whites. Divide the mixture and leave one half plain. Into the other half beat 3 tablespoonfuls cocoa. 1/4 teaspoonful ground cloves. 1/2 teaspoonful ground cinnamon. 1/4 teaspoonful soda.

Put the two mixtures, alternately, by the large spoonful into a loaf tin. Do not stir, but smooth over the top. Bake in a slow oven. This cake does not require icing.

Cup Cakes

1/4 cupful shortening
1/4 cupful sugar
2 eggs
1/4 cupful milk
1 1/4 cupfuls SWANS DOWN CAKE FLOUR
2 teaspoonfuls baking powder
1 teaspoonful lemon or vanilla extract

Cream shortening, add sugar gradually, creaming mixture well. Add eggs well beaten. Sift flour, measure, add baking powder and sift again three times. Add flour and milk alternately to first mixture until all is used, beating batter hard meanwhile. Add flavoring extract. Bake in muffin tins. Ice if desired.

One, two, and three egg cakes easy to make!

"Economy cakes" need not be substantial and breadlike. If you use the proper ingredients you can save materially on eggs and shortening and still attain the soft, fluffy texture that makes cake a delightful delicacy as well as a real food.

For perfect results in all your cake making, use the tried and proved

SWANS DOWN
Prepared (Not Self-Rising)
CAKE FLOUR
Preferred by Housewives for 28 years

It is pure wheat flour, specially ground from selected rich winter wheat, many times sifted through tiny-meshed silk. Nothing is added, only the hard, tough particles of the grain are removed. Cake made from such flour stays fresh and moist to the last piece.

Because Swans Down is feathery fine and smooth as velvet, it naturally makes lighter, finer, whiter cake than is possible with a comparatively heavy bread flour. The economical cakes shown on this page can be made very tempting with Swans Down Cake Flour. Follow the recipes and you will be assured of perfect results.

IGLEHEART BROTHERS

Established 1886
Evansville Dept. J-4 Indiana
Also makers of Swans Down Health Bran

INSTANT SWANS DOWN is a dry cake batter. Contains all the ingredients you use in making a white butter cake except the moisture. Add water and bake a cake. The only product of its kind made with the famous SWANS DOWN CAKE FLOUR. Ask your grocer to get it for you, or write us.

Important: Do not confuse Instant Swans Down with Swans Down Cake Flour. They are two different products.

Send 10 cents to Igleheart Brothers, Evansville, Ind., for "Cake Secrets"—an authoritative recipe book on cake and pastry making by Janet McKenzie Hill of the Boston Cooking School.

Cakes pictured above may be made with one package of INSTANT SWANS DOWN (white cake batter, dry). Special recipes on both sides of Instant package.

MORRIS

Supreme Ham

Another slice! It is so good your guests will want another slice; and will ask—"What brand is this?"

The Morris Supreme cure achieves the delicious flavor. The yellow and black label of goodness is on many other Morris foods—all Supreme.

MORRIS & COMPANY

Packers and Provisioners

Bake one for Easter dinner

The Most Powerful Lobby in Washington

(Continued from Page 5)

which is represented in its entirety at Washington. The demand for suffrage alone was not sufficient to bring this thing about. Nor was the demand for prohibition by itself enough. A third impetus was needed.

To have the story complete it is also necessary to learn when and where it was that the first American woman thought of inviting two or more other women to come to her home to form a club to study the plays of Shakspeare or the poems of Browning. The name Browning Club became generic. Two generations ago the thing that it stood for spread throughout the country. It became as much an object of ridicule as were the causes of suffrage and temperance. But the pretense, affectation and humbug which crept into it were negligible as compared to its training for future usefulness. Whatever it had of faddishness in the beginning was swamped by the earnestness of what grew out of it.

The main point is that women who knew little or nothing of suffrage and had no interest in the temperance movement began to get together in groups with a purpose which they took seriously. They then began to form the habit of studying something in common, thinking no doubt that the literary topic on the winter's program was an end in itself and entirely unconscious of the fact that it was only a part of the beginning of a movement of tremendous historical and political importance to the United States, which their daughters and granddaughters would carry on, not in scattered, isolated parlor groups of a dozen here and a score there, but in organized millions as the General Federation of Women's Clubs.

In the beginning, say the women of to-day who know the history of their movement, these three groups had little in common. The early suffragists talked of their "woman's rights," meaning only the franchise, as something entirely abstract and without much thought as to other matters in which they might exercise those rights. Early temperance workers staked their whole case on morality and the emotions alone, most of them unconscious of the fact that they could never get rid of the saloon until they themselves had political power. And the third group, the social and literary clubs, was made up of the conservative women of their communities who, like their husbands, looked upon the suffragists and temperance workers as fanatics and not quite in the same social set. In the beginning, but of course with exceptions both ways, the financially well-to-do women were those who flocked to clubs, and the less well-to-do were those who rallied to causes.

To-day the clubs and the causes are very much the same thing. The merging of the three forces was inevitable.

"United We Stand"

IT WAS not until after the different organizations had come to Washington and established their permanent camps and fortifications for the close-up war on invisible government and other phases of the régime of things as they were that the women fully learned that in reality they were all aiming at the same goal, that their roads were converging, no matter how far apart they had seemed in the beginning, no matter how little in common their organization titles seemed to suggest. Women agents of various causes had ample time, while waiting together in the lobbies of Senate and House, to compare notes and to learn that they were there for the same fundamental purpose. Under the circle of the Capitol's dome they all saw the same source whence must come eventually the adequate protection of motherhood and childhood, and therefore the best chance for the manhood of the nation.

With this realization they joined their moral, political and social forces by the recent organization of the Women's Joint Congressional Committee. The committee describes itself as "the outcome of a movement on the part of the great national organizations of women to pool their resources and cooperate for the support of Federal legislation which affects the interest of women in particular and makes for good government in general."

There are fourteen constituent bodies in this combination. They are, together with their representatives on the joint committee and their total membership throughout the country, as follows:

1. National League of Women Voters, Mrs. Maud Wood Park . . . 2,000,000
2. General Federation of Women's Clubs, Miss Lida Hafford . . . 2,000,000
3. Women's Christian Temperance Union, Mrs. E. A. Yost . . . 500,000
4. National Congress of Mothers and Parent-Teachers Association, Mrs. A. C. Watkins . . . 310,000
5. National Women's Trade Union League, Miss Ethel Smith . . . 600,000
6. Daughters of the American Revolution, Mrs. Alice Bradford Wiles . . . 200,000
7. American Home Economics Association, Miss Louise Stanley . . . 1,800
8. National Consumers' League, Mrs. Florence Kelley
9. American Association of University Women, Mrs. Raymond Morgan . . . 16,000
10. National Council of Jewish Women, Mrs. Alexander Wolf 50,000
11. Girls' Friendly Society, Mrs. Graham H. Powell 52,000
12. Young Women's Christian Association, Mrs. Samuel MacClintock . . . 560,000
13. National Federation of Business and Professional Women, Miss Mary Stewart . . . 40,000
14. Women's League for Peace and Freedom, Mrs. George T. Odell 2,500

The Clearing House

MOST of these organizations in the Joint Congressional Committee, with their programs of legislation within the United States, are also, together with Miss Emma Wold's World Committee for Disarmament, constituent bodies of the National Council of Armament Reduction, which is international in its scope. It is a conservative estimate that the women working for world peace at Washington, before, during and since the recent international conference of the governments, directly represent ten million women of the United States. That means that ten million women throughout the country were members either of the various permanent organizations and clubs, which include peace among the things they stand for, or of the many emergency committees created for the sole purpose of stimulating public opinion for peace to support the Government.

The Joint Congressional Committee alone represents nearly seven million organized women. In the case of either the seven or the ten million the number must be greatly increased to include all the women indirectly represented, those who want the things the organizations are working for but who fail to participate or cooperate through membership in their local bodies. There is also in Washington the Woman's Party under the leadership of Alice Paul. It works alone, not because it is opposed to what the others are doing, but because its policy is to drive at only one thing at a time and without formal alliances with other groups. Its present campaign is to do away with discriminations against women in the laws of the separate states.

The Joint Congressional Committee, as such, indorses no measure whatever. It acts

(Continued on Page 95)

MRS. MAUD WOOD PARK

Get This Quality Mirro Pan Today!

You can obtain this regular $1.45 Mirro Aluminum 3-Quart Convex Sauce Pan, complete with cover, for only 89c,* if you act quickly.

This is an introductory offer, to acquaint you with the beauty, convenience, and durability of Mirro Aluminum cooking utensils. We know once you use a Mirro utensil you will never use any other kind.

Mirro ware is heavy and durable. Its price is moderate. Every woman can afford Mirro utensils because of their economy in first cost and long service.

Compare any Mirro utensil with a similar article of any other make. Compare the thickness and hardness of the metal, the beauty of design and finish, the many features of convenience, and the low price.

The low price of Mirro ware is possible because of volume production and latest improved manufacturing methods.

Go to your dealer today and get your pan at the special 89c price.* If it happens he is out of stock, ask him to order one for you, or send $1 (89c for pan and 11c for postage and packing) direct to factory.

*Special Price in extreme South and West, 98c, regularly $1.60

Aluminum Goods Manufacturing Company

General Offices: Manitowoc, Wis., U. S. A.
Makers of Everything in Aluminum

Every Mirro Utensil Bears This Imprint

MIRRO ALUMINUM
Reflects Good Housekeeping

Here are the eight special features of this Mirro 3-Quart Convex Sauce Pan:

- 1 Cool, smooth, hollow-steel handle with thumb-grip for easier, safer handling. Eye for hanging
- 2 Tightly rolled, sanitary bead, free from dirt-catching crevices
- 3 Inset cover prevents boiling over—conserves heat
- 4 The bead of cover is upturned, and thus protects against steam and liquid
- 5 Rivetless, no burn, ebony knob—always cool
- 6 Convex sides prevent contents from pouring off when liquid is drained
- 7 Beautiful Mirro finish; rich, lustrous, silvery
- 8 Famous Mirro trademark stamped into the bottom of every piece. Your guarantee of excellence throughout

"DEPENDABILITY PLUS"

In an unpretentious office in one of the greatest manufacturing plants in the world, there sits a quiet, elderly man who is known to every one, from the president to the smallest office boy, as "Dependability Plus."

For forty years he has been in the employ of this company. There is not a question concerning the business that he cannot answer better than any one else. He is responsible for more than half the improvements in their product; he tests and approves every change in their methods. His achievements have won him world-wide fame.

Yet, if you ask him, he will tell you that his greatest pride is in the affectionate, respectful name by which he is known to all, "Dependability Plus."

For every man who is voluntarily dependable, there are a hundred dependable only through force of circumstance. Placed in positions where dependability is a requirement, it becomes with them a forced virtue—a feeble flame that needs the constant fanning of necessity.

Voluntary dependability is a quality of the spirit. It may characterize a business as well as a man or a woman. When it does you will find the name of that business honored and respected wherever it is heard. And you will find its products of a quality that is rarely equaled.

In the manufacture of pharmaceutical and chemical products Squibb holds such a place. Squibb quality in the products described below is a revelation to persons who use them for the first time.

Squibb's Castor Oil, for example, is not the offensive, unpleasant cathartic that is taken under protest by so many people. By careful refining and purifying, the Squibb product is almost entirely freed from the detested taste and is of greater medicinal value as well.

This same thing holds true with other Squibb HOUSEHOLD PRODUCTS. At the Squibb Laboratories, for more than half a century, a constant process of testing and research work has raised the purity and efficacy of all Squibb products to a point that never has been reached before.

There is no reason why you should be satisfied with quality that is inferior to Squibb. But there are a score of reasons why you should prefer Squibb quality above any other.

Squibb's Bicarbonate of Soda—exceedingly pure, therefore without bitter taste.

Squibb's Epsom Salt—free from impurities. Preferred also for taste.

Squibb's Sodium Phosphate—a specially purified product, free from arsenic, therefore safe.

Squibb's Cod Liver Oil—selected finest Norwegian; cold pressed; pure in taste. Rich in vitamin.

Squibb's Olive Oil—selected oil from Southern France. Absolutely pure. (Sold only through druggists.)

Squibb's Sugar of Milk—specially refined for preparing infants' food. Quickly soluble. In sealed tins.

Squibb's Boric Acid—pure and perfectly soluble. Soft powder for dusting; granular form for solutions.

Squibb's Castor Oil—specially refined, bland in taste; dependable.

Squibb's Stearate of Zinc—a soft and protective powder of highest purity.

Squibb's Magnesia Dental Cream—made from Squibb's Milk of Magnesia. Contains no detrimental substance. Corrects mouth acidity.

Squibb's Talcum Powder—a delightfully soft and soothing powder. Boudoir, Carnation, Violet and Unscented.

Squibb's Cold Cream—an exquisite preparation of correct composition for the care of the skin.

Squibb's Pure Spices—specially selected by laboratory tests for their full strength and flavor. (Sold only through druggists.)

Sold by reliable druggists everywhere, in original sealed packages.
"The Priceless Ingredient" of every product is the honor and integrity of its maker.

SQUIBB

General Offices: 80 Beekman Street, New York City

Laboratories: Brooklyn, N. Y.; New Brunswick, N. J.

Copyright 1922, E. R. Squibb & Sons

The Most Powerful Lobby in Washington

(Continued from Page 93)

as a clearing house for all the constituent organizations so that there may be no needless overlapping or duplication and consequent waste of effort. Just enough overlapping is allowed to prevent gaps and neglect of a vital place in any activity. The women have provided against such accidents far more skillfully and effectively than the men at the heads of departments and bureaus in the national government. Mrs. Arthur C. Watkins is executive secretary of this committee.

When, on occasion, the women organizations see that it is necessary to act unanimously on any measure, as was the case in the Maternity Bill fight, they put into action the most powerful lobby that has ever operated on the American Congress.

The subcommittee—under the chairmanship of Mrs. Yost, of the W. C. T. U., and with the daily aid of Mrs. Park, president of the National League of Women Voters—which had charge of the maternity fight held more than one hundred sessions. The work of checking up on five hundred and thirty-one members of Congress was the daily task of this committee. Hours were spent in studying the attitude of individual senators and representatives. Records of all their votes and speeches on former progressive and welfare legislation were charted and on the table of the committee for its guidance. Every member of that committee had her allotment of congressmen to see. In doubtful cases several women saw the same men and then compared notes as to denials or promises and half promises received.

There were interviews at the rate of fifty a day in the last week of the fight. By order of the subcommittee at Washington the local organizations in the home districts flooded Washington with letters and telegrams to their representatives. Delegations were brought on from the various states to make their pleas in the Senate and House office buildings. Similar pressure was brought to bear upon President Harding.

And so, after repeated attempts in both branches of Congress to let that Sheppard-Towner Bill die of neglect or delay or evasion, after the most violent opposition, it was passed in the Senate by a vote of 63 to 7; in the House by 279 to 39.

Senator Kenyon told me that if the members could have voted on that measure secretly in their cloak rooms it would have been killed as emphatically as it was finally passed in the open under the pressure of the Joint Congressional Committee of Women.

Other Victories

THERE have been various other victories, which the women rate as partial and which leave much to be done; and the women are doing it.

The case of the United States Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board is an illustration. This board, created as a war necessity, had become an effective agency in the fight against venereal disease. It had four main activities. One depended on Federal funds allotted to state health boards for medical measures. Another provided for the installation of departments of hygiene in educational institutions. A third was the establishment of laboratories in medical schools to develop better measures of treatment. And the fourth was to work among the men of the United States Army and Navy. Congress prepared to abolish the whole thing as a measure of economy, despite the fact that this one item of venereal disease had cost the United States Army alone $15,000,000 in 1920, not counting the time of men lost on hospital leave.

The organizations of the women took up that fight, this time led by Dr. Valeria Parker, chairman of the Social Hygiene Committee of the League of Women Voters and of the Social Morality Committee of the Women's Christian Temperance Union. She won to this extent: Congress appropriated enough to carry on for the present fiscal year the work among the soldiers and sailors. Whereupon Surgeon-General Ireland, of the Army, immediately appointed Doctor Parker as executive head of the government board to administer the fund and direct the work. Her appointment was not primarily because she had saved the work from extinction at the hands of Congress but, in the opinion of Surgeon-General Ireland, because she was considered the most efficient person in the United States for the job.

Eight social hygiene experts were nominated for the place, all of them men with the exception of Doctor Parker.

Another illustration of much wider relevancy is that of the fight of the women to get legislation for control of the meat packers, a matter, they say, which has a direct bearing on the kitchens and the household accounts of every home in the land. In that the women "both won a victory and suffered a reverse," according to the report of Mrs. E. P. Costigan, chairman of the standing committee on food supply and demand in the Voters' League and also of the Consumers' League.

What Admission of a Reverse Means

"THE victory," says Mrs. Costigan, "is in the fact that a bill for government regulation of the packers has passed, and the principle has been established that large organizations which control the necessities of life are charged with public use and therefore can and should be regulated. The reverse we have suffered is in the fact that in its present form the law removes the packers from the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission, and this commission can make no investigation of any business engaged in by the packers which relates to livestock or livestock products unless requested to do so by the Secretary of Agriculture."

For these Washington women to admit that they had a reverse is merely another way of saying that they are going to continue the fight.

In the packer fight Mrs. Costigan had back of her not only the organized women but the granges, the National Board of Farm Organizations, various state farmers' unions, the National Milk Producers' Federation, the railroad brotherhoods and several other associations of men; but she held the leadership for the entire group.

A member of the Senate told me that if he were President of the United States he would surely have Mrs. Costigan in his Cabinet. It may be said, in passing, that there is no office in this country—from the Presidency down—which these politically informed and humanitarian women do not expect to see filled eventually by women as often as by men. They do not except even the State Department or diplomacy. They are equally sure that no English government would care to say that an American woman ambassador to the Court of St. James was persona non grata because of her sex.

Suppose Mrs. Costigan should be in some future Cabinet as Secretary of Agriculture, for example. A very definite idea of what her policy would be in that office may be obtained from her program for the present year as chairman of the Committee on Food Supply of the National League of Women Voters. The program is of more immediate significance, however, as indicating some of the things which the women will demand of Congress next fall, and also as indicating the direct relationship of all their work to the home.

(Continued on Page 96)

From a drawing by J. Henry Brasher © ARCO 1922

You want your new house warmed, not heated

THERE are two kinds of homes, you know.

The homes where some rooms are heated, and some rooms are cold. And the homes where every room is evenly warmed.

Homes of the second sort are usually warmed by the boilers and radiators of this Company, CORTO RADIATORS and the IDEAL TYPE A HEAT MACHINE, if the home is large; American Radiators and ARCOLA if the home is small.

And this better warmth is really a gift—for the products of this Company are designed to pay for themselves in the fuel they save.

AMERICAN RADIATOR COMPANY

Makers of the famous IDEAL Boilers and AMERICAN Radiators

Dept. 32 — 104 West 42nd St., New York Dept. 32 — 816 So. Michigan Ave., Chicago

Send for this free book. If you are planning to build or remodel, this free book is the first piece of literature to send for. It gives ten secrets for saving coal. It tells why florists insist on hot-water warmth in their green-houses; and why the warmth that is best for flowers is best for families, too.

American Radiator Company,
Dept. 32, New York or Chicago.

Without obligation, send me by mail your free booklet,
"BETTER WARMTH AND BETTER HEALTH."

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____

Better Warmth
and Better Health

What you can do with HEBE

THINK of the convenience of a cooking liquid that can be used in almost everything you cook! And every time you use it means finer flavor and added nourishment!

HEBE is just such a convenience. It moistens, shortens and enriches—puts new life into old favorites and adds zest to the less expensive cuts of meat and to vegetables. The happy housewife who keeps HEBE on hand and uses it daily for every meal never needs to puzzle over something different to stimulate the lagging family appetite.

You will always get splendid results from HEBE and the economy is really worth while. HEBE is a wholesome, well-balanced food—pure skimmed milk evaporated to double strength enriched with vegetable fat.

Order several cans of HEBE from your grocer and write for the free HEBE book of recipes. You will find it filled with welcome suggestions. Address 2401 Consumers Bldg., Chicago.

THE HEBE COMPANY

Chicago

New York

Seattle

Try HEBE for Soups
Corn Chowder
Fish Cakes
Chicken à la King
Salad Dressings
Cakes
Cottage Pudding with Custard Sauce
Tapioca Pudding

The Most Powerful Lobby in Washington

(Continued from Page 95)

In the first place, Mrs. Costigan's committee states as its belief:

That the high cost of living is in large measure caused by unorganized and wasteful methods in the distribution and use of food;

That the unfair manipulation and private control, by large food organizations and combinations, of markets and the facilities for trade and distribution are discouraging production and increasing prices to consumers;

That open price associations, recently condemned by the United States Supreme Court, have resulted in detrimental practices, are preventing the natural decline in prices to normal competitive levels, and are thereby adding to the consumer's burdens; and

That our nation is morally obligated to make it possible for nourishing food to be brought and kept within reach of every home and especially all growing children.

Because of these beliefs the committee recommends four specific things, as follows:

1. The support of Federal legislation removing all legal restrictions which hamper the effectiveness of cooperative associations organized and conducted in accordance with Rochdale principles.

2. The enactment by Congress of a law in aid of local markets, giving such markets the benefits of scientific information, government inspection, certification of products, and the use of railroad terminal facilities.

3. The support of legislation giving enlarged appropriations for vocational education in home economics.

4. That the Government be urged to take the necessary steps to increase the production of nitrates and other necessary chemical elements needed in agriculture, by the completion and utilization of plants in process of construction.

The schedule also includes many supplementary activities to be taken up within the separate states.

What a long way such a program formulated by women for women seems from the tea-table study of Pippa Passes and The Ring and the Book, from the infancy days of rights and the period when working for welfare of the home centered on preventing the drunkard from beating his wife and selling the baby's cradle for more rum.

Clear, Concise and Earnest

TO WIN these victories and partial victories in Congress, only a few of which have been indicated, the women neither promise anything nor threaten anything. They do not invite the country's lawmakers out to tea or dinner. Neither do they cajole or flatter or flirt. They have nothing to say in the privacy of the senator's office which they do not declare to all the world at the public hearing.

"The clearness, conciseness and earnestness with which women present their case are remarkable," says Borah. "They have a real appreciation of the value of a man's time and therein differ from the men lobbyists. Women say what is relevant; they put their argument and then go away. Men who want this or that bill supported hang around and try to act like good fellows. They don't know when to go."

There is another difference, much more fundamental, between men and women lobbyists and their ways. It is this: Men who go to Washington—the perfectly straight, decent and honest ones—go there to advocate legislation in behalf of some interest which concerns them personally or which they are paid to represent; something in the way of banking, trade or manufacturing. The causes advocated by the organizations of women are, on the other hand, never personal but always general and national in their scope, and always concerned directly with the welfare of homes and schools and health.

This is no reflection on the men; for, as a member of the Senate put it, the men do the banking and the manufacturing and the women do not. The men always have thought it necessary to come here to further their special business interests.

It is only very recently that the women have become so thoroughly organized to work here for the things that are humanitarian.

By their study and tact and intelligence they have created a new profession among American women, an entirely new calling.

They are the super welfare workers of the country—of the world. Here is a partial Washington roll call—Mrs. Yost, Mrs. Park, Ethel Smith, Mrs. Watkins, Emma Wold, Mrs. George T. Odell, Lida Hofford, Mrs. Raymond Morgan, Mrs. Alexander Wolf, Mrs. Minnie Fisher Cunningham, Julia Emory and Mrs. Costigan.

To this list could be added many more who are working as the leaders of their organizations in states and towns and villages, the training places of those who finally get to Washington.

There is a calling to which no flapper need aspire. Or as Mrs. Morgan, of the University Women, puts it: "There is no room among them for a soldier of fortune who is out for a lark or an adventure." Brains, tact, intelligence and dignity are the absolutely required qualifications. Without them wealth is no help and with them wealth is no hindrance. Women who have fortunes give of their money as of their time and strength. Women with no money live lives of sacrifice that they may lead in the causes in which they believe. There is no more democratic or rationally patriotic element in the American population than that of these great organizations of women.

And Then—the Right Congresswomen

PLUS the brain and the tact, there must be hard work and hard study; years of both. There is no woman leader in Washington watching and doing her part to mold national legislation who has not served her apprenticeship in the community affairs of her own city or village and who has not carried on her training and ripened her experience at the capital city of her state before her fellow workers deemed her fit to represent them at the national capital.

And promotion to Washington means only harder work, more responsibility and greater anxiety. No leader of the Senate or House, no chairman of a great committee of Congress studies the legislation in his keeping more faithfully and thoroughly than the woman at the head of the committee to which that same piece of legislation has been referred as a measure that must be opposed or advocated.

Incidentally, although it is not mentioned by them, perhaps not thought of by them as part of the required equipment, these women all have charm, feminine charm. If by any chance Nature has cheated any one of them out of something in the way of color or features or wave of hair, the intensity of their interest in things that count has made up for it with the life and expression in their eyes. Also they know when to laugh. But the charm is not consciously used as a tool of the profession. Sex is not a factor tolerated by the women who go to demand things in the name of their citizenship and in the name of humanity.

Why are these women here? Why are they not content, as the men of the country seem to be, to let their elected representatives in Congress go their own way without outside prodding or support? It is because of a firm conviction of the women that men, if left to themselves, not only will not but cannot adequately represent them. They cannot divest themselves of the notion that women are better represented by women than by men in all matters that have to do with the relationship between lawmaking and the home. They agree with men that representatives best qualified should be chosen regardless of sex. They would rather be represented by wise men than by foolish women.

Advocates of the Maternity Bill, for example, take no pride in the one woman now in Congress. But nevertheless the women are becoming more sure every day that men don't know so well as women know what is best for the humanitarian side of national life. "We have reached the point," said the legislative leader of one of the women organizations, "when we must divert some of the energy now exerted on influencing men in Congress to the task of selecting the right sort of women for membership in the Congress."

It is among the probabilities that this next phase will have its beginning this year.

IVORY Pyralin

A WOMAN'S dressing table is a true reflection of her personality. In daintiness, charm and good taste, nothing could be more thoroughly appropriate than Pyralin toiletware. Made to give life-long service—in every necessary article from mirror to jewel-box; exquisitely decorated if desired, to harmonize with any color scheme.

E. I. DU PONT DE NEMOURS & CO., INC.
Pyralin Department
WILMINGTON, DEL.

You will find the name "Pyralin" stamped on every article.

THE illustration shows that universal favorite—the DuBarry pattern in Ivory Pyralin, made also in Shell Pyralin and Amber Pyralin. Sets can be acquired piece by piece if desired, as all Pyralin toiletware is sold at leading stores everywhere in standard patterns, easy to match at any time.

Bon Ami

for Windows

Principal uses of Bon Ami

—for cleaning and polishing

Bathtubs	Windows
Fine Kitchen Utensils	Mirrors
White Woodwork	Tiling
Aluminum Ware	White Shoes
Brass, Copper and	The Hands
Nickel Ware	Linoleum and
Glass Baking Dishes	Congoleum

Crystal Clear—

Wouldn't you like windows as spotless as mine?

It's easy—with Bon Ami. Just spread the thin, watery lather over the glass—in a minute it dries to a soft, light, powdery film. Then—a few whisks with a soft cloth, and—

Straightway the window shines forth in crystal transparency. Never a smear, nor a trace of cloudiness.

Read the list of principal uses above.

"Hasn't Scratched
Yet"

Cake or Powder
whichever you prefer

THE BON AMI COMPANY, NEW YORK

Creating Color Schemes

The Fourth Article on the Complete Furnishing of the Little House

THERE is nothing in the whole problem of furnishing the house so completely fascinating as the matter of choosing and combining the colors that may make it a wholly individual, satisfying and beautiful home. For with the right use of color any home may be charming, no matter how limited the other factors may be; but with the wrong use of it, unfortunately, the most carefully chosen furniture, the most promising rugs, curtains, upholsteries and ornaments, may be quite ruined in their effect.

The correct use of color in the home has been greatly simplified by the modern insistence upon neutral walls and floors as a kindly background for the exploiting of color harmonies, whether these be subtly or extravagantly planned, for all color effects are more safely successful against neutral tones than they are against other colors, or against self tones that are either paler or deeper than themselves. Place varying notes of rose against ivory and you will have something much finer than if you had placed them against pink; put your glorious yellows and leaf greens against pale gray rather than against lurid blue or brown if you are striving for beauty; and against misty gray also may curtains of flaming orange be for some of you a possible achievement when more positive walls would render them horrors indeed. Isolate your quaint blue stuffs, your blue furniture, your blue dishes, against cream, rather than against the bluest of walls. So you will achieve a faint foretaste of the joyful result a more thorough study of color will give you.

If the course in color that is given in some of the art schools could be lifted bodily into every general school in the land, that every young person's color sense could be properly educated, an enormous measure of pleasure and profit would result. For everyone should know why certain colors go together, and what should be done to make them go, if they don't; everyone should know how to be daring in his or her color schemes without being crude, and how to achieve subtle effects without tameness; people should be taught to appreciate color as they do music, and they should learn to tell off color harmonies with the same ease with which they play Chopin and Mozart. But they should not expect to master color without the study and practice that are required to become proficient in anything else.

The Meaning of Colors

EVERY school child is at least taught the primary and secondary colors that are to be found in the rainbow, or the glass prism that may project these same colors onto the wall. The primary colors are red, yellow and blue; the secondary colors are green, orange and purple. The primary colors in their pure, unmixed strength are the most positive colors there are, and yet all three mixed together in the proper proportion make neutral gray, which is important to remember, for often you will need to know what a color requires to make it less bright and crude or, on the other hand, more brilliant. The secondary colors are obtained by mixing together any two of the primary colors—yellow and blue mixed together make green; yellow and red make orange; red and blue make purple. Each secondary color is called the complement of the primary color that is left out of its make-up; red is the complement of green, or vice versa; orange is the complement of blue; and blue and orange are complements of each other. Always to make a color purer or more neutral, add some proportion of its complement to it; and if you thoroughly master this rule, even in the hunting of a certain drapery fabric or wall paper, you will be aided in stating your desires and in knowing what is the matter with a material that is too bright or not bright enough. Colors that are not stridently green, orange and purple, but which seem softer and older and sometimes distinctly more decorative than these secondary color mixings, are called tertiary colors, the third degree in the mixing of color, so named because some part of all three primary colors enters into their composition. Peacock, old rose, amber, mauve, jade, brown, tan, gray, as well as many others, may be called tertiary colors.

Colors have meanings, which you disregard at your peril, and this is another step forward in the study of color. Red is the brilliant color of blood and fire; it is life-giving, vital and warm, and, used wrongly, it is aggressive and irritating. Yellow is the color of happiness, the light-giving color, and signifies light, life, cheer and happiness; but used wrongly in too large quantities, it is blinding and oppressive. Blue is a color befitting kings; it may be formal and dignified, and the most decorative color we have; it is cool, peaceful, pure and restrained; used unwisely, it is discordant, and entirely unrelated to other color harmonies. In figuring out the meanings of the secondary and tertiary colors, one usually combines the meanings of the colors that produce the color under consideration. Green typifies coolness and light, restraint and cheer, since it is a mixture of yellow and blue; orange typifies light and heat, brilliance and happiness, because it is formed of yellow and red. Purple is a color of mystery, since it is hot and cold, life-giving and quietly dignified, a royal color as well as a twilight color.

By ETHEL CARPENTER

The meanings of colors must be known and recognized, so that the exposures of various rooms may be dealt with properly, the needs of certain personalities fulfilled.

North, northeast and east rooms require the predominant use of tones from the warmer side of the spectrum; south, southwest and west rooms that of the cooler tones. Of equal importance, however, is the matter of your disposition. If you are despondent and inclined to be morbid, you require plenty of happy, cheery yellow; if you are unambitious or phlegmatic, you require the tonic notes of brilliant red; if you are impulsive, nervous, inclined to be irritable or excitable, you should calm yourself with blue. If you are overworked and weary, envelop your tired nerves in restful leaf green. If you are lacking in purpose and a bit lazy, try some glorious orange color in your room as a spur to endeavor. And if you are perturbed in spirit, perplexed, upset, steady and calm yourself with quieting stretches of wistaria, mauve or heliotrope. Rose color, unlike its parent, red, is the color of joy, and ranks with yellow in its happiness and cheer, having, however, a somewhat more tender quality of appeal.

Neutral colors always may lean or tend toward one of the positive primary or secondary colors. A gray may be cool or warm, as may be a cream or tan, or any of the other neutral tones. Of course, there is a mid-point where the tone seems to be normal, and this point is to be advised unless you are actually striving for a certain warmth or coolness. For instance, neutral pale gray has rose, yellow and blue in sufficient quantities to equalize each other, but if it had an ever so little extra amount of rose it would be called a pinkish and warm gray; if it had a bit more of yellow than the other colors it would be a yellowish gray, also warm, but more translucent and less muggy than the pinkish gray; if it leaned ever so slightly to blue, the gray would be bluish and cold. Thus might we analyze any of the neutral tones that are being continually advised for backgrounds: ivory, cream, putty, tan, and so on.

Exposures Must be Considered

WITH certain well-marked exceptions, you should use in the room with the north or east exposure a background that is tinged by a color from the warmer side of the spectrum, which will result in a warm ivory, cream, putty or tan. The exceptions are when such quantities of the stronger warm colors, such as rose and yellow, are used in hangings and upholsteries, and so forth, that you can risk a cooler tint for the walls. These principles, reversed, apply to southern and western exposures, where cool tints should be used for the backgrounds, such as pale gray, grayish cream, cool ivory, gray putty, grayish tan. Also such cool colors as blues, mauves and greens should predominate in the entire color scheme, though, as in the case of the cold exposures, these proper colors may be used in such sufficiency that a warmer tint may be used for backgrounds, if you prefer.

If you should be struggling with a cold exposure which calls for warm colors and at the same time your temperament requires cold colors, what shall you do? If you are meditating retiring into your own particular little iceberg, which is what your north room will be after you have done it in blue, and freezing there, when you have really pondered the previous paragraph, you will see that this is quite unnecessary. If you love rose color, and your bedroom has a northern exposure, and yet you should be refreshed by the calming effect of blue, the walls might be warm ivory or putty, with woodwork exactly matching this; on the walnut brown floor you may lay a rug in blue and putty color, with enough rose color to prepare for the rest of the scheme; at the windows there may be a cotton cretonne, showing clear notes of rose and clear notes of blue; the chair upholstery should be in old blue, or the furniture painted in it; on the bed there might be a rose taffeta spread, and the lampshades may be rose colored. You see, there is in this scheme plenty of blue to act as an "influence," and yet there is enough warm color to counteract the northern exposure.

Following this same principle, a room with a southern exposure may have delightful notes of warm color if surrounded by sufficient areas of coolness.

In the old acceptance of the term, a room should never be done in one color. A red, yellow or blue room—walls, floor, upholstery, accents, everything of this one chosen color—would be worse than deadly, and yet most of you can remember when such rooms were used. With a room of each color in the house, the bare walking from one to the other was a shock to the nervous system as well as to the maligned artistic sense. A modern one-color room may be all the more beautiful for the restraint in which that one color is used. For a blue dining room, I see cream walls and ivory woodwork and a dark polished floor. I see furniture of that flat brown of American walnut that goes so preeminently well with blue, furniture of the simple and dignified lines of the William and Mary style; a dull blue-and-black rug gives distinction to the floor. The seats of the chairs should be upholstered in blue horsehair, lined in gold; the curtains could be of cream-grounded cretonne straggled over with Japanese chrysanthemums in blue, with blue foliage trailing after them. I can see china of that Canton ware, but the ornaments used in this blue room should be for the most part in other colors, some orange luster, some old yellow pottery, some brassware and pewter, a peacock bowl filled with yellow tea roses or golden freesias.

The One-Color Schemes

PERHAPS we see more intensely blue rooms to-day than we do rooms done in any other one color, because blue has a strange way of causing people who love it to saturate the very air they breathe with blue, whereas blue can be appreciated wholly only when an atom of entirely different color is near by to intensify its serene beauty. As a separate color, blue is the most decorative one we have, for in its combination with other colors, or isolated against a neutral background, it stands bravely fine and beautiful, as though conscious of a supreme strength of character. Use some blue in every room you have—old flat blues, sapphire blues, peacock blues, king's blue, midnight blue, china blue and the glorious Chinese blue that symbolizes purity.

Red should never be used in any great quantity if we value our peace of soul. Red is a cheering leaven that will vitally bring out the point and strength of many carefully planned schemes. There are certain things that are particularly suitable clothed in red, when they act as the last word in beauty in just the right room: Flowers—dahlias, orange red or dark garnet; stiff little zinnias, blending their many reds into a flaming glow in a copper pot; nasturtiums; bittersweet. Books in rows on shelves, bright red, dark red, dusky magenta, brilliant scarlet leather lettered in gold; red lacquered boxes; the red in fine cretonnes and linens, the red of brocades; the subtle rose red of curtain and lampshade; the occasional piece of furniture in Chinese red; the kochi red china.

The term red embraces many tones besides the rich crimson or scarlet we usually think of as red. There are the copper reds, the orange reds, the rust reds, henna, Chinese reds, cerise, magenta, red mulberry, rose red, American beauty, cherry rose.

Red in some of its modern blendings may be used in any room where it will improve the color effect; it may be used in any season, for there are reds which, combined with white, are as cool as summer itself. A red dining room that

(Continued on Page 102)

Dresses you have never dared attempt you can now make like a professional

A year ago you would have laughed at the idea of re-creating a Paris gown at home—today you can calmly do it

Butterick Design 3651. The bateau neck, the spring version of the moyen-age waist, and the new fabric trimming, lend fresh interest to the simple frock.

DRESS after dress a triumphant success.

This is the experience thousands of women who sew at home are having now.

Now you can know the joy of starting to sew, certain that your dress will turn out a success. You can give it the style, the lines, the perfection of finish of an expensive imported frock.

With the Deltor, now included in every new Butterick pattern, home sewing becomes for you an entirely new thing. The Deltor enables you to re-create an imported dress as perfectly as a professional.

It gives to you the skilled economy in cutting of an expert, the deft putting together of a great dress-maker, the clever finish that spells Paris.

First of all you have a list of just what fashionable materials are best suited to the pattern you have bought, so that you choose your material like an expert. The lines of a pattern cut for a cloth like Kasha may not look right in a material like the fashionable canton crepe, because of the greater softness of the goods.

Then when you start to cut, the Deltor gives you a picture of the pattern in your size laid out on the width material you are using. For the first time you are assured of getting a cutting layout that exactly fits your case. The Deltor gives you pictures of the pattern in every size laid on every width of suitable material.

You just select the picture of your size laid on your width material, pin and cut accordingly. You will find you have cut your frock out of from $\frac{1}{4}$ to $1\frac{3}{8}$ yards less material than you ever used before and saved money and time.

Your dress goes together so easily! A glance tells you just where and how everything goes—no puzzling over where to begin gathering, or start taking in

An individual cutting chart—for your size and your width material

When the designer has made the pattern, men who specialize only in cutting make your Deltor cutting layouts. Not one person in a thousand, however talented, has their skill and experience. You make it your own when you use the Deltor cutting layout. Each Deltor shows a separate layout for every size the pattern comes in, laid on every suitable width of material. You just select your size laid on your width—and go ahead. You will find your new way of cutting saves you from $\frac{1}{4}$ to $1\frac{3}{8}$ yards of material.

"I bought my material first, then when I got my pattern with the Deltor I had $1\frac{3}{8}$ of a yard more material than I needed if I followed the Deltor cutting layout. Fortunately, I was able to return my piece of goods and get the smaller amount, so I saved \$7.50 as my material cost \$5.50 a yard."

So now Butterick patterns specify only enough material to cut the economical Deltor way.

The exact lines of the original model

This modern version of the long moyen-age waist is characteristic of the spring frocks. To keep it slim, yet have that necessary and subtle fullness, might be a pretty problem even for a professional. But, no matter how inexperienced in sewing you are, the Deltor shows you how you can easily handle it just as an expert would.

If you follow the Deltor exactly you are amazed how simply it all goes and how successfully it turns out.

With the Deltor you will find you can make clothes you never dared attempt before.

The professional finish that "makes" a dress

When the great couturier came to the finishing of the model after which this pattern was cut, he selected one of the new fabric trimmings.

No matter how new a method of finishing is, if your frock calls for it, the Deltor shows you exactly how to make and apply it. It is all there for you in pictures and clear directions.

Your frock when done has that intangible something that implies the hand of a master.

500 Designs for the new Spring Season—BUTTERICK a dart—the Deltor puts it there before your eyes in graphic and accurate pictures.

One enthusiastic woman writes, “I am not a very experienced sewer—I bought a dress pattern with the Deltor. I never imagined sewing was so easy. The dress turned out perfect. Now I am going to make another for myself.”

You know how women sewing at home have despaired of ever being able to give a professional finish to their work. Every method of finishing and trimming that made the model you selected so charming, is carefully described in the Deltor. You just follow along, stitch by stitch, and suddenly there is your dress finished, professional in its perfection.

Every bit of the Deltor applies specifically to just that garment on which you are working. It is really a complete, illustrated dressmaking course for that particular garment.

That is why, just as Butterick's fashion service has always been the most complete in the world, now the Deltor dressmaking service is so complete, that with it you sew into your dress all the lines of the original model, the very spirit of the Rue de la Paix, that fashion center of the world.

When you buy a Butterick pattern you will find its Deltor in the envelope. Every new Butterick pattern (30c to 50c) now gives you this complete service. It is the greatest dressmaking help to women since the paper pattern itself.

Butterick, New York, Paris, London.

You save $\frac{1}{4}$ to $1\frac{3}{8}$ yards—multiply that by the price per yard and see how much money you save

New York dressmakers, without the Deltor cutting layout, have tried again and again to get the pattern out of the amount of material specified on the pattern envelope. Time and again they have failed.

With the Deltor cutting layout before her, an inexperienced girl pinned and cut the pattern in seven minutes.

When the designer has made the pattern, men trained by years of experience, who specialize in cutting, make the Deltor cutting layouts. Not one person in a thousand, however talented, can cut as economically. Their expert experience, their careful planning, their skill, become yours with the Deltor. Gone is all the old time fussing, and trying the pieces, first one way and then another, to be sure you were not wasting goods. The quickest, most economical way is there, charted for you. With the Deltor you cut even more cleverly than ever before.

There is a Deltor cutting layout for every size of the pattern on every width of appropriate material. No other pattern gives you this. Select the one made for your size and your width material and you will save from $\frac{1}{4}$ to $1\frac{3}{8}$ yards of material and time and money.

Nowadays all Butterick Patterns specify only just enough material for you to cut by the economical Deltor charts.

Butterick Designs 3649 and 3602. Two things say at a glance this costume is new. The cape to which the Parisienne clings even when spring has come to the Bois, with its great flower-like ornaments, and the exaggeratedly low waist-line effect.

Swiftly, easily, you re-create the lines and grace of the original model

What to do first, what next, is all important in putting together a dress if its lines are to be really perfect.

A professional knows instantly how each dress demands to be put together. This expert's decision for your dress and the exact way in which he carries it out is what the Deltor gives you. You know just what pieces to put together first, at what point setting in the sleeve will be simplest and most successful—it is all in pictures before you.

This frock, for example, is so exquisitely simple that even whether you turn in the tabs before or after sewing on the skirt, makes a difference in its lines. The Deltor tells you just how to put it together correctly, step by step. You just follow along stitch by stitch, and sew into your dress the very lines of the original.

You “finish” your frock as cleverly as an expert

No one in the world is as clever at finishing and trimming as the French. This ability is yours when you use the Deltor. If your costume is the type on which Paris is using one of the entrancing ribbon devices that are so stylish this spring, the Deltor tells you exactly how to make it, shows you in pictures any unusual twist. You can trim and finish your dress as modishly as though it were imported.

When your frock is done, no wonder no one believes you made it yourself—there is the atmosphere of an atelier about it.

"Yes, It's Genuine Jap-a-lac, I've Used It for 25 Years"

"See how smoothly and evenly it flows on. Isn't that a fine new color? And it lasts, too. Some day you'll be using Jap-a-lac."

And so Jap-a-lac has become a household necessity. One generation after another has come to depend upon Jap-a-lac Household Finishes for the renewing of all worn surfaces about the home.

Old pieces of furniture are given many more years of life—and money is saved. Floors are protected against wear and tear. Woodwork is made new easily and quickly—and more money is saved. Jap-a-lac thriftiness is spread around the house adding beauty and utility wherever it is applied. Jap-a-lac usefulness has become universal. Because of this universal demand dealers everywhere sell Jap-a-lac. Be sure to ask for genuine Jap-a-lac.

JAPALAC WITH GENUINE JAP-A-LAC

HOUSEHOLD FINISHES

Creating Color Schemes

(Continued from Page 99)

isn't red, if I may be allowed this ambiguous statement, has ivory walls and woodwork, a built-in cupboard which shows, through its glass-paned door, an interior of Chinese red, with shelves set with pewter, iridescent amber glassware, porcelain in brown and écu, with a bowl or so of red kochi, a bit of peacock luster. The furniture itself is of rich putty color, banded in Indian red, a quiet, unnoticeable tone; the chairs are lacquered in this color, and the rug is of tan and black. Usually the few notes of red, echoing the fire on the hearth, are enough to supply one big room with cheer: the flaming red box or bowl, the few colorful books, the Chinese tea cart, the lampshade, the flaming red tassels on a brown velvet cushion, the orange-red fringe on the handsome Italian armchair.

And then we consider yellow. Too many people feel that only yellow goes with yellow, and that its place is strictly in the bedroom where monotonous yellow walls back curtains and bureau scarfs as yellow as themselves. But yellow is the color of sunlight, of gold. Under its name there are the buffs, the butter yellows, the ochres, mustard and orange, with many tones lying between. Yellow should be used in touches here and there, in inner curtains, in bowls, in table scarfs. There is nothing so delightful as spots of sunny yellow in the living room. Can you not see, against gray walls, printed linen curtains of gray and cream overlaid with a design of deep yellow? Set on a dark mustard, nearly brown carpet, the rich mahogany furniture upholstered in greenish stone blue enhanced the yellow of the curtains, the tawny lights of the carpet. And the tones of pure yellow in pillow and lampshade quite completed the scheme.

A north bedroom has been papered effectively in a sort of saffron cream, enhanced by curtains of pale yellow Japanese crepe, valanced with a deeper yellow crepe, striped in orange and black and tasseled in orange. Mahogany furniture and a gray rug seemed all as they should be, and there was further charm in a slat-backed chair lacquered in lemon yellow and an overstuffed chair upholstered in dull blue. The bed sported a yellow crepe counterpane; there were orange candles, blue pictures and a pot of golden flowers to catch the sunlight.

Color schemes can be created right out of your head. You begin with one general idea, such as a wall tone, plus the principal color you wish to predominate. You get first one thing and, in considering it and its effect, another is suggested. Midway of the plan, quite likely, you achieve a curtain, a pillow or a picture that combines a number of colors and blends with your scheme.

This is one of the most fascinating methods of working out a color scheme. Purposely search for a cretonne, a rug, a vase, a picture, and create beauty from it into your room. If there is a light background it should be duplicated for the walls, and possibly the woodwork. Perhaps the light tone will be found in a flower petal or the wing of a bird. The middle-toned colors should be used for the furniture and the big things, but you may be daring in your pure notes of joy that may be used in the room's accents, found in the most brilliant tones of the color harmony you are copying.

Furnishing the Small Apartment

(Continued from Page 35)

The cost of achieving the living room might be anywhere from $400.00 to $450.00, depending upon the person who was doing it. But I have found some very definitely wonderful pieces of furniture that might serve anyone for a nucleus: A desk of mahogany for $85.00, the like of which has not been seen since before the war—a desk beautifully finished, with claw feet, spacious, and of ample proportions as one wants in the average-sized room; a mahogany gate-leg table for $34.00, measuring 34 by 42 inches, with leaves extended, and which will cost $3.50 additional for painting; a wing chair for $38.50—a ridiculously low price—with a range of a number of nice coverings to choose from, but with a cost of $6.00 additional if covered to order, before sending home from the shop, with the 75-cent cretonne that is used for the curtains. Another delightful overstuffed chair, done in blue sateen or denim, for $40.00, though a slightly cheaper chair might be chosen for $33.00. A Windsor chair in real mahogany for $22.50, or, if one wanted to make a saving here, a painted Windsor porch chair for $15.00. The daybed is priced at the amazingly low sum of $62.00, in mahogany with cane insets; it has real box springs and can in every way hold up its head with the best of them. For those who happen to fancy this particular extravagance, an extra mattress may be added so that the bed may be made up with greater convenience at night for the overnight guest.

The bed proper may be painted blue to carry out the color scheme, and a flounce of the cretonne may be added.

A small tiptop table in mahogany finish may be purchased for $10.50, a little extra being added if the shop paints it; a wrought-iron lamp to stand on the floor may cost $12.50, if a plain but effective one with tripod feet be chosen, with $4.00 for a parchment shade; a taupe axminster rug in 9 by 12 size may be bought for $56.50; cretonne at 75 cents a yard for the windows, allowing about thirteen yards for two, totals $9.75, with any used on the daybed to be allowed extra. An attractive mirror may be found for from $25.00 to $35.00, or a picture might be substituted. If all the painting of the colored furniture is done at home, if the daybed is used as it comes from the shop, if one makes the lampshades and dyes the colored draw curtains, chooses a cheaper Windsor chair, and a second upholstered chair for $33.00, a mirror for $25.00, the most important things in this room may be purchased for $400.00.

The dining-room furniture may be bought in the suite, and may be had in walnut for $235.00, including buffet, extension dropleaf table measuring forty-eight inches, and with three additional extension leaves and five chairs. For $290.00 this suite may be had enameled in any desirable color to suit the individual taste. An attractive striped material has been chosen for the curtains, in peacock green, purplish blue, black and cream, and this has also been used for the chair seats. Its price is 75 cents a yard. The Colonial rag rug is made of woolen rags dyed the desired colors, and may be made at home at practically no expense if the rugs are begged from one's friends. An oval rush rug may take its place, costing about $35.00. The picture above the buffet costs $48.00, and is the sort of decorative still life that is being much used in dining rooms, but a mirror could take its place at less expense. Allowing $15.00 for the curtains and chair seats, the cost of this dining room is $388.00, but it can be done more economically by following some of the above suggestions.

At first, at any rate, one can do with a bureau and a double bed in the bedroom. Made of birch, this furniture is enameled in white with soft blue beadings and decorations, and is extremely low-priced at $48.00 for the double bed and $45.00 for the bureau, which includes the mirror. A box spring may be had for $25.00 or $35.00, a mattress for $25.00 or $35.00, both depending on quality, and feather pillows from $2.50 to $5.00 apiece. A night table will cost $10.50, a wicker chair $15.00, and twenty-three yards of cretonne at 75 cents, costing $17.25; glass curtains may be had out of ten yards of 25-cent white material, and a bedroom chair to match the suite may be found for $10.00. A small axminster rug may be found for $45.00, and at the lowest count this bedroom will cost $250.00.

Busy-Day Salad

Delicious, Fresh—and Rich in Vitamines

THINK of the possibilities, Madam, in this luscious salad that everybody likes.

An incomparable salad that's ready in five minutes, if you have oranges in the house.

Think of the convenience on busy days when you are pressed for time.

And think, too, of the healthful freshness it adds to any meal.

Rich in needed vitamines, those elements in food which all scientists agree are vital to real health.

What other single food does so much to simplify housekeeping? Do you know of any other that offers equal flavor or better benefits to health?

Make a Meal of It

YOU can make a meal of such a salad with crackers and a cup of tea—a dainty, time-saving lunch each day that you'll never tire of.

You don't tire of oranges. Their important salts and acids which are natural appetizers see to that.

Then, these salts and acids help to digest other foods, as well as add essential vitamines to the diet.

So whole meals are better for whole families when orange dishes are included.

Ask your physician if this food would beneficially reinforce your usual fare. Then serve more oranges or less, according to his advice.

Vitamines are Important

VITAMINES are important and too many meals furnish less than an adequate supply.

That is the opinion of scores of modern scientists who are now studying our foods.

These same men and women recognize oranges as one of the great carriers of these needed food elements.

And oranges supply them in fresh, delicious form—not as medicine, but as food.

Many years ago, long before science knew of "vitamines," an English law was passed forcing all ships to carry lemon juice. That was to insure against lack of certain food necessities in the sailors' meals—now known to be vitamines.

Does this not suggest to you the need of more fresh fruit with your repasts?

Learn more about vitamines. We'll send a free booklet that tells more about them to anyone who requests it. Ask for your copy now.

Delicious—Attractive

It is called "New York Salad." Made with orange sections on pineapple and lettuce, garnished with dressing and cheese sticks.

Salad and Dessert in One

An old standby that millions of people like—simple and delicious. Simply cut up some oranges and serve with sliced bananas.

A Beautiful Dish

Prepare it in a jiffy. Orange segments tucked in lettuce leaves make a beautiful as well as delicious salad.

The sailing vessels of olden days were required by law to serve a daily ration of lemon or lime juice and from this custom these vessels were termed "lime juicers".

Sunkist Uniformly Good Oranges

Order a dozen or more now. Keep them always within reach.

Practically seedless, juicy, tender, firm. Easy to slice and separate into segments. Ideal for salads and desserts.

Look for the "Sunkist Tissue Wrapper" and always order them by name. Note our offer of valuable recipe card file in coupon to right.

California Fruit Growers Exchange
A Non-Profit, Co-operative Organization of 19,500 Growers
DEPT. 265, LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA

Mail This

Send 10c with this coupon and we will send you a set of 24 beautifully illustrated Sunkist recipe cards.

Each dish pictured in colors. Shows how to serve oranges and lemons in the most attractive ways. Just right size for recipe-card box.

For 75c we will send the set of Sunkist recipe cards, neat oak box without any advertising on it, 100 blank cards and 25 index cards, all prepaid.

This set would cost $1.25 in retail stores.

Check the offer you wish to accept and forward with stamps or coins. Offer is good at these prices in both United States and Canada.

☐ 24 Sunkist Recipe Cards—10c

☐ Complete Box and File—75c (Including above 24 cards)

Address: California Fruit Growers Exchange

Dept. 265, Los Angeles, Calif.

Name _____

Address _____

A Serious Question to Mothers and Fathers

Are you bringing up your Children properly?

NO OFFENSE intended in this personal question to mothers and fathers. On the contrary this message, prepared by an expert in matters of diet, endeavors to throw light on a subject of much confusion to many parents.

It is possible to give children all the food they can possibly eat—and still their little bodies can be under-nourished in certain respects.

For many foods are lacking in the vital mineral salts that science tells us we all need—if we are to build strong teeth and bones, and sound nerves and brain cells.

The food for your children

One of the most complete and best balanced foods you could possibly give your growing children is Grape-Nuts—the rich cereal food made from whole wheat flour and malted barley.

Grape-Nuts contains iron, calcium, phosphorus, and other mineral elements that are taken right up as vital food by the millions of cells in the body.

These terms may sound very technical to some people, but if you will ask your doctor you will learn that you could not live long without giving your system the benefit of these vital mineral elements.

With milk or cream, to supply fat, Grape-Nuts is a remarkably balanced food for every possible purpose.

What you may not know about a "perfectly balanced food," however, your PALATE does know about FLAVOR. The international popularity of Grape-Nuts is due equally to its tempting, nut-like, sweet crispness and to its value as a satisfying, wholesome food.

You'll find Grape-Nuts in the best homes, and in every first-class hotel and restaurant in America, just as you will find it sold by leading grocers everywhere.

Grape-Nuts—the Body Builder
"There's a Reason"

Made by Postum Cereal Company, Inc., Battle Creek, Michigan

Foursquare

(Continued from Page 15)

done—or not said or not done—since you arrived, to make you treat me as if I were your valetudinarian uncle I can't imagine. But this I know: I refuse to be considered an instructor in a classroom when I'm out of that classroom, as if I carried the shell of it around on my back. And I want you to know that when we reached that magnificent climax at the end of that last movement my pulse was probably beating only a trifle slower than yours. And it's not slowed down perceptibly since; hence this turning of the worm." His eyes held her; the fire in them was genuine.

MARY responded to it, like the sensitive quicksilver she was. "I do beg your pardon," she said with a change of manner as attractive as it was spontaneous. "I have been thinking you old before your time and hated to see it too. There's something about teaching—it does make men old, if they don't look out. You have just a bit of a stoop in your shoulders, you know; and you shouldn't have, at—what is it? Not forty yet?"

He laughed rather bitterly. "Hardly. Do I really suggest forty at thirty-five?"

"You certainly do—or did. At this moment, with your nice, thick hair rumbled up a bit and your eyes waked up and that attitude which says the male creature is asserting itself, I could easily imagine you a bare thirty. You really—why, I like you better than I have since I was a little girl and you jumped me over the hedge. Goodness! You couldn't have been anything but a big boy then."

"I'm only a bigger boy now, you know," he said. "I can't conceive what's made you so belligerent toward me ever since you came, when you weren't avoiding me completely. We used to be very good friends, I thought."

"Belligerent! It was you who were that. Letting me know the very instant you saw me that you thoroughly disapproved of me. Is that a basis, I ask you, for the renewal of friendship?"

"I DIDN'T disapprove of you, only of one example of your work—of which you disapproved yourself. But, great Caesar! Don't let's go back to that, now that there may be some slight chance of our finding common ground again. See here, Mary! Harriet and I were looking forward with the greatest pleasure to your coming back to us. We thought of you as the open-hearted girl you used to be, who'd be in and out of our little old house—why, I went and invested in two new and decidedly expensive ties and a new hat, particularly that I might not look my horrible age. Harriet—I believe Harriet did something equally extravagant, with the idea of impressing you. And then you came, with a chip on your very pretty shoulder—"

"Which you instantly knocked off," declared Mary. "Yes, you knocked it off, Mark Fenn—Professor Mark Fenn—you know you did—"

"Take back that 'Professor'."

"It's your proper title."

"I won't be 'professed' by you, Mary, of all people."

"Mister, then," substituted Mary wickedly.

"Why not plain Mark? I am plain Mark, I'm well aware, and can't interest or amuse you as the men you know in your own world can do so well. But I mightn't make so poor a friend, Mary. Anyhow, it seems a pity to live next door to each other for a year and keep on—collecting chips. Doesn't it?"

"It does indeed," she admitted. "Well, if we continue to play the classics together, with an occasional bit of ragtime just to refresh us—" she broke off, laughing at his face. "There you go again! Don't tell me you don't like ragtime. Listen."

She slipped onto the bench again, struck a few gay notes and plunged into a song of the day, with which she did not expect him to be familiar. To her surprise, after the first two measures, a clear whistle joined her, and they finished the dashing lines together.

She swung about upon the bench. "That wasn't so bad, after all, was it?" she challenged him. "How on earth did you come to know it?"

"Pretty bad, though clever enough, too, in its way. How did I know it? You don't really ask me that, in these degenerate days. But after Beethoven and Handel—"

"It was unkind of me. I apologize, though I can't be sorry, for it proved your humanness as nothing else could do. Well, shall we play again some night? I wish we had a violin and could do some trios."

"I can find you one easily. We have an excellent first violin in the college orchestra. He would be mightily pleased to join us—now and then."

SHE noted the emphasis and smiled appreciatively. "I should be very glad to have him—now and then," she agreed. "It will be the best thing in the world for me to have an evening of music when I've been grinding hard, as to-day. I was on the ragged edge of deep despondency when your cello pulled me out."

"Really? I'm glad. I was rather in the dumps myself—though it doesn't seem possible now. Is the work pulling hard? I'm sorry for that, unless it means that something substantial is to be hauled up out of the depths."

"The trouble is, nothing seems to be on the other end of the rope; it's just caught on a snag. I've about given up"—she bit her lip and finished the sentence hurriedly—"about given up thinking work will ever come easily again."

"That's good."

"You don't mean that, Professor Mark."

"Is that my punishment? All right; I won't continue on those lines. Instead, I'll say—"

Miss Graham's old tall clock on the staircase landing clanged a slow, impressive warning. Mark pulled out his watch. "I'll say it some other time," he finished. "Who knew it was twelve o'clock!"

Mary's laugh was delicious. "I did, and loved it that you didn't. Is it a crime to be up at this hour, playing Beethoven?"

"Very nearly, playing anything, on College Hill—unless it's a party."

"It's been the nicest kind of a party, I should say. Let's have 'em often, now we've begun."

"I'll be delighted. Good night, Mary."

"Good night—Mark."

She closed the door upon his ruggedly well-knit figure, recalling the smile which had lighted the rather fine modeling of his face. In the future, she thought, she wouldn't need to avoid so carefully the chance of hearing what he really thought about her work. If he was only thirty-five, could whistle ragtime, and distinctly didn't want to be given a title, it seemed possible that she might get off more easily than she had feared.

"WHAT on earth can she be doing?" Mark Fenn, on an afternoon in early August, tramping along a woodland path

(Continued on Page 106)

4-Inch Opening

Enables you to pack Fried Chicken, Baked Beans, Boiled Potatoes, Ice Cream. Easy to fill or to empty.

You Can Clean This Jar

Large four-inch opening admits hand for cleaning and drying. Always sanitary.

Carry Food or Liquid Hot or Cold, in New 1 Gallon Thermal Jar

Think of a thermal bottle you can use interchangeably for foods or liquids! And of a full gallon capacity—16 cups.

It's here! The Aladdin Thermalware Jar. Keeps contents piping hot or icy cold for hours. Four-inch opening admits food in large pieces—fried chicken, potato salad, chop suey or ice cream. Or holds coffee, lemonade or iced tea enough for the whole family.

The insulated container is of heavy glass, sealed to the metal jacket by a patent Thermal seal into one inseparable piece. Sanitary glass stopper. High thermal efficiency. An outer steel shell gives additional protection against bumps and jars. Unusually sturdy. Handy bail for carrying. Handsomely finished in Brewster Green Enamel. Capacity, durability and wide usefulness considered, the Aladdin Thermalware Jar is the lowest priced thermal bottle you can buy.

On Auto Trips
Carry a hot dinner. An extra jar supplies whole gallon of hot coffee or cold lemonade for entire family. Be independent of expensive roadside restaurants.

For Sportsmen
Fishing, hunting, camping, yachting—you have a gallon of hot or cold drink for a whole day's outing.

At Picnics
Steaming hot coffee or iced lemonade for all. Or serve hot fricasseed chicken, baked beans, ice cream or other food prepared before you start.

In the Home and Office
Keep a constant supply of cool drinking water—any desired temperature.

Ask for the Aladdin Thermalware Jar by name. In one-gallon and two-quart sizes. Sold by leading Department, Drug, Hardware, Jewelry, Sporting Goods and Auto Accessory Stores.

ALADDIN Thermalware JARS — DISHES

Ask Your Dealer to Show You
This New Thermalware
Dish

—Cooking
—Serving
—Heat Retaining

A wonderful three-purpose Thermalware Dish, consisting of insert, container and cover. Bake or cook the food in insert, place it in container, and put on the cover, which seals by vacuum, and food is kept steaming hot.

With the Aladdin Thermalware Dish, you can prepare soup, vegetables, stews, puddings, griddle cakes, desserts, etc., in advance—have everything hot and tasty to serve at the same time. No matter if some of the family are late for dinner—the food is hot.

Be sure to have your dealer demonstrate this magic heat-retaining Thermalware Dish.

In three styles—Sheffield Silver, Nickel or Copper finish. Capacity, 3 pints. As a serving dish it ornaments any table.

Club Women—We have an interesting proposal to active members of Women's Clubs, Church Societies, etc. In writing, ask for Brochure "A."

DEALERS—If you are not now handling the Aladdin Thermalware Jar and Dish, write us or your jobber at once for information and prices.

WRITE
For Free Booklet

ALADDIN INDUSTRIES, INC.
603 West Lake Street, Chicago, Ill.

Please send me booklet, describing Aladdin Thermalware Jar and Thermalware Dish.

My dealer's name is _____

Name _____

Street _____

City _____

State _____

THE rare, sweet flavor of sugar cane in Domino Syrup makes it a great favorite on the table. And it is unusually fine for sweetening delicious dishes and desserts. You'll find Domino Syrup a real inspiration to prepare good things to eat.

Try your folks today with the winning flavor of sweet sugar cane. Ask for Domino Syrup—made by the refiners of Domino Package Sugars.

American Sugar Refining Company

"Sweeten it with Domino"

Granulated, Tablet, Powdered, Confectioners, Brown, Golden Syrup

Domino
Syrup

Foursquare

(Continued from Page 105)

which ran beside a small stream, came to a standstill, staring between the slender trunks of a group of birches toward a spot a few yards beyond and below him where energetic operations of some sort were in progress. A blue-clad figure was staggering toward the brook's edge carrying a stone rather too heavy for a woman's strength. Across the tumbling width of the small chasm an irregular heap of similar stones suggested that the laborer was attempting to construct a bridge.

He removed his pipe from his mouth, softly knocked out its ashes and put it in his pocket, while he stole a little nearer the scene of action. Mary Fletcher as a bridge builder presented a new and interesting study. She was splashed from head to foot, and even as he watched a fresh volume of water rose from the invaded stream in answer to the fall of the latest addition to the spanning heap of stones and turned a large area of blue linen to a damp expanse of deeper blue.

The new stone added nothing, however, to the sum total of its brethren in the bridge, for it very promptly rolled off them, escaping to a deep pool just beyond.

"Oh—hang!" exploded an angry voice.

BUT the next instant Mary was dragging at another and heavier stone, tugging with panting breath, and finally heaving it down upon the wabbling foundation into a position where it hung perilously upon the edge of things.

Mary Fletcher threw up both clenched hands into the air, crying out something unintelligible, and flung herself down upon the bank, a figure of baffled discontent. The next instant she was sitting erect again, startled by a quiet observation from a few feet's distance:

"If it must be done, it must be done differently. Would you be willing to engage an engineer who isn't afraid to wade in?"

"Thank you; I wanted to do it myself."

There was no welcoming smile on Mary's face, and Mark's reflected a corresponding gravity.

"You can't—without getting in. And you need heavier stones than you can lift. Besides, unless you intend to build a dam, you need to leave free places for the stream to run through, or it'll wash everything away."

"I suppose so. Of course I don't know how to do it properly. I did think if I threw on stones enough I might in the end get a bridge out of it."

"About fifty yards below you can cross without one."

"But I wanted to build a bridge," cried Mary.

"All right," Mark said quietly; "let's build it together. Mary's the time I've done it as a boy. I see plenty of good material all about."

Mary rose to her feet. "Go ahead," she said briefly. "I'll help, if I know enough."

Without further words Mark went at it. Coat off, trousers rolled above his knees, he stood in the center of the narrow stream, and began the thing all over again with a well-placed, substantial foundation, wide and compact, such as might be expected to withstand the rush of the current. Mary silently placed within his reach each stone as he indicated it. In due course the task was completed, a structure sufficiently solid to be trusted for the crossing.

Mary stood and looked down at the sturdy, small bridge, and Mark, taking his place beside her upon the bank, regarded it with the satisfaction the man feels in having relived an experience of his boyhood. At the next moment, however, his thoughts returned to the person beside him, whose moody look had been not in the least dissipated by the labors of the hour.

"It's very fine," she now said slowly. "But I didn't do it myself. The analogy is perfect. I can do nothing myself any more. I can't even place the first stone right."

Mark sat down upon the bank and put on his socks and shoes, resumed his coat, and ran his hand across his hair, thrusting it back into place. He returned to stand beside

Mary, the strong color in his face telling of a healthy circulation, his mind working rapidly. The hour had come, he was sure, when he must try to show her he could really be a friend in need.

"I wonder," he said quietly, "if you'd do me the honor of telling me all about it. Of course I can't help guessing that your work isn't going well, that you're at a standstill. Are you letting discouragement get the upper hand?"

"IT'S not only got the upper hand," Mary answered bitterly, "it's thrown me, and bound and gagged me. I'm helpless, and—I think I'm going quite mad with rage. When I began to build this bridge I thought—if I could build it I should have proved—that I could create something, if only a child's plaything. It seems I can't do even that."

"You tried a man's task."

"I want to do a man's task. That's it exactly."

I'm tired of doing womanish work—of building bridges that won't stand. Besides—building that bridge wasn't a man's task. I could have waded out and laid the bottom stones as securely as you did—and built up just as strong a crossing. I hadn't the patience. I wanted —"

"You wanted to stand on the bank and throw them in and have them lodge by some happy chance just where they needed to be. And then you grew hysterical and unreasonable because they didn't."

"I've always done it—before," Mary cried defiantly; "stood on the bank and thrown the stones, and they lodged, and the bridge was built, and people crossed on it."

"And you didn't get your feet wet?"

"I didn't need to."

"You admitted a minute ago," Mark suggested, "that the bridges didn't always stand."

IT WAS at this point that Mary's nerves gave way completely. "I'm going home," she said unsteadily. "If I don't—I shall go to pieces and cry. I wouldn't cry before you for anything I can think of. I'm not a crying person; I'm not! I won't break my record."

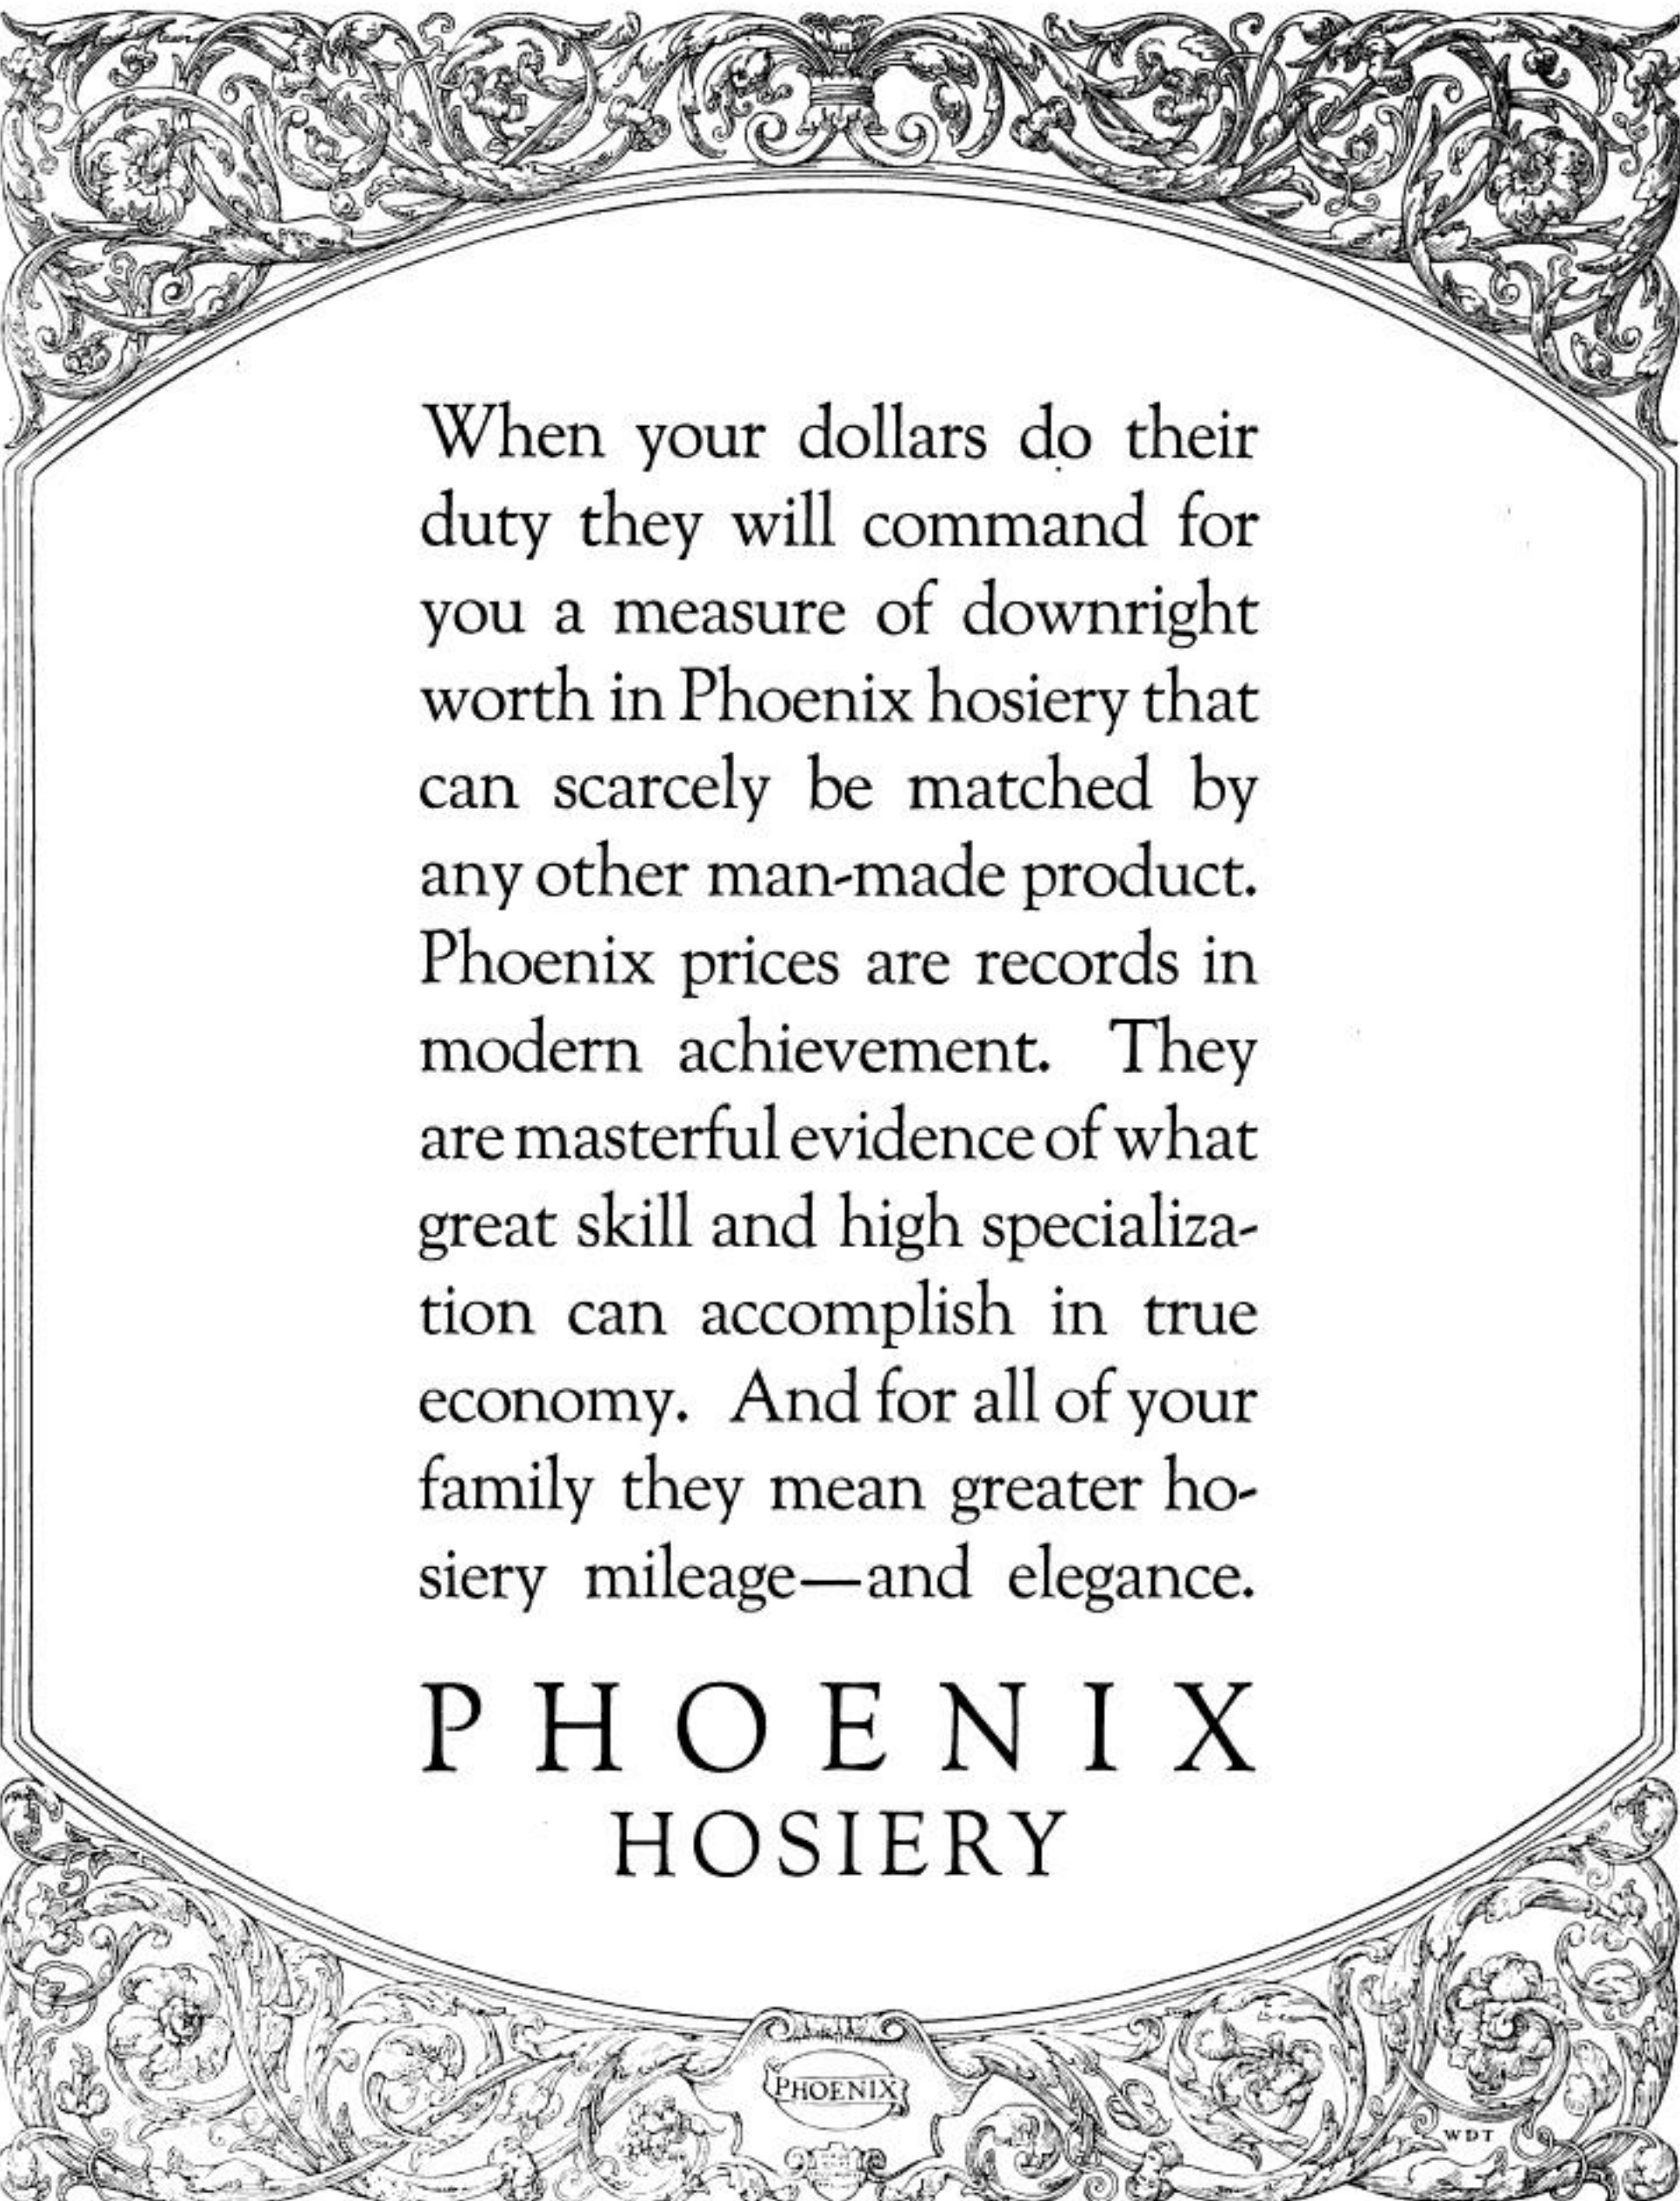

"You shall not," he agreed.

Therefore they walked home together, through wood and lane, and Mark, glancing from time to time at Mary's profile as they went along for the most part silently, thought he saw that the long strain of unprofitable self-communings was telling upon her and that she was keeping a grip upon herself with difficulty. Before he left her, however, he said the thing which he most wanted to say.

"I've wished I could help you," he said. "But I can see that you're not fit just now to talk or think about your work. I wish you'd drop it entirely for a time —"

"I can't," Mary interrupted raggedly. "I've got to think it through. I've got to

(Continued on Page 108)

When your dollars do their duty they will command for you a measure of downright worth in Phoenix hosiery that can scarcely be matched by any other man-made product. Phoenix prices are records in modern achievement. They are masterful evidence of what great skill and high specialization can accomplish in true economy. And for all of your family they mean greater hosiery mileage—and elegance.

PHOENIX HOSIERY

PHOENIX

W.D.T.

AN IDEAL

The Premier
FIRST AMONG CLEANERS

Premier's leadership has been attained through the determination of every employee to work faithfully toward the ideal of superiority. Quality and dependability have marked Premier progress towards perfection

MAIL THIS COUPON TODAY

ELECTRIC VACUUM CLEANER CO., Dept. 104, L. H. J., Cleveland, O.

- ☐ Please have nearest dealer call or 'phone for appointment to demonstrate The Premier in my home without obligation to me or
- ☐ Please send me free color booklet, price, convenient terms and nearest dealer's name.

(Check your preference)

Name _____

Street Address _____ City _____

R. F. D. _____ State _____ Telephone Number _____

Foursquare

(Continued from Page 106)

get somewhere. I—there's no other way. Never mind; I will—somehow. Don't bother about me. I know I've seemed a little fool this afternoon, but ———" She turned away. "Good-by," she said.

He took a step after her and laid hold upon her hand, which he was startled to find was cold as ice. "Mary," he said to her averted face, "there's one thing I can do for you, and that's to—stand by. Your ship isn't sinking; far from it; and you're not going to abandon her. But the seas seem to be running high, and I think you've got to make port for some repairs to the engines. Meanwhile my ship is going to stand by and keep in touch. I want you to know that. You may not care—much—just now, whether I'm there or not. But sometime perhaps you will. Anyhow, I am there, and nothing can make me change my course from yours, while you're in trouble."

SHE looked around at him. The first smile she had seen on her face this afternoon touched it in answer to this speech.

"I admit I'm quite human enough to have that touch me, Mark. There's nothing you—or anybody—can do for me except that. But if, some night, my ship goes head on, on a rock, and sinks before you can get to me, don't mind too much. Maybe I'd never have made port anyhow."

She pulled her hand away and fairly ran from him towards the house.

Though she went early to her room, it was not to sleep. Daylight saw her dressed for the street, a small bag packed, her room left in order.

When Miss Graham came down to breakfast she found a note beside her plate:

Most Beloved: Mary wouldn't be Mary if she didn't do erratic things, would she? But really this isn't so erratic as it seems. I didn't sleep awfully well, and it suddenly occurred to me that if I could catch Alexandra Warren before she gets away on her fortnight's vacation, and have a good talk with her, it would be worth doing. I know she's on the edge of leaving, and suddenly I want to see her so very badly that I feel I'm justified in startling you this way. I know you get your best sleep toward morning, so I wouldn't wake you. I'll be back very soon; I'm only taking a few things. If I can get what I want down there I'll come back, a more reasonable person. I know I've driven you to distraction for weeks with my moods and tenses. Forgive me, won't you—for I love you very much and shall be eager to get back to you.

MARY.

MISS GRAHAM went up to Mary's room, and found it perfectly in order but for one thing. The small fireplace was full of fluttering ashes and half-burned type-written paper, some of which, by reason of a light wind of the past night, had blown out upon the floor. Miss Graham swept these up herself, setting a match to the unconsumed remains.

"I don't see," she mused as she watched them rapidly flame up, "why it seems to be so difficult for her now, when always before, as she has told me, it was so easy. Perhaps—perhaps she is trying to do something too hard for her. I wonder if that is necessary."

Already, a hundred miles away, Mary could have told her that it was necessary. Her courage had risen a little with the mere getting away.

But the whole journey was to her a mere inescapable interval between the state she had left and that into which she hoped to emerge.

She was making it as one who has suffered a bereavement travels with veil down and eyes averted, the inner consciousness shutting away all immediate environment.

Morning found her where she longed to be. It was barely nine o'clock when Alexandra Warren in her suburban home, stooping over a trunk she was packing, heard a joyful cry.

"Oh, Sandy, Sandy! Heaven is merciful, and you haven't gone! I didn't dare wire before I started, to find out. I had to come, anyway—bless your dear, delightful back. It would have been worth coming for, just to see your back, even if you hadn't turned round."

"Why, Mary Fletcher!"

There succeeded one of those strangling embraces with which Mary had been accustomed, after long intervals of rather boyish distaste for manifestations of affection, to show unexpected emotion over her best friend. The way in which she now clung to Alexandra, laughing and half crying, shed instant light upon that wise woman's mind.

"Let me look at you," demanded Alexandra, holding Mary off at arm's length. "Yes, I thought so. You've been having a bad time over something, and have reached the limit of your restraint. But—my dear—I never saw you so thin and worn. Your eyes—why, child, what is the matter?"

"Haven't slept for two nights; that's all. I'm all right really. That is, I'm—all—wrong."

ALEXANDRA sat down. She pulled a pillow off a couch and dropped it at her own feet. "Sit down there, and put your head on my knee, and tell me all about it," she commanded.

"I shall die if I can't," Mary said, biting her lip, because it trembled. "And I'm afraid I can't. But I've got to make you understand—some of it."

"You may not find me so dull."

"Oh, Sandy——" She put her head down in Alexandra Warren's lap and broke into wild sobbing.

Suddenly, almost as suddenly as it had begun, the sobbing passed. "I won't—any more," a shuddering whisper declared. "I didn't know it was coming or I—no, I think it had to come. I hate to cry; I don't cry; I detest crying women. But——"

"Never mind; the pressure had to be relieved somehow, and you'll be better now. It's not like you, and it makes me anxious. Something must be radically wrong."

I'm afraid you have tried to go to work too soon. Is it the work that worries you?"

SO MARY told her all that she could tell. After all, it was not much. It seldom is much that can be told of the spirit's real distress.

"So I've come," concluded Mary, "to get this over with you, and then go into town and see the one person who can give me back any confidence in myself. He's always done it—I don't know how; and if anybody can now, he can. A month ago I wouldn't see him or tell him anything, though he came up on purpose. Now, just all at once, I can hardly wait to see him."

"Mr. Kirkwood?"

"Of course. Oh, my wireless is tuned to his; it always has been, though I wouldn't acknowledge it. The awful truth is—and that's what's been driving me frantic—that the suspicion has been growing and growing that I can't do anything without him."

"Oh, no!" The exclamation was one of deep dissent. "Why, think of the almost two years you were away from him, in France. You were doing absolutely independent work——"

"That was entirely different. I had every stimulus. I couldn't help but write of what

(Continued on Page 109)

Foursquare

(Continued from Page 108)

I saw and divined. But back here"—Mary made a gesture of unhappy abandon—"oh, perhaps I didn't realize it, but I think I did in a way, he—he—why, he just had me in the hollow of his hand. The only thing I ever did without him was that abominable trash I wrote when I first came back—to prove that I was independent. Do you wonder I ran away? And now—oh, shame on me, I suppose; but I'm so desperate I can't help it—I'm going back to him."

"My dear! Are you sure that's best? Not that I don't admire John Kirkwood and trust his advice—to a certain extent. But I don't like this confession of his power over you. Now that you've broken away from his influence for a time, hadn't you better—well, fight it out, this struggle for independence?"

She sat looking steadily across into Mary's face, though Mary's eyes after an instant dropped away from her. Then in a moment she suffered a shock greater than that which she had lately received. Mary slowly lifted her eyes again, and in them was written a misery so deep that her friend's heart sank.

"Sandy," Mary said very low, "I'd like to take that advice; I would indeed. I've been giving it to myself all these weeks of struggle. But the bitter truth is, I've grown afraid that if I don't write something big and splendid pretty soon, I never will. I'm—why, Sandy, I'm just plain scared. Scared, so that I can't sleep! Scared, so that—oh, I can't tell you! I suppose if I went to a doctor he'd call it nervous depression. It's not that, and I'm not going to any doctor."

"THE only cure for me is to produce something that I'm proud of, so that I can feel again that amazing tonic of success. If I can once do that, even if I do it with John Kirkwood's help, I think I'll be strong again to break away. But it doesn't always do to take the prop away all at once."

"Very well, dear," Alexandra said, rising with decision. "You said you meant to take the next train in to Mr. Kirkwood's office. That leaves at nine-forty. I'll go with you. If need be I'll stay in town until your conferences with him are over, even though they take some days. Or you can come back out with me here each night—"

"Oh, but it's your vacation!"

"That doesn't matter. I'm not specially tired, and can spare a few days as well as not."

An hour later, in the city, the pair were shot upward to the high floor of the crowded downtown building upon which were The Centerpiece offices.

"Mr. Kirkwood's out of town," said a laconic office boy, new to the place and unacquainted with Miss Fletcher's importance there.

"Oh!" Mary breathed it like a sigh of despair.

"When will he be back?" Alexandra asked.

"Thursday."

"Could he be reached before then?"

"Don't think so. He didn't leave any forwarding address."

Alexandra asked for a sub-editor whose name she knew.

BUT Mary hastily interposed under her breath: "No, no, Sandy. We'll go. This is Tuesday. I'd rather wait." Outside in the cab she explained. "I don't want him called back for me; I want to come in upon him when he doesn't expect me."

"Will you go back home with me, dear?"

"No, I'll stay in town. It's not very hot just now."

"Then I'll stay with you."

"No, I won't have it."

"Then you must come back with me. Be reasonable, Mary. You are worn out. The two days' rest will be good for you, before you see Mr. Kirkwood. I can make you very comfortable."

Back in the pleasant suburban town Mary gave herself up to her friend's ministrations, outwardly at least. On Thursday morning Alexandra took the precaution of telephoning in to the office, learning that Mr. Kirkwood had wired that his return would be delayed until the morrow. At this news Mary went quite out of her head, announcing that she must do something or she couldn't endure it. This time it was Alexandra who yielded, accompanied Mary to a New York hotel, and went with her on a ceaseless round of supposed diversion, beginning with shopping and ending amid the blare of a summer musical comedy offering which outraged every sensibility and left both women feeling besmirched and wearied beyond expression.

ALL nightmares end, however, and this one came to its finish with the announcement of the office boy next morning.

"Yes, ma'am. Mr. Kirkwood's in. Just got back. Card?"

Mary sent it in, her heart throbbing disconcertingly.

Two minutes later an inner door opened, and a tall figure, clad in the freshest of light summer apparel, came rapidly forward.

The light in John Kirkwood's eyes spoke his astonished pleasure.

"Mary Fletcher! Miss Warren! This is wonderful of you. When did you come? Why didn't you let me know?" His eyes studied Mary's face, and concern appeared in his own.

"I thought it would be rather fun to surprise you," Mary told him. "I ran down to see Alexandra, and—well, I really wanted to see you too—to talk things over."

"You are tired," he said abruptly. "You don't want to talk in this hot office, I'm sure. Just wait, please, while I dispose of a few details; I've been away for a week. Then I'm at your service."

"Are you sure you can spare the time?"

"Absolutely—for you. We'll go somewhere—to a cool and quiet spot, if there's one to be had—and spend the whole day."

It took him long enough, however, to arrange his affairs to prove to his guests that getting loose again wasn't quite as easy as he would have them think. Brief consultations with various members of his staff, rapid decisions of matters brought to his attention by one and another, telephone talks, short personal interviews with persons who had appointments—Alexandra caught enough glimpses of the editor in action to appreciate what he was about to do for Mary.

IN DUE time, however, he came to them, hat in hand. "There's a motor waiting below, and a lunch is being put up at a very good place where we'll stop on our way. If you'll permit me I'm simply going to take charge of things and carry you both off for the day and evening. I think I can plan a program which will prove sufficiently refreshing to justify my being high-handed about it."

"I think we're both glad to have you high-handed," Alexandra assured him.

Kirkwood carried a well-stuffed brief case, and a couple of books besides.

"I've picked up several good things in my absence," he remarked as they fled uptown in a large closed car, so shiningly new and luxurious that it betrayed no sign of having been hired. "These two books I'll engage will keep even such an exacting critic as you absorbed while Mary and I go over whatever affairs she has in mind. I've some matters of my own I want to consult her about as well, if she'll give me the chance. Your coming couldn't have been more timely; I was just 'wishin' to go a-fishin'—and that with Mary Fletcher herself."

His eyes met Mary's. He himself had been away upon a vacation, preceding the interesting business trip from which he had just returned, and she had rarely seen him looking so well. The usual tired lines were gone.

(Continued on Page 111)

After a day of Work or Play

Your tired, irritated skin needs invigorating—toning up—to offset the ill effects of the wind and grime to which it has been subjected.

Give it a refreshing treatment with warm water and Resinol Soap. This relieves the pores of their accumulated dust and oil—permitting them to function properly. It gently removes excess oil and reduces the unsightliness of facial blemishes.

Now watch the tired lines disappear and the gray pallor give place to a healthy glow. Once more you are ready for the evening with a complexion that is radiant and charming.

You make no mistake when you select Resinol Soap for daily use. It is—

Ideal for the hair
Unexcelled for the bath
Incomparable for the nursery

For sale at all drug and toilet goods counters.

Send for free trial size cake, Dept. 1-E, Resinol, Baltimore, Md.

Resinol Soap

Thousands of oil-laden pores—

Essential to the beauty and health of any complexion, yet they destroy woman's chief charm, if they are neglected

Since 1893, thousands of mothers have kept their skins youthful by using the same Melba Creams their daughters now apply

EVERY inch of your face contains hundreds of tiny pores. Each pore, brimming with natural oil, traps and holds any floating particle of dust which comes in contact with it daily.

Look at the sunlight streaming in through the windows and you will see, in the dancing motes, how much microscopic dust is always in the air. Unless removed, this dust and grime, combining with the oil, clog the pores, hinder their important cleansing function—and make complexion health and beauty impossible.

Soap and water alone will not remove this foreign matter and the impurities dammed up behind them. Washing merely clears the surface of the skin—the trouble-maker lodges within the pores. Left to its vicious work, it will undermine skin health and will cause enlarged pores and blackheads.

Certain oils dissolve impurities

To acquire and keep a clear, smooth, radiant complexion, therefore, you must give your pores a thorough cleansing every night. The way is easy. Certain oils, when scientifically compounded, will penetrate the pores, will dissolve the oily mass in each and, little by little, will bring it to the surface. A soft cloth will remove it.

These oils have been combined in Melba Skin

Cleanser. Thousands of women have used this cream for twenty-nine years, and thus kept their skins youthful and radiant. If you, too, would have the satiny clear complexion women and men alike admire, begin tonight to really cleanse your pores.

Complexion health and beauty

Apply Melba Skin Cleanser. Allow it sufficient time to penetrate the pores before removing. The first time you wipe the cream off you will see and feel how much you have needed it. By the end of the first week, you will be amazed at the smoothness and softness of your skin, its new, fine texture. Even when care of your complexion has been sacrificed to other duties, the improvement will be gratifying.

Then, to remove or prevent wrinkles and bring added color, massage lightly with Melba Face Cream Skin Massage. This will stir the circulation and bring more blood to nourish the tissues. The cream is astringent and will contract and refine the pores.

Right face powder is important

Now, to add the final touch of beauty, it is important that every day you use the right face powder. The coated or "calimined" look you see so often comes through use of a coarse face powder. To blend evenly with the tone and texture of your complexion, face powder must be infinitely fine.

Under the microscope, the most beautiful skin is revealed as a region of tiny hills and valleys. Unless a face powder is superfine, it will not cling evenly to the delicate contours of these hills and valleys, but will simply fill the depressions and produce that coated look all women of refinement seek to avoid.

By a wonderful new process of air-sifting, Melba face powders are now made so fine they float on air, blend admirably with any skin and cling perfectly, whether you dance, golf, motor or ride.

Melba powders are delightfully fragrant. You can select the scent which best expresses your personality, matching the Melba perfume or toilet water you prefer. You will find Melba products for sale at toilet-goods counters of all drug and department stores. If you wish liberal samples for trial, first—

Clip and send the coupon

Fill out the coupon, enclosing only 25 cents, stamps or silver, and we will send you a generous trial package of Melba products, including a trial tube of Melba Skin Cleanser, Melba Face Cream Skin Massage, Melba Vanishing Cream, a trial bottle of Melba Skin Lotion, and sample packets of air-floated Melba face powders. We will include, free, a copy of "The Art of Make-up," a little de luxe book that tells how beauty can be emphasized.

MELBA

Melba Skin Cleanser, 50 cents
Melba Face Cream Skin Massage, 50 cents
Melba Vanishing Cream, 75 cents
Melba Skin Lotion, 35 cents

MAIL THIS COUPON WITH 25 CENTS

MELBA MFG. CO.
4237 Indiana Avenue, Chicago, Illinois

I enclose 25c (stamps or silver) for which send me 1 trial tube of Melba Skin Cleanser, 1 trial tube of Melba Face Cream Skin Massage, 1 trial tube of Melba Vanishing Cream, 1 trial bottle of Melba Skin Lotion, and sample packets of Melba air-floated face powders. You are to include your book, "The Art of Make-up," free.

Write plainly with pencil

Name _____

Street No. _____

City _____ State _____

Foursquare

(Continued from Page 109)

from his face; his lean, long body had filled out by a matter of many pounds; his color was that of the outdoor life he had been for the most part living for a month.

But he didn't tell her what he was thinking—that if she didn't stop growing thin and worn she would some day lose her look of enchanting youth, merely grown interestingly mature, which had thus far persisted through all her days of work and experience. As yet she was simply touchingly attractive in these signs of harassment and fatigue. But he knew full well that all too soon there might come upon her that fatal change which marks the border line between two well-defined stages of life, across which there is no going back. How to arrest her progress toward that line had been uppermost in his mind ever since he had set eyes upon her to-day.

VI

KIRKWOOD could hardly have chosen a cleverer course than that which he now pursued. He wanted to get Mary out of the hot city, and yet the open country was not his goal. She had had enough, he considered, of Nature unshaven and unshorn, of wild-wood and rocky glen. An ordered Nature, an out-of-doors trimmed and finished, reminding of the resources of the city's wealth—this must be the setting for their day together. The car flew toward a certain great estate, the former home of one of the names of American history, closed to the general public, the picturesque old mansion unoccupied except by a caretaker. Kirkwood was confident, however, of securing permission to spend the day in the grounds, and even to take his guests into the distinguished old house, full of relics and of suggestion.

"Oh, what a delightful spot!" Mary cried, when presently she found herself established on a velvety green bank under magnificent spreading trees, the blue river lying broad beneath her feet, with gray-green shores beyond.

Behind her, the ivy-covered stone walls of the famous mansion made a background, when she turned her head, for the figures of her two friends. A caretaker, with a large fee in his pocket, had brought out quaint chairs and a table, a rug and cushions; Mary felt a little like a princess, with anything she might ask for at her disposal. For the moment care dropped away from her; she found herself wishing to see the contents of the hamper which had come on board before they left the city.

"Hungry?" asked John Kirkwood blithely. "Almost famished! Isn't it time to eat?"

"We'll get to it at once. I hope they've put in what will appeal to us."

He had spared no pains, it became evident, to suit what he had guessed might be a capricious taste. As she ate delicious food, and drank pleasing iced beverages, Mary began to feel the weight upon her spirits lift a little. It suddenly occurred to her that she had never quite appreciated, in her association with John Kirkwood in the great city, how almost distinguished he was in personal appearance, not to consider the charm of his manner and speech. Just once, as she sat listening to his entertaining talk, the image of Mark Fenn came into her mind.

THE contrast between the two men struck her afresh as that between the man who lives his life closely in touch with human affairs and interest, and the one who remains secluded in a small world of thought and limited action. Mark Fenn had told her he would "stand by." Could he possibly know how to give her even the beginning of such a sense of well-being and comradeship as could this man? Hardly! There could be but one answer to that. She told herself that Mark Fenn didn't know even the alphabet of the language which John Kirkwood could speak with ease.

The hamper was repacked and set away. Kirkwood made Miss Warren comfortable, pointed out certain outstanding chapters in the books he was leaving with her, tucked a rug and a cushion under his arm, and frankly asked: "Are you game, dear lady, to be left a considerable while? I've a notion we shall be rather likely to forget how time is passing while we talk shop. But we shan't be far away; a call will bring us, even though we're out of sight. I want Mary to forget all sense of duty, even to your kind self."

"You need have none at all," Alexandra Warren settled herself, too accustomed to this rôle to resent it.

A FEW rods farther up the river, in a spot still more coolly secluded by heavy tree growth than that of the lunchtime, though open at one point to the river, Kirkwood spread his rug and placed his cushion.

"How would you like to take a little sleep, while I smoke a pipe not far away and keep guard?" he suggested. "Wouldn't you be fitter for our confab for a bit of rest first? We've all been talking rather uninterruptedly."

Mary dropped upon the rug, took off her hat, and laid her head upon the cushion.

"I'd love it for just a few minutes," she smiled up at him. She felt more like herself than she had felt for many weeks. "I'll just play sleep, for the length of one pipe—and then please come back."

"You tempt me to pack it lightly," he said as he strolled away.

When he glanced back from a discreet distance through the trees, he noted with satisfaction how completely the slender figure seemed to have relaxed upon the rug, with the arms thrown back and clasped above the head, the face turned upward. He thought she was probably staring up into the heavy green leafage above, and knew that if it were so not even sleep could be better medicine for a mind ill at ease. For that Mary's mind was far from being in any sense at ease, he had read at the first glance.

"I WANT," said John Kirkwood slowly, "to tell you a story."

He lay stretched on his side upon the turf at Mary's feet, his head propped upon his hand. He was looking at the blue water shimmering in the distance between the low-drooping branches of the great oaks beneath which the consultation had been held. Consultation? Rather had it been a clinic, or so both had felt, without saying so. Kirkwood, however, had not made a complete diagnosis; for the present he was postponing operation.

Mary had made almost a clean breast of it; she could do no otherwise. He knew now as nearly as she could tell him how deeply despair had laid hold upon her. The one thing she had not told him—could not bring herself to it—was the humiliating fact of her dependence upon him. If he had guessed this feature of her trouble he had shown no sign.

"It's a long story," he said, and filled his pipe again with a word of apology.

He began with deliberation of speech, sketching in the background of his story. He did this vividly, with few words, as a skillful reporter might. Then he began to tell the tale.

As it went forward, presently he drew himself up to a sitting position, though his eyes still remained upon the sparkling blue water through the trees. Then, suddenly, having reached a point in the story where events began to quicken, situations to develop, characters to strengthen, he began to speak faster, and now and again he glanced at his listener. He found her eyes upon him with a peculiar

(Continued on Page 112)

WILSON'S

Make Easter Breakfast the best of the year

The end of the Lenten season, the renewing of interest in social affairs, the gay Easter eggs for the children, the flowers, the new frocks—all these are emphasized by Easter breakfast. Let it be as good a breakfast as anyone ever enjoyed.

Wilson's Certified Ham—tender, juicy, tempting in flavor and appetizing in aroma—broiled to a nicety—delights everybody. Certified Hams are selected hams of choice young porkers, carefully and slowly cured and smoked to give them the topmost touch of quality and taste.

Or some rashers of Wilson's Certified Bacon—famous for its crisp appetizingness when broiled, sweet and tender from its mild, sugar cure and patient, old-fashioned smoking.

Your dealer can also supply you with Wilson's Clearbrook Fresh Eggs to make your Easter breakfast complete.

The Wilson Certified label assures you that the product it identifies is selected, handled and prepared with the respect your own mother would show toward your favorite dish when she prepares it specially for you.

The Wilson label protects your table

TENS of thousands of tourists stop at the Broadmoor Hotel in Colorado for meals and then more on their way again. The chef favors his dishes with Dromedary Coconut, and largely upon his judgment of flavor and fine dining depends the reputation of the hotel. The recipe on the right is his.

Dromedary Coconut Pudding

Heat 2 cups milk. Add 1 tablespoon corn starch mixed with 2 tablespoons cold milk. Cook in double boiler 15 minutes. Beat 3 yolks with $\frac{1}{2}$ cup sugar and $\frac{1}{4}$ teaspoon salt. Cook 2 minutes longer. Add $1\frac{1}{2}$ cups Dromedary Coconut. Cool slightly. Add $\frac{1}{4}$ teaspoon vanilla and $\frac{1}{4}$ teaspoon lemon extract. Mix 3 stiffly beaten egg whites and 2 tablespoons powdered sugar. Fold one-half into pudding. Spread remainder over top and sprinkle with coconut. Brown quickly in hot oven. Chill.

When there's a thrill as you dine

One of the great games is "Keeping the Family Expectant"! And it is so easy to win.

Just a little ingenuity and the old dishes take on a new thrill.

Cereal is commonplace; but cereal sprinkled with DROMEDARY COCOANUT is an event. Bread and muffins baked with Dromedary are an unexpected delight. And the usual desserts, when Dromedary is added, become surprisingly unusual.

There are three thrills a day in a Dromedary package. But be sure to ask for it by name. Coconut is coconut; but coconut with all its original flavor—that is Dromedary.

The free Dromedary Booklet "One Hundred Delights" is very much worth sending for. Your name and address, mailed to Department 36, will bring it to you at once.

THE HILLS BROTHERS COMPANY
375 WASHINGTON STREET, NEW YORK
NEW YORK . . . LONDON . . . BUSSORAH
SAN JUAN . . . SMYRNA . . . PARA
THE OLDEST AND THE LARGEST BUSINESS OF ITS KIND IN THE WORLD

Dromedary Cocoanut

DROMEDARY PRODUCTS
Tapioca that is ready in an instant; COCOANUT that keeps fresh to the last shred; GOLDEN DATES from the Garden of Eden.

Foursquare

(Continued from Page 111)

intensity of gaze, denoting entire concentration. He had been a little doubtful, when he had begun, whether he could secure this. She had been so absorbed in her own troubles, he had feared lest he could not obtain complete control of her attention. It was very necessary to his purpose to do this, and as he now received assurance that he had succeeded, his ability to speak effectively increased.

He got to his feet and stood before her, leaning against a tree trunk, his pipe grasped by the bowl, its fires extinct. He needed no other stimulation now than that of her interest. With all the art at his command he brought his recital along towards its climax, each minor crisis a dramatic triumph in itself, the whole effect growing in power with each successive unfolding of the extraordinary plot. As he came to the final scenes he lost himself in his own absorption in his theme. He became actor as well as speaker; unconscious slight gestures with the hand which held the pipe bowl, changes of facial expression illuminating the drama of his conclusion, till, as he ended, he was as a man inspired, the fires he had lighted in his own imagination glowing in his every aspect. Quite of himself, thus, apart from the story he had told, he had become an irresistible object of interest. As for the story itself—

FOR a minute, after the telling had ended, the two pairs of eyes continued to look into each other, each held by the emotion of the story's climax. Then Mary's eyes dropped, and Kirkwood turned away, to stride off among the trees for a few paces. Wheeling, he came back, to see her pressing both hands over her eyes, a great breath swelling her throat.

He dropped upon the ground again and lay silent, his own pulses racing. The tale had gripped him in the telling beyond any anticipation he could have had of such effect. What the hearing had done to Mary Fletcher he could guess from his past knowledge of her and his present recognition of her stirred and shaken state.

He left it to her to end the long silence. It took some time for her to reach the point where she could speak. "Where did you get that story?" she asked at last.

He smiled. He wouldn't have been human if it hadn't given him pleasure to answer that question. But he tried to answer it with modesty. "I've been working it out for a long time," he explained with careful restraint. "Somehow, I had to do it; I couldn't get away from it."

"I shouldn't think you could. Do you mean it is all—yours?"

He nodded. "A poor thing, but mine own. No; I won't pretend I think it poor; it got hold of me too deeply for that. But until you heard it I wasn't so sure. I wanted your reaction to it. I had it. So now I know there's something in it."

"You are going to—write it?"

It was his cue to delay the answer to that. It was for his advantage to keep her in suspense a little longer. He filled and lighted his pipe once more, first knocking out the half-burned contents. When finally he spoke, it was after a succession of puffs and through an ascending cloud of blue-gray smoke. "I wish I could write it. But it's as impossible as any of the labors of Hercules."

"But you could conceive it."

He nodded. "That's different. It's my trade to study construction, to criticize it, to delight in it. But I could no more put that book—it should make a book of good size—on paper than I could build this oak beside us."

"I don't see why."

"Oh, yes, you do. I beg your pardon, but you do see, you know. To change the simile—I've only hewn out the marble till I got a general outline, in the mass, of the figure I'd like to see. It will take the sculptor, the artist, to chip away the rest with a thousand delicate strokes and leave the perfect form."

"Oh, but you've dreamed the dream." Her eyes were dark with envy.

"Have I? You don't know what a great big thrill it gives me to hear that—from you." He smiled at her, but he met no answering smile.

"You've dreamed the dream; you've seen the vision. You've created a wonderful, wonderful thing."

"Ah, but it's not created yet. A dream isn't—"

"It's everything. It's the whole thing really. Making it live in words is nothing—comparatively—if you once have the thought, the plan that stirs you. Why, if in all these months I'd had that great idea of yours—"

"Mary, you forget. It's the long drudgery that tells. If it were as simple as that, I'd have written the book myself. It's not as simple as that. It's as difficult and long as—art."

"Oh, but it's a glorious road to take, once you know the goal. Who would mind plodding, climbing, struggling up the hill of work, if you knew that was over the top? Not I."

"Then—write my book."

Her startled glance leaped to his. He was not smiling now; his intent look met her halfway and held her.

"Oh-h!" There can be no way of expressing literally the strange little wailing sound which escaped her lips. It was as if some starving thing were suddenly shown food—through a glass, darkly.

HE WAS very gentle with her. "Please don't be frightened at the idea. I know it's sheer presumption of me to think of it."

"Oh-h!" It was the wailing note again.

"Oh, don't."

"You mean you wouldn't want even to consider taking my outline?" He knew that wasn't what she meant. "You couldn't be absorbed in it for yourself?"

"Absorbed! But—I couldn't do it."

"Couldn't do it! If you mean you're not equal to it—why, that's nonsense. You could do it magnificently. I don't know of anyone who could do it so well. Why, Mary, the central figure, Olivia, is just yourself. You'd have only to live the part. Don't you recognize her? If you don't, then I've told the story badly."

This brought her up short. She considered it breathlessly.

"You see?" He pressed his advantage. "You would have only to live and breathe the character of Olivia, so to speak, use your own reactions to your own experience, and then carry them on logically to Olivia's conclusions. As for Broughton—well"—and he paused, watching her downcast face with its rapidly changing expressions—"if I might dare to serve as a suggestion of him for your use. Or am I too old, too cut and dried?"

(Continued on Page 113)

Foursquare

(Continued from Page 112)

She looked at him then, and her lips curved into a hint of a laugh. "You are Broughton," she said.

"Well, then, don't you see? When you came to a place where it might be difficult to work out the psychology of their relations, you would have only to put it up to Mary Fletcher and John Kirkwood, and let them take a day off and have it out. I know this sounds horribly egoistic and perhaps melodramatic, not to say impossible, and yet I have a strong feeling that we could work together in that way and perhaps produce something that neither of us could quite do separately."

"You mean collaboration?" She suddenly put the question as if it had only just occurred to her that he might want to see his name with hers upon the title page of a book thus evolved.

HE WONDERED what else she could call a product the whole scheme for which he was to furnish. Yet it was clear that this thought gave her pause. He made haste to relieve her mind, recognizing that he had touched her pride, and that he must make concession to it—for the present, at least.

"If I might have a share," he said quietly, "a most happy share in any work of yours, by means of any help in my power, direct or indirect, I should be quite content. As an editor you must know I have long been used to doing creative work vicariously through suggestion to other minds, fitted as mine is not for the actual coinage of invention. And you will let me say this: I've never known a creative mind through which I should so like to make this vicarious expression of my own as yours. It seems to me that, if I may so put it, my mind and yours articulate."

She sat staring out at the river through the trees. As the afternoon had advanced the light had changed and deepened. Where the blue waters had sparkled earlier in the day there now lay long shadows of indigo and darkest green, with purple edges outlining the opposite shore far across. Hours had gone by since Alexandra had been left alone with her books; Mary had forgotten that she existed. If Kirkwood remembered, it made no difference to his plan of action. Hours like these were not to be cut short by any recognition of social duties.

HE SAT so still he might have been carved out of stone, while Mary looked away into space; well he knew that she was seeing nothing of the scene before her. He had said all there was any use in saying; that he readily divined. He had sown the seed; if it was to spring up at all, he would not have long to wait. Mary was in no mood to deliberate. She would come to a decision soon, he was sure, for very inability to stand the strain put upon her judgment and her will. That he had tempted her powerfully he knew; it had been in the wail of her tense voice. She was so hungry for the renewal of her ability to work that she was vulnerable now where once she would have been watchful against any declared alliance which threatened her independence, her acknowledged and outward independence. He thought she could not possibly have realized quite all that she had owed him from the beginning, nor understand that the new relation between them would be only a step farther along the road of dependence than the old.

Suddenly a question from her surprised him, and made him sit up rather tensely.

"Would you want to carry out every detail of the story, just as you sketched it?"

"You mean there's something about it you don't approve?"

"I mean there were places in it that seemed to me to—a little—forgive me, please—degrade the whole."

"You don't feel that they were logically a part of the whole and so couldn't be omitted?"

"I have been brought up to feel," she said steadily, more steadily than he would have thought possible just now, "that it is justifiable to introduce immorality only if it is made unlovely. Of course," she went on hurriedly, "I think the whole conception wonderfully fine; otherwise I shouldn't be attracted by it. But the part where Sylvia and Julian are together for so long. You see"—she stumbled over it—"as you told me I got rather the idea that you didn't mind about it, that you thought it—"

Here she stopped and the color rose in her face. But her eyes met his frankly.

He gave her back the look with a frankness apparently as great as her own, though inside he was laughing a little and saying to himself: "You beautiful little Puritan! And I love you for it too."

"I FEEL," he said as gravely as though he felt grave about it, "that it isn't always necessary for the true artist to depict only the phases of life which have the approval of the Ten Commandments. If he can give a faithful picture of the other side, if only to prove that he sees there is another side, and is not blind to it, it seems to me worth while. In my scheme for this book, don't you think the fine relation between Olivia and Broughton will be more than a foil for the questionable one between the other two? Will the reader need to have a 'Look on this picture, then on that!' to point the moral for him?"

She considered it, her brows drawn together. "It all depends, I think," she said, "on the way it is done."

"Of course it does. And in putting it into your hands I should know you'd handle such a situation as the one we're discussing with just those fine shades of discrimination which would redeem it from sordidness."

"I shouldn't want to redeem it from sordidness," she said quickly. "It is sordid; it should be made to seem so. That's precisely my point. As you told that part of the story you—unconsciously, of course—made it poetry. I don't think that's fair. I shouldn't be willing to do it."

He saw that he couldn't confuse her with words, that he must make the concession; that in spite of her longing to attempt this new and fascinating task, her conscience must be satisfied at the very start; that it should never have to impeach her for her methods.

"Mary," he said, "we shall never quarrel over your resolution to keep your work up to the standards you have set for yourself. If you'll write this book, you shall do it in your own way. I'll be satisfied if you'll let a logical realism be its basis, a logical realism, I say, mind you. You need poetize nothing that should be told in unblinking prose, if you'll just be willing"—and he looked keenly at her—"not to generalize when truth and real art demand that you draw no veils over that which should be told. As for the poetry, you can't help putting that in, and not for anything would I have you leave it out. Now will you trust me? And will you—"

HE LEFT the direct question uncompleted, except as his eagerness for the answer was in the inflection with which he began to ask it.

Mary rose to her feet and stood looking off again at the blue-and-purple shadows,

(Continued on Page 114)

Belding's

Makers of Fine Silks
for Gowns, Linings, Lingerie

For Lingerie
Lovely to look at,
luxurious to wear,
and enduring past
expectation

NEW and unusual designs for small gifts, scarves, sports hats, sweaters, bags, etc., including a full color page of cross-stitch designs—all in

Belding's Book of Silk Embroidery, Knitting, and Crochet

Fifteen Cents, at your dealer's or from Belding Bros. & Co., 902 Broadway, N.Y. Use Belding's New Process Embroidery Silks—made of pure silk—for articles which must withstand long wear or frequent launderings and Belding's Crochet Silks to give the utmost durability to crocheted articles. Belding's Syltex—a fast dye artificial silk—is especially adapted to dress embroidery.

Heirloom Plate

From Generation to Generation

BEAUTIFUL SILVERWARE!

The aristocrats of Colonial days selected their silverware with a fine discrimination, with an eye to utility as well as beauty. Silversmiths then were indeed artists—their creations are still handed down from generation to generation.

With the same ideals in mind that animated these master-craftsmen, Heirloom Plate was created. A silverware so well made, so lavishly coated with pure silver, so correctly designed, that it is well worthy of being handed down from generation to generation.

Heirloom Plate is the accepted silverware in homes of distinction. If you would know the reason for its choice, go to the nearest Heirloom Plate dealer and examine it for yourself. You will be charmed by its beauty of design, delighted with its obvious quality, and amazed at the moderate price.

Heirloom Plate may be obtained in chests or by the single piece. And every piece is guaranteed for 100 years! Write for name of a dealer near you and illustrated literature.

WM. A. ROGERS, Ltd.
Niagara Falls, N. Y.

New York Chicago San Francisco Toronto

Individual Salad Fork
$6.00 set of six

Foursquare

(Continued from Page 113)

while Kirkwood watched her. When she turned to him at length he found himself wanting to put both arms around her, as if she had been a child who was showing both her need of him and her faith in him.

"I think," she said, "I must say 'yes.' I feel like one who has come up against a stone wall, with the tide coming in behind, and no way through the wall. And then suddenly you have shown me a way through, just one way. I must take it or be swallowed up."

"Is it really like that to you?" he said very gently. "Just a way of escape? Well, then, I want you to believe that on the other side of the wall lies that glorious road you spoke of a while back, and that I can walk along it with you."

They went back to Miss Warren at last, their sense of guilt at their long desertion growing as they approached. But to their relief they found a cheerful lady just emerging from the old mansion, through which a proud and pleased caretaker had lingeringly shown her, both apparently quite content.

"AND now," said Kirkwood blithely as he led his companions back to the car, "we'll have no more of solitude. I've a little program for the evening which looks pretty good to me; I hope it will to you."

He took them to a wayside inn overlooking the river, where they dined upon attractive food and rested in comfortable chairs upon a sheltered balcony until dusk and evening fell.

Then they were in the car once more, flying up the highway in the summer darkness lighted by a thousand lights. Then they were on the ferry, crossing a dusky river, with more lights all about reflected in the water, and the cooling breeze in their faces. Then the road again, in a procession of cars, and a long string of approaching headlights facing them. And at the end of the road their own car turned smoothly in between massive gate posts, lighted fantastically with great particularized globes and hung with flowery garlands.

KIRKWOOD explained: "It's a big countryside festival, an annual affair given by the Ainsboroughs. Everybody is asked. There's everything doing all over the estate, and no rules, except that there must be no disorder. The society people think it a great lark, join in the entertaining and seem to have the time of their lives performing in all sorts of shows for the crowd. It's rather a fascinating carnival, take it on all sides. I thought, after our serious afternoon and decorous dinner, you might enjoy letting out a little."

"I'm sure we should, if you think such clothes as these we're wearing will do."

"Oh, there's no dressing for this. You'll find your hosts in sports clothes, and only a few aspiring neighbors of the newly rich type wearing evening things."

The scene they were approaching beckoned alluringly. The whole area inclosing the immense stretch of lawn lying immediately before the imposing house was given over to the various tents, stages, and smaller stands which at country fairs contain the various forms of entertainment; only in the present instance the performers—"barkers," food-dispensers and the rest—were people of another class than those to be found in country fairs. Long strings of varicolored electric lamps made all as light as day; an expensive orchestra alternated with an amateur band in furnishing real music and an amusing imitation of the blare and boom of the rustic performers of remote regions.

"Oh, this is a joy!" Mary declared as, an hour after their arrival, the three came out of a great striped red-and-white marquee in which they had been watching several noteworthy people of much social distinction produce a bit of vaudeville not unworthy the professional stage. "I don't know when I've been so amused and charmed."

"THAT'S partly because it really was a clever little show, and still more because it's so long since you've seen anything to satisfy the need of being amused and charmed," Kirkwood declared. "What do you say to a dance now in that orange-and-gold pavilion? The music's enough to pull your feet over there in spite of yourself, isn't it?"

It took but a minute to find a pleasant spot in a sort of improvised balcony for the sitters-out and to establish Miss Warren there.

Kirkwood had suddenly remembered to ask her and even to urge her, against her smiling refusal, to give him the first dance. Released from all obligation he turned away with Mary, himself keener for the coming hour than it seemed to him he had ever been for any similar experience. To dance with Mary Fletcher—he didn't quite know what that was going to be. And yet he really hadn't much doubt that it might be a little better than a first reading of her best work.

AFTER the first ten steps he had no doubt whatever. Where had she learned it? he wondered. All in five circlings of the pavilion floor she had become a creature so radiant it seemed impossible that she could have been a partner in the sober discussions of the afternoon. Kirkwood looked down upon her and marveled.

"I'm a lucky dog," said Mr. John Kirkwood to himself as he skillfully guided this partner of his through the ever-increasing difficulties of a floor becoming more and more crowded. "And it's up to me to clinch things while the iron is hot and the music's in our blood."

He led her away, when the waltz was over, and down a dimly lighted path through the shrubbery, already discovered by several other promenading couples. But he took care not to get beyond the magic of those inebriating violins.

(Continued on Page 116)

Anyone can use Valspar Varnish-Stains!

VALSPAR Varnish-Stains are Valspar itself—the waterproof, weather-proof, accident-proof varnish—plus natural wood colors. With one stroke of the brush you apply both varnish and stain.

They bring out clearly the grain and beauty of the wood and can be secured in Light Oak, Dark Oak, Walnut, Mahogany, Cherry, and Moss Green.

Wherever varnish-stains are needed to brighten up your home—use Valspar Varnish-Stains. Remember that they give the same matchless service you have always experienced with Valspar, “the varnish that won’t turn white.” They are easy to apply and dry over night.

Send for our Card showing the actual colors. See their beauty for yourself. If, however, you are sure just which color you wish, use the coupon below to send for a sample can.

Reproduction of sample can, about 1/2 actual size.

VALENTINE & COMPANY

Largest Manufacturers of High Grade Varnishes in the World—Established 1832

New York Chicago Boston Toronto London Paris Amsterdam

W. P. FULLER & Co., Pacific Coast

VALENTINE'S
VALSPAR
VARNISH-STAIN

The famous Valspar boiling water test

This coupon is worth 20 to 60 cents—
VALENTINE & COMPANY, 456 Fourth Ave., New York

I enclose dealer's name and stamps, amounting to 15c for each 35c sample can checked at right. (Only one sample of each product supplied at this special price. Write plainly.)

Valspar Stain . ☐
State color
Valspar . . . ☐
Valspar Enamel ☐
State color

Dealer's Name _____

Dealer's Address _____

Your Name _____

Your Address _____

City _____

L. H. J. 4-22

How To Enjoy Your Own Cooking

ISN'T it a shame that some of the best meals that you prepare you enjoy the least of all yourself? The reason for it is natural, of course. You spend hours in the kitchen preparing and cooking the food. You hover over pot and kettle; you frequently take a peek into the oven, and in doing so absorb the odors and a certain amount of the nutriment of the food. It is just enough to take the edge off your appetite and spoil the meal for you.

How to enjoy your own meals is answered in our book, "The Secret of Perfect Cooking," which we will gladly send you.

Cooking authorities say that the secret of perfect cooking is through gradually receding temperatures.

They say, in roasting, the raw meat should first be subjected to high temperature which browns it, seals the pores and keeps in the rich juices. The temperature should then be reduced, and cooking proceed gradually until done.

This book tells how temperatures are reached and automatically receded, without watching or waiting. It tells how you can cook the same meal just as satisfactorily, and you can stay out of the kitchen for an hour or two and sometimes more, while the meal is being cooked for you. No danger of food burning or cooking dry. You can take food up when it is done or forget about it till you are ready to serve. You will then find it hot and palatable, with an unusual delicacy of flavor.

The Secret of Perfect Cooking

—is given to you in this book; it also tells you how to save 80% on fuel, 25% in food cost, and several hours each day of your valuable time. Write today for a copy of this book, because it's

FREE

You will not only find it unusually interesting but it will show you how to make housework a joy.

Write today, address Dept. 14

THE TOLEDO COOKER CO.
TOLEDO, OHIO

Manufacturers of the Toledo Fireless Cook Stove, Ideal Aluminum Ware, Conserve Steam Cooker and Ideal Food Conveyor for Institutions

Foursquare

(Continued from Page 114)

"Mary," he said when they had walked in silence for a minute or two, "when will you come back to town?"

She looked up in surprise. "Why, when my year with Aunt Sara is up."

"Do you think you can write that book away from me?"

"You—you could come up and see me now and then, couldn't you?" Her voice sounded a trifle abstracted.

"Once in several weeks, perhaps, not oftener. Would that be enough? Think of the plot of it, of the rush of it. Could you get into the spirit of it all, walking alone along your country roads—in November?"

"I shall have to try." Evidently she was disturbed. In the light of a great rose-and-amber Japanese lantern they were passing her face showed sober again.

He hated to take the light out of it, and yet he felt that if he could ever convince her that she must come back to be at her best, his chance was now. "Remember," he bade her, "how you have struggled and worked in vain, up there in the country. The atmosphere there, for you, isn't the atmosphere you need. Do you venture to go back into it, and stay? The psychology of it, the influence, the suggestion—they're all just now, for you, of failure. Here in the Big Town, they'll all be of success again. It's worth taking into account, isn't it? Let me look you up another apartment, persuade Miss Warren to return with you, go back and let your nice little aunt give a farewell party for you, and then be settled in here for work by the first of October. Six months in the country is enough. Six months in the city will see you with the book half done. Come, tell me I'm right. You know I am."

MARY tried to say she would do it; she really tried. But the words wouldn't come. A sob rose in her throat. She had been through so much during all these weeks and months, was so tired of the long, barren effort. This whole day had been such a contrast to all that—the warmth, the kindness of it, the friendly strength offered her to lean upon when she felt so weak. John Kirkwood's plan for her was a wonderful one, his scheme for work one to grip her from first to last. But to carry it out—wasn't he right?—she must come back to town, where she could see him, consult with him as often as she needed him.

"Please say you will," said Kirkwood's persuasive voice in her ear. "A friend should be trusted, and I think you need to trust somebody just now. I promise you you shan't regret it."

So Mary promised, with a queer little sinking of the heart she couldn't wholly account for.

BACK at their hotel, hours later, Alexandra and Mary found a slip under their door announcing the arrival of a special-delivery letter for Miss Fletcher at the office below. At Mary's order it was sent up. It bore the Newcomb postmark, but the handwriting was one Mary didn't recall. With some anxiety she opened it, to find within a few lines only, above a familiar name. Somehow the very sight of that name seemed strange to her, here, at the close of the day.

Dear Mary Fletcher: I understand that your ship has reached port for repairs, and I am hoping they may be effective in putting her into perfect condition for many successful voyages. But, somehow, though I can't conceive being needed just now, I can't help standing by, as I told you I should, just outside the harbor.

Yours, as ever, MARK FENN.

As she read the words, in a clear, rather small hand of some distinction, the strange little sinking of the heart came back most unexpectedly. And presently it became a well-defined ache in the throat. But the origin of the ache seemed to have nothing to do with the writer of this rather singular message. It was connected more closely with the image of Miss Sara Graham. Mary could see her quite plainly as she would look when she was told that the year of Mary's stay with her had ended with six months!

(Continued in the May Home Journal)

The Pageant Widow

(Continued from Page 11)

This metaphor was mixed and far too splendid. Mrs. Clanton murmured something politely praiseful and took her departure, feeling vaguely diminished by this wan little figure in her faded black dress who felt crowns on her head, and called herself a "pageant."

FORMERLY the widow rarely went down into the town. The boys did her errands there. But now every day she might be seen on her way, maybe to buy a chop, and always bound for the post office—a prim little figure in her black dress, very neat, very erect, stepping along with a kind of mincing swiftness, but nothing about her to suggest that she was a pageant wearing crowns on her head. Still, as she passed by, the men sitting in front of the stores frequently rose, stood back and lifted their hats—not that she really saw them, but they saw her. They acknowledged her as men sometimes acknowledge a text from the Scriptures. The sight of her pleased them as the tune of a very old hymn brings memories of goodness and innocence, even if you are long past your own innocence and goodness. Their minds touched the hem of her garments, and all unconsciously a little virtue of her went out to them to make gentle thoughts in harsh breasts.

One day Doctor Plimpton eased back into his chair after she had passed, hooked his heels over the rung, jerked his head sideways at her back and remarked to Colonel Guilford, who roosted similarly on the next chair: "There's a woman for you! Just as God made her, just for what He made her and nothing else."

Plimpton got up and went back into his office. Guilford remained where he was. He began to drum with his fingers on the edge of his chair, a sort of scale he played of his thoughts, apparently light and strangely frivolous thoughts for a man of his age. He took out his watch and looked at it as if he wanted a certain time of day from it, and could wait, still staring at it, until the minutes intervening passed. Then he snapped the case, thrust it back in his pocket and glanced up the street toward the post office. The widow was coming again in his direction with her swift, short steps, as if she wrote a song on this pavement with her feet.

Fanny Harpeth—Guilford never called her the widow—gave him the briefest nod possible and passed on. There was no reason for a stronger recognition. They had always known each other casually, merely by polite salutations.

GUILFORD sighed and let go the reins of himself. He slumped down in his chair and muttered something which was not an invocation, probably an invective applied to himself. He was a timid man, a bachelor who had never been confirmed in his celibacy. He had never been more than a "valorous worm," romantically speaking. Still in this humble fashion he was valorous, or at least he meant to be.

Late in the afternoon of this same day the widow, seated on her porch, saw someone coming up the hill, a tall man with an opulent figure, wearing splendid tails to his coat and swinging along with an elegant air, although it was something of an effort to climb such a hill with an elegant air.

She recognized Colonel Guilford. Not only this, but when he drew nearer she

(Continued on Page 117)

(A real letter from a typical Ohio Electric owner)

The Woman Who Has Children

Philadelphia, Pa.

"I think a woman with children can appreciate best the blessing of a vacuum cleaner. Donald and Mildred are dears, but they have a perfect genius for tracking in dirt and littering the floors.

"Before I bought your cleaner, I seemed a slave to a broom, and even then the rugs and carpets were never really clean. But now the daily cleaning is very simple, and the floors are always perfectly sanitary and safe for the children to play on.

"I bought your cleaner because I found it the simplest and strongest of all I looked at. I have never had the slightest trouble with it, and my friends who have Ohios say the same thing. I have seen nearly all the different kinds of cleaners, but I prefer the Ohio because it has both strong suction and a really good revolving brush.

"Your cleaner is so light I carry it easily, yet it will stand the hardest use. I think it is a real woman's cleaner.

"I bought my Ohio on the installment plan, and found that the economy of it more than paid the small payments."

Sincerely,

(Name and Address on Request)

The United Electric Company
1300 Eighth Street, N. E.
CANTON, OHIO, U. S. A.

OHIO

ELECTRIC CLEANER

Let us send full details and the Ohio divided payment plan.

Big white grains full of flavor

Comet

Uncoated White Rice

ONE POUND NET WEIGHT

Comet

Uncoated White Rice

SEABOARD MILLING

© 1922 S. B. M. Co.

Ever Tired of Potatoes?

THEN try Comet Rice for a change. Cook it the Comet way, and serve with gravy. Comet Rice served at breakfast with sugar and cream is another delicious dish.

There are so many delightful ways of serving Comet Rice. And the family appreciates variety, too.

Comet Rice comes in a clean, dustproof package. It is the finest quality grown in this country.

Order Comet Rice today. Serve it often in place of the everlasting potato and note the appreciation of the family!

Cook Rice Right—THE COMET WAY

HEAT 6 cups water, with pinch of salt, in large saucepan. When boiling violently, add slowly 1 cup Comet Rice. Continue boiling 20 minutes—or until grains are soft. Drain in colander, set on back of stove until grains fall apart. Do not cover—that makes rice heavy and soggy.

TRY COMET NATURAL BROWN RICE. Ever taste whole rice? It retains the vitamins and natural bran coating. Doctors recommend it. Highly nourishing.

Seaboard Rice Milling Co.
Galveston and New York

The Pageant Widow

(Continued from Page 116)

perceived that his eyes were fixed searchingly upon her flowering boxes, as if he asked these blossoms if anyone else was at home.

She stood up, her face merely a whiter bloom above the geraniums. She was always alarmed now when she saw some unusual person ascending the hill; she so constantly expected bad news of her sons. This was why she took no intelligent notice of the way the colonel was wearing his hat.

SHE should have known that a bearer of sad tidings never comes with his hat sitting like a cock robin on his head. He wears it honestly and dolorously.

"Colonel Guilford, has—has anything happened?" she cried to him the moment he came opposite her.

"Why, no," he returned, startled at this question so far from his purpose, which, of course, was a secret purpose.

"I feared, when I saw you coming, that there was a message," she stammered.

"A message?" he repeated vaguely.

"About one of the boys," she murmured.

"You have not heard from them?"

"Not since the St. Mihiel drive—five weeks," she said, her voice trailing into a whisper.

She could stand it, she told him; but nothing could relieve her anxiety until she heard from the boys. He endeavored to distract her attention from this anguishing subject. This could not be done, either. She could think now only of the fate of her sons. She began to talk about them. From that she began to talk of herself. She had so little to do now, since the boys were gone. Nothing to sew or mend or plan. Wasn't it dreadful how the war had dashed all plans and stopped the future from coming on?

He was sympathetic. He would go himself to the post office for the evening mail; perhaps there would be letters for her. Well, if he only would, she entreated. Certainly, he would do anything for her, he implied delicately. But this was not the time to make that as broad and plain and personal as he meant it. What he really said was that he was out for a walk, but he would cut it short and go back for the mail.

Then he took his leave and went down the hill, thinking heavily that he had been near making a frightful blunder. What if he had told her that he thought she had planted a lily among her geraniums, when he came up just now and saw her face above them? What if he had said that, with her thinking only of her sons! He was out of practice, that was it. A man must be as limber as an acrobat, self-effacing at the right moment, tremendously apparent and effective also at the right moment, to court a woman.

THE widow watched him striding back down the hill, his magnificent coat tails convoluting in the soft September air. She wondered why he had never married. He was a "nice man." Then having tacked this little, narrow blue-ribbon adjective to him, she went on thinking about her sons.

There were no letters for her in the evening mail, he telephoned. No doubt she would get them in the morning, and so on, and so forth, but not much "and so forth" because the widow's voice over the wire indicated that she did not care to talk under the circumstances, namely, that William might be dead or wounded in France, and John might be a prisoner in Germany, and she did not know where Roger was.

You may become a sort of physician without ever taking an M.D. degree, and no quack at that. The next afternoon Guilford closed his office at five o'clock and started off to make this kind of professional call. That poor, little woman up there on the hill suffering the anguish of terrible suspense greatly needed someone to look after her. It was not his business, but he would make it his business! The romantic impulse in its earlier stages is one of the most unselfish and noblest inspirations of which a man is capable. He saw the widow as he approached her house. She was coming down the steps. She was flushed with happiness; her eyes sang at him; her lips were smiling.

"Two letters from William, and four from John," she exclaimed, joyfully waving the sheaf of them over the gate.

Well, he was very glad. He had not rested the night before, thinking of her anxiety, he told her.

THIS was so good of him, she said, but not as if she had time to be more than passingly grateful. She must read William's letter to him. He would see then what a fine soldier William was. He saw and expatiated on the same. But wait! Now listen to this last letter from John! He waited and listened. And having finished she looked at him with that crown-on-her-head look. Wonderful, he vowed. Took courage to sail around fifteen thousand feet up in the air. He doubted if he had such courage himself. It was a sort of instinct with him to keep his feet on the ground. Ah, John was very brave, she returned sedately, as if such bravery was incomparable with that of ordinary mortals, and it was scarcely to be expected that he should even remotely connect himself with it.

She went on talking about these boys. For them her roses bloomed, her eyes shone, her smiles came. He was ashamed of his secret annoyance and made a gallant effort to outdo her in praise of these confounded boys.

The only satisfaction he had as he went back down the hill was that he had pleased her, but not himself.

This was the beginning of his courtship of Fanny Harpeth, one which he was obliged to conceal from the widow herself. He called every day now to get whatever news she had from the Front. If she had none, she entertained him with the whole history of her boys.

He could never break through with a personal word which was not personal to them. Good heavens! Couldn't she think of anything else—himself, for example? He deserved a thought, and he was only an audience.

HE BORE with her through the Argonne battle. Then came the armistice. He thanked heaven, not only for the end of the war, but for his own sake. He meant now to take a firmer hand with the widow. He hoped she had appreciated his consideration in not pressing his suit while the guns were booming along the Front in France. He did not think she was entirely blind to what was in his heart. He had occasionally caught a glance which was personal to him, startled, quickly given, quickly withdrawn, a flash of blue as the wing of her thought disappeared.

The question was how now to proceed. For who by taking thought can tell the east and west of a widow's mind? She may have been watching you through the thin muslin curtains of her mind since the beginning of your affair. She may have refused you long ago and only waits until her own convenient season to tell you so.

One evening late in November the widow's parlor had an expectant air. This was a bright, clean, little room with nothing in it worth anything, only the good, kind look of cherished things. The oak table wore a large, red blotter with two slender brass candlesticks at each end, holding brand-new candles. There were a few books, the only ones she had with gilt edges, so disposed that these edges glistened in the firelight. The red roses in the faded rug before the hearth had been beaten

(Continued on Page 118)

FREE Sample Bottle

and the Wonderful Cook Book, "Flavoring Secrets"

WE have a surprise for you—a vanilla extract of 100% purity and 150% strength!

And to let you find out for yourself what a wonderful thing that is, we will send you a sample bottle, free—with enough pure vanilla in it for 10 desserts!

In one teaspoonful of Virginia Dare 150% Strength Vanilla there is as much flavor as there is in almost two teaspoonfuls of ordinary vanilla. Do you realize what an economy that is?

Besides, so pure is the richness of Virginia Dare Double-Strength Extracts, that it will give your desserts a new and undreamed-of deliciousness.

Lewis B. Allyn, noted pure food authority, pronounces it without question the best vanilla.

VIRGINIA DARE
Double-Strength EXTRACTS

You needn't take our word for it. Just mail the coupon, and get your sample bottle and the remarkable cook book, "Flavoring Secrets." In it are recipes for 21 other delicious Virginia Dare Extracts—all double strength—all so rich that they can neither cook out in baking nor freeze out in ice creams.

FREE OFFER

Garrett & Company, Inc.

10 Bush Terminal, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Please send me, free, a sample bottle of Virginia Dare 150% Strength Vanilla, together with your recipe book, "Flavoring Secrets." I enclose 10c to cover postage and packing.

Name _____

Address _____

State _____

"TASTE THE TASTE"

THE GREATEST Sandwich IN THE WORLD

for camping trips, for motor trips, for every picnic party. Made in a jiffy too. Just open a can of Underwood's Deviled Ham and spread it as you would butter on thin, crustless slices of fresh white bread and you have "the greatest sandwich in the world" ready to pack in the luncheon kit.

If you could see the choice salted, sugared, hickory-smoked hams. If you could see them boiling to wonderful tenderness in covered kettles such as you'd use in your own home. If you could see these hams chopped fine, you'd have still to see the great secret of that wonderful taste. The taste that comes only when the famous Underwood deviled dressing is added.

If you have not yet tasted Underwood Deviled Ham Sandwiches don't go on another picnic party without taking some with you. Get a can or two from your grocer today. If he cannot supply you send 25c in stamps for trial can—enough for a dozen sandwiches.

WM. UNDERWOOD COMPANY
52 Fulton Street, Boston, Mass.

Underwood Deviled HAM

Look for this seal of quality on Underwood's Sardines in Oil, Tomato Sauce, and Mustard Dressing; on Underwood's Clam Chowder, Clam Bouillon, and Clams in Bouillon.

"IN BUSINESS
OVER 100 YEARS"

The Pageant Widow

(Continued from Page 117)

and dusted until they bloomed faintly. Pots of geraniums on the window casements flared red clusters of blossoms. The white scrim curtains were looped back and spread their tails stiffly. There was a bookcase against the wall filled with terrible volumes, theological, yielding nothing to the carnal nature of man, but softened now in this room by the deeper shadows; elder gospels in the gloom, with a vivid and opulent panel of roses hung above to catch the eye, like immortal hopes.

A large armchair, cushioned with red and gray rep which had faded, yawned on one side of the fire. A small chair, with a wicker back and bottom in black woodwork, balanced itself delicately on its rockers opposite the big chair, as if not for anything would it lean too far back or cross its legs.

IN THIS glowing, softened brightness the widow moved about in her black dress, very busy, very thoughtful, which is a mature form of being demure. The somber dress brought out the whiteness of her skin, the pale roses of her cheeks, the blueness of her eyes and the dull fairness of her hair; a pretty woman who had forgotten to put on her brows; these little, picked, ragged lines above her eyes showed like the careless stroke of an artist, but honest, when she might have made ends clearer by applying the burned end of a match. This was the best she could do for herself. She dressed and prinked the room instead. Maybe it was her housewifely instinct, maybe it was her womanly instinct. Anyhow, the effect was enhancing chiefly to her, as a rare and beautiful frame brings out the sweetness and purity of a good, worn, little woman's face.

Then the doorbell rang, and old Mary, who always came in for the night, since the boys were gone, let the colonel in.

To Guilford it was like getting into the ever-loving alabaster box to be allowed to enter this room. It soothed him and filled him with longing at the same time for a presence that could make a place like this. She received him neatly, a little primly, as became her dress.

"I am always so glad to see you," she said, when they were at last seated before the fire.

THEY talked about a few things, nothing of any consequence. She was afraid, she said, that it would still be a long time before the boys came home.

"It is bad for you living up here alone," he returned.

"I have Mary," she answered.

"But no companion, no one in whom you can really confide."

"Only you," she answered simply. "You have been so kind. I may have taxed your patience, talking so much about the boys," she added, regarding him entreatingly.

"Not at all," he returned heartily, giving her what she wanted as usual. "It has been, I may say, my chief pleasure to be of some comfort to you."

"Well, the worst of it is over now, and they will come home at last," she said.

"But not to stay."

"Not to stay?" she repeated.

"They will never settle down in Cranbrook. There is nothing here for such men as you have made them. They are different. They belong to the world. They will make their way in it, but not here," he said, giving her a look.

She did not return it. She sat with her hands folded, staring into the fire. "I have thought of that," she answered after a pause.

"Do you know the hardest thing I have had to bear, except the fear of their wounds and death in this war?" she asked.

"This loneliness," he replied.

"No, not that. There has been so little I could do for them, nothing to make or mend for them. When you have spent your whole life giving and doing and loving, it is like losing your life when there is nothing else to be done for love."

"And you are still young."

"No; not young."

"Yes," he insisted; "too young to have finished with love and living."

A SILENCE fell between them and rested there, like a secret speech each whispered to the other. For one moment the color flamed in her cheeks, then faded. Here was his chance. He knew what to say and—could not say it. He was under "control." She made a gesture, or was it a glance, which said plainly: "I am a trust to keep for my sons. This is my duty."

Women, especially the best of them, are astoundingly unscrupulous.

Here was Fanny Harpeth in bondage to her sons; and yet she had been at great pains not an hour since to make this room the very charm that love makes with far more subtlety than a maid who exploits just herself, and for Guilford who had no notion that she was capable of such duplicity. In fact, it was not duplicity, it was the covetousness of every woman for love. Not one of them ever gets enough.

Guilford went home that night spellbound by a single thought. He had suddenly got a hint of how to win this woman. He had discovered at last the kind of woman Fanny Harpeth was. She must perform sacrifices and services. Her life had been a ritual of such piety as that. Therefore he need only to prove his need of her. He must appeal to her maternal instincts, show his rags, become a potential Lazarus at the gates of her love. This is the oldest and strongest appeal to women. Every man makes it.

THE next time Guilford called on the widow he wore a shirt with disgracefully frayed cuffs, a mere hint to see how she would take it. He was encouraged. She fixed her eyes at once on these fringed wristbands. She had less to say than usual about her sons. She was distracted by needle thoughts. Guilford added to her distress by pulling off the raveled threads of his cuffs as if he was accustomed to doing this. Also, he gave evidence of deep depression. But to her diffidently expressed concern for his health he replied that he was quite well, only tired of the monotony of life. No real incentive to achieve much for a man in his position. He supposed she knew all about that feeling now? No, she did not. Well, of course, not yet, he answered broodingly, because she had had something to accomplish and live for.

She stirred at this use he made of the pluperfect tense, "had had," a ditch he dug with two words between her busy past and her vacuous future.

"But you will know, now that your sons are grown and out of the way," he went on, giving her a pitying prophetic glance.

She was too much disturbed not only by his ravelings but his mood to make a suitable reply.

From this time forth he went carefully to pieces morally and sartorially. He let her know that his life had been and would be a failure. He played upon her compassion with no compunctions.

One winter afternoon Plimpton entered Guilford's front office, which was already dark in the December twilight. He was about to go on into the private office, the door of which was open, when he was arrested by what he saw going on in there. Guilford was sitting before his desk, grinning

(Continued on Page 120)

Fatigued or just healthily tired?

Specially made to suit you exactly—a corset should be a vitality-giving companion, helping to bring you unfatigued to the close of each busy day

THE end of an active day—does it find you physically and mentally worn and weary, or can you enjoy the relief of relaxing healthy muscles, tired but unstrained? Much of the answer depends upon your corset.

How vital correct corseting is to the active American Woman of today! That is why our women in ever growing numbers fail to be satisfied with anything but a corset measured, and fitted individually, with a stay that yields to every movement of a supple body, yet gives firm support. In addition to this greater assurance of comfort, health, and style, your NuBone Corset, reasonably priced, will soon prove itself a decided economy.

From the moment your NuBone Corset is slipped on in the morning, you feel its benefits. The first will be that you are so much less conscious of wearing a corset. It supports and strengthens your body in your day's domestic, business, social, or outdoor activities. It never hinders, never stiffens your body in its natural movements. It helps your body to do your alert mind's bidding—adds to the buoyant spontaneity of your enjoyment of a full day's activities.

The NuBone Corsetière will give you freedom from the inconvenience and from the even dangerous results of ordinary corsetry. She is a woman of taste, and experience, and training in the art of corsetry who looks upon the service to her clients as a profession. A NuBone Corsetière will come to you in your own home and there, in its privacy, she will study the lines of your figure; will take the careful measurements required to make a corset to meet your particular needs. Presently she will return to fit your corset, and to reveal to you the secret of correct adjustment. Your NuBone Corset then must meet, as no other corset can, the exact needs of your figure.

More than that, your NuBone Corsetière will give you a corset that will add charm to your most modest gown—she might indeed be suspected of being in league with your dressmaker not only to enhance the natural lines of your figure but to give you the subtle atmosphere of easy grace so envied in the truly well-gowned woman.

And the secret of NuBone's strengthening support, its ready yielding—its flexibility—is the stay of finest woven piano wire. This is the only Woven Wire Stay and is used only in NuBone Corsets. A written guarantee accompanies every NuBone Corset. Look in your telephone book, call the NuBone Corsetière and ask her to tell you more about this NuBone Stay and the Corset it makes possible, or write us at the address given below, and we will immediately put you in touch with her. Be assured that this will not obligate you in the least. We

Bends edgewise as easily as flatwise

The NuBone Woven Wire Stay

NuBone is the only Woven Wire Stay in existence. The machines that weave the strands of finest piano wire into the NuBone Stay are patented, owned and operated by The NuBone Corset Company only. The Stays are used only in NuBone Corsets.

The Woven construction produces a flat, thin, smooth and light stay, having extreme flexibility combined with great strength. It permits the utmost freedom of motion and is guaranteed to support fully any type of figure.

The NuBone Stay will not rust or break. It bends edgewise as easily as flatwise, without twisting or turning. It will lengthen or shorten, give or take, to meet any strain. This prevents the "end thrust" and "side thrust" which are so uncomfortable and so destructive to corsets and gowns.

The economy of NuBone Corsets is due, first, of course, to the moderate purchase price, but then also to the ease and possible frequency of washing. Both the stay and the fabrics can go through many a laundering without showing it.

A Written Guarantee with every NuBone Corset

A written guarantee accompanies every NuBone Corset, under the terms of which the old corset is replaced by a new one, free of charge, if a NuBone Stay rusts or breaks within a year.

The Only Woven Wire Stay in the World should like to mail you a copy of our new Style Book. Just send us your name and address. It will be mailed to you at once.

The NuBone Corset Company, 25th at Ash St., Erie, Pa.

NuBone Corsets are Designed and Made according to your NuBone Corsetière's orders at Corry, Pa. Erie, Pa. Los Angeles, Cal.

ENGLAND
Madam May's
London, W. 14

SOUTH AFRICA
E. S. Howard
Johannesburg

AUSTRALIA
L. L. Lucas & Co.
Melbourne

NEW YORK CITY
NuBone Corset Shop
Aerian Building

NuBone INDIVIDUALLY FITTED Corsets

SOLD ONLY THROUGH CAREFULLY TRAINED NUBONE CORSETIÈRES

The Chafing Dish Supper

R & R

Look for the name stamped in both ends of tin

Boned Chicken

The lure of the chafing dish is complete when R & R Boned Chicken plays the title rôle.

What is better than Chicken Creole or Chicken à la King served steaming hot from the chafing dish? Or what is so sensible and economical as merely lifting a tin of R & R Boned Chicken from the pantry shelf to make one of these delightful recipes?

Supper is the favorite meal of most folks. Menu-makers should take a tip and reserve a large space on the pantry shelf for R & R Boned Chicken.

Solid chicken meat, with the wholesome country flavor, cooked ready to serve and packed in sanitary tins. For home or outing use, it is a favorite and a convenience.

At Your Grocer's

Other R & R Products

Plum Pudding
Ported Ham
Ported Tongue
Ported Chicken
French Process Prunes
(in glass jars)

The contents of a tin are equal to three times the quantity of uncooked meat.

RICHARDSON & ROBBINS
DOVER DELAWARE
ESTABLISHED 1855

The Pageant Widow

(Continued from Page 118)

and very busy. Plimpton saw him hold out one side of the coat he was wearing and cut two buttons from it with his penknife. Then he reared in his chair, looked down at his vest, deliberately chose a crucial button and cut it off.

But it was not until Guilford seized the tail of his coat and tore at the lining that the doctor became thoroughly alarmed. The man was mad, violent. He strode into the room. Guilford looked up, startled. "What's the matter with you?" Plimpton demanded. "Nothing. Why?"

"Well, a man does not tear up his clothes unless something ails him," Plimpton exclaimed, fixing his eyes on a portion of the lining which hung from the tail of his coat. "Are you ill?" he insisted.

"No," Guilford answered mildly. He stood up and regarded himself with interest. "What is the effect you get?" he asked.

"That of a lunatic," Plimpton replied. "Not the one I planned," Guilford mused, still studying this effect.

"What had you planned?"

Guilford resumed his chair; he toyed with the penknife which lay upon the desk, a slow grin beginning to widen every feature of his face. The doctor continued to regard him suspiciously. "You know women, don't you?" Guilford asked.

"I've been a physician for twenty-five years—ought to know women," Plimpton answered; "but what has that got to do with this?" he wanted to know.

"I—well, I was just going up to call on Fanny Harpeth."

"In that fix! And what for?"

"To give her something else to think about besides her sons. I'm in love with her."

"By Jove!" Plimpton exclaimed, dropping into a chair and staring at Guilford.

"I've seen a good deal of her since the boys went over. And the burden of her heart is that she has no one to cook, keep, sew and mend for since they are gone. I have tried every way to change the subject, attract her attention. Finally, I worked it out. For the last month I have been going to pieces before her very eyes. It works like a charm. She is so worried about me, she is beginning to care for me. Understand?"

Plimpton let himself go in a roar of laughter. He held his sides and whooped. "Well, you've overdone it," he said at last.

"No, you cannot overdo it with a woman. I've found that out. They demand the italics of every emotion," Guilford retorted. "This is my last grand-stand play," he said, getting up and putting on his coat and hat.

An hour later he was sitting before Mrs. Harpeth's parlor fire. She sat like a little old daguerreotype of faded prettiness on the opposite side. What a man could do for himself was so well done, that is to say, he was so well shaven and barbered and brushed that she did not at once detect that all the things which only a woman can do for a man needed doing. Then she saw his emergencies, the buttonless coat, the gaping vest, the hem slouching over his heel. Oh, horrors, that breadth of lining hanging from his coat! For some time she had noticed growing evidences of disrepair. The poor man! had he no sense of his condition?

Apparently not. Guilford was talking with a fine disregard for his dilapidated state. "After all," he said, "life is merely an appearance, then a disappearance. Why are we so concerned, then, for our happiness?" he asked her in a fine, rolling bass.

She could not answer. A duty was pressing upon her like a pain in her side.

"I might have been something; but what does it matter? Presently I shall be nothing. Why struggle? I feel myself slipping. Despair—it is a drug, powerful; did you know that? Why, Fanny, what is this?" he exclaimed, looking across at her, startled by the sound of a suppressed sob.

"Oh, it is all so sad," she moaned, her eyes filled with tears.

"That you cannot love me, yes," he said. "But I can. I do!" she cried, regarding him pityingly.

"THAT makes all the difference," he said. A moment later, with her head upon his breast, his arms infolding her.

But only a moment of this, one little moment against so many years to come.

She drew away from him, gently but firmly. "The boys!" she said.

"What have they to do with this, your happiness and mine?" he exclaimed.

"When—you have children," she began slowly, "they—finally—do not belong to you, but you always belong to them."

"Nonsense; we belong to each other now."

"I cannot promise so much now. The world, everything is different; they must find me—not changed—when they come home," she said as one recites a creed.

"But you do not know when they will come. It may be months, a year. We—"

"I had forgotten to tell you, I was so disturbed to see you—like this," glancing furtively at his coat; "but to-day I had a wire from William. They have landed in New York. To-morrow I go to meet them." Then she gave him a tearful smile. "It seems strange I should have forgotten to tell you such news," she said.

It was a compliment to him, this forgetfulness; he admitted that it was. He made the most of it and was obliged to be contented with the best she could do for him, which was that he should wait for his answer until she had welcomed her sons.

Two days later he had a brief note from her, which read:

Dear Colonel Guilford: It is so difficult to write what I must say. I fear you will not understand, but I know you will forgive. My sons claim me. As a mother, I am sacred to them. As your wife, I could not be. I dare not outrage their idealism to accomplish your happiness or my own. Faithfully yours,
FRANCES HARPETH.

Guilford sent his clothes to a tailor and went back to his law practice, so refreshed by this whiff of a romance that within a year he had distinguished himself for the first time in a famous case before the supreme court of the state.

Meanwhile the little widow sits alone in her house. She still haunts the post office for letters from her sons, who are all doing well, she will tell you, in their chosen professions. And yes, she is very well herself—only a little tired with nothing to do. Strange how wearisome idleness is. But the boys take such wonderful care of her. She must rest and do as she pleases. She is the Scriptures for her sons, their poetry and their ideal. It is like being a little gilt-edged book laid away in a drawer, not read, known by heart, sometimes quoted. So she is beginning to fade. She is getting that futile, innocent look of age in her eyes. She has passed. She only wonders vaguely how it happened. And any woman can tell her. But not one of them will do it.

Nufashond Soutache Braid—firm and silky. For the new knotwork and braiding designs.

Nufashond Shoe Laces with the non-slip tip, self-color. Won't run, that the horse can come off.

A Touch of Rick Rack Braid lifts a frock out of the commonplace. The simplest little chambray and the fine French linen are both enhanced by this braid of saucy points.

Nufashond Rick Rack Braid lies perfectly flat and its points are sharp and uniform, not wavy and uncertain. The colors—all fast colors—range from the demure to the vividly gay and form delightful contrasts with the material of your frock.

There are countless designs for trimming frocks and household linens, underwear and baby clothes in the Nufashond Rick Rack Book which you can secure at your store or we will send on receipt of 25c.

A length of Nufashond Rick Rack, sufficient for trimming a handkerchief, with instructions for making will be sent upon receipt of 4c to cover mailing. Write for it today.

NUFASHOND, READING, PA.

Nufashond
TRADE MARK REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.
NOTIONS

Nufashond Rick Rack Braid—be sure to read the sample after at bottom of page.

Nufashond Middy Laces and Braid—a smart braid for crimping collar and cuffs and a lace with the fabric, self-color tip.

Nufashond Shoulder Strapping for dainty lingerie. No ready attached—washes beautifully.

Nufashond Elastic—real live snappy rubber—all the widths you want.

Nufashond Lingerie Braid—washes beautifully. Packed in glassine envelope with bodkin attached.

Nufashond Corner Laces—the same fabric tip which will not run nor pick the underwear, self-color.

Three Nufashond Books:

Rick Rack Book—delightful designs and how to make them—25c.

Lace Book—dainty lacy things to wear and for the home—25c.

Knotwork Book—designs for use of Nufashond Soutache Braid—10c.

Or the three books for 50c.—at your store or from us direct.

"If it's a Nufashond Notion it's good."

Nufashond Edgetrim—a dainty finish for your own and the children's summer frocks and aprons. As dainty as Madras handwork, a bottom-hole stretch which will launder well and not fray.

McCallum
Silk Hosiery

"You just know she wears them"

McCallum Numbers 105-113-122-199 in black; and 152-153-199 in colors, are the superb stockings on which the McCallum reputation was built. Every woman who sees them wants them—she must have them.

McCALLUM HOSIERY COMPANY, Northampton, Mass.

Where I Test Ladies' Home Journal Recipes

By CAROLINE B. KING

Whose Articles on Cooking and Housekeeping Can Be Found in No Other Woman's Magazine

When I worked out the plans for my kitchen I kept the idea of smoothness before me constantly; I had all the free edges of the woodwork beveled, so that they may be easily cleaned; the plaster is hard and firm; there are no dirt-alluring crevices in the floor, which meets the walls tightly. There is no line to break the wall space, no rail or molding or shelves jutting into the room, no wainscoting, nothing at all to mar the effect of smoothness and evenness. The woodwork, while not quite flush with the plaster, projects so slightly that it is almost on a level with the wall.

All this may sound as though my kitchen might be a rather severe and unattractive place. But I have tried to make it beautiful as well as sanitary and efficient. I spent more time in the selection of its furnishings and decorations than I did on those for the living room, purchasing them not only with a thought for their durability and utility, but their beauty as well. Yellow, the most cheerful of all colors, is the note which prevails. A warm, sunshiny yellow are the walls, with a smooth unglazed white in the woodwork to contrast with them. Both are washable, and so are sanitary as well as cheerful.

The yellow note in my decorations is repeated in the checked gingham curtains at the windows. Yellow, too, is most of my kitchenware and crockery. Some of the prettiest pieces came from the five-and-ten-cent stores; others I discovered in arts-and-crafts shops or department stores.

The floor of my kitchen is of narrow Georgia-pine boards, stained and waxed until they shine. A linoleum rug of tan and brown, extending to within two feet of the walls, adds to the cozy, cleanly effect of the room and harmonizes well with the general color scheme. My floor is easily kept in shining order and has a resiliency which would have been lacking in tiles or cement. In front of the sink is a mat of white rubber bordered with brown that is restful to the feet; and as it may be washed with the hose, it is practical.

Utensils are Systematically Arranged

MY WORKTABLE and a smaller table beside the sink are white, with porcelain tops, and the chairs are also white. So my kitchen, with pots of green herbs and plants in the windows, is one of the pleasantest places in the house.

The dresser and cabinet and cupboard combined, between the dining-room door and the pantry, is a wonderful aid to good housekeeping. Glass doors inclose four eight-inch shelves above the open space, and below it are six drawers, deep and wide. A tall, narrow closet at the right of the dresser is divided into a small cupboard at the top and a long shallow one beneath. The latter provides a place for brooms, brushes, ironing board, clothespin bag, and implements for cleaning silver, brass, windows, and the like, while the small cupboard above is useful for storing extra laundry supplies.

Behind the glass doors of the dresser are stored my kitchen bowls and pottery, my yellow cereal-and-spice jars, my brown casseroles and my glass baking dishes. One shelf is relegated to my cookbooks, for I have quite a library of them in my kitchen.

In the deep drawers beneath the dresser I have established a system which has saved me many an hour, usually spent in hunting for some certain pan or egg beater that never had any place to call its own. My system is that of grouping utensils pertaining to various types of work, so that when one is ready to begin an undertaking everything necessary for its accomplishment is at hand immediately. Thus, everything needful in baking is placed in the upper left-hand drawer—pan, cutters, and so on, are all right at hand when I want them. In the second drawer are grouped the implements for mixing, beating, stirring, straining, rolling, whipping, and the like; and in the lower drawer my tools for fancy cookery and unusual dishes. The other upper drawer is used for my kitchen office supplies, an inkstand that will not spill, paper pads, pencils, rubber bands, paste and brush, labels, and so on. Here also are toothpicks, skewers, paper napkins, pie collars, chop frills and a pincushion supplied with pins and threaded needles.

The towels and kitchen aprons fill the next drawer. The bottom drawer is used for the ironing tools. The open shelf between the upper and lower sections of the cupboard holds tea caddy, mortar and pestle, and some of my laboratory implements, but nothing more unless it be a pair of candlesticks or a tray, which are permitted because of the nice note they add to the decorative scheme.

The pantry is both a place for food supplies—not kept in either the refrigerator or the cellar—and for the larger utensils. The food products are given the shelves at one end of the pantry, all foods not received in tightly covered tins or cartons being placed in yellow crockery jars or yellow-painted tin receptacles, each of which is fitted with a substantial cover. Canned goods and surplus supplies, and such large utensils as are not frequently required, are placed on the top shelf, which, by the way, is not as "unget-at-able" as most top shelves, for I have a set of small steps, very inconspicuous, but strong and well made, in my pantry, and these, being on rollers, may be pushed from place to place as they are required.

All the other things in the pantry are grouped and so arranged that they are easily accessible. A six-inch shelf, placed midway between two of the wider shelves, is very useful; on it I keep all my flavoring extracts, spice boxes, sauces, baking powder, and the rest of those small articles which, in the ordinary pantry, are apt to be hidden behind larger jars and bottles. A tin box, which also stands on this shelf, holds my little jar of vegetable colors, a small box of candied rose leaves and cherries, another of little silver candies for decorating cakes, some strips of angelica, and the collection of very minute pastry or icing tubes which I use in making the ornaments on cakes or desserts. With this box at hand I find it the work of only a few moments to transform a plain dessert into a very fancy affair, and to make a birthday cake look pretty enough to please the most fastidious little boy or girl.

Ready for Visitors

THE pantry shelves are painted white and smooth, like the woodwork in the kitchen, on both surfaces. They are very easy to keep clean and sanitary when treated in this way, and the decorative note is added in the rather artistic lace-paper edging which I fasten to the shelves with white thumb tacks. This border may be renewed whenever necessary without disturbing the shelves.

Each of the kitchen tables contains drawers, and in these the smaller tools, all classified and grouped, are kept. One drawer holds only knives—chopping knife, paring knives, large kitchen knife, grapefruit knife, spatulas of different sizes and the glass knife for slicing oranges and lemons. In another drawer are spoons, and I have a large assortment of them—for mixing, beating, stirring and measuring. The third drawer contains the tools that any household requires daily, screw driver, hammer, boxes of tacks, and so on.

As to my utensils, I try always to have every convenience that I believe will honestly help me in my work, but not a single superfluous one. I have a whole series of egg beaters, one small enough to beat one egg yolk in a cup, one so large I sometimes use it for beating mashed potatoes. I have a bread mixer, and a pressure cooker, and a most efficient broiler for use on top of the range.

My dish pan is a substantial one of block tin, resting on rubber feet and fitting into the sink in a neat manner, because of its rectangular shape. It has a stopper and strainer. My dish drainer has almost eliminated the drying of dishes.

Among the smaller implements I have wooden paddles, strainers, lemon and orange squeezers, ice shredders, pastry forks for cutting the shortening into the flour, apple corers, vegetable cutters, kitchen shears, a porcelain rolling pin that keeps my pastry cool, and a dozen other tools which, small though they are, I would miss greatly were they to vanish.

As far as possible I have tried to eliminate noise in my kitchen. Therefore, I have had everything that could be so treated fitted with rubber knobs, rubber pads or rubber strips. Rubber heels on the shoes of the helper in the kitchen do much toward maintaining quiet and a peaceful mind.

My kitchen is a busy place while work is going on, but when everything is finished, then nothing is permitted to remain in view that pertains to the working hours. I know that many housewives like the appearance of business which rows of pots and pans on the wall give to a kitchen; but I like the "cleaned up and ready for visitors air" of the kitchen, cleared of working implements, each immaculate utensil in its place on the neat shelves, or in drawers, and the pots and bowls and jars behind the glass doors of the cupboard—all assuring me that not only is my kitchen clean from my housewife's standpoint, but that it is sanitary and wholesome as well.

Covered Oval Baker
2-in-1 Baking and
Serving Dish

When an Onion is not an "Onion"

BAKE an onion in the new Pyrex Covered Oval Baker and you will declare it deserves a more enticing name. This is merely a hint of the many delightful uses of the Pyrex two-in-one baking and serving dish. The top and bottom are really separate dishes for general use. Put them together and you have a baker that works wonders with many foods.

This Pyrex Baker is another of the 50 new designs in

PYREX

The Original Transparent Ovenware

Saves Pan Scouring

Pyrex oven cookery has won millions of women to its economy, its superiority in flavor and the advantage of serving food hot on the table in the same attractive dish.

Five of the essential Pyrex dishes (shown below) comprising a Pie Plate, Utility Dish, Bread Pan, Casserole and Pudding Dish, are the selection of thousands of women as the right beginning of a Pyrex equipment—useful every meal, every day. A Royal gift for any occasion or season.

Your dealer's stock now comprises 100 shapes and sizes. New 1922 prices are back to the 1918 standards.

Pyrex will not break from oven heat.

This trade mark identifies the genuine Pyrex

Pyrex Sales Division

CORNING GLASS WORKS, Corning, New York
Originators and Patentees of Oven Glassware

5 of the Essential
Pyrex dishes for every home

Colette Cooks Eggs

By MARIE JACQUES

WHEN the Story Teller said that she wanted to come and stay I was ever so pleased. For a long while I had liked and admired her at a respectful distance; and the thought of having her under my own roof and all to myself was enchanting. But there was just one thorn in my rose-leaf bed. The Story Teller is a food faddist of a most pronounced type; and what was Colette going to say about that?

I mentioned gently that a lady was coming to stay on Saturday. Colette looked pleased. She likes visitors.

"I will kill the little pig—the one with a black spot near his tail," said she.

"But that's just the trouble," I explained; "this lady eats no meat."

"The fish merchant passes only on Thursdays," said Colette hastily. (She detests fish, and cooks it worse than anything else.)

"She doesn't eat fish either. She lives entirely on eggs."

Colette screwed up her brown old face into the most severe of wrinkles. "Is she a delicate eater?" demanded she.

I hesitated. But truth and a cold in the head must come out sooner or later, so — "Well—perhaps—just a little," I admitted. And I waited, shaking in my shoes.

The wrinkles deepened, wavered, broke, and the whole face beamed out in a broad grin of pure delight. "Ah! Merci, mon Dieu!" cried Colette devoutly. "At last I shall have in the house somebody who will really eat and enjoy eggs as they ought to be cooked! Does she stay long, this lady?"

"Fifteen days."

"And she will eat eggs twice a day! Encore un grand merci, mon Dieu!" She was quite carried away over it.

The Story Teller hadn't been in the house an hour before she and Colette had fallen on each other's necks, and the result was that Colette's egg cooking became not only an artistic triumph but a work of love. Really, she did some remarkably good things—and quite out of the way, many of them. I will try to tell you about them.

Oeufs aux Petits Pois

THE first evening there was a sort of creamy dish with green peas in it and wee stars of fried bread to decorate the edge. "Eggs with little peas," murmured the Story Teller. "I ate it often in Paris, but it was not so good as this—the peas were less completely mixed into the eggs. I think they cooked the eggs first and put the peas in afterwards, and —"

"Ah, but that is wrong!" cried Colette, quite forgetting that she must not talk when she waits at table. "Listen! This is how I do it:

"I fry my little stars of bread and keep them very hot in the oven till they are wanted. I take one pint of tender little peas, wash them in cold water, drain them well, and toss them in as much flour as they can pick up. In my stewpan I melt a big tablespoonful of butter and toss the peas in it till they are well buttered all over. Then I add one cupful of water, half a teaspoonful of salt, a big lump of sugar, and one little onion, peeled."

"Or one bay leaf," suggested the Story Teller.

"If you choose. Or, again, one may rub the sugar on a cut head of garlic. All are good. Bring the pan to the boil, cover it, let it simmer till the peas are quite tender."

"Now beat up four eggs as if for an omelet. Move your pan to a hot place on the fire. Pour in the eggs and stir briskly with a little wooden spoon till they just take. Whisk the pan off the fire at once, pour the contents into a hot dish, decorate with the fried bread, and serve without losing a second."

The important thing is that the eggs must not be allowed to harden into lumps, as badly cooked scrambled eggs do. There is just one moment at which, mingling with the sauce from the peas, they make a thick, smooth cream. And that moment is the one in which you must whisk your pan off the fire. Wateriness means that they are done too little and lumpiness that they are done too much. Only creaminess is perfection.

If new peas are not to be had one can very nicely use a can of the smallest peas. Drain them and toss them in flour, as directed above. In a double boiler melt a generous tablespoonful of butter, and add a small onion, grated; then put in the peas and stir until the butter is sizzling. Then add the water, salt, and a lump—or teaspoonful—of sugar and proceed in exactly the same way as with fresh peas.

Next day at lunch there was a little copper saucepan standing before the Story Teller's place. It was a pretty little saucepan, beautifully cleaned and twinkling invitingly; still, one does not, as a rule, put pans on the table, and I began to murmur an excuse.

"It's all right!" she assured me. "That's fondue au fromage, and it always must be served in the thing in which it cooked, in order to keep it hot enough. Some people use a copper or fireproof china dish, but I like the saucepan best myself."

A fondue au fromage is quite easy to make. Break into your little pan four very fresh eggs. Add a big pinch of pepper, a small pinch of salt and a big pinch of sugar, and beat the whole thing with a wooden spoon till the eggs froth well. Then add four tablespoonfuls of fresh butter and a cupful of grated cheese—Cheddar or Gruyère—set the pan on a very gentle heat, and stir continually with a wooden spoon till the mixture thickens into a smooth cream.

Again, this mustn't be allowed to go into lumps like an omelet or scrambled eggs. As soon as it clings to the spoon and coats it, it is done. Serve it in the pan and give something crisp and crackling to eat with it—potato ribbons, piping hot, sprinkled well with salt and piled upon a folded napkin, are the ideal.

Eggs With Cheese

COLETTE considers this one of the most nourishing of all her egg dishes, quite substantial enough to be the chief course of a meal. She always serves purée of potatoes with it, as the dish itself is rather rich and can well carry off a simple vegetable, such as mashed potatoes.

Allow two eggs for each person—more if you like, of course, but two at least. Get your pan of deep frying fat on the fire and heat it till it comes to boiling point, which it does just a few seconds before it stops bubbling and gives off a thin blue smoke. Then drop the eggs in, one at a time, and poach them in the fat, just as you are accustomed to do in water. They cook much faster in the fat, and you should be ready to take them out as soon as they are set. If you allow them to harden, the charm of the dish will be lost. Have ready a fireproof dish in which you have melted half a teaspoonful of the best fresh butter and one tablespoonful of grated cheese for each egg. The dish should stand in the oven while you are preparing the eggs.

(Continued on Page 126)

The Stove that Serves the World

HOUSEHOLDS of every nation cherish one thing in common—the comfort of the New Perfection Oil Stove. Australian bacon, Hawaiian fish cakes and Wisconsin sausages are prepared on New Perfection Oil Cook Stoves in their native lands. Wherever economy and effectiveness are prized you will find the New Perfection—over four million in our own America. Sold by progressive dealers everywhere.

New Perfection Ovens for oil and gas stoves, and Aladdin Utensils in Aluminum and Enameled Steel, made by this company, have earned their world-wide fame.

Made by
THE CLEVELAND
METAL PRODUCTS CO.
7370 PLATT AVE.
CLEVELAND, OHIO.

Made makers of PERFECTION
Oil Heaters and
ALADDIN
Cooking Utensils

NEW PERFECTION

Oil Cook Stoves and Ovens

This is the
Syracuse Pattern

With the Charm of True Usefulness!

YOU will love to use Syracuse China. Its beauty of line and coloring will delight you.

And this beauty is more than surface deep. Syracuse China possesses the rare charm of service—of true usefulness. It is made to use—three meals a day every day in the year! It is so well made that it resists the unsightly nicks and cracks that so soon disfigure most china. And if by accident, you should break one piece—a cup perhaps or a plate, you can easily replace it, for every Syracuse China pattern is carried in open stock. It is made right here in America, so it is always available.

You may choose your design from a wealth of beautiful patterns. You can select one to blend perfectly with the decorative scheme of your dining-room—to express your own personality. And with Syracuse China you can be assured that it is not extravagance to use your "best china" for every day.

As it is often hard to fill all requests for this popular china promptly, we suggest that you place your order with your dealer as early as possible.

ONONDAGA POTTERY COMPANY
Syracuse, New York

SYRACUSE CHINA

Colette Cooks Eggs

(Continued from Page 124)

and you should stir the contents now and then, so that the cheese may melt nicely without getting browned at all. Arrange the eggs neatly in the prepared dish, spoon just a little of the butter over them, sprinkle them daintily with salt and pepper, and serve the whole thing piping hot.

Take care to drain the eggs when you fish them out of the fat.

If you cannot eat rich things poach the eggs in water. But the dish becomes more ordinary at once, though still nice.

Eggs à l'Ardennaise

"ALMOST as uncommon as it is delicious," sighed the Story Teller, lovingly regarding the snowy mountains of whipped whites, with golden yolks tucked away among them. "Why don't folks do it more often, I wonder? It is quite easy."

Take a rather deep fireproof dish and butter it. Whip up the whites of four or five eggs to a froth so stiff that the fork will stand in it, seasoning them with pepper, salt, a tiny pinch of mixed sweet herbs, just as if for an omelet. Pile the whipped whites roughly in the dish and trickle over them one tablespoonful of good cream for each egg. Slip in the yolks wherever they fit best, and set the whole thing in a brisk oven till the yolks are just set. The white really ought not to brown, although now and then one can't keep it from coloring a little on the peaks. Serve immediately in the dish in which it is cooked.

"What a pity that madame can take no meat!" sighed Colette regretfully. "It hinders me from making her an omelet with croûtons, which is the best of all omelets."

"Oh, but I don't go as far as that!" the Story Teller assured her hastily. "It is not that I have made a vow against meat, my good Colette—it is simply that slices of beef and mutton do not agree with me. But an omelet with croûtons made with a little gravy of veal or chicken—why, that is all that there is of the most delicious, is it not?"

It was. And not quite like any other omelet that I have ever tasted.

Take a good round of bread about a quarter of an inch thick, remove the crusts and cut the white into little squares. Fry the squares in a very little butter till they are just colored. Now put into a pan just enough good gravy to cover the bottom to the depth of about one inch; put in your bread squares, let them drink up all they can, and then add more if necessary, so that the pan is just not dry. Let it simmer gently till the bread is quite tender, adding a few drops more of gravy if they are wanted, but remembering that, in the end, the pan must boil dry. Beat it up with a fork, add salt and pepper to taste, and then beat in four eggs, one at a time. Have ready a little butter melted in an omelet pan, pour in the mixture, and cook like an ordinary omelet, taking care that it does not stick.

Eggs With Savory Herbs

COLETTE gave us soft-boiled eggs several times.

In France they are served very frequently, all kinds of different sauces being put with them—tomato, cream sauce, thickened gravies and others. They are quite easy to do, they are quickly prepared, and many people find them far more digestible than hard-boiled eggs.

Bring a pan of water to the boil, drop in your eggs and let them boil fast for five minutes. Fish them out and drop them straight into the coldest water you can get. Let them stay in the cold water just one minute. Then take them out and peel them immediately. They are not quite easy to do at first, as the shells rather tend to stick to the whites; but a little practice will give you the trick of it. Eggs cooked in this way are well set and yet tender to the touch, and with the full taste, which is lost when they are boiled hard. Have your sauce ready, and pour it over them at once, before they have time to get cold.

Supposing that you want to do them with savory herbs—you must make the characteristic and delicious sauce.

Put into a small saucepan one teaspoonful chopped parsley, one teaspoonful grated onion, one leaf of mint and a tiny bay leaf, the juice of a large sweet orange, three tablespoonfuls of water and a large tablespoonful of butter rolled in as much flour as it can pick up. Let all boil gently for fifteen minutes, stirring often and adding a little more water if the sauce gets too thick. Strain it. Add salt and pepper to taste. Put the eggs into a casserole, pour the sauce over them, sprinkle with fine crumbs of fried bread, and slip the dish into the oven barely long enough to heat it all up thoroughly, but not long enough either to dry the sauce or harden the eggs. I think you will find your family most appreciative.

"In Italy they leave out the butter, bay leaf, mint and onion, and, instead, they use oil and garlic and just about half of a leaf of sage," said the Story Teller. "I don't know that their dish is better than yours, my Colette—no, that I do not say—but you might try it one time, by way of a change."

Eggs Mimosa

THIS was the prettiest and most tempting thing Colette had ever done, I thought, though the two egg epicures shook their heads sadly at my lack of taste and said it was ordinary.

Boil four eggs hard and drop them into cold water as soon as they are done, won't you, to keep the yolks from turning green outside. Cut them in halves lengthwise. Remove the yolks. Make a nice stiff mayonnaise with the yolk of a very fresh egg and pile it in the spaces left in the whites. At the center of a flat dish make a small round pile of finely chopped small salad, tossed in just a drop or two of oil and vinegar. Put the prepared whites all round, radiating outwards from the pile, like the petals of a flower. Hold a fine sieve over the dish and rub the hard-boiled yolks through it so that they fall in fine golden rain. Cool it well before serving.

Gateau Golden

IT'S not a cake at all, but a sort of soufflé. French folks have a way of naming everything that is cooked brown in the oven a "gateau."

"Take half a pound of rice, wash it well, and put it into a pan with enough milk to cover it, the rind of a lemon and salt to taste. Let it simmer very gently till it has cooked itself into a soft thick paste. You may add a little more milk from time to time, but don't let the mixture be sloppy at all; there must be no liquid in it when it is done. Take out the lemon rind, let the rice cool to lukewarm, and then beat in, one after another, the yolks of four eggs. Now add salt to taste, with a dash of red pepper—"

"Somebody once told me to put a very little mustard," murmured the Story Teller.

"A fool!" was Colette's prompt comment. "Mustard with milk? Mon Dieu!"

"You are right," said the Story Teller meekly. "Go on."

"Butter a mold thickly—a tin mold is better than a china one—and sprinkle it with the finest browned crumbs. Beat up the whites of the eggs to the stiffest possible froth, fold them gently into the rice, fill the mold not more than half full, because the gateau rises a great deal, and bake it in an oven brisk enough to brown it well, for forty-five minutes. Turn out and serve immediately, before it has time to fall.

"Serve with it any sauce you like. Tomato sauce is delicious with it, and so is the sauce with savory herbs."

Take Del Monte Peaches, for instance-

Think of the many simple and delicious ways to serve them ~

consider their instant, ever-ready, all-year-round convenience ~

~ and then remember that the Del Monte label brings them to your table with all their natural freshness at less expense than if you canned them yourself ~

For Del Monte Peaches are tree-ripened fruit—grown in the pedigreed orchards of California's finest peach districts—gathered at the moment of perfection—and packed where they ripen the day they are picked.

That explains the delicate, fresh flavor they always add to every-day meals. Try the recipes below and you will realize the almost unlimited menu possibilities at your command—not only with peaches, but with more than a hundred other delicious varieties of choicest fruits and vegetables packed under the Del Monte label.

PEACH JUNKET

Dissolve one junket tablet in one tablespoon cold water. Heat $\frac{3}{4}$ cup milk and two tablespoons sugar quickly in a saucepan, stirring until sugar is dissolved; add $3\frac{3}{4}$ cups milk and heat slowly until lukewarm, no more. Remove from fire, add one teaspoon vanilla or almond extract, add dissolved junket tablet and pour into dish from which it is to be served. Stand in warm place undisturbed until set like jelly, then chill. Serve with one can Del Monte Sliced Peaches.

PEACH TRIFLE

Drain one can Del Monte Peaches and rub through sieve. Dissolve 3 tablespoons powdered gelatin in one cup peach juice and keep hot. Pour $\frac{1}{2}$ cup each of peach juice and water into small pan, add $\frac{1}{2}$ cup sugar, bring to boiling point and boil 10 minutes. Add peaches, one cup custard and gelatin. Cool and beat 8 minutes, add 4 egg whites and beat until slightly stiff. Chill in a glass dish and serve with sliced peaches.

PEACH BETTY

Arrange 1 cup of bread crumbs and $1\frac{1}{2}$ cups ($\frac{3}{4}$ can) of Del Monte Canned Sliced Peaches which have been drained, in alternate layers in a greased baking dish, sprinkle each layer of peaches with sugar and a little cinnamon, dot with 2 tablespoons of butter, pour $\frac{3}{4}$ cup of water over all, and bake 35 minutes in a moderate oven.

Send for this free book

"DEL MONTE RECIPES OF FLAVOR" contains hundreds of other tempting and thrifty menu suggestions. Write for a free copy.

Address Department A
CALIFORNIA PACKING CORPORATION
San Francisco, California

Three sizes—one quality, for your convenience

Del Monte Peaches, like most other Del Monte Fruits, are packed in 3 sizes of cans to meet the needs of various sized families: No. 2½, the largest, containing selected large fruit; No. 2, the medium can, with selected medium sized fruit; and No. 1, the small can, containing selected small sized fruit—all of the same fine flavor and quality. Ask your grocer for the size you need.

Del Monte makes summer last all year long

Some other good cook would like your choice recipes

Exchange with her through our Recipe Club

NOT every woman has the talent for concocting enticing dishes. It is a real gift. If you have certain specialties, which find particular favor in your own family or neighborhood, you may be sure that there are thousands of women all over the United States, who would be delighted to know about them. That is what the Borden Recipe Club is for—to make possible the exchange of interesting recipes.

Members receive the Recipe Album

Any woman can join the Borden Recipe Club. It already has members from all parts of the country, from big towns, and little towns, and farms—wherever good cooking is found. New England cooks, Southern cooks, Western cooks—they're all represented. Every woman who joins, receives the Borden Recipe Album. There are no charges of any kind except the twenty-five cents membership fee.

This Recipe Album is not like an ordinary cook book at all. It has substantial cloth bound covers, with loose leaf pages inside. From time to time additional pages containing the latest prize recipes are sent to each member.

There's scarcely a dish that doesn't need milk

The recipes in the Borden Recipe Book include all kinds of food. But when you think of it, most dishes call for milk. Certainly it would be difficult to get a meal without using milk somewhere. For milk is an essential food containing every factor vital to health and growth.

If you want pure country milk with the cream left in get Borden's Evaporated Milk. Keep several cans on the pantry shelf where it is ready for use any minute. Borden's Evaporated Milk is so thick and rich that it is almost as good as regular cream. It is particularly smooth and creamy and makes delicious cream dishes. For these reasons the recipe contest this year is on soups, sauces, entrées.

All about the 1922 contest

This year prizes in the recipe contest will be awarded for the best recipes for soups or sauces or entrées made with Evaporated Milk. Remember, no desserts, no other dishes—only soups, sauces and entrées. Send the recipe only. All recipes must reach the Borden Company not later than June 15th, 1922.

The first prize will be $100.00. The second $50.00; the third and fourth prizes $25.00 each; the ten next best $10.00 each; and the forty next best $5.00 each. There are fifty-four prizes in all. This contest is open to everyone.

Join the Recipe Club

The initiation fee is 25c—there are no dues. Just sign the coupon below and send in 25 cents in stamps or a postal money order. The Recipe Album containing the recipes which won prizes in the other contests will be sent to you at once. And when the new contest has been judged every club member will receive the new recipes whether she won a prize or not.

Join the club today. Fill out the coupon below.

The Borden Company, Borden Bldg., New York

Borden's Evaporated Milk

THE BORDEN COMPANY
Borden Building
New York

I would like to join the Borden Recipe Club. I enclose the 25 cents membership fee. Please send me the Borden Recipe Album and particulars about the Recipe Contest.

Name _____

Address _____

To Save You Two Dollars or More

In Nerves or Money

A BLACKBOARD in the kitchen, or on the wall of the pantry between kitchen and dining room, will become a real factor in saving time and effort. Here all sorts of kitchen messages and requirements may be quickly jotted—the order for the grocer, supplies needed, a reminder to order coal, a request for the iceman or milkman, or a telephone number frequently used; perhaps a message to the children or cook, when mother has been called away hurriedly, a note to take father's suit to the tailor's; or some other household data. No end of useful plans for the blackboard will occur to one when it is once established.

A SMALL closet in the side of the chimney will occupy space usually wasted and prove as convenient in summer as in winter. One that measures about thirty-six inches wide and twenty inches deep—opening at the side, not in front—will hold five or six logs, with a supply of kindling for building three or four fires. In summer it may be used for storing newspapers and magazines.

VERY light and durable laundry baskets may be made by scrubbing the bushel baskets in which peaches or pears have been packed, and then giving them a coat of flat white paint and one of enamel. These baskets are not only sanitary and good-looking, but since they cost next to nothing one may keep two or three on hand and forestall the dangerous temptation to carry a large basket full of heavy, wet clothes.

A DOOR that sticks may not be in need of the carpenter's attention. Perhaps the screws of the hinges have worked loose, and merely tightening them with the screw driver will remedy the difficulty. Sometimes it is well to replace the old screws with new ones of slightly larger size; this bit of diplomacy is also effective in stopping the rattling of a loose door knob.

DO YOU carry your soiled clothes from bedroom floor to basement laundry? It's an economy to have a clothes chute, for saving strength is saving money in many different ways. One woman, who had to economize on space, had the tread of the next-to-the-top step of her stairway hinged and a chute fitted in. A large clothes basket placed below the chute eliminated further handling. Of course, if her basement stairway had been located directly beneath the other stairs, the chute would have had to be placed at one side.

For use in an old house, a tin chute is usually cheapest and best. It can be made by any tinsmith, and will admit of necessary bends, provided that the angles are not greater than ten to fifteen degrees. One must be sure, too, that the joints or seams are perfectly smooth inside, each length of pipe fitting into the one below it. The chute should be not less than fifteen inches in diameter, but can be made as much larger as you wish.

Another ingenious use of the stair steps is to hinge the tread of the second or third step of the stairs, put in a back and a bottom, and keep in the little box thus formed hammer, tacks, screw driver and other handy tools—or even overshoes. A catch of some sort should, of course, be put on tread.

May Wilson Preston uses ledged and bracketed shelves on her closet door to solve the shoe-disposal-in-limited-space problem.

WHEN the lawn or garden must serve also as drying yard for the laundry, strong, dependable clothes poles that may easily be put up and taken down are most desirable. One need not buy such poles and sockets ready to be put up, for they can be made at home.

First fill a seven-foot length of one-and-a-quarter-inch galvanized iron pipe with cement, directions for the mixing of which will be cheerfully furnished by the seller. This will result in a pole weighing from ten to fifteen pounds. Now attach a hook for the line about four inches below the top by means of a bolt run through holes bored in the pipe, with a nut screwed on the end to hold it in place. To hold the pipe in position, another short length of pipe, about eighteen or twenty inches long and of slightly larger diameter, should be driven into the ground until the top of it is just even with the surface of the ground.

If the soil is sandy the pole will be more firmly anchored by means of a cement block, about four inches square and two feet deep, and this, too, can be made at home. A socket for the pole is provided for when the block of cement is cast, a section of pipe being embedded in the center until the cement has almost set, when it is turned round and round and finally pulled out. This block, buried in the earth, will make a practically everlasting base for the poles. When not in use, the poles may be stored in a convenient spot, and the grass plot is left free for tennis, croquet, and all of the other good home games.

The holes in the sockets, by the way, should be plugged or covered when not in use, to keep out dirt and other undesirable possibilities.

TO REDUCE the gas bill seems to be a universal ambition; one of the most effective means is this small, one-burner oven, which consists of an iron toaster with an asbestos rack above it, the whole being covered by an inverted sheet-iron pan which serves to hold the heat. In this little oven one may bake potatoes, apples, custards, biscuits and numerous other things, without the necessity of heating the large oven. The cost of such an oven is about eighty-five cents.

YOU may put away wool clothing in your cedar chest with entire confidence that it will not be molested by moths if you are careful first to beat, brush and, if possible, sun all articles before they are placed in the chest. The odor of cedar wood does not, of course, kill the moth miller, nor does it kill the eggs or pupae, but the United States Department of Agriculture has found by careful investigation that it does kill the very young worms or larvae which do the damage to clothing. To prevent undue escape of the aroma from the chests, they should remain tightly closed except when clothing is being removed or placed in them.

If clothing is cleaned and brushed with great care, and immediately rolled tightly with naphthalene in several thicknesses of unbroken paper, it will remain unmolested by moths.

The ends of the package must be doubled back and securely tied or sealed so no moth can crawl in. Clothes moths will not eat through paper under ordinary conditions.

One or two pounds of fresh naphthalene placed in any airtight chest will protect clothing from moth damage.

MOST people are aware of the danger of searching for gas leaks with a match or candle, but not everyone knows that soapsuds spread over the suspected area give a sure and safe test, bubbles being formed wherever gas is escaping. A leak may be temporarily patched up with soap, paraffin or sealing wax, until the gasfitter can find time to repair it.

ASHELF or table on hinges fastened against the back wall of the house, close to the door, makes an excellent place for cleaning vegetables, chickens and all sorts of things in summer. When needed, it is let down from the wall by two strong, light chains, and when no longer required is fastened to the wall with a hook, so that it is entirely out of the way.

Such a working space, with garbage can conveniently near, lightens one's housework considerably by keeping pods, peelings and garden soil out of the kitchen. The same idea can be used in the kitchen itself as a temporary shelf for use in times of stress.

LEATHER furniture coverings last much longer and look better if rubbed occasionally with castor oil or a commercial leather polish, to restore the oil that gradually dries out. The liquid should be well rubbed in and any excess carefully wiped off, so that no film remains to gather dust and so darken the leather. The leather bindings of books should receive this same treatment; books should be kept away from intense heat, however, or no amount of care will preserve them.

FREE-This Book on Home Beautifying

S. C. JOHNSON & SON,
"The Wood Finishing Authorities"
RACINE, WIS. U.S.A.

THIS book contains practical suggestions on how to make your home artistic, cheery and inviting. Explains how you can easily and economically refinish and keep furniture, woodwork, floors and linoleum in perfect condition. Use coupon below.

JOHNSON'S Paste - Liquid - Powdered PREPARED WAX

Johnson's Prepared Wax comes in three convenient forms—Paste Wax for polishing all floors and linoleum. Liquid Wax, the dust-proof polish for furniture, pianos, woodwork and automobiles. Powdered Wax for dancing floors.

S. C. JOHNSON & SON, Dept. LH4, RACINE, WIS.
(Canadian Factory, Brantford)

Please send me free and postpaid your Home Beautifying Book "The Proper Treatment for Floors, Woodwork and Furniture."

Best Paint Dealer is _____
My Name _____
My Address _____
City & State _____

ELGIN TAILORED SHIRTS

VASSAR—Fine pleated edges trim collar, button panel and cuff opening. Pleated front. Straight cuff. Sizes 36-44. White only.

809 C—Extra Heavy Crêpe de Chine (5 thread) . . . $9.75
809 E—Super Radium (Willow) 9.50
809 H—10 Merveille Lustrous Habutai 8.25

Elgin tailored shirts are for women who appreciate fine custom tailoring.

Elgin tailored shirts fit—they are made throughout like the finest custom tailored men's shirts. Wondrous heavy silks—generously cut—newest styles.

Carefully stitched seams—beautiful pearl buttons—firmly fastened. Sleeves and cuffs set with exactness.

Ideal for sports wear yet suitable for all occasions. And the price is so modest, you'll want several in your wardrobe.

ELGIN
Look for this label.
It identifies the genuine.

If your dealer can't supply you, send us his name with cash or money-order and we will fill your order. Style book sent on request.

ELGIN COMPANY

Eighth & Locust Sts., Philadelphia, Pa.

WELLESLEY—Pointed Peter Pan collar. Small silk bow. Collar and button panel trimmed with pleated edging. Front cluster tucked. Turned back cuff. Sizes 36-44. White only.

807 C—Extra Heavy Crêpe de Chine (5 thread) . . . $9.50
807 E—Super Radium (Willow) 9.25
807 H—10 Merveille Lustrous Habutai 8.25

ELGIN TAILORED SHIRTS

Easter Salads and Desserts

By CAROLINE B. KING

AND what shall we have for dessert on Easter Sunday? What dish is so delicate and dainty and tempting as to be a fitting finish to the dinner which is to usher in the spring? For the feast found its origin in the old, old pagan feast to the goddess of spring, and so through the centuries we have continued serving something unusually nice on this day, though we long ago lost sight of the primitive reason for the festival, and have adopted it for our very own.

For the Easter dinner the dessert should be light, evanescent, almost ephemeral in quality, and therefore dishes composed in part of whipped cream, or the feathery, foamy whites of eggs, or something equally alluring, are in order. The salad, too, must partake of the joyousness of the season; but of that later.

Of course, one may order ice cream from the caterer, and cake as well, but the housewife who is as deeply interested in the culinary department of her home as are most readers of the JOURNAL prefers to serve a dessert rather more distinctive than any that the confectioner can furnish; something which shall have the personal touch, the mark of distinction which she alone can bestow upon it.

AN EASTER DRESDEN CREAM is one of the most delicate and exquisite desserts I know. It is quite simple to make too, though sounding elaborate perhaps. For a party of six persons one will require to make it: Four eggs, four lady fingers, one-half cupful of sugar, one-quarter packet of gelatin (half an envelope), one-quarter cupful of candied pineapple cut in very small pieces, one-quarter cupful of blanched and shredded almonds, half a pint of whipping cream, a teaspoonful of vanilla, half a teaspoonful of almond extract and two ounces of candied violets.

Dissolve the gelatin in one-quarter cupful of cold water, and break the lady fingers into small pieces, but do not crumble; beat the yolks of the eggs to a stiff foam with the sugar and add the flavorings, then stir in the lady fingers lightly. Dissolve the gelatin over hot water and beat the whites of the eggs to a stiff froth; whip the cream solid and add to it the liquefied gelatin and the egg whites, beat for a moment, then stir in the egg-yolk-and-lady-finger mixture, stir lightly and gradually add the fruit, nuts and half the violets, crushed. When all is well mixed pour into a mold dipped in cold water and set away to chill. It should stand for several hours, then turn out on a plate covered with a lace-paper doily and garnish with the rest of the violets. If it be impossible to obtain candied violets, though most confectioners will furnish them if they are ordered a day in advance, substitute candied cherries in making the cream and decorate the dish with fresh violets and sprigs of ferns. It will be very lovely in any event and is most delicious.

MERINGUE WHIP is quite ethereal enough for even an Easter menu, and would make an ideal dessert for an Easter luncheon. Beat the whites of six eggs to a partial froth, then add half a teaspoonful of cream of tartar and continue beating till stiff and dry. Now add one cupful of granulated sugar and beat again until the mixture will hold its shape when the beater is lifted from it. Then add gradually another cupful of granulated sugar, beating only lightly this time. Flavor delicately with vanilla or almond, or with orange juice, and spread in two large layer cake tins, buttered lightly and dredged with flour. Bake in a very slow oven—the meringues should really rather dry out than bake, and should be but tinged with brown when finished. It will require thirty-five to fifty minutes to bake the cakes properly. When done remove them carefully from the pans, and cool them. They may be made a day or even two days before they are to be used, as they keep nicely. Now whip a pint of cream to a solid froth, sweeten and flavor it to taste, and spread between and over the top of the cakes. Decorate with candied or maraschino cherries, or halved nuts, or preserved or candied pineapple cut in strips or in fancy forms with little vegetable cutters. If it is desired to make the meringue very beautiful, the stiffly whipped cream may be forced through a pastry tube about the top in fanciful borders and rosettes.

MARSHMALLOW FLUFF is not quite so new, but it is so delicious and so easily made that it must have a place with the Easter desserts. The recipe will make a sufficient quantity for eight to ten persons; for a smaller party it may be decreased proportionately. A pound of soft marshmallows, the kind that are sold in bulk and are usually very fresh and tender, is the first requirement for the dish; tear these into bits and mix them with a quarter pound each of candied cherries and pineapple or apricots finely shredded. Then whip very stiff a pint of cream and flavor it with a teaspoonful of vanilla. Mix with the marshmallows and fruit, taking care that the latter is well distributed, and arrange in a large mold which has been rinsed with cold water. Or if you prefer, it may be served piled in sherbet glasses, which will eliminate the turning-out process. Place in the refrigerator to chill, and be sure that it stands at least five hours before serving, though a much longer time is preferable. Serve decorated with rosettes of whipped cream, halved blanched pistachio nuts and candied cherries; or, if to harmonize with a dinner representing some color scheme, with flowers.

ROSE PUDDING with Golden Sauce is a most desirable dessert, and one which is less costly than either of the preceding, but very attractive nevertheless. To make it, dissolve one-quarter cupful of cornstarch in one-half cupful of milk, and add half a cupful of sugar and a pinch of salt. Then add this mixture to two cupfuls of scalded milk, and stir over hot water until well cooked. Now flavor with a teaspoonful of vanilla and half a teaspoonful of rose water, and beat in the stiffly whipped whites of three eggs. Divide the mixture into two parts. Leave one portion, which should be slightly larger than the other, plain white, and tint the other a very pale pink with vegetable coloring. Pour the white portion into a pint mold wet in cold water and set away to chill. The pink portion should be placed in very small molds, and also chilled. When ready to serve, turn the Raw icing, the consistency of dough, makes these stately lilies. A single piece, pinched out to make the petals, is fastened to the stem with thin icing. Stems and leaves are painted with green fruit coloring on the icing of the cake.

Madame Grace
CORSETS
BRASSERIES HANDEMAIX
The Foundation of Style

Enjoy greater body freedom. Get these lighter weight corsets. New design gives modish lines, adequate support and more comfort. Ask for Madame Grace Corsets. Front or back laced. At good stores.

Booklet on request

F. 226

KALAMAZOO CORSET COMPANY
Kalamazoo, Michigan
The Makers of Graceful Stout
CORSETS

DID YOU EVER SEE a UNION SUIT WITHOUT BUTTONS?

Here's One

for men and boys!!

Left leg—right leg
Left arm—right arm and he's in!

IT IS THE HATCHWAY NO-BUTTON UNION SUIT

Made by one of the biggest underwear concerns in the United States and another one in Canada.

DOUBTLESS many readers of The Ladies' Home Journal have seen boys' underwear without any buttons often enough; too often, in fact. But now comes a garment designed to do away with buttons for good and all—at the start and throughout the long life of the suit. No more button bother, expense, sewing. No more button-hole repairing. An absolutely orderly garment because there's not a thing to get out of order. Even the seat is so constructed that no button is needed at the back to keep the garment smooth and comfortable.

See these garments at your favorite dealer's today. He can get them for your boy or for the men of the family, if we have as yet been unable to supply him or if he is temporarily sold out. It has been a big job to keep dealers stocked up this Spring, but if you have any difficulty in getting just what you want, we will be glad to see that you are supplied, delivery free anywhere in the United States. In ordering, please state sizes and numbers of garments required, enclosing remittance to our mill at Albany. Send for free catalog illustrating complete line of Hatchway No-Button Union Suits and Hatch One Button Union Suits photographed on live models.

Men's Nainsook Suits, $1, $1.50, $2, $3, $5.
(The $5 garment is all silk)
Boys' Nainsook Suits, $1, $1.25.
Men's Knitted Suits, $1.50, $2, $3, $3.50.
Boys' Knitted Suits, $1, $1.25.

FULD & HATCH KNITTING CO.
Albany New York

York Knitting Mills, Ltd., Toronto, Canada, Licensed
Manufacturers of these lines for Canada.

white mold out on a pretty plate or lace-paper doily and arrange the little rose pink molds about it. A pink flower, sweet peas or carnation with a spray of maidenhair fern will make a most enticing garnish for the dainty dessert.

GOLDEN SAUCE is very fine, both for this and other puddings. Beat the egg yolks left from the Rose Pudding very stiff and fine, then add a cup of powdered sugar and beat till like a batter. Now mix with a cupful of cream also beaten to a stiff froth. Flavor with a few drops of vanilla and chill very thoroughly before serving. It will be well to whip the sauce just a little before sending it to the table. If preferred a rich boiled custard made of the yolks of the eggs, half a cupful of sugar and two cupfuls of milk may be substituted for this sauce.

SUNSHINE CREAMS make an appropriate Easter dessert. Dissolve a tablespoonful of granulated gelatin in cold water for a few moments, meantime boiling together till a thread is formed, a cupful of granulated sugar and half a cupful of water. Pour sirup over the stiffly beaten yolks of three eggs and add the gelatin and the juice of an orange. Whip till almost congealed, then beat in the stiffly whipped egg whites and pile in tall slender glasses. Decorate with strips of candied or canned pineapple.

MACAROON TRIPLE calls for ten macaroons, one cupful of milk, one quarter cupful of sugar, and a few candied cherries or other glacé fruits. Whip the egg yolks to a stiff froth, adding the sugar and beating till like batter, then pour the scalded milk over them, and while hot add the macaroons. Let stand for a few moments, then flavor with half a teaspoonful of vanilla and whip in the stiffly beaten egg whites. Pour into a buttered dish and place this in a pan of hot water in the oven. Bake about twenty minutes, and serve hot or cold. You may turn this pudding out and ornament it with the candied fruit, or it may be garnished with the fruit and served in the baking dish, which is a very good plan if the dish is one of those attractive glass baking dishes which almost every housewife now uses. Plain or whipped cream may be served with the trifle if desired.

EASTER PLUM PUDDING takes us into the realms of frozen desserts, but it is one which is very easily managed even without a freezer. Boil a cupful of sugar with three-quarters of a cupful of water, to the thread stage, and pour over the stiffly beaten whites of three eggs. Continue beating till cool, then add a pint of stiffly whipped cream, one quarter of a cupful of chopped pecans, one-quarter cupful of chopped blanched almonds, one-quarter cupful of sultana raisins chopped, and one-quarter cupful, mixed, of candied pineapple and cherries shredded rather fine. Pack in a mold and set in a tub of ice and salt to chill for three hours, or longer if convenient. Then turn out and serve plain or with the following sauce:

MARSHMALLOW SAUCE. Melt one-quarter of a pound of marshmallows in the top of a double boiler with half a cupful of water, add one and a half cupfuls of confectioner's sugar and beat till smooth, flavor with vanilla, then whip in the stiffly beaten whites of two eggs.

The Easter salads should also partake of the lightness of the season. The heavy mayonnaise of the colder months and the whipped-cream dressings, unless served at luncheon, are not for the Easter menu.

But the French dressing with all its variations, and they are many, is particularly piquant and delicious for the dinner salad. With a dinner of several courses, the salad should be a simple one, merely a taste of something green and refreshing with just enough oil and acid to lend a tang to it.

HEARTS OF LETTUCE WITH FRUITED FRENCH DRESSING is novel and tempting, and makes a very pretty salad too. Iceberg lettuce or any of the more compact head varieties should be used for its making. Wash the lettuce well, dry in a cloth and cut each head in halves, discarding the coarser outer leaves. Crisp on ice until just before serving time, then arrange on salad plates and pour the following dressing over it:

FRUITED FRENCH DRESSING. Blend together six tablespoonfuls of oil and two of lemon juice or grapefruit juice, mixing till thick. Then add one tablespoonful of finely chopped candied cherries, the same quantity of chopped candied pineapple, and a teaspoonful of candied orange peel also cut into minute particles. Season highly with paprika and daintily with salt. Serve as soon as possible after making the dressing, or beat it well just before serving.

EMERALD SALAD is a brilliant and spring-like addition to the Easter menu. It has for its foundation either the crisp cold leaves of the lettuce or Romaine, with its pungent savor. Green peppers, one to each head of lettuce or Romaine, watercress, and tiny green onions in desired proportions with a few sprigs of parsley are also required for making the Emerald Salad.

Wash the lettuce or Romaine and separate into leaves. Wash and drain the watercress and shred it coarsely, cut the onion fine and the peppers into long, very thin, almost transparent strips. Break the parsley into tiny sprays. Arrange the salad in a bowl, in layers, the lettuce first, then a sprinkling of the other green things, with the delicate pepper strips decorating the whole. Garnish with the bits of parsley. Serve with a French dressing to which a spicy green cucumber pickle chopped fine has been added.

BLACK-EYED SUSAN SALAD is another handsome springtime salad. Make it by dividing oranges or tangerines, after peeling them and removing all white skin, into sections and arrange on lettuce leaves in the form of daisies. Fill the centers with chopped pecans mixed with French dressing and serve with French dressing made with orange or lemon juice in place of vinegar.

FROZEN TOMATO SALAD is a fine accompaniment to a rich dinner. Rub a No. 2 can of tomatoes through a sieve, and season highly with pepper, salt and paprika. Then add a cupful of water and a tablespoonful of tarragon or plain vinegar, and freeze. Serve on lettuce leaves. A mayonnaise is always appropriate with this salad.

LATTICE SALAD is made of grapefruit and is most attractive. Arrange tender leaves of lettuce on individual plates, breaking the ribs of the leaves to make them lie flat. Then arrange sections of grapefruit over the lettuce so that they also will remain quite flat and will present a solid foundation. Now form a lattice across the surface of the fruit with strips of green pepper and pimento, both cut very thin and the pepper made almost transparent by cutting away the flesh back of the green skin. Serve with French dressing for dinner, mayonnaise or whipped-cream dressing for luncheon.

The captivating Easter bonnet that unexpectedly tops this cake is easily made of stiff writing paper, sewed together and covered with raw icing. Ribbon streamers in pastel colors and tiny flowers and leaves, fashioned of raw icing and tinted with fruit colorings, trim the hat. All cakes from Marie L. Norfleet.

Fashionette Invisible HAIR NETS

The
PALM BEACH

We can't be sure that Psyche wore her hair this way, but many a very modern maiden relies on the low Psyche knot to display her hair to perfection. A Fashionette will keep it smooth.

The
PINEHURST

Only the maid with the long tresses should venture this adaptation of the Turkish turban—it requires much hair to do it successfully, but the result is both comfortable and becoming. A Fashionette is indispensable.

The
NEWPORT

Named for Society's Summer stronghold—Newport—is this smart coiffure for the older woman. Grey hair is beautiful and distinguished when dressed with care and kept trim with a Fashionette.

The New Coiffures

THIS is a season of interesting coiffures—even the bobbed heads of yesterday are tucked up and pinned to simulate luxuriant tresses. "Society Coiffures" pictures and explains the various ways smart women are wearing their hair—all of them easy to arrange with the aid of a Fashionette. Send for a copy—mailed promptly and without charge. Fashionette Invisible Hair Nets are exceptionally strong, perfectly shaded to blend with your own hair, and shaped to conform with any coiffure. The usual shades, in either single or double mesh, are 15c each, 2 for 25c at department stores, specialty shops and drug stores. White or grey, 25c each.

Colonial Quality
Samstag's New York
1200 Broadway

ALVIN

Long-Life Silver Plate Correct for Every Occasion

THE GARDEN CITY COUNTRY CLUB, LONG ISLAND where Mrs. John A. Drake gave an exclusive luncheon and Alvin Long-Life Silver plate was used at her special request.

"At our luncheon which was given recently at the Garden City Country Club, Alvin Long-Life Silver Plate was used at my request. I prefer it to the ware ordinarily used in the clubs and hotels, and the praise which the beautiful George Washington pattern received amply justified my choice."

Guests in your own home, too, will note your impeccable good taste when they observe your table set with the George Washington pattern of Alvin Long-Life Silver Plate, Mrs. Drake's preference. This and other exquisite Alvin patterns are sold by leading jewelers.

DELA RAE DRAKE
(Mrs. John A. Drake)
President American Diet Club and Relief for Italy

Banquet Spoon

George Washington
Pattern

ALVIN SILVER COMPANY

20 Maiden Lane, New York

Makers also of Alvin Sterling Silverware

Your Garden in April

By J. HORACE MCFARLAND

APRIL is a month of doing things, and a lot of things, in the Middle States gardens. Spring officially arrives March twenty-first, but actually is in the air earlier, and if the ground can be worked, April finds it tenanted with some of the season's seeds of flowers and vegetables that are to produce gratification later for at least two of the five senses, while the framing shrubs of the garden are also in place. If it is to be even a random garden, the ground must be prepared, and not many days of April should elapse, in a broad line across the continent, until that preparation has been completed.

In many places any part of April is late for planting the spring-blooming shrubs, unless they come from a nursery so far north that they have not yet started growth. Lilacs, spiræas, forsythias, deutzias, mock oranges and similar shrubs may yet be planted, if dormant, and while they will not or ought not to bloom this spring, they will get ready for another spring. The summer-blooming shrubs are also yet plantable, and these, when planted, may well be trimmed back a few inches to induce the proper growth. The best of the hydrangeas, popularly sold as "Hills of Snow," and actually Hydrangea arborescens sterilis, is a splendid shrub for a half-shady place, and its fine flowers come just after the spring burst of bloom has ceased. The other prevalent hydrangea, H. paniculata grandiflora, is a good-enough shrub, but has been planted too freely, so that it becomes a tiresome nuisance, particularly as its big panicles of white flowers turn to a dirty pink and then tempt the unwary to take them indoors to remain all winter as dust gatherers and reminders of a dead garden.

Roses can yet safely be planted in early April, and the hybrid teas will do good business the same season, provided they get a start before the ground is too warm. The catalogues will tell of the new and standard sorts, but I may say that nearly everywhere Gruss an Teplitz is quite likely to give many lovely bright crimson flowers, and Radiance will pinkly justify its name. Duchess of Wellington is a reliable near-yellow, Lady Ursula has vigor and a fine flesh-pink color, and Chateau de Clos-Vougeot—what a name!—is worth adventuring with in the assurance that every one of its deep crimson flowers, when they do come, will be a fragrant event.

What to Start Now

I AM not advising extended rose trials until the gardener gets the fever, when his own instincts and the catalogues will take care of him; but I must not fail to suggest the planting of one or more of the lovely hardy climbers. My own garden at Breezehill now welcomes the June-July bloom feast of seventy sorts, and I am not immune to further attractions! American Pillar is a wonderful red single climber, Dr. W. Van Fleet as a tea-rose pink of lovely quality, Silver Moon for snowy whiteness, and Excelsa as a bright light crimson cluster rose, will make a proper start.

If the garden beginner is living in the chilly regions about the Great Lakes, these climbers will need winter protection, as will the hybrid teas, but he may plant as hardy bushes Conrad Ferdinand Meyer, Frau Karl Druschki, Anna de Diesbach and J. B. Clark in assurance that they will stay with him over many hard winters, giving him a feast of flowers about the end of June.

The other flowerful April plantings aside from seeds need to be of the hardy herbaceous plants. Leave places for irises and peonies, of which I will tell in the summer-growth pause, but start now with columbines, the hardy asters and chrysanthemums for fall bloom, coreopsis and rudbeckia of cheerful yellow, the lovely blue delphiniums, in very rich ground, the funkias or "day lilies," the splendid and persistent crimson and gold gaillardias, the hardy phloxes from white to deep scarlet, the fragrant garden pinks, and a score of other "old reliables," to give you a new garden every growing day. These are hardy, as I have said, and they go well in the garden plan in front of and between the shrubs that make the lines and the background.

April is the time for seed sowing, too, of the vegetables and annual flowers that love cool ground. Peas, spinach, radishes, lettuce, beets, are among these vegetables, and of all of them at least two succession plantings need to be made in April.

The peas are to grow quickly where they are planted. Sow them more thinly than you want to, so that the plants are two inches or more apart. Incidentally, I believe most in the truly sweet or "wrinkled" varieties like Gradus and Blue Bantam, rather than in the extra-early sorts that save or gain only a few days. Radishes need "quick" soil, fertile and fine, and you can have the juicy little globes or pencils of scarlet and white in three weeks if you are right. Spinach comes more slowly, and beets may better be started and thinned or transplanted. The thinnings are delicious as "greens" for the table. Lettuce also ought to be thinned; in fact, it must be if you are to get heads of it that are worth while; so plan to have successive small sowings and space them out so the plants are never crowded. With a little preparation of watering and a good trowel, lettuce plants of some size can be so transplanted that they never notice it; that is part of the fun of gardening that beats golf, for me at least.

Fall Strawberries

CABBAGE ought to have been sowed in March, and if you are inclined toward it, buy a dozen or so plants to set out a foot apart in April. The late cabbage can be sown in early April, and the other crops of the cabbage family—cauliflower, kohlrabi, brussels sprouts and so on—I do not commend to the garden beginner.

Swiss chard is a safe adventure for late April and a vegetable not at all known according to its merit. It is actually a beet, but doesn't look that way. The plants grow up rapidly with broad and sometimes crinkled leaves, each with a thick white midrib. It is these leaves that are eaten as if they were spinach, and the taste is as good, or better. The midrib is sometimes cooked separately, as if it were asparagus. The plants can be cut and cut again, and yield leaves all summer and until late in the fall; indeed, they stand some freezing. Sow thinly in a row and then thin out to three, six, and finally a foot or eighteen inches apart. A row of Swiss chard—Lucullus is the right variety—is a garden reliance.

Toward the end of April preparations are made for the vegetables that need warm ground, like beans, corn and so on. The gardener who has had experience, or who is reading for it, gets his tomato plants started way ahead of the safe time to plant them out—or he buys them, which is not playing the game. Vegetable gardening, even in a back yard, is a good game to play, and the little plot will do wonders if it is handled that way.

I have almost forgotten an April suggestion which can produce a joyous surprise in any community. One year I planted a hundred Progressive Everbearing strawberries on April twenty-seventh, and that same September there was a strawberry-shortcake celebration at Breezehill in consequence. The plants were in rich ground, and I pinched off all the blossoms until late July, then permitting them to form into beautiful scarlet cones of sweetness and flavor. These strawberries do best as an annual crop, planted each year, and they are worth it.

But my space is full, and the garden barely started. I've said nothing about the sweet peas and poppies and marigolds, the alyssum and the zinnias, and all the other possibilities in easy annuals, even in a back yard or a farm corner. They are actually easy; planted in good ground, with garden love to start them and keep them, they pay the largest dividends known.

From a pastel drawing by Neysa McMein

Look for this Scranton trade-mark sewed in every pair of curtains.

The vogue is for filmy curtains that drape gracefully

Filminess of texture that is almost gossamer-like in its exquisite fineness—easy, graceful draping that is always natural, therein lies the fascination of Scranton Filet Nets and Lace Curtains. And that is why the very touch of Scranton materials makes it a keen pleasure to compare and select them, and to sew and hang them. When it comes time to re-decorate, you will find in the Scranton Counter Book, at any good store, many practical suggestions on the choice and hanging of curtains for every type of window, as well as many of our most charming designs.

THE SCRANTON LACE CO., Scranton, Penna.

Please send me free sheets showing exact reproductions of your patterns checked below:

Lace Curtains	<input type="checkbox"/> Crochet Bedspreads	<input type="checkbox"/>
Filet Nets	<input type="checkbox"/> Satin Bedspreads	<input type="checkbox"/>
Novelty Curtains	<input type="checkbox"/> Embroideries	<input type="checkbox"/>
Shams and Scarfs	<input type="checkbox"/> Printed Marquisettes, Voiles	<input type="checkbox"/>
Dimity Bedspreads	<input type="checkbox"/> and Serims (in colors)	<input type="checkbox"/>
	<input type="checkbox"/> Cottons (in colors)	<input type="checkbox"/>

Also please send your free booklet "New Outlooks For Every Home," showing the newest ideas for draping windows of all types, with many illustrations and details.

Name

Address

If you have a difficult problem in curtaining, write to our Service Department about it. Without charge we will gladly send you our advice.

SCRANTON

FILET NETS · LACE CURTAINS · COLORED DRAPERIES · BED SPREADS · EMBROIDERIES

A Story of Appetizing Appeal

Let Tak-hom-a Biscuit tell you a story that words cannot express.

When you open the package, the light, golden color invites you to eat.

Fill a plate with these Sunshine Soda Crackers and serve with the soup.

Their crackly crispness and even, fresh flavor fulfil the promise of their tempting appearance.

Leave them on the table and watch them disappear all through the meal.

And when the table is cleared, how few cracker crumbs you will find.

Tak-hom-a Biscuit splits-in-two without crumbling.

LOOSE-WILES BISCUIT COMPANY

Bakers of Sunshine Biscuits

Branches in Over 100 Cities

Everymeal Everyday Sunshine Biscuits

Tak-hom-a Biscuit is sold only in packages with a red wrapper.

From the Thousand Window Bakeries

Why Children Lie

(Continued from Page 18)

Perhaps the most painful cases of children's lying come from parents who have wholeheartedly tried to give their best to make the most of their children—parents who gave themselves selflessly, but unfortunately blindly, without knowledge and understanding of their children's particular nature and individual needs, with the result that all their wonderful devotion was sown on barren, sickly soil and in turn yielded sickly fruit.

Such a case was that of Mary. Until about the age of seven the parents could not recall that they had any difficulty with Mary. But from the time she began to go to school a change came over her. Her record at school was a bitter disappointment to the parents. They held her rigidly to her tasks, they tried to drive her; but as the years passed she showed interest in none of the subjects taught her; she did wretched work, barely keeping up with her class; she disliked the teachers, and above all she hated the schools.

But her failure in studies was not the worst of her school record. In ten years she developed into a confirmed liar; she was guilty of every kind of trickery and deception at school, bringing disgrace on herself and her parents. The climax to this phase of her development came when she was seventeen.

One evening both parents went out, leaving Mary at home apparently working on her lessons. At ten o'clock the parents returned and found their bedroom in a topsyturvy condition. In fear they shouted for the missing Mary. A closet door opened and Mary came tremblingly out and told in detail of the dark, whiskered man who had robbed the house, first ordering her into the closet. The parents checked up the loss; the only thing missing was forty dollars in cash, which was taken out of a bureau drawer. They soon realized what had happened, and before long they got the confession from the hysterical Mary. She had taken the money, had taken it for the purpose of running away from home.

The outline of Mary's history was given me by Mary's despairing mother, who in response to questions went on: "The only time she seems like a normal being nowadays is when she's outdoors. Her one delight is to take long hikes into the country, building fires by a stream and cooking her own food over them; and she loves flowers."

Back to Nature for a Cure

THE description of the girl's love for the outdoors suggested the possibility that at the bottom of this girl's lying was only a blind struggle to find satisfaction for some very natural and all-demanding need.

As Mary and I became friends her side of the story came out. Ever since she could remember, school had been to her a prison. She could not stand being shut up in a room with studies that to her were dead. From the time she entered school there was but one thought in her heart and mind and that was how to get away from it.

"I could not tell anybody what I felt. If I only could!" Mary one day told me. "I only knew something, something big, was pulling me somewhere and I was bound to get there."

Mary is now a normal, vital, sympathetic and truthful young woman. And there was no miracle in the transformation; it was a plain case of going to the bottom of the trouble, discovering Mary's particular nature and giving it an opportunity to express itself through the medium which made the strongest appeal to it. She was taken out of school and was sent to live with some understanding friends on their beautiful farm.

To-day, five years later, Mary has a small flower-garden farm of her own, near the friends with whom she had spent a year. She is at her work from sunrise to sunset; she loves her work, gives herself wholeheartedly to it, and is as honest in all her relationships as she is with her flowers, which she handles with as great love and care as if they were human beings.

But in our efforts to establish the habit of truth-telling in our children we must not fall into the error of regarding any and every deviation from literalness as an essential lie. We must learn to distinguish when a lie is not a lie. Judged from the standard of pure literalness most fairy tales are lies; so are the Mother Goose stories; so are many other of the classics of childhood. However, we do not hold these in reprobation; we accept them for the colorful, stimulating delights which they contain.

But when these qualities appear in our children we are too likely not to recognize them. We forget that many children live largely in the land of make-believe, and that often there is no difference in actuality to them between the events of their fancy and the events of their everyday life. Both are equally real.

A Decalogue for Parents

WITH lying, as with any other disease, an ounce of prevention is worth many pounds of cure. The best prevention, in fact the only prevention which is within our power to exercise, is for us parents to be at all times simple, direct, honest with our children in all relationships. We all recognize the importance of building a sound physical foundation in our children from their earliest years. If we wish to develop all-round, wholesome human beings we must with equal thought lay in our children the foundation for their ethical development. And particularly must we remember that if we are to succeed in this prevention we cannot begin our work too soon.

If a new decalogue could help parents to save their children from the sin of lying, then I would submit these ten commandments for their study and guidance:

1. At all times speak to your child simply and clearly, and in giving directions use as few words as possible so there will be no chance for his misunderstanding.
2. Do not arbitrarily suppress his natural energies and force him to seek a secret and illegitimate outlet for them, which he will be tempted to conceal by untruths.
3. Answer his questions honestly, not with half truths.
4. Satisfy his curiosity wisely, lest he seek satisfaction through unwholesome channels and be compelled to lie to cover his guilty knowledge.
5. Do not emphasize his mistakes and transgressions, making them become black monsters to him and making him ashamed to speak of them freely. Correct his mistakes quietly and constructively.
6. Trust your child. Do not question him with suspicion, lest you stimulate in him the fear of punishment, which will lead him to lie in self-defense.
7. Do not judge children by the adult standard of right and wrong, lest the child, in order to come up to it, will be forced to deception.
8. Do not crush or punish a child's honest, outspoken observation merely because some adult's vanity might be hurt by a true criticism it contains, lest the child be led to hypocrisy.
9. Do not mistake the child's fancy, his imaginative playfulness, for lies. Remember that his imaginative world is as real to him as our material world is real to us.
10. Honor your children. From the earliest years treat them with the same consideration you would give your equal.

The Heart of Your Kitchen Equipment

THE TEA KETTLE is used more than any other utensil, always ready with its generous supply of hot water. It is the heart of your kitchen equipment—the one utensil you should select with the greatest care.

You soon come really to love a Wagner Tea Kettle, because it is so downright good, so pleasing in appearance, so different from others. Each Wagner design is distinctive. Every piece is cast solid in a mold, (not sheet metal or stamped). After using a Wagner Kettle for fifteen or twenty years as many others have done you'll agree that Wagner makes "the finest cooking utensils in the world."

THE WAGNER MFG. CO., 21 Fair St., Sidney, Ohio

Best dealers everywhere handle Wagner Ware. Please write us for booklet 19.

WAGNER
CAST ALUMINUM
WARE
From Generation to Generation

Other
Original
Wagner
Designs

KARPEN FURNITURE

DISTINGUISHED by rich, artistic coverings, soft yielding cushions, and excellence of design, Karpen Furniture is helping to create an environment of beauty, refinement, and comfort in countless American homes.

Though luxuriously upholstered and built for a lifetime, Karpen furniture is really very moderately priced.

A visit to your local dealer will confirm this.

* * *

We shall be glad to send you upon request Book A of Distinctive Designs with the name of the Karpen dealer nearest your home.

S. KARPEN & BROS.

Also manufacturers of Karpen Fiber Rush and Reed Furniture and Dining, Office, and Windsor Chairs

Exhibition Rooms

801-811 S. Wabash Avenue, Chicago

37th and Broadway, New York

The Confessions of a Useless Wife

(Continued from Page 17)

"Aw, say," he was holding forth, "Mac isn't the only one that needs an eye-opener. The day we went to the inquest Mac's car ran dry, and we stopped in for water—well, I won't mention where; but the young lady where we stopped offered us tea. Asking farmers questions is dry work, so you bet Mac and I took it and Mac ate about ten sandwiches. He'd been so mad through the whole thing that he had used up all his available food supply and he was hungry, but do you think that girl thought of that? Not she! All she thought of was the way his wife starved him. She told him how nice it would be if he had a useful wife; oh, not in those words, but that's what it meant, and old Mac said he had one better than that."

"Well, he has," said Symmes shortly.

"YES, the lucky old fool! I wish I'd seen her first. But that's no answer to give a girl who was talking that way. Why didn't he up and say 'She's the most useful woman in the place'? Why, do you know, instead of telling how Mrs. Mac saved Susy's life, this girl says there wasn't a bit of ice in the house for the ice bag needed for Susy's heart. That's her idea of usefulness. She asked Mac why he didn't get an office girl. She said he'd ruin his practice with his wife answering the door. And when we started home Mac was worried. He actually asked me if I thought he ought to get an office girl; he said it seemed a shame to make an office attendant out of a young girl straight from a successful season."

"What'd'y say?" Mr. Symmes was chewing on his cigar.

"I said, rot! Ten to one this was more exciting than a season of débuts, whatever they are. Besides, I said, what would she do if you planted her in this burg with nothing but the social life here on her hands?"

Mr. Symmes broke in: "Oh, you missed it all, you old fool! The thing is that, instead of being useless, this girl is making Mac. What brings these women to his office—his magnetic personality, his good looks, his skill? Maybe, but it's more. It's the girl that opens his door and listens so sweetly to all they say about themselves and what ails them. And some of it is interest in what she does in this house and how she looks and acts. She's advertising him. Of course he has to back it with medical skill, or they'd come only once; but he does that. Isn't it most doctors' troubles that they can't advertise? This girl solves that trouble. If she were like what we're used to here, she wouldn't be any advertisement at all for him, no matter how useful she was about the house."

"IF SHE had an immaculate kitchen and regular meals it would be what was expected of her, and Mac's skill could be used on the slums until ten years from now, when he might have a few regular patients. But Alma has told Gerty that Sally left a message for Mrs. Mac on the dust of the table, and somebody else has said you had to stand up in the library for lack of a chair to sit on, and the third person has said that the bathrooms are scrubbed by a shapely girl in pink satin bloomers who hastily put on her real lace nightgown to answer the door bell while the soap suds dripped on the lace. And half of Gordon City has to see this, if they get sick to do it. I call that the finest kind of advertising in the world, and so would any advertising agency—personal, mouth-to-mouth advertising. It would be worth thousands to me. It will be to Mac. It's great!"

Here Neal came out on the porch. "I'd been so interested I hadn't heard him go downstairs. 'What's great?' he asked."

"Your wife's sympathetic manner. Don't you make the mistake of ever letting her get away from the place during the hours your patients are coming. They'll tell her what they wouldn't tell you."

Neal was silent a moment. "You give me an idea," he said.

"Idea!" spluttered Sam. "Are you thinking of what that fool Sally said?"

"Oh, it—it was Sally," murmured Mr. Symmes.

"No, I wasn't," said Neal. "I don't often remember what Sally says for twenty-four hours. I was thinking of a woman patient who will not give me necessary information about herself."

VIII

SO IT was no surprise to me next morning when Neal asked me to drive with him to Adam Fleming's. I thought he spoke to Mrs. Landis about my going a little shortly. "Mrs. Landis, can you get your upstairs girl to help you this morning? I need to take Leila with me."

"Oh," she said, "I wouldn't have Mrs. Gordon stay home on my account. I thought she had household duties to detain her."

"I need her help this morning myself," said Neal.

"Her help?" Mrs. Landis' voice held immeasurable surprise.

I knew Neal was angry, because he offered no further explanation.

When we were in the automobile Neal grew quite grave. "It's a curious thing, Leila, this being a doctor. There are times when it has its old Latin significance of teacher, and adds confessor to it. Not all confessions are intentionally made, or made by words. And there are times when we know that the illness we are asked to heal is caused by an ache in the heart that we cannot reach. This is such a case. A frightened, bullied girl has had a glimpse of a strange doctor who she believes is human, and she has clutched at the humanity to keep her head above water."

"IT WAS she, then, who wanted you and not the men. I couldn't see how she even got them to come for you."

"She is efficient. They knew she had to have a doctor, and she refused to have any other. She is a country dressmaker. You don't know, I think, what that is. She goes to these farmhouses and sews all day for a small wage, making over dresses, helping with the dishes at night, staying in the house so she can get at her work earlier in the morning. Most of these women do their own sewing, so she's only called in when there is an emergency. She mixes her stitches with brains; so here in the city they began to employ her, and sometimes she has been taken away to Harbor Beach and Charlevoix for summer sewing, when there was a costume ball or something like that coming on. And all her money has gone to helping the farm; yet in her own trouble—well, her sister-in-law's death has piled work on her so that she will go under if she's not taken away, and neither of these hulking men helps her. Jim Fleming runs a dairy. He wanted his sick wife home to milk the cows. I'm going to ask you to take Elsa home with you for a few days—to help you while Susy stays with us, or to sew for you or for any reason you can think of. Her sister-in-law is buried, and there are enough of the Fleming men to milk those cows."

I thought Adam Fleming looked at Neal sullenly when he let us in. Neal did not consult him about taking Elsa home with us, though he made his request of her in her brother's presence.

I had thought, when she opened the door for us, that she looked very pale and harassed, but she got whiter when Neal proffered his invitation.

"She's needed here," said Fleming.

"She won't be any use to you here. She's not strong enough to churn; she can't stand over a cook-stove; and she oughtn't to carry a heavy milk bucket."

"She can't go to your house."

"Do you want another case like the one your brother's mixed up in now?"

I haven't asked you,

(Continued on Page 137)

The Confessions of a Useless Wife

(Continued from Page 136)

I've asked her. And she's said she'd come. Can you come now, Elsa?"

"She gave him a long look and left the room. 'If she can't work here, she can't work in your house.'"

"She won't do the work there she does here. She'll sit still and sew a little bit and answer the telephone. Here she's lifting and washing and ironing. She can't do it, that's all."

"If she goes, she can't come back."

"Maybe she won't want to come back. Maybe she'd like to have the use of some of her own money instead of giving it all to you for the privilege of working herself to death in her odd moments."

When Elsa came back she did not have much with her. Her wicker suitcase was pathetically small. There was a white desperation in her face. You would have thought she had been burning bridges that had long been hard for her to cross.

WHEN we got home we found Mrs. Landis had bolted every downstairs door and locked every window. We were kept waiting some minutes before she opened the door.

"Oh, it's you," she said. "I just couldn't run up and down stairs so much to answer the bell. Who on earth—" She swept Elsa with hostile eyes. "Oh, it's Elsa Fleming."

Neal offered her not the slightest explanation, and she stood still watching us as we went upstairs with Elsa.

In the upstairs hall Neal, who had taken Elsa's arm, said softly: "Steady! You are not Mrs. Landis' guest, but ours. See, your room is the whole length of the house away from hers."

When Neal and I came downstairs we encountered Mrs. Landis in the hall where we had left her. She seemed to have been pondering. "I suppose you two don't know," she said, "that there's a great deal of gossip about Elsa Fleming."

"Is there indeed?" said Neal. "Well, this little town has only gossip and the 'movies.'"

"Oh, don't forget its clubs," I said lightly. I didn't like Mrs. Landis' look, and I thought Neal had been badgered enough about Elsa.

Mrs. Landis did what I hoped she would. She took this as the personal affront of the New Yorker attacking a small town. "We have a respect for the integrity of the home that places like New York would do well to copy."

Neal gave her flattering attention. "Are you applying that to Elsa?"

Mrs. Landis pursed her lips. "I would not have her in my home."

Neal surprised me. "But you have had her there—many times."

She gave him a swift look. "What did she say?"

"Nothing," Neal answered curtly.

THERE was a silence so full of crossed emotions that it was louder than speech. "Do you wish us to leave?" asked Mrs. Landis.

"On the contrary, you cannot leave just now; Susy cannot," Neal's face broke into sudden amusement. "By Jove, I seem to be spending all my time these days ordering people to move or not to move. You know, Mrs. Landis, that Doctor Garland's advice would be the same as mine. You have only Susy and Stephen left to you."

Mrs. Landis was not quick of speech. Lacking the words for what she conceived the situation to demand, she fell back on a time-worn formula.

"If not eating our bread will make it easier for you, Mrs. Landis," said Neal, "the place is at your disposal to make your own arrangements. You know what Susy ought to eat and what you yourself want. I will absolve Leila of further care in the matter. If you want to keep the arrangement from seeming quarrelsome, you can put it on the ground of making it easier for Leila"—he paused, the whimsical look lightening his face—"which ordinarily you might wish to do."

Neal drew me into his office and closed the door, and we grinned at each other.

"Neal," I said at length, "what is the matter with Elsa? You didn't tell me definitely—only that she needed your help."

"AND yours." He reflected a moment. "She's been robbed of vitality by one who should have added to it—as near as I can make out. That's not very clear, but it happens all the time."

"You don't mean Elsa's brothers, do you? If they were my brothers, living with them would take all my resistance."

"No, I don't mean them." "You mean some man?" "Some man is a pretty safe diagnosis in a good many such cases. Yet I think this is a little more complex than this."

At the moment it did not occur to me that Neal probably wanted me to draw my own conclusions. I knew very little then about the power of suggestion or about how much easier it is to act on conclusions you have drawn yourself than to act on somebody else's. I know more about that now. So all I said was:

"Do you know the man?"

"I only suspect him, Leila. That's where I count on your help. There is a big difference between suspecting and knowing. If Elsa would tell me the man's name, I think I could cure her. As long as she does not, I can only hope to strengthen her. Elsa and the man—whatever he is—are up against something big and have too few weapons to fight it."

"Something big?" "The conventions of a small city where there are only gossip and clubs."

"I call that little, not big." "You haven't been up against it. You are from a city where there is no espionage."

"Oh, yes, I have been up against it. I bump into it every time I step out of my house, and if I haven't time to step out, it comes here and walks upstairs into my back hall and my bathrooms."

IX

MRS. LANDIS carried out her threat of not eating our food. Had she done it amiably it would have been a help. But so far as I know she had never thought of herself as a trouble, and she felt now that she was giving us a lesson, though with an inconvenience to herself that she resented. She wouldn't even order of my grocer, though I noticed she also forgot things. I should have liked to have offered her a nice, large black slate with a few appropriate words, but instead I got out of the way when I heard her coming. I got so I could feel her coming by the chills that ran down my spine, and it was worse with Elsa. She used to turn faint and white.

"Elsa," I said as we washed the dishes one noon, "the Gorgon turns you to stone more quickly than she does me."

Elsa's eyes as she looked up at me were the eyes of one who has met the Gorgon and lived through it. "Do you mean Mrs. Landis?"

"Yes; did she ever really hurt you, Elsa, or are you just sensitive, like me, to animosity?"

The girl hesitated. "She has injured me," she replied after a time.

"Does she know it? Is that why she is afraid of you?"

"She knows it." Elsa's mouth shut into a narrow line, whose determination made her look like a different person. Then the

(Continued on Page 138)

Where Walls must be beautiful and sanitary

Healthful walls should surround your family. Have them artistic, of course, daintily colored in charming harmony with your rugs and furnishings—but first of all—sanitary. Added attractiveness and economy may be secured while obtaining this result.

To make your walls beautiful, as well as sanitary, just mix Alabastine, which comes in many standard colors and intermixes to form others, with cold water and apply to any interior surface with a suitable brush. You can do the work yourself if decorators are not available and your walls will be in tones and tints exactly to your taste—inexpensive, harmonious and still absolutely sanitary.

Alabastine

Instead of Kalsomine or Wall Paper

Used wherever attractive walls are essential; in homes, schools, churches, hotels, theatres, auditoriums and public buildings of all kinds. Also used over almost any interior surface—over plaster, wall board, paint, burlap or canvas, or even old wall paper where it is fast, has no raised figures, and contains no aniline dyes.

Alabastine may be purchased at almost any store selling paints but be sure the cross and circle is printed in red on every package.

Let Us Send You Samples of Alabastine Opaline Process

Let us show you the most popular and fashionable home decoration color schemes and send you samples of the new and beautiful three-color harmony effects produced by the Alabastine Opaline Process—the wonderful blending of three different colors on your walls—tiffanized effects—now produced for the first time within reach of moderate incomes.

Write for the advice of our staff of experts who will help you solve any unusual decorating problem.

PRICES:

5 lb. package white Alabastine . . . 75c
5 lb. package tinted Alabastine . . . 80c
Special deep shades (No. 33 dark green—No. 58 deep brown) . . . 95c

The Alabastine Company

570 Grandville Ave.
Grand Rapids, Michigan

"FAMOUS
FREEDOM SPOTS"

No. 2

Send 6c in stamps for this original etching of the beautiful Joan of Arc Statue on Riverside Drive, New York. In sepia tints. Much larger than shown. Suitable for framing.

Freedom from "Nerves"

BOUND in blind slavery to narrow toes and high heels, a woman's feet take wicked toll of disposition, beauty, vivacity, efficiency, health. But do you know that shoes are now made to give women all the attractive smartness Fashion demands—combined with the relief and continued ease for which highly strung nervous systems are constantly crying?

"Type 1"

"Type 2"

"Type 3"

GROUND GRIPPER WALKING SHOES

are the ORIGINAL muscle-developing beauty-preserving Health Shoes

BUILT on Nature's own incomparable lines—with sensible toes and heels and flexible arches like those of your own feet—these shoes revive and strengthen not only your feet, but refresh your entire body from the ground up. And, oh, how fine it is to feel the imprisoned, nerve-edged muscles relax and new life pulse freely—still knowing that all's well in the eyes of the world!

Too many women suffer from headaches, exhaustion, anemia, or worse, and attribute their condition to complicated causes when nervous feet are what really create the trouble.

Wear GROUND GRIPPERS! Unlike ordinary orthopedic footwear, they eliminate this basic cause without limiting your choice to a single type of shoe. There are three distinct types, with a variety of attractive numbers in each. Each fulfills a certain well-defined physical requirement:—

TYPE 1 is the famous "Mother" of corrective shoes—the best medicine in the world for tired, nervous women. TYPE 2 combines this same inimitable principle with bristly modified toe and heel. TYPE 3 is an even smarter adaptation—ideally suited where prevention of foot troubles is more necessary than correction. And all are wonderful shoes! Also made for Children. Men, too. In Boots and Oxfords.

GROUND GRIPPER SHOE COMPANY, INC., 140 Brookline St., East Lynn, Mass.
(Largest Exclusive Manufacturer of Health Shoes in the World.)

Exclusive Stores in Principal Cities. 2000 Agents Everywhere. If there isn't a "Ground Gripper" Shop in your locality, send us the name of your regular dealer. Refuse substitutes!

Never in your life have you known anything to compare with the complete HAPPINESS of "Ground Grippers." Write for our Style and Medical Booklets on Feet—FREE.

The Confessions of a Useless Wife

(Continued from Page 137)

second half of my sentence reached her mind. "Afraid of me? She—of me?"

"Why, yes."

Elsa leaned over and picked up the dish towel she had let fall. It was one she had hemmed for me in the morning. "How could you suppose such a thing?" she asked under her breath.

"I don't suppose it; I know it."

Quite suddenly the color flooded her face into a rare beauty. I watched her with a faint awe; the spirit was so close to the flesh and in such pain. I put out my hand involuntarily, for the color faded, leaving her face whiter than before, and as I held her, the reason for Mrs. Landis' fear—the only possible reason for such fear—came to me as clearly as reasons can come when they have to be put together piece by piece. I had been piecing this all night, before I slept, perhaps in my sleep. It needed only a question for the last piece to be put into the puzzle. A little sentence of Neal's as he spoke to Mrs. Landis about Elsa's arrival came to me: "You have only Stephen and Susy left to you."

"Sit down a minute, Elsa; you look so white. It is Stephen Landis, isn't it? You know it is safe with me."

SHE sat quite still, trying with infinite pathos to pull herself together.

"Don't you think," I said softly, "that you could tell me about it? Perhaps you might feel better if you did."

"Oh, feel!" She stopped. She had no need to say that she had run through feeling, so that there was little left for her to feel. I tried to think where the hopelessness was, or where she thought it was.

"But if he loves you, Elsa," I said finally, "it cannot be so hopeless as this."

"Loves me," she said, repeating the word mechanically.

For an instant I could not find the meaning of the look in her face; then I knew. It was the hunger Neal had spoken of last night; the love-hunger of one who will willingly starve rather than hurt the beloved.

"It is very plain," I said, gravely offering my little sustenance as I would to one weakened by famine. "It is because her son loves you that Mrs. Landis is afraid of you. What other cause could she have? She knows that gossip would not hurt him; it would hurt only you. And she knows you would protect him to the last moment, even if he had no thought of protecting you. What she's afraid of is his finding out how much more her son cares for you than he does for her, how much more he needs you."

"She need not fear." And every word the girl said came as if it were wrenched forth.

"He will not—he does not choose me." Such a simple statement of fact—a white-faced girl clenching her hands on a newly hemmed dish towel—yet here it all was. She was dying of it, of that choice a man was making; dying not all at once but inch by inch; dying not of denied love—that can be borne—but of love that sees the one beloved turn coward.

I WOULD not have augured her pain by any word against Stephen Landis. "Perhaps you are wronging him by allowing him to make this choice," I said at length. "Sometimes men are hurt by the self-sacrifice of women."

She considered this, clasping and unclasping her hands with their finger tips worn with the sewing of many years. "Even if you are right, what can I do?"

"Perhaps you won't have to do anything—not now. You have no idea how trustworthy my husband is."

She looked at me strangely. "If you knew," said Elsa—"If you knew what it means to have such faith in your husband!"

The wall between our minds must have been thin; or else if you listen with the heart you can always hear. "Elsa," I said, "are you married to him?"

She made me no answer. But she did not need to answer.

"YOU have promised not to tell, haven't you?" For I knew as well as if she had said so that only some promise could have kept her from answering at that moment. "Oh, Elsa, then you are injuring him to let him stand from under his responsibilities this way; to let him have all the privileges of marriage and shoulder none of its duties. Marriage means work together. It is what it is for. It is the reason it is publicly entered into, so that a man and a woman may publicly begin work in which each has a part. If you made such a promise as this, you must release yourself. It is not fair to him, even if you made the promise to him. Have you been thinking of him?"

She gave me a startled look. "I have thought of no other."

The telephone which had been ringing several times and the sound of which had only come to me subconsciously, now gave an insistent twang, and I went to Neal's office to answer it. Even tragedy must yield to the telephone bell in a doctor's house.

It was Sam Poyntz. "Say, Mrs. Gordon, will you tell your husband, when he gets home, that I'll drive out to Loon River with him this afternoon? I felt so badly this morning I wasn't sure I could make the trip, but I feel all right now. And tell him if his testimony sends Jim Fleming to jail all the cherries on his farm will rot."

"Well, you know what Neal will say to that."

"Sure. He'll say they ought to get what's coming to them. But Judge McIntyre—he's here now—says to tell Neal, Fleming doesn't have to go to jail to find out what it means to wish night and day you hadn't done a thing."

"BUT think," I said, "of being sorry you hastened your wife's death just because you need her to milk cows and pick cherries."

When Neal came home he found Elsa and me in the laundry. She was showing me how to wash lace.

"Sam and I are going to Loon River," he said. "But just as I was getting the car out, Mrs. Landis found it necessary to overcome her objection to speaking to me. She wants to know where the carpet sweeper is."

"You tell her I gave her a broom three days ago; and if she doesn't know how to use a broom I'll come up and show her," I said, and spread my lacy garments on towels as Elsa had shown me how to do.

"Elsa," said Neal, "you must get out of this cellar. Come upstairs, both of you."

He drew me into his office when we reached the hall, and let Elsa go on to the kitchen.

"Wise little lady," he said softly to me, "you have taken her secret from the hurt place in her heart. It will get well now."

"Tell me, how did you know, Neal?"

"I saw it in her face. It is Landis, is it not?"

"Yes, it is."

"I thought so, but I could not be sure. Does she love him?"

"Hopelessly."

He walked the floor for some minutes, up and down, up and down. When he paused before me his face looked grim. It was his operating look. "I will bring him here to-night. It's what I'm going to Loon River for. Don't tell her beforehand."

X

IT WAS almost dusk when I went to the door to let in Judge McIntyre. "Neal isn't here, judge," I said.

(Continued on Page 141)

Walnut Fruit Salad

Cube 1 slice pineapple, 12 dates, and 1 orange. Add $\frac{1}{2}$ cup Diamond Walnut meats broken in pieces, and 1 sliced banana. Mix thoroughly, moisten with Golden Salad Dressing. Garnish with Maraschino cherries and Walnut Halves. Serve masked with dressing.

Meatless Meat Loaf

2 cups cold cooked beans, 2 cups bread crumbs, 1 cup Diamond Walnuts (ground or chopped fine), 1 bell pepper, chopped fine, 1 egg, 2 tablespoons melted butter, salt and pepper to taste. Mix all ingredients thoroughly. Shape into loaf and bake 30 minutes in moderate oven. Garnish with Walnut Halves, and serve with tomato sauce.

Toasted Walnut Sandwiches

$\frac{1}{2}$ cup cream or cottage cheese, 2 tablespoons salad oil, 1 tablespoon vinegar, $\frac{1}{4}$ teaspoon salt, $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon paprika, 6 tablespoons Diamond Walnut meats, 1 loaf graham bread. Mix oil, vinegar, salt, and paprika and then mix with cheese. Cut graham bread in $\frac{3}{4}$ -inch slices, spread with cheese mixture, and sprinkle with chopped Diamond Walnut meats. Put together in pairs, remove crusts, and cut in finger-shaped pieces. Toast, pile log-cabin fashion on a fancy plate, and serve as an accompaniment to dinner salad.

The Chef's Touch

May be a few Crisp Walnuts

Walnuts add essential nourishment in flavory form

OFTEN a few crisp, flavory Walnut meats add just the touch necessary to transform a commonplace dish into one of the family favorites. Their delicious flavor contributes to the goodness of almost any food.

Nature made Walnuts appetizing because of their nourishing qualities which are so essential to the well-rounded diet.

Walnuts exceed potatoes, milk, graham bread, macaroni, and eggs in protein—the tissue builder and repairer.

And in calories, the scientific measurement of food value, Walnuts, with 3180 to the pound, lead all the above foods and in addition beef, veal, ham, mackerel, cheese, sugar, beets, cabbage, carrots, peas, turnips, and beans.

Some foods lack one essential and supply others in excess, but Walnuts supply all of the vital food elements in ideal proportions. They are over 96% pure nutrition.

Use Them Regularly in Menus

Use Walnuts in meat substitutes, dressing for fowls, desserts, cakes, and salads. They make almost any dish more attractive.

And Diamond Walnuts, the best, cost no more than ordinary kinds. They are hand-sorted, weight-tested, sample-cracked, and selected with infinite care.

Thin shells permit the kernels to be lifted out whole. The plump, sweet, tender nut-meats are perfect in flavor.

Your dealer has a sack marked with the Diamond Trade-Mark like that shown on the bottom of this page. Ask him to take yours from this sack.

DIAMOND California WALNUTS

More Meats Per Pound

Diamond Shelled Walnuts are packed in a high vacuum to preserve indefinitely the fresh, sweet flavor characteristic of the newly matured California Walnut. The can contains Halves for topping and facing as well as Pieces for filler and salads. The glass contains only carefully selected Halves for table use and fancy dishes.

Many recipes just as tempting as these, are contained in the revised edition of "100 Delicious Walnut Recipes," which includes the favorite dishes of the Wives of the Walnut Growers, as well as those of a leading culinary expert. Send the price per pound you have been paying for Walnuts and a free copy will be mailed you. Address Dept. 13.

California Walnut Growers Association

*A Purely Co-operative, Non-Profit Organization of Over 4000 Growers
Our yearly production more than Forty Million Pounds
LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA*

Quick Easy Thorough

Old Dutch Cleanser gives superior results on cooking utensils. It doesn't scratch and leaves the surface bright, clean and sanitary. For all cleaning in the kitchen or bathroom use Old Dutch Economical — Efficient — Sanitary

The Confessions of a Useless Wife

(Continued from Page 138)

He was quite grave. "I know it, Mrs. Landis telephoned me he wasn't here, an hour ago. It's she I've come to see. She sent for me." He hesitated the barest second. Then he said: "Is it true, Mrs. Gordon, that Susy ought not to be moved?"

"I think she can be moved in a few days, judge, if she's carried flat on her back. But any sudden movement might put just the little more strain on her that can't be borne."

"I understand." He looked embarrassed.

"You see, Mrs. Landis wants to get away. I won't go into that; it's natural she should not want to burden you, kind as you've been. But she telephoned Doctor Garland this afternoon, and he would have nothing to do with it. So now she wants to see me. I think we'd best get her away, if we can. She'll have more time to look after Susy if she doesn't spend it at the telephone telling the town her troubles."

I got as angry as any Scotchman could get. "The trouble is on her side, judge. There is no more trouble for us than would be occasioned by any unexpected guest."

"Well, what ails her then?"

"She doesn't like the woman I've engaged to help me."

"Well, I'll be hanged! Excuse me, but what's it to her?"

"It must be a good deal to her, if it stirs up all this."

HE GAVE me a straight look. "I've always said there was nothing the matter with your headwork, Mrs. Gordon. I'm going upstairs in a moment, and I'm taking a man's opinion with me. Susan Landis should have some man about to explain a few things to her. Since she's sent for me I'll do my best to take on that little job for my old friend Landis' sake."

"She has a son," I said briefly.

"Aye, when she has him, which isn't any oftener than he can help, and by now you'll not be blaming the young man much, with the straight way your head works."

Yet working straight or not, this was the first time this particular thought had occurred to me. "What kind of a man is her son? Like Susy?"

Again he hesitated. Again he seemed to feel he could speak. "Not he. He's more like his father. If he gets the other in him beaten out early enough, he'll do. Give him a chance. He only got away a little while ago, and but for outside help I doubt if he'd have managed it. It will be the making of him, if he can keep away. His father was a man. He stuck it out—and died in his forties."

I should never have connected the two but for my work with Neal. And as the warm thought of Neal flooded me, obliterating these disagreeable things, I heard the sound of his car out in the road. "It's Neal," I said joyfully.

AND then my heart skipped a beat. For following Neal was a tall young man whose likeness to his mother was apparent even in the dusk.

"Ah, Steve!" said Judge McIntyre. "Where did you find Steve, MacNeal?"

"Fishing at Loon River, judge. I'll call his mother downstairs, because I don't want Susy disturbed. Will you go into the library, all of you, and wait for me?"

"MacNeal," said Judge McIntyre, "will you just let me go up with you for Mrs. Landis? She sent for me this afternoon. It's the first moment I had to come, and maybe she won't want me now that Stephen's here."

The two men's eyes met. A ghost of a smile lay in Neal's, as he nodded and they went upstairs together.

I took Stephen Landis into the library with my heart going like a velvet-padded gong, for the library opened into the dining room and it was near the dinner hour when Elsa might be setting the table. But the place was deserted.

The young man stood at the center table, the chandelier lights shining on hair as blond as Susy's, on eyes frowning under light brows at the sudden glare of the room after the dusk, on a full under lip and a lifted firm chin. It was a face that needed only a dark cameo one, like Elsa's, near it to make it striking. It must have been inevitable that these two would attract each other. He gave me an appraising look; then spoke to me quite simply. Had I not seen that his hands were grasping the table with white-knuckled fingers I would not have guessed at tension. "Mrs. Gordon, Mac says you have—have Elsa Fleming here."

I had not expected it. I had supposed Neal meant to surprise him, even though I had heard Neal say many times not to surprise a man into doing a thing, if you wanted him to keep on doing it; that a minute's preparation was worth an hour's persuasion. "Yes," I said. "She is not very well."

I was feeling my way, and I suddenly found it, almost as if my hand had been taken. "I don't think she could get well with her brothers. They are—they are terrible people."

I saw him wince, but he made no answer. I let a little frame of silence surround the picture, then I added: "There seems to be no one who cares what becomes of her."

"There is." "Well"—I crossed the room and pulled down the shades and came back with my eye on the swinging pantry door in the dining room, behind which I knew Elsa was working—"if there is, Elsa doesn't know it. And for all the use that it is to her in saving her strength and health, it might as well not exist. It's worse than nothing to have somebody who ought to help and doesn't. Oh"—I found passion creeping into my voice, for all my efforts to say the wise thing—"to have one person you might look to for help and to have that one fail you, it's like taking a crutch from a crippled child or kicking an unhealed wound."

HE UNCLENCHED his hands. "If you mean me, I didn't know —"

But out in the hall I heard the men's voices. Mrs. Landis entered, followed by the two men.

She did not rush to her only son with the gladness of a mother in a difficult position, happy to have him at her side. She stood still looking at him a second. Then she looked furtively about the room and beyond it into the dim dining room. "Well, Stephen," she said, "we find ourselves in a most disagreeable situation. Susy fainted here a week ago, and we have been unable to move her."

She stopped and leaned forward, again peering into the dining room.

The pantry door swung open and Elsa entered with the tablecloth on her arm and a tray in her hand. She stopped at the sound of voices and looked from the dim room into the lighted one. I saw her grope a little with one hand while the tablecloth slipped to the floor and her eyes fixed themselves on the figure under the chandelier. Then she put the tray gently on the table and stood quite still.

"IT IS Elsa, Neal," I said. "Do you want her to come in?"

"Yes, please, Elsa," Neal went to the dining room and brought her back.

"Ah, I see," said Mrs. Landis. "It was a prearranged matter." Her voice was unendurable. Even her son flushed.

Elsa's eyes, resting on Stephen Landis, burned in her white face with an intensity that seemed to filter through the atmosphere of the whole room.

(Continued on Page 143)

The nursing mother

How to guard Baby's health and yours

WITH a keen yearning for baby's welfare, you should watch your own health. You know that your physical condition registers its effect upon baby through the milk.

Be particularly careful to secure regular and thorough elimination of intestinal contents. Such waste, accumulating and allowed to remain in the body, creates dangerous and irritating poisons. An eminent baby specialist says that these poisons, when absorbed from the poisonous accumulation in the intestines, are very quickly reflected in the milk.

Nor can the nursing mother safely employ laxatives or cathartics, states an authority, because they are absorbed into the blood, re-appear in the milk, and thus affect baby.

Leading physicians have discovered a newer, better way, a means as simple as nature itself.

LUBRICATION

In perfect health, a natural lubricant keeps the food waste soft. Thus it is easily eliminated. But when waste matter is allowed to accumulate this natural lubricant is not sufficient.

To find something to take the place of this natural lubricant, medical authorities have conducted exhaustive research. They have discovered that the gentle lubricating action of Nujol most closely resembles that of nature's own lubricant. As Nujol is not a laxative it can not cause distress. It is not a medicine in any sense of the word—and like pure water it is harmless.

Unlike laxatives or cathartics, no particle of Nujol is absorbed into the system, thus it cannot affect the milk nor the infant. Nujol can also be given to your infant with perfect safety and effectiveness.

These facts have influenced leading physicians everywhere to prescribe Nujol for all nursing mothers, and have led to its adoption in the principal hospitals throughout the world.

Test Nujol yourself. Get a bottle from your druggist today.

Nujol

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

A Lubricant, Not a Laxative

Guaranteed by Nujol Laboratories, Standard Oil Co. (New Jersey)

TRIAL BOTTLE FREE—Send the coupon below for a free trial bottle of Nujol.

Nujol, Room 821-J, 44 Beaver Street, New York
For this coupon and 15 cents stamps or coin, enclosed, to cover packing and postage, please send me a trial bottle of Nujol.

Name _____

Address _____

1847
75th Anniversary

1847 ROGERS BROS. SILVERPLATE

Anniversary celebrations, or gift-occasions of any kind, call for silverplate. It can be given year after year, each gift-piece increasing the value of that given on previous anniversaries. This year "1847 ROGERS BROS." celebrates its own Seventy-fifth Anniversary. Whenever you see the date, 1847, you will think of this silverplate, which has been proved finest in quality by three-quarters of a century's service. Remember it—and the Ambassador pattern shown above.

Sold by leading dealers. Write for folder 28-Q, illustrating other patterns, to the International Silver Co., Meriden, Conn.

THE FAMILY PLATE FOR SEVENTY-FIVE YEARS

INTERNATIONAL SILVER CO.

The Confessions of a Useless Wife

(Continued from Page 141)

"Some few things, Mrs. Landis," said Neal grimly, "like death and birth, need arrangement."

I don't know what I had expected; perhaps some argument; perhaps even a quarrel. But I had not expected the blank hush that followed Neal's simple speech. Stephen Landis had not looked up when Elsa entered the room, and when he did so he did not look at her. He looked at Neal and there was no warmth in the look. It was the guarded glance of the man who had been trapped into a scene. Distinctly it could be seen that Stephen Landis felt it was a trap. My heart ached for the girl who would have let her own frail body agonize in the trap without one moan.

MRS. LANDIS spoke: "If you have arranged this assembly at a time when I cannot escape it, with the hope that it will be of any benefit to Elsa Fleming, you have taken advantage of my situation to no purpose."

Neal's answer seemed to have no bearing on Mrs. Landis' speech. "Your son is of age, Mrs. Landis, and he is making his own living."

A flush spread over Mrs. Landis' face. "I do not know why you connect Stephen with this, or why you say what you have."

"Perhaps," said Neal, "Stephen knows."

"I feel quite sure," Mrs. Landis answered, "that Stephen does not wish his name connected with this girl's. Any further connection of this sort would start scandal. Even if Stephen felt seriously about her, I am sure he would put the feeling aside. You cannot in this city go on with a thing that provokes scandal. You cannot even begin domestic life, if that is what you have in mind, Doctor Gordon, on a foundation of scandal. I am thinking of Susy as well as of Stephen; and I feel quite sure he wishes to think of us both."

"Have you thought at all of Elsa?" Neal apparently spoke to the mother, but I knew to whom his words were addressed. "Elsa is also a young girl like Susy, only Elsa has worked hard all her life at a work that scandal actually harms. Had your son amused himself with one of the girls of his own set and then left her, there would have been gossip, but no scandal. But in this case her summer's amusement may be followed by the loss of the girl's chance of making a living."

"She should have thought of that herself before she got into this," Mrs. Landis replied. "She is accustomed to taking care of herself. She knows how to do it. If she didn't do it, it was because she didn't want to."

AGAIN Neal's answer was not made to the actual words Mrs. Landis spoke. "If Stephen could repair the damage to Elsa's reputation—and I suppose he can and will—it will take him longer to repair the damage he has done to her faith in him, to our faith in him, and that is a greater waste than the other." Behind Neal's low voice there was a passionate sincerity. For the first time since Elsa had entered the room Stephen Landis looked at her. "Already nothing can ever repay Elsa," Neal continued, "for these days she has had to stand against this public opinion you have helped to create, Mrs. Landis. She has had to stand even against her own family, when by every law of kindness and decency she should have had your son's arm to hold her."

"Oh, all this pious melodrama doesn't alter the case," said Mrs. Landis curtly. "Why do we stand here talking about it?"

There had been an insistent ringing of the doorbell, and Neal now heard it. It is a summons, as I have said before, that no doctor may deny. Neal opened the hall door. We heard a strange voice and his own in curt reply. I saw Elsa grasp the back of the chair, and Adam Fleming appeared at Neal's side at the library door.

His sunken eyes swept the group within and came to a pause on Stephen Landis. The dull antagonism of his look flared into real enmity. He brushed by Neal and entered the room. "It's time I came to take her home. If it wasn't for this man I wouldn't be facing the chance of a jail sentence. Six months ago Elsa wanted more money, so she could get fine dresses to look like the girls he was used to. So she went out to sew among you women," he flung his hand at Mrs. Landis, "instead of working among her own kind where she would have been safe."

Mrs. Landis stirred, but the man's force could be felt as a tangible thing. "She came home to us," he swept on—"she came home with all her fine clothes, a thing to point the finger at. She had money, and she set herself against us with her money back of it. She put these ideas in my wife's mind. She told her if a woman had her own money she didn't have to take orders from any man, husband or brother. And so when my wife got tired of her own house and filled with these crazy ideas, she left me and took work in another house, to get money; for all I knew to end as Elsa has ended. She didn't get money for work in her own house, so she didn't care. I brought her home. And I'd have done it, sick or well. Better to have her die than be the thing Elsa is."

THE young man under the chandelier had grown whiter. Perhaps some new vision was touching him of what Elsa had been facing. Perhaps merely the old truth had reached him that no one can live to himself alone. Here were death and desperation following his decision and his indecision. "What do you mean," he said to Fleming, "by this thing that Elsa has become?"

The man moistened his lips. "I don't have to tell you."

I cannot describe the insult of the few words. I saw the triumphant thing in Mrs. Landis' face, and I could bear it no longer.

"Adam Fleming," I said, "you haven't anything to tell anybody about Elsa. She is Stephen Landis' wife."

The room became as still as the mountain must have been after the whirlwind passed by. I felt Neal's hand on my shoulder as he drew me against him. Then I saw why he had done it. For Mrs. Landis literally sprang at me.

"It is not true. Ask the girl; she will tell you it is not true."

"It is true," I answered. "Ask your own son. It must be because of you that he is withholding the truth. It is a brave thing you wish your son to do."

STEPHEN LANDIS gave a curious sound. "Is this a Sunday school?" he asked bitterly. "Yes, I am married to Elsa. Why didn't she speak to me, if she wanted to announce it now?"

Elsa came softly forward. "You know I asked you, Stephen, to make our marriage public. You know when and why you denied me."

Landis did not answer her. He turned to Neal. "Where do you come in?"

"I am her doctor."

"I am almost well now," said Elsa, and her voice was clear as a bell. "Go home, Adam, and tell all the family that I was married to Stephen Landis in Grand Rapids on the tenth of June, at the courthouse. Mrs. Landis, I have not found marriage

(Continued on Page 144)

"Mother, what can we do now?"

YOU CAN keep children amused for hours on rainy days with the fun they can have with LePage's Glue.

There never was a boy who did not like to play with soldiers. In the magazines of the past few years there are dozens of pictures of real soldiers, guns, tanks, generals, which he can cut out and mount on cardboard with little props to make them stand up. He can make armies and navies.

The fashion pages of magazines will furnish whole paper families to be cut out and mounted on cardboard for the little girl who likes paper dolls. LePage's will stick the edges of paper and cardboard together smoothly all around.

A broken wooden soldier's leg or doll's leg may be glued as good as new. Make match-scratchers by spreading a thin coat of LePage's over a piece of cardboard or toy elephant's back. Dust sand or emery over it and allow to dry.

If a child's rubbers are a bit loose, he is quite apt to lose them. Give him a small strip of felt or velvet to glue on the inside of the heel close up to the edge. This tightens rubbers nicely.

Needle cases may be made by gluing cretonne over squares of cardboard placed side by side to close like a book, the cretonne forming a hinge. Then glue squares of scalloped flannel inside for needles. Pictures cut from colored supplements may be mounted in scrap books so a child can make a "funny" book of his own.

LePage's Glue is also a household friend, and Daddy uses it on his office desk. Many other practical, money saving uses are described in a book called "LePage's Glue—the Handy Helper for Making and Mending." Send for free copy. Russia Cement Company, Laboratory and Factory, 2 Essex Avenue, Gloucester, Mass.

You can make an army of soldiers with LePage's.

Sister, you can make paper dolls. Mother will show you.

A nice little giraffe has his neck mended with LePage's.

You can make a match-scratcher all yourself!

LE PAGE'S GLUE

THE STOPPER IS ALSO THE SPREADER

Table talks

By Mrs. Knox

Making Your Table Allowance Go Farther

"I HAVE just so much money each week to spend on my table," a young housekeeper explained to me recently. "Toward the end of the week, particularly if we have been entertaining, I find my allowance diminishing so that I can't afford expensive steaks and chops—yet I always try to set a very nice table. Can't you help me find some really attractive, yet inexpensive, meatless dishes?"

I knew just the recipe she needed, a delicious Salmon and Rice Loaf, molded with Knox Sparkling Gelatine—inexpensive yet attractive and appetite satisfying. She was delighted with it and asked for others, which I gave her, explaining how helpful Knox Gelatine can be in making bits of leftover vegetables, fruits, fish and meats into salads and desserts which the most particular housewife would proudly place on her table.

Here is the first recipe I gave her. I will gladly send you the others if you'll write to me for them.

SALMON (OR TUNA FISH) RICE LOAF

1 envelope Knox Sparkling Gelatine
1 cupful of cold water 1 teaspoonful salt
1 teaspoonful pepper 1 cupful cooked rice
1 cupful milk 1 tablespoon melted butter
1 can of salmon (or tuna fish)

Soften gelatine in cold water and dissolve by adding hot milk. Add the seasonings, salmon (or tuna fish), rice and butter. Pour into a wet mold and let stand until set. This may be served cold on lettuce as a salad or with a hot tomato sauce in place of meat at dinner.

Other Meatless Recipes—Free

There are many other inexpensive, meat-substitute recipes, together with real meat dishes, fruit and vegetable salads, desserts, candies and dainties given in my booklets, "Dainty Desserts" and "Food Economy." Send for them. They are free. Just enclose 4c in stamps to cover postage and mention your grocer's name. Address

KNOX

SPARKLING GELATINE

113 Knox Avenue Johnstown, N. Y.

"Wherever a recipe calls for gelatine think of KNOX."

The Confessions of a Useless Wife

(Continued from Page 143)

with your son a very happy thing. I am not eager to hold him either against your will or his own. It may be true that my earning a living in Gordon City is jeopardized, but I think only temporarily. As soon as it is known that I am Stephen's wife, and that will be by breakfast time to-morrow, there will be many homes eager to have me sew. I do not need your son to support me or to stand behind me."

She turned to Stephen and her voice sank to a whisper. "And to you, Stephen, marriage is more than—than love. I learned it in my brother's house, watching its failure there. I have learned it here, watching its success. Marriage is living together with value to each other; working together, I think, with value to others, but working together. When you can work with me, when you are glad to have me with you, not ashamed, nor afraid, then only can I come to you."

She turned away and left the room with a strange look at Neal and me as we stood together. Judge McIntyre opened the door for her and bent his head as she passed out.

Silence fell on us. Stephen Landis stood staring at the floor.

His mother was the first to move. She came to him and laid her hand on his arm. "Stephen, surely we have had enough. Let us go."

He seemed to waken from sleep. Quite gently he lifted his mother's hand from his arm. "I must try to find her, mother, now. Perhaps she will have patience." He spoke shyly, making his faint apology with guarded mouth. Then he went out of the room.

XI

AFTER Neal's office hours were over he had several visits to pay and he did not get back until almost dinnertime. He had been in court in the morning, and Adam Fleming had not been held for the Grand Jury. But Neal said he was not through with him. He had yet to see if there was any reason on Fleming's farm for Mrs. Fleming's typhoid.

"Neal," I said, "Sally McIntyre has called off her dinner at the club to-night. You'll have to put up with my cooking."

"What did she say?" asked Neal.

"That they couldn't get a table because she'd waited too long to reserve one, and she would postpone the dinner until next week."

"Did she name the day next week?"

"No, she didn't. She said she'd call up. Why?"

Neal humped his shoulders.

"And Neal, each person who came to the office to-day tried to pump me about Elsa and about Susy. Neal, I believe something in your visits has made you cross."

"Oh, all this talk makes me cross. I wouldn't mind if they'd get it straight. The town is buzzing with Elsa's marriage. You can hear anything about it, if you listen, except the truth."

"Where have they gone, Neal?"

"Stephen took her with him back to Loon Lake, where he's camping and fishing. It'll be good for her, out in the woods with nobody around. They can get everything talked over before they come back." He fell into thought for a few minutes. Then he said: "Suppose we have a dinner of our own at the club. I'll ask Sam and Mr. Symmes, and if you like we'll dance afterwards."

"If Sally can't get a reservation, how can you?"

"Oh, Sally!"

WE WERE late, because Neal had to stop and see his sick baby and its mother. And the first person I saw as we went into the dining room was Sally, the center of a dinner party, where Neal and I had evidently been the only ones for whom places had not been reserved.

"Why, Neal," I said, "there's Sally and—yes, there are all the rest of the party but just us. That's funny."

I saw Sam Poyntz and Mr. Symmes exchange glances. Sam's face darkened visibly. But Neal looked at Sally with a faint shrug. She had the grace to blush. When the dancing began, she came over to our table and explained that at the last moment they had succeeded in getting a smaller table that somebody else had given up. She spoke to Neal, not to me, and he heard her in perfect silence. There is something about silence in answer to an explanation that is embarrassing to everybody who hears. I looked across at the table Sally had left, and there was no mistaking the subject of their conversation as they watched Sally.

Sally was no coward. "Mac," she said, "are you deaf?"

"Anything but, Sally! You know what I am. I was born here. There are a few things I won't stand for. And this is one of them. If you or any of your friends could accept hospitality in a desperate situation and then go away and slander your host and hostess, then you—well, I don't have to explain that to you, Sally."

SALLY sent a fleeting glance at me. "They're not slandering you, Mac."

Neal's face got a little white. "Cowards!" Neal looked straight at me. "Thank heaven, we have a few real people in this city. Leila won't have to waste her time and strength on the others much longer."

I didn't enjoy my evening, for all that I had the undivided attention of three of the nicest men in the world. There is a great difference between the look that accepts you at once and the look that hesitates between two opinions. I had never encountered the doubtful look before, either at school or at home or in my own social set. It was strange to me now. You have to steel yourself against it. And the Country Club was not the only place that I met it. I began to expect it and to look for it whenever I went out. At home I missed Elsa; perhaps I missed all the drama that had used our home for a stage. It seemed very quiet and very lonely at night, for Neal spent every spare second with the baby down the road and its mother. Both had typhoid. Neal sent for the father, but he couldn't get a nurse. The small supply of nurses in our own town and those near by was long ago exhausted, and the telephone calls came pouring in.

"I warned them," said Neal. "I warned them all, especially the families at Cone Beach. I tell you, everybody that used that man Fleming's milk needs inoculation. If I can just pull that baby through! It's touch and go. The mother's made of stronger stuff."

I heard him calling Doctor Garland and Sam Poyntz by telephone. He couldn't get Sam. He tried until late at night and again early in the morning.

"LEILA," he said, "try Sam for me about nine, will you? Tell him there are nine cases of typhoid at Cone Beach now, and that I want to see him."

I had central ring four times and then, as I was about to hang up, I heard Sam's voice faintly.

"Leila Gordon, Doctor —"

He broke in. "Tell Mac I'm sick." The telephone grew quiet.

I didn't wait for Neal. I didn't know where to find him. I drove straight to the flat building where Sam lived, and when I couldn't get in his door I got the janitor to take me up the back steps and in the kitchen door, or what would have been the kitchen if Sam had kept house. He lived alone in the only bachelor-apartment building in town.

He was lying across his bed, his face flushed and his eyes bright. "Give me a drink," he said thickly.

The janitor held up his head while I gave him a drink. "Have you been like this long, Sam?"

"Long enough."

"Well, I'm going to get you a nurse. Neal's out, but I'll telephone Doctor Garland."

"But, Mrs. Gordon," said Doctor Garland, "there isn't a nurse in town. I can't even get any more from Grand Rapids."

"Can't somebody come over here and help Sam until Neal gets here, doctor?"

"Try Mrs. McIntyre, Mrs. Gordon."

"I would stay myself, doctor, but a little baby near us is dying, and its mother is sick

(Continued on Page 145)

SLIPOVA CLOTHES for CHILDREN

Pretty Creepers for Active Tots

No wonder Mothers of small, lively children like "SLIPOVA Creepers". They are so neat—so pretty—so free from frills.

The Creepers, like all "SLIPOVA Clothes for Children," are made of standard fabrics. They wear well and wash perfectly—fast colors. They have double seams where greater strength is necessary. There's no skimping of cloth or finish.

When you recognize the sturdy quality of these "SLIPOVA Clothes for Children" you'll find it hard to realize that most of them sell for not over $1.

THE "SLIPOVA" LABEL IS PROOF OF UNUSUAL QUALITY AND LOWER PRICE.

If your dealer doesn't carry them, write to Dept. C.

McCawley & Co., Inc.
M. W. S. Bldg.
Baltimore, Md.
Sales Office
253 Church St., New York City

Look for the label.

Aladdin
meets every need

THE absolutely sanitary, correctly modeled Aladdin Utensils help to retain the full flavor of their contents. Just as the Aladdin percolator makes better coffee, all thru the complete line, you find Aladdin Utensils improving cooking quality and meeting every need. Start an Aladdin breakfast set with the aluminum percolator and the enameled steel boiler (for your cereals).

ALADDIN
Aluminum

Made by
THE CLEVELAND
METAL PRODUCTS CO.
7190 PLATT AVE.
CLEVELAND, OHIO.

Also makers of
NEW PERFECTION
Oil Stoves, Ovens and Water Heaters

Enameled Steel

For the preparation of every meal there are Aladdin Utensils in silvery aluminum and china-smooth enameled steel. Modestly priced they are made with the care bestowed on table ware. You will be proud to own Aladdin Utensils. At the foremost hardware, house-furnishing and department stores.

Start your
Aladdin Set Now

The Confessions of a Useless Wife

(Continued from Page 144)

and they haven't anybody. But I'm so afraid Doctor Poyntz is very ill."

Mrs. McIntyre came in half an hour. By that time the janitor had Sam in bed, but he needed everything—a bath to reduce his temperature, an ice bag for his aching head, and so on. So it was almost noon before I got to the sick baby. Neal was there. He held up a finger as I tiptoed in. The baby was sleeping, with its father's hand held in its thin little fingers. I never heard anybody breathe so fast. The father looked haggard, and his eyes were red with sleeplessness.

"Make him some strong coffee," whispered Neal.

He followed me to the kitchen and I had a chance to tell him about Sam.

"I'll go and see him at once, Leila. Will you stay here until I get back? We'll save this baby yet with a little luck. Don't let anybody in. I'll get an ex-service man to look after Sam, if I can't get a nurse. There are several of the disabled men who could help and who have nothing else to do."

He came back for me in an hour. The baby hadn't stirred, and its father had fallen asleep on the bed beside it. Neal nodded to me and I followed him out to the veranda.

"I'm sorry, dear, to put all this on you, but I want you to telephone the American Legion at Grand Rapids as soon as you get home, and ask if they will round up the disabled service men who can look after the sick—those who have been in a hospital long enough to know a little about sickness. Ask them if they will send them to my house, and I will pay for the expense attached to it. We are in for a typhoid epidemic, I'm afraid."

"It would be too bad, Neal, to endanger these men's lives when they've given so much."

"Every one of them was inoculated against typhoid two years ago. Every service man and woman in town is safe. You get your first inoculation as soon as I get home, Leila. I'll be there in time for my office hours."

"Is the baby still sleeping, Neal?" I asked when he came into the office.

HE SHOOK his head. "If I had a good nurse! But they haven't the money to send away and get one."

"How much money have we, Neal?"

"Hardly any, dear."

"What about Mr. Symmes?"

"It's broken out among his factory men. Mr. Symmes needs every cent he has."

"Won't the city help?"

"It is helping. We all are. But I need more than amateur help. I need expert skill, not only for this baby but for dozens of other cases. It's all a matter of nursing in typhoid."

That night Neal stayed all night with the baby. At six in the morning I asked the milkman if he knew how the baby was. He had come from there.

"I'm afraid it won't live through the morning, Mrs. Gordon. They've put it beside its sick mother, and they wouldn't do that before, on the mother's account."

I stood on the porch thinking of that poor mother who had lain there so patiently watching her baby across the room and who was holding it now, because in all the years to come she might have only this little hour to recall. And I thought of how silly, in the face of such agony, a thing like pride was.

I went indoors and called long distance. "I want Benjamin F. Laughlin, New York," I said. "I want to get him before he leaves the house for the office, and I want the charge for this call reversed. It is Leila Laughlin calling."

I heard father's voice in an incredibly short time, as clearly as if he were before me.

"Father," I said, "you will never have a chance to do more with your money. They are dying here for lack of money. Father, I want you to telegraph me money, not for myself; I don't want a penny for myself. I want it for nurses and doctors. I want it this morning. If I ever meant anything to you, useless as I am, do this for me. I'll give you an account of every penny spent."

"How much do you want, Leila?"

"I want a thousand dollars. I want more if you'll give it."

"I will telegraph two hundred and mail a draft for the rest in an hour. It should be in your hands to-morrow morning."

Neal came in a few minutes. He was exhausted. I had never seen him so hollow-eyed and tired.

"Neal," I cried, "not the baby!"

"No; not yet. I had an inspiration this morning. I gave the baby to its mother. I think—human will is a strange thing, Leila; that mother will not let her child die. Perhaps it's prayer; I don't know. The baby is alive."

"I have telephoned father for money. I'm to have a thousand dollars to-morrow."

A faint light came into his face. "Then we'll send to Cadillac for nurses—to Detroit, if we need to. I'm so glad."

"You will sleep, Neal?"

"An hour or two; then I must go with the men who are to examine the Fleming well and the cows. No, I don't have to drive. Tom Symmes is driving me there. No coffee until I wake up, dear."

THE telephone rang insistently after Neal had gone away in Mr. Symmes' car. I took down message after message; one from a strange doctor, asking for Neal's help; one from the hospital, now full of patients; a half dozen from people who wanted to be inoculated.

The city was swaying from fear to a gathering of its resources. Scarcely a family that had taken milk from Adam Fleming but was now paying for it in illness. The surrounding country was massed against the city in a solid wall of fear. But it was the women whom the scourge was attacking; all the men who had been overseas or in camps and so been inoculated against typhoid were escaping it now. The inoculation of the community went on as fast as it could be done. Fear-stricken women besought me over the telephone to send the doctor to inoculate their children. I sat at Neal's desk and made out a list of visits, graded according to their importance, and trying to find a place among these visits for him to sleep.

I must have fallen asleep myself, sitting in the desk chair, for I was awakened by the whir of the telephone bell and as I sat up I was conscious that it had been ringing for some time.

AS I TOOK off the receiver I heard Mr. Symmes' voicesaying insistently to the operator: "Try again, won't you? It is of the utmost importance."

"Here I am, Mr. Symmes," I said. "I fell asleep. That's why I didn't answer."

"Mrs. Gordon, your husband—" he paused.

I caught the arm of the chair. "Yes," I said sharply, "I hear you."

"He has been hurt."

Something wrenched at my heart and turned me faint. "Say it again."

"MacNeal has been hurt, Mrs. Gordon."

"Mr. Symmes, you wouldn't—surely you wouldn't tell me an untruth. Neal—he's just been hurt—no more?"

"No more, dear Mrs. Gordon." His voice was kindness itself. "His leg has been hurt. I am bringing him home myself. We had a doctor out here; we brought one with us, you know. No, not Sam Poyntz. He's ill to-day; but we have a pretty good surgeon. And Garland will meet us at your house. Please don't worry. Just make a place for

(Continued on Page 146)

Make Mapleine Syrup
As You Need It
for 22¢ a quart

Yes, a whole quart for only 22c, made as follows:

4 cups sugar	*12c
2 cups water	00
Mapleine (sample)	10
	22c

(*Approximate price of sugar)

And such syrup—fresh, golden, maple-flavored! Made as quickly as you pour hot water from the tea-kettle. Simply dissolve granulated sugar and add the magic drops of

MAPLEINE
The Golden Flavor

to impart the delight of maple flavor and the glow of golden color. The ingredients cost so little you can use this delicious syrup freely. A 2-ounce bottle of Mapleine (35c) contains sufficient flavoring for twelve full quarts of Mapleine Syrup, reducing the cost of the syrup to 16c a quart. Make as much or as little of it as desired—fresh and clear—just as you need it.

And there are other taste treats in the Mapleine bottle! Use Mapleine as the flavoring delicious in desserts, in cake frostings and fillings, in ice cream or candies when you want them particularly good. Add Mapleine as a chef's touch of piquancy to soups, baked beans, ham, gravies, meats.

At grocers'—2-ounce bottle 35c.

Also larger sizes
(Duty added in Canada)

Use the coupon below for trial bottle (enough for one quart syrup) and recipe booklet. Enclose the dime for expenses.

Crescent Manufacturing Company
321 Occidental Avenue
Seattle, Wash.

Send 10c with this coupon

Enclosed herewith find 10c for trial bottle of Mapleine, and recipe booklet:

My name _____

Address _____

My Grocer _____

She must wear

H. & W.

They Fit Brassieres
to preserve this contour

Expertly designed to anticipate each prevailing mode and perfectly conform every type of figure to that mode, "H. & W." Brassieres have for twenty years earned their conspicuous place in the wardrobe of the woman who cares.

There is a design to meet your especial requirement at your Corsetiere's. Style book will be forwarded on request.

No. A3807, here illustrated. The front panel produces a straight front line flattening in effect. The horizontal boning across the diaphragm reduces and gives just the desirable support. This boning is a recent and marked improvement for its purpose and will not wear through. Graduated strips of elastic extending around the waist from the panel give easy but firm support.

The elastic panels assure a snug waist and preclude the riding up of the garment with the movement of the body.

Back panel—with its close closing feature gives a most satisfactory back support and assures comfort. Price $1.00. Other styles and fabrics from one to five dollars.

Style Book will be forwarded on request.

H. & W. Company, Newark, N. J.

KROEHLER Daven-O The Invisible Bed Room

An Added Room

= Subtracted Rent

An extra bedroom is ready when the Kroehler Daven-O, a luxurious davenport, is opened with one simple motion into a full-sized bed. Bedding concealed by day. Many handsome styles, at all prices. Sold by leading furniture dealers everywhere. Ask to see the Kroehler trade-mark. Send for free booklet.

KROEHLER MANUFACTURING COMPANY - CHICAGO
Factories at Kankakee, Ill.; Naperville, Ill.; Binghamton, N. Y.; Canadian Factory: Stratford, Ontario

The Confessions of a Useless Wife

(Continued from Page 145)

your husband in his office, so we won't have to take him upstairs."

I rolled the square box couch from the library to the office, though with my hands trembling as they were I thought it would never go through the doors.

It seemed hours before the automobile crept up the drive, and Doctor Garland and Mr. Symmes got out. Neal was lying on cushions in the back of the car, and I had never seen him so white. For a moment my world reeled and slipped. Then I heard Neal say softly: "Steady, dear."

"Fleming shot him," said Mr. Symmes, "twice, through the leg, there, above the knee. Can you stand being carried in now, old chap?"

"Sure," Neal kept his eyes on me. "It was Tom," he said, "who hit the pistol just in time, so that the bullet went through my leg instead of where it was aimed."

"I don't call that just in time," muttered Mr. Symmes. "You should never have let him off yesterday. He won't get off today—nor to-morrow."

THEY undressed Neal, talking as they did it to keep up my heart, I think.

"Fleming was madder than a hatter," Mr. Symmes said to Doctor Garland, "because MacNeal had said it was his well and his watering his milk with it that started this epidemic. He's half crazy, that man. He shot to kill."

The older doctor looked across Neal at me with the look a doctor gives a patient. "He wasn't meant to go, Mrs. Gordon. We need him too much. But it's an infernal shame he got this at this time when we need him more than ever. A hypodermic, Gordon?"

"No," said Neal. "I think he'll sleep anyhow, Mrs. Gordon; it's been so long since he has."

"I won't call you, Garland, unless I have to," said Neal. "I know you haven't a second to spare. But won't you go down the road, just a couple of hundred feet from here, and see my sick baby and its mother. I'd have pulled that baby through except for this."

"Do you want me to go with him, Neal, and bring you word? If Mr. Symmes will stay with you a little longer—maybe we can pull the baby through yet."

"I'm going to stay all night," said Mr. Symmes. "And Tommy is going to bring the dinner my housekeeper fixed for us. We'll eat it here instead of at home. I've already arranged it."

The baby lay in the hollow of its mother's arm. Neal had told Doctor Garland to expect that, and the doctor had merely nodded. He was an old man now, and he knew that not by the same route is everyone sent forward.

"Oh, he will live; he will live, I know," I whispered to the mother. And I did know.

SHE looked far more wan than she had yesterday, but the baby no longer had that look—it cannot be described, but it is a look that all who work to hold back death know.

I walked home alone, for there were any number of things for me to do for the baby and its mother after the doctor had gone. Both men were asleep when I tiptoed in—Neal with a round red spot in each gaunt cheek; Mr. Symmes stretched out in the Morris chair. I lowered the light and propped the door open and lay down on the window seat in the hall.

It was five o'clock in the morning before I wakened, and then it was the telephone, and my hope of reaching it before it wakened Neal, that got me up forgetful of the cramps that window seat had put into my knees. Neal was awake. It was the ex-serviceman who was looking after Sam Poyntz. He wanted Neal to come as soon as he could. When I told him about Neal he hesitated.

"Well, I'll get another doctor, if I can, Mrs. Gordon; but—but—would you come in, if you get a chance? There isn't any woman here, you know, and he hasn't any family at all—and things look bad; would you come? Is your husband too sick for you to leave?"

"Wait!" I turned to Neal. "I didn't tell you, dear, about Sam. I thought you had worries enough." And I told him.

"You go, if you will, dear. There isn't anything you can do for me that somebody else can't do, and there is for Sam. Go right away, if you like."

Poor Sam! His tired, fever-glowing eyes lightened as I came in, as if he had been watching the door all the night.

"HE WON'T take his milk," the man in charge complained. "Doctor Gordon said his life would be on my hands if I gave him anything but milk, and I can't get him to take it; it's about as broad as it is long. He'll die if he starves as quick as if I gave him what he asks for. He's had nothing all day or night."

"Oh, Sam! And you a doctor! You know you've got to do it this way. Here! I'll hold it for you. You've got to get well, Sam, for us; you've just got to. You've got to hold your mind to it, Sam, night and day."

"For you?" And Sam smiled a little. "I like your calling me Sam and all that."

"Yes, for me. I'll come again in a little bit to see if you've taken your milk all morning."

I looked down at him with a sudden sinking of the heart. He had the look—the look of one whose chance is not quite even. "Sam," I said, "you will hold on; won't you, Sam?"

"Yes, if you are coming again." The faint effort at gallantry was infinitely pathetic.

"I'm coming again and again, Sam." And I bent over and kissed his forehead.

After I had given Neal his breakfast and made him as comfortable as I could, I called Sally McIntyre by phone.

"Sally," I said, "can't you get your church guild to help? All those girls had some training during the war. Won't they help now? Somebody's got to visit these people on Cone Beach. It's dreadful to have them sick this way."

"Their mothers won't let them run around among typhoid cases, Mrs. Gordon, and I don't see how they can be expected to."

"Leila," said Neal as I hung up the receiver, "why don't you ask the fathers and not the mothers? This is a town where the word of the father has weight."

Marian's father offered me his own services, his car and his money. He put heart in me. "It's the least any of us can do," he said, "with a young thing like you, with a hurt husband, putting up such a game fight. I'd be ashamed if my daughter didn't help. Let me round them up for you. I'll have 'em at your house at noon, if I have personally to visit each family."

I THINK I will never forget that night. Marian's father stayed with Neal. Mr. Symmes had men in his factory he had to help, and Tommy was so tired he fell asleep on the steps and I had to put him to bed. The man who was caring for Sam was stumbling with sleepiness. He was thankful for a little time to sleep.

At two in the morning I brought Sam his milk. But though I held his head and tried him first with the tube in the glass and then without the tube, he could not seem to take it. The doctor had given him the kind of bath they give to reduce temperature just before I came, but despite that Sam's temperature had risen to 105, though at two o'clock it should have begun to go down.

(Continued on Page 149)

For Every Wear - Everywhere

THE WEST HAIR NET Beach and Motor Brand is the net for you for all occasions. Its durability makes it ideal for Beach and Motor wear, while its liberal size, its shape and invisibility, make it the choice net for social and business wear.

Every West Net is made of extra selected strands of human hair 30 inches long, treated by the West secret process to retain its natural life, lustre and elasticity.

West Nets are re-inforced with 2 extra meshes to the net making them stronger and more durable.

Another advantage is its shape—each Cap net is fashioned to give the room needed and yet fit snugly around the edge of the hair.

Ask for, insist on and be sure you get the West Beach and Motor Hair Net—the Larger Net.

YOUR DEALER SHOULD HAVE THEM!

If your dealer cannot supply you, order from us direct, enclosing purchase price and your dealer's name and address.

Our new booklet, "Guide To Hairdressing At Home," illustrates and explains how to accomplish the new and fashionable coiffures. Sent postpaid on receipt of 5c. Send coupon today.

WEST ELECTRIC HAIR CURLER CO.
Philadelphia, Pa.

Canadian Distributors: H. B. Holloway & Co.,
Toronto, Canada

WEST HAIR CURLERS

are unsurpassed in producing any wavy effect desired. Simply dampen the hair slightly and wind loosely around the curler. This simple little curler cannot catch, cut or injure the hair.

Guaranteed
a Lifetime

Card of 2, 10c
Card of 5, 25c

WEST ELECTRIC
Hair Curlers

SOFTEX The Shampoo Exquisite

Softex preserves the natural oils and will make your hair look thicker, softer and lovelier. An absolutely safe shampoo. With or Without Henna.

One Size Only

10c a package
$1.00 per Dozen

WEST
Softex

WEST HAIR NET

Beach & Motor Brand
Hand Made Twice Sterilized
All Shades

Cap or Fringe

15c EACH

Gray and White
Double Price

WEST ELECTRIC HAIR CURLER CO.
Philadelphia, Pa.

1-11-4

Gentlemen: Kindly send me your new illustrated booklet, "Guide To Hairdressing At Home," for which I enclose 5c.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____

State _____

Why—should our styles and patterns be copied and our trade-mark imitated, if Daniel Green Comfys were not the best? For your protection, we have placed the above label in every pair of Genuine Daniel Green Comfys.

“Hurry, Children, and Change into Your Dry, Warm Comfys”

DO you realize how much your children's health depends on keeping their little feet dry, warm, and comfortable? That is the reason so many mothers keep the children's Comfys ready and waiting on rainy days, so that they can change at once, as soon as they come romping home.

Then, too, little feet must have room to breathe and grow. Heavy walking shoes, even when they fit perfectly, still have a tendency to cramp and confine the feet. It is a wise mother who realizes that Comfys are the right footwear for the children, not only at night, but for many hours which must be spent in the house during the day.

No wonder children like to wear Comfys as often as possible. Genuine Daniel Green Comfys are not like ordinary bedroom slippers. They are so good looking, with their custom-made appearance and trimness of fit, that even fastidious men and women do not hesitate to continue wearing them when outsiders drop in.

There is such a wide selection of designs and colors in Daniel Green Comfys that you are sure to find just the slipper to suit you. For children, cunning little designs that look as though they had walked right out of a "picture book", quiet, dignified designs with rich, conservative colors for men, and for the woman who appreciates daintiness and charm, a wide selection of shades and fabrics that will harmonize with her choicest negligees and frocks.

Don't go wrong—ordinary felt slippers will soon lose their shape. It's worth many times the slight extra cost to insist on seeing the "Comfy" label in the slippers you buy. Daniel Green Felt Shoe Company, Dolgeville, N.Y. New York Office, 116 East 13th Street.

Daniel Green Comfy Slippers

For Men, Women and Children

The Confessions of a Useless Wife

(Continued from Page 146)

"Oh, Sam!" I wept, for I was so tired and so discouraged and so afraid of the sudden signs of perforation Neal had warned me of, "you promised me to pull through!"

I didn't even suppose he heard me, he was lying so still, with his eyes closed. But he opened them and lay looking at me. "I'll pull through, girlie," he murmured as I bent to hear. "Can't break a promise to you. You go to sleep."

If you have not sat all night through the stillness and terror of that hour of lowest vitality when they say death is nearest, sat with one battling for life, you do not even dream what the dawn with its promise can mean.

When Doctor Garland came he brought Mrs. McIntyre with him. I gave Sam his milk again before I left.

The doctor patted my hand softly as I was leaving. "Good-by, Mrs. Gordon," he said in his soft, courteous voice. "All our little city is grateful to you this morning."

"Why—why —" Again the tears rolled down my cheeks. I seemed to have no inhibitions left; and I couldn't recall what I had done for the city.

"YOU got the serum here for all the inoculations, and you got the nurses here to help give the inoculations. Tom Symmes has told on you, and so has Bellows."

It was still very early, but I drove out to the hospital for crutches for Neal. The interne I met gave me some breakfast and a bottle of hot coffee for Neal. When I got home he drank the coffee so avidly that when I got Mr. Bellows outside the door I said to him: "Neal swears he had a good night, Mr. Bellows, but I don't believe a word of it. Did he?"

"Oh, well, not very."

"I wish I had been here."

"We were glad you weren't, Mrs. Gordon."

"Oh!" I tried desperately to keep back those silly tears and succeeded until Mr. Bellows left.

Then I leaned against the front door and cried them clear out of my system. I had to bathe my face several times with hot water and powder it before I went in to Neal.

"I suppose," I said as lightly as I could manage, when I opened his door, "that Sally would say I had time to dust my nose even if I didn't dust my house."

"And make up your face, even if you didn't make up your beds," said Neal. But the tone was so like my own that I knew quite well what Neal was doing.

"Oh, Neal," I said, and put my head down on his arm, "don't mind. You'll be well soon, and back in the thick of the fight long before it's over."

He was silent a second, stroking my hair. "It isn't my own hurt, Little Soldier," he said. "It's this thing of being crippled now, made useless right when I'm most needed, when I just can't be spared. It does a queer thing to you to have to lie still while the bells at the door and the telephone keep ringing and ringing, asking for your help." He looked out the window. "It must be the way a man feels who dies suddenly in the midst of his greatest usefulness."

FOR a moment black spots swam in front of me. I pulled myself together. "Listen, Neal," I said softly, "you've got clean wounds, with no bullet in your leg, wounds that are healing. Your usefulness needn't be crippled by them. There are a lot of people in this town who are perfectly well and strong, but who aren't doing a thing to help in this emergency. Maybe the very thought of you helping when you have been crippled will bring them to some realization of what they could do and aren't doing. I'll move your couch to the telephone and you can answer all these calls that are worrying you. You can give all your directions yourself, and I'll go and see that they are carried out. I'll put the telephone right where you can use it, propped on your pillows. And by day after to-morrow, when you are sitting up, you can give the inoculations. I can help you do that. Maybe that's what the man cut off in his most useful time does. Maybe, even from the other side, he can still give directions to the minds of those who need him here and still get somebody to help him give inoculations to keep those who have relied on him from further danger."

In his tired eyes there came the faint glimmer that I knew. "Little Inspiration!" he said, and even the smallest thing that I had ever done for him became sweet as he said it. "A man might not mind being dead if he thought he could still carry on. If I can work that telephone I won't mind being tied to this excuse for a bed one bit."

"Well, then I'll roll the couch over now. It moves perfectly easy. I'll take the rug up. No, if it's hard to do, I'll stop."

It was hard to do, but I didn't stop. I thought that if I had him there beside his desk and his telephone, with his crutches on the chair beside him, before I took the sleep I had to have, he'd be so much happier. And he was.

Then I don't know what happened. Things got dark and I got deadly sick.

XII

I SEEMED to have been running uphill for hours and hours, running and running after the sound of Neal's voice. And then I stopped and felt myself running up the steps of my own house in New York, and up to my own room with Anna beside me. By and by I opened my eyes and reached out my hand toward Anna. It was some minutes before I saw that I was in bed in my room in Neal's house. And I lay there trying to decide whether Neal's house was my house or whether father's house was my house.

"I shall have to ask Neal," I said out loud, and I turned my head on the pillow.

There was Anna beside me!

"Anna!" I cried. "How did you get here?"

She smiled at me delightedly. "Your father brought me, Miss Leila."

"Have I been ill, or did I faint or something? Don't tell me I've got 'It,' Anna."

"No, you haven't. I don't think, really, you are anything more than tired and sleepy, Miss Leila, but your husband has been so afraid it's all he can do to stay downstairs."

I sat up in bed. Beyond a faint giddiness, there didn't seem to be a thing the matter with me. "How did I get in this bed, Anna?"

"We put you here, a girl named Marian and me. Your father and Mr. Symmes carried you up."

"Well, how did you get here—really, I mean, Anna. Begin at the beginning and don't, for heaven's sake, say you'll tell me when I'm better."

"Why, your father, Miss Leila, read the account of the typhoid epidemic at the breakfast table a day or so after you telephoned him, and I suppose he thought he hadn't sent you enough money, for he tried to send you more by telegraph, and they wired him you couldn't be reached. That got him going. Of course I don't know, but I think he could just see you with typhoid and nobody to look after you. Your mother died of typhoid fever, you remember, Miss Leila. So your father had me call your husband by telephone. He didn't seem to want to do it himself. And I couldn't get your husband. Long Distance said he was too ill to answer the phone, but that I could talk to Mr. Thomas Symmes." She stopped and looked out of the window.

"Well, did you?"

"YES, I did. And your father talked to him. Your father didn't mind talking to Mr. Symmes—well, you can see how he'd feel about your husband. It's hard to make up over the telephone when you have to raise your voice to be distinctly heard. And Mr. Symmes said that, almost unaided, you and Doctor Gordon had organized all the work

(Continued on Page 150)

Miss Saratoga

Tailored MIDDY BLOUSES
and
SCHOOL DRESSES

NEW COTTON or linen school dresses—not middy styles—for girls of 6 to 14 years; middy blouses and middy suits in the best summer fabrics as well as serge and flannel; bloomers for little folks and for their elder sister's gym work; separate skirts—

all are illustrated and described in our new 1922 Spring Style Book, which we will gladly send you direct on request.

"Miss Saratoga" garments are sold by good stores everywhere. Ask for them. You will find prices very low for fine garments.

CRIPPEN & REID
Baltimore, Md.
New York Office: 1182 Broadway

This real photograph shows how our dresses look on real girls.

THIS framed photograph of "B. B." Laces—reproductions of hand-made Laces—is displayed in over 500 prominent Department Stores and Specialty Shops.

Established 1827

"B. B." Laces
WASHING GUARANTEED

Birkin & Co., 73 Fifth Avenue, New York City

"Onyx" Hosiery

Reg. U.S. Pat. Office

"Pointex"

Because it so admirably supplements the smartness of costume, "Onyx Pointex" is naturally the Hosiery of Fashion.

Emery & Beers Company Inc Wholesale Distributors New York

"APRIL FOOL" isn't limited to April the first. It takes a watchful eye to make sure that your money goes farthest!

If it's Middies, Middy Suits or Dresses, the "Goody" label is a pledge that you could not have done any better.

For no expensive gown has been made or put together with more thought and care.

Goody styles are original. They have a semi-snug fit that is not carried to bagginess; they will launder perfectly; and they are finely tailored to the smallest details.

Write for Free Style Book

and give your dealer's name, to

SAMUEL GOODMAN
Paca & Lombard Streets
Baltimore, Md.

Goody Middies
Dresses and Suits

The Confessions of a Useless Wife

(Continued from Page 149)

that was being done in the epidemic, and that he congratulated him on such a daughter and such a son-in-law. But your father wanted facts and not congratulations, though, as he hadn't said what he wanted, Mr. Symmes didn't know. When he found out, he must have worried your father almost to death. After all, you are his only child and closer to him than anybody else."

"He didn't seem to think so the last time I saw him, Anna."

"IT'S like some other things, Miss Leila. You've got to lose them before you find out how much you care. If you knew what the house has been without you! I don't think your father would admit it, at first; but one day I heard him cut Mrs. Laughlin short when she said something unkind about your husband. 'He's a confounded good chap,' your father said. 'Better than we could hope for in this messy lot of loafers that hang around our girls these days.' Your father wasted no time when he finished his telephoning. We took the noon train."

"Where is he now?"
Anna smiled a little. "He's at a town meeting. They're having one to make everybody work. They say your husband started it. Almost everyone on that milkman's route is sick. Your father is representing your husband at the meeting." She looked at me brightly. "Oh, Miss Leila, it's a lovely little town, and it loves your husband and it loves you. I'm sure your father—well, he could help in this."

"Help." I laughed aloud. "We've got so much for him to do here he'll have to stay until it's started and come back to see it finished. Anna, where is Adele?"

"She is buying clothes in Paris, Miss Leila. It's the first time she's been able to go there since the war, you know."

"Then you can stay until she comes back?"

"Longer. She's going to bring a French maid back."

"Anna, don't tell me you can stay as long as I like. Anna, in a doctor's house you'd be invaluable. We've got work for you to do here, too, Anna. Could you stand a little town like this?"

"I was born in a little town like this, not so very far away from here, Miss Leila. I can stay as long as you need me, but not any longer. I—I'm going to be married, Miss Leila."

"Anna! Anna, are you going to marry the man?"

"Yes, Miss Leila." Again Anna looked out of the window at something that seemed to have taken years from her face. "Yes, he's a widower now. He needs—I guess he needs what all men need, Miss Leila."

I stared at her. "Anna, how did he find you after all these years?"

SHE was still looking out of the window. "Why, Miss Leila, it might seem to you like an accident, I suppose, only sometimes I think there are no accidents, that these things are all arranged. It was through you he found me, Miss Leila."

"Anna, am I awake or am I looking at some 'movie'? How long have you been here, Anna? How long have I been ill?"

"Several days, Miss Leila." She brought her eyes back from the window and looked at me. "Quite long enough, Miss Leila. I haven't been taking care of you every minute. There's been your father, you know, and all these young ladies who have been so worried over you."

"Anna," I said solemnly, "am I thinking of the same man you are?"

"I shouldn't wonder, Miss Leila. It was his voice over the long-distance phone. It sounded just the same after all these years; it is a voice—the kind of a voice—"

"Yes, it is. It's one of the nicest voices I ever heard. Give me my negligee, Anna, for goodness' sake. I've got to see Neal."

I got out of bed and tied my peignoir as I went down the stairs. I didn't stop to think whether I was dizzy or not. Neal was sitting at his desk, his crutches by his side, his leg propped on cushions. His head was on his hands and he was looking away to the ends of the earth. He was thin and white. I tiptoed in and circled his neck with my arms.

"Neal!" I whispered. "Neal, lover! You're better."

He drew my face down to his and said nothing for some minutes. I thought there were tears at the back of his voice when he said at last, "I was so afraid for you, dear."

"But I've never even been ill, Neal. I've just been asleep. It would be like me to sleep a week, because I had gone without sleep for two or three nights. I'm so sorry, dear, to be such a sleepyhead; my sick baby and its poor brave mother—I'm almost afraid to ask about them."

"They are getting well, dear, both of them."

"And Sam?"

"Oh, Sam!"

My heart sank. "Neal!" I said sharply; "not Sam!"

"No; it was close though, Leila. I think it was Sally McIntyre who really saved him."

"Neal, you're laughing at me again!"

"Am I? Well, you see, you may recall I was alone here with you when you —"

"Flopped!" I interjected.

"Yes. So I had to stir up a lot before I could get help; everybody was so busy."

"Don't tell me you got Sally."

"NO, I GOT her mother. She came right from Sam's, and she said Sam would die without you. She said it over the telephone to Sally and the judge, and it was too much for Sally. She undertook to follow in your steps. A good imitation is pretty sincere flattery, Leila."

"Neal!"

"Well, by this time it was all over town that you also had 'it.' I guess the town is yours, dear. You ought to have heard them."

"It's Sam I want to know about, Neal."

"Well, Sam's an ungrateful brute. Sally slaved over him. Did it ever occur to you, Leila, that Sally likes Sam Poyntz better than any of the other men in this town?"

"Well, if she slaved over him, it seems a natural deduction."

Neal chuckled. "You never get anywhere with this slave act when it comes to a man. All the brute did was to go into a delirium and howl for you."

"For heaven's sake, why didn't Sally give him a hypodermic?"

"Oh, trust Sally! Sally called me by telephone and told me exactly what Sam was bellowing and, by this time, Sam was informing anybody that would listen that he had loved you from the moment he saw you and that he loved you then and didn't thank anybody for keeping you away, just when you were beginning to care for him."

"Oh, Neal! What Sally could do with a thing like that!"

He grew grave. "What Sally might have done with it, a couple of weeks ago! What Sally cannot possibly do with it now, to save her life! It was what I meant, Leila, when I said the town was yours. They know how you helped Sam, and why."

"I don't care. They might have saved Sam that. Sally won't forget it."

"OH, HO! Saved Sam! This is too much."

It did save Sam. About the time Sam clutched Sally's wrist and implored her with tears in his eyes to bring him the woman he loved, Sally told him that she couldn't do it, because he had given the woman he loved typhoid fever and she was sick in bed with it. And Sally couldn't understand why Sam suddenly became as a little woolly, tractable lamb, swallowing his milk with no more curses. Sam held on with every bit of will power he had; but Sally doesn't know why.

"Well, do you know why? I don't."

Neal considered this, his hollow eyes growing whimsical for the first time in days. "Well, if you ask me, dear, I think Sam's hurrying to get well so that he can come here and save your life, Leila. Sam has the right idea about love."

"Well," I mocked, "you should know the symptoms, doctor and lover."

He held my face between his hands. "I do," he said. "I love you."

THE END

Dr. Lyon's

The Dentifrice that made fine teeth Fashionable

Powder Cream

Approved by the best dental authorities for over 50 years

What Is The History of Your Dentifrice?

IN INTIMATE things, even social or business, history is helpful. In things to do with one's physical well being, it is even more important.

Take the care of the teeth, for example. That's a pretty intimate proceeding with something which is a big factor in health and looks. The means must be right and safe. You can't tell what is in your dentifrice from looking at it or tasting it. But you can get something from its history.

For over half a century—indeed, ever since Dr. Lyon's first started the fashion of fine teeth—millions of men and women have been proving that it contains no harmful or doubtful ingredient. It cleans and beautifies without risk.

Begin to have Lyonized teeth today.

I. W. LYON & SONS, Inc.

530 West 27th Street, New York

Canadian Distributors:
LYMANS, LIMITED,
341 St. Paul St., W., Montreal

FREE SAMPLE—Powder or Cream—
SENT TO ANYONE

A new hat for a quarter

Change the color of your straw hat and you've changed the hat so much that you wouldn't recognize it yourself.

It is perfectly easy to do, and millions of smart women do it every year, with Colorite Hat Finish. Five minutes to apply it, half an hour to dry, and you have, to all intents and purposes, a brand new hat—for a quarter.

There are sixteen colors to choose from; all of them waterproof and durable.

Colorite is for sale at all drug stores, also in department and dry goods stores, for 25 cents (in Canada 30 cents). Rather than accept a substitute, send us the price for the shade you want.

You can also get Colorite Fabric Dyes (in convenient tablets) for the easy dyeing or tinting of cotton, wool, silk and mixed goods. One dye does all.

CARPENTER-MORTON COMPANY

Dept. 24 77 Sudbury Street, Boston

16 COLORS

Jet Black (Gloss)
Dull Black
Cardinal Red
Yellow
Navy Blue
Cadet Blue
Victory Blue
Sage Green
Lavender
Old Rose
Cerulean
Burnt Straw
Brown
Violet
Gray
Natural

Colorite

HAT FINISH

Mary Brush Williams Writes of Paris Hats

(Continued from Page 90)

The fitter snuffed it on her as if to extinguish her flame. She bandaged it round her forehead, and then combed it back sleek, the way your mother used to comb your hair that made you say "Ouch!" She pinched it in, where its sharp edges stuck out from the rounded surface of the head. She carved it like a pie along its edges and made little insets of pointed crinoline to ease it—for whereas it must follow the shape of the head on top, it must be very easy round the face. She put on the material over it, drawing it tight round the head and deftly draping it over the crown just where a tight band makes the head look biggest. Indeed, she let the material fall from the apex like a brownie's tam-o'-shanter, cutting its cornucopia length just where it crossed the brim, and fastening it down with two loops of the material.

This accomplished, the fitter raked the hat off, whereupon the young woman calmly combed her hair. It was as if she did so at a reception. Then she prepared to go. She drew her little close hat of black satin straw low on her head. It was like a bathing cap, and she pulled it down as if she were going into the ocean at Atlantic City. Indeed, that is the way you are expected to wear every French hat. Around her on long hat poles were scores of models in all variations of that style, and many in color: more still in the white crinoline.

I ordered one, and the fitter arrived with a big piece of round straw, such as might cover a bridge table, to construct it then and there. You will not go wrong if your hat consists entirely of crown with little ears sticking out on the sides, is in a brilliant color, and looks a little crude, as if hacked out informally and not stitched.

When the second young woman got up to go, her sports skirt would have measured eight inches from the ground. It was of gray knitted wool, blocked in squares of lighter gray down the broad, flat front and back. She fastened a short, box-shaped mole jacket over it and wound a sports scarf in old blue wool under the collar, making it stand up high round her neck, and she tied the scarf in a bow in front.

Still, there were afternoon things represented and the skirts of these were some six inches from the ground, while the sleeves were much less wide than formerly, and they came into a cuff at the wrist, with the loose bell effect just above it. Except for suits, the silhouette for spring will be a very narrow straight line when you stand still, which fans into the umbrella-shaped skirt when you move. There is a dress of four flat panels that seem to meet, but conceal accordion pleating under them. Imagine how ravishing it is in white when you dance! For coats I think the current silhouette will be a loosely fitting jacket to the hip line, with the skirt gathered on. But hats are our real concern.

There were street hats with a brim curving upward and close to the profile on the left, and sweeping across the face into a broader line on the right side. That is distinctly one of the shapes for spring, and it carries all sorts of garnishment from flowers to feathers. There were tricorns; indeed, I should say they were in the ascendant, and many of them with little aeroplane wings on the sides. One was in black, but nothing is all black any more. The back of the aeroplane wings were in savage colors of crude blues, bright green, and scarlet. The inside sweep of them across the face was black.

There were enormous cart-wheels of hats, heavily laden with flowers of magnificent texture and coloring. Reboux, by the way, had one encircled round the crown with wondrous tulips, their leaves spreading almost to the edge of the wide brim. There were hats very wide on the sides and not so wide front and back. Lewis has some of his faced in the light colors that are so very becoming to the face. There is a Henry the Fourth shape, the chief feature of which is a deep roll of material round the brim. He once said that Paris was worth a mass, and adopted Catholicism to gain the city, which now is celebrating him in a spring hat.

Easter is Here: By Lillian Gard

THERE is something very beautiful about the fresh new life of springtime and the promise of life which twines round Easter days. Death seemed a drab, gray thing to many of us, years ago, a shut-away, sorrowful state upon which one could see little sunlight fall. And then came the war. With a triumph cry of youthful heroism the youth of the world went bravely stepping into the Unknown Country. And no longer did that Land seem cold and silent, but it lay, a glorious tract of Cheery Splendor, where loved ones trod in intercourse, friend with friend.

We imagined them chatting of old Earth days and wondering a little if we, the left-behinders, realized what lay before us, beyond the shadow gate. We never dreamt of them with harps and crowns and endless monotony of singing, as the old-fashioned Heaven had been depicted to us. They were too virile, too full of the ecstasy of youth and strength. It seemed as if God had peopled some splendid new world of High Ideals, and had set the pioneers at work on His great scheme of reconstruction—a braver Heaven of beauty than that of our feeble dreams!

And because of the drawing together of this world and the next through the links of beauty forged by the passing of our gallant folk, we spurn the old funereal, gloomy thoughts of death—for life is such a real, real thing! Even the mounds in the churchyards have lost their old grim look; the fact of the Unseen Paradise of Happy Hearts carries us away to gladder visions, and we don't imagine our loved ones just at rest even, but rather as busy, never-tired people, full of a joyous vigor and delight in the Things That Are To Be.

Early with the Easter Dawn, we stand as of old beside an empty tomb and bowing our heads before the Risen Christ, we thank Him, for the Glory of Resurrection!

Down the lane a bird is singing, and the flowers waft censored praise from their breeze-touched fragrances.

Easter is here—and joy—and hope that merges into certainty that all is well and God forever good!

Angelus Creates Beauty for Any Type

WHETHER she is blonde or brunette, with features classic or plain, any woman will enjoy admiration and compliments if her skin is smooth, clear and healthy. Her complexion is vital. It can make or mar, beautify or defile, her attractiveness.

Women of all types and all ages have found in the Angelus Lemon Creams, the heart-warming secret of a beautiful complexion. These famous creams impart that healthy glow and softness to the skin that is facial charm regardless of profile or configuration.

Begin your Angelus treatment today. If your drug or department store cannot supply you, send 35c for introductory tube of Angelus Lemon Cleansing Cream and the new booklet "Complexion Beautiful."

PARK & TILFORD, Division H
529 West 42nd Street, New York

Introductory Tube by mail 35 Cents

For Complexion Beauty

First use Angelus Lemon Cleansing Cream to cleanse thoroughly the pores of the face. Then apply Angelus Lemon Tissue Cream. Let it remain on over night—and in the morning let your mirror tell the story.

Your first trial of Angelus will convince you that the clear, healthy depth, the glorious pink and white tints of a beautiful complexion can be yours.

Your druggist or department store has Angelus Lemon Cleansing Cream at $1.00 the 4 oz. jar, $1.85 the 8 oz. jar—Angelus Lemon Tissue Cream at $1.00 the 2 oz. jar, $2.00 the 4 oz. jar.

Mrs. Shirk recently made $26 in a month for pet charities and other uses and enjoys knowing that she can do it.

Miss Graham was forced to give up her teaching. Now, living quietly at home, she has made $60 in a month.

Mrs. Kolb (above) has been making money for ten years in this same way, first for necessities, now for "enjoyables."

Making More Extra Money!

OW interesting are the experiences of the senior members of our Girls' Club, which is, as perhaps you know, composed of HOME JOURNAL readers who like to make extra money in their spare time, and who do just that!

One of our shining examples is Miss A. F. H., who, at sixty-six, finds herself making more spare-time money than ever, instead of less. Miss H. recently made over $150 in a single month, entirely through the interesting plan of The Girls' Club.

Then, Miss Charlotte Graham, a younger woman, after having to give up her teaching because of physical disability, has added $60 in one month to her earnings as a Girls' Club member, without leaving her comfortable little apartment.

Miss M. M., who could not possibly stand the grind of an office position or other day-in-and-day-out work, has made over $350 in a month in The Girls' Club. Mighty few business positions pay anything like that!

In fact, Miss M. and Miss H. were first and second highest, respectively, in The Club in one month recently. These two members each earned in that one month more than any one of the fifteen thousand other members. And Miss H., as I told you, has celebrated her sixty-sixth birthday!

A Widow Who's Proud of Her Five Boys, and They of Her

TEN years ago Mrs. Kolb began to add Girls' Club dollars to her purse, and each year she has made more money. At first, Club dollars were used for shoes and school books and such like. In the last few years, since her boys have been grown, her Club money has brought Mrs. Kolb some well-deserved little luxuries, among them the making of a beautiful fur neckpiece. Favorite charities, church work and a bank account have also benefited by Mrs. Kolb's Girls' Club dollars.

A Business Woman Had to "Give Up"

MISS H. used to be a business woman, by the way. Then her failing eyesight forced her to give up her work. Any other woman who has felt the competition of those younger than herself will understand the keen anxiety Miss H. experienced. Finally a friend told her of this Girls' Club of ours here in the HOME JOURNAL. There is something truly interesting about our plan, especially to a woman who enjoys making money by doing a good work. Miss H. has increased her earnings every year since joining us. Often a woman who is making money knows that each added year subtracts from her earning capacity. Not so in our Club!

Kept Her From "Being Bankrupt"

EVERY month in the year, Mrs. Kelsay, now a grandmother, earns some money in The Girls' Club. In appreciation of a check sent her by The Club recently, Mrs. Kelsay wrote: "I surely do enjoy being a member of The Girls' Club. It has kept me from being bankrupt more than once. It has furnished me with money to help my boy through high school and graduation. His father died the first year he was in school. The Girls' Club means a great deal to me." Mrs. Kelsay makes as high as $45 in a month in The Club and now, of course, that her son is grown, this money is used for herself: part for a woman to help with her heavy housework, part for the bank, for books and other nice things.

Now don't think I have told you about all of our senior members. I could fill the whole JOURNAL with stories of them, and still have more to tell you. Enough to say now that we have a warm welcome and a way to make just as much money waiting for any other HOME JOURNAL reader of middle life, or younger or older, who would like to join us, including yourself, of course.

This is the very best time to write and find out about our Club. It will not cost you a penny, now or later, you know. Here we have a most unusual and pleasant money-making plan: we receive our payments for doing a good work. It is work that can be done in spare time, whenever you feel like it. It need not interfere with your other interests or duties. And it is a sure way to add money to your purse. Come and join us and feel the joy of making some extra money to spend as you please.

Sit down and write me this very minute, why don't you? Just say: "Please tell me about your way to make money," and address me as the

Manager of The Girls' Club

THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL
490 INDEPENDENCE SQUARE
PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA

Heart-Star Waffles!

ONE WHIFF OF THOSE DELICIOUS HOT WAFFLES brings the whole family to the table quick! You don't have to call them twice.

It seems as if they would never get tired of hearing those welcome words, "Have a heart!" For waffles baked crisp and evenly brown in the Griswold Heart-Star Waffle Iron, are a treat for old and young.

It's a treat you know is good for them—could anything be better than light, delicate, perfectly baked waffles, with butter and pure syrup, or wholesome jams and jelly!

For Sunday breakfast, for luncheon any day, for a chicken dinner—well, there's almost no time when good waffles aren't appropriate and welcome!

Griswold Heart-Star Waffle Irons come in two styles, No. 118, High Frame, and No. 18, Low Frame; either cast iron or aluminum pans. Also other Griswold Waffle Irons with round or square pans.

Write for booklet giving recipes and suggestions for serving waffles.

THE GRISWOLD MFG. CO.
Dept. J-2, Erie, Penna., U. S. A.

Makers of the Bolo Oven, Extra Finished Iron Kitchen Ware, Heart-Star Waffle Irons, Cast Aluminum Cooking Utensils, Food Choppers, Reversible Dampers, Steel Damper Clips and Gas Hot Plates.

When buying, always look for this label

Why Baby Smiles

Boott Toweling dries a baby's delicate skin with little rubbing. It quickly absorbs moisture. All the family should use Boott Toweling. It takes up all the wetness very quickly and leaves the skin smooth and dry. It is soft, good-looking and bright-white.

Buy Boott Toweling by the bolt. It costs little. It is made of pure cotton and will not lint. It can be used for every household and personal use for which you want an absorbent material—towels for the face and the bath, wash cloths, dish towels, bibs and so on.

BOOTT MILLS, Lowell, Mass.
Dept. JAP

Send fifty cents for two sample towels similar to those which you can make by buying Boott Toweling by the bolt.

The Newer Architecture in Corsetry

Madame Now Demands More Than Corsets Which Merely Confine

IT is generally agreed that la Parisienne depends for her well-grooming, not upon just the acquirement of a particular new accessory but essentially upon the fidelity with which all details of her costume harmonize among themselves and comport with her individual person. She knows that artistic attire is a composite thing with every garment playing its important part in the ensemble. From lingerie to wrap and from toque to toe, she dresses as a sculptor moulds—with a fixed and definite purpose to be accomplished through studied and methodical means.

The axis about which revolves the world of Madame's wardrobe is the corset. For the corset expresses the form which all other raiment serves but to enhance and to adorn. The corset at least must carry the air of what is natural and intimate to the living body. Thus it should not be built like the masonry of a skyscraper—for grandeur and rigidity; but assembled like the drapings of a bower—for flexibility, delicacy and grace.

Made to the Life

Through the most logical and natural means the P. N. Practical Front Corset attains the objective toward which the most eminent custom corsetieres have always striven. There is nothing here to vex or irritate the bust. In P. N. Practical Front, an inner elastic vest clasps firmly but pliantly about the figure, placing and holding the front steels directly at the center of the body, in contrast with

The living body new-fits itself each morning the off-center steels of other front-lace corsets. And this corset can't ride up. The outer flaps lace easily and quickly—shoewise—over flat hooks and not through elusive eyelets. The daily lacing so essential to the holding of original corset lines is most effortless to the wearer of the P. N. Practical Front Corset.

The Daily New Fitting

The very act of donning the P. N. Practical Front Corset is in effect a fresh fitting to conform in every slight particular with the

For flexibility, delicacy and grace

She dresses as a sculptor moulds body as it is today—with due accommodation to any slight physical variation to which every living body is continually subject. It is the living body which new-fits to itself each morning the P. N. Practical Front Corset. Where fashion or physique demands restraint P. N. Practical Front applies it surely, gently and with fidelity to the treasured uncorseted effect.

The models are most various but underlying them all are the exclusive features which have established the P. N. Practical Front Corset as the appointed means for the figure to make the utter best of itself.

The prices of the P. N. Practical Front Corset are moderately placed at five dollars and upwards to twelve. At most good stores or departments where corsets are sold you may select your appropriate model, or

Upon request the makers will mail you a Descriptive Style Book

P. N. Practical Front

Pat. U. S. A. and Foreign Countries

BOSTON, CHICAGO
AND NEW HAVEN

CORSETS

I. NEWMAN & SONS
222 FOURTH AVENUE
NEW YORK

Manufactured exclusively in Canada by DOMINION CORSET CO., Quebec, P. Q., Canada; in England by WILLIAM PRETTY & SONS, LTD., Ipswich, England

The Prince Rides By

(Continued from Page 4)

someone that she had seen before somewhere. Somewhere—no, she couldn't remember. "But why are you 'pretty miserable,' Penelope Thornton?"

"Because there aren't any fairies," said Pen. "And what's the good of anything in the world without fairies?"

"Now I know who you are," announced the man triumphantly. "You're my damsel in distress, and the only thing that I wanted to find more than a dryad was a damsel in distress. Both at once—what a day! No fairies, hey?"

Pen came a little closer, her tear-swept eyes raised to the gay blue ones. "I thought that you knew," she said with quivering lips, "or I shouldn't ever have told you truly. I'm dreadfully, dreadfully sorry."

"Thank you, Dryad," said the man. "But you mustn't be too sorry, though it's very dear of you. You see, I know that there are fairies."

"Oh-h!" breathed Pen, and the tears that she had been fighting so valiantly brimmed over suddenly and fell on the brown hand stretched out to hers.

"Some of us grow too blind to see them and too deaf to hear them, but they're still there, the little folk. Only when we grow up we don't talk about them any more."

"Never any more?"

"Never any more," he assured her regretfully but firmly. "And I think that you must be pretty nearly grown up, Dryad."

PEN dimpled at him distractingly. "I think that I am too; but no one else does. You see, I'm not in my teens yet."

"Heaven forbid!" said the man fervently. "You'll be a thousand years old before you're out of your teens. I know that I was."

"But aren't you pretty old now?" asked Pen respectfully.

"A thousand years young!" cried the man blithely. "You are, you know, the minute that you're out of your teens. I'm just a little bit afraid of grown-ups like you."

"You're laughing at me, I'm afraid," said Penelope gravely. "But I can see that it's funny, because I have a sense of humor. I know that I'm little, but I'm very, very clever."

"You're very, very adorable," announced the man enthusiastically. "And I'm destroyed with sorrow that I can't stay here forever." He picked up a little green book that had fallen from his pocket, rising reluctantly to his feet.

Pen's eyes were riveted on it. "Is it a story?" she demanded avariciously.

"No; a play."

"A play?" She drew closer, incredulous and enchanted. "Oh, please let me see—please. I'm going to write plays too."

The man yielded the book, all courteous interest. "Tragedies or comedies?" he inquired gravely.

"Everything," the authoress declared largely. "Plays and sonnets and epics and novels and —"

"Many epics?"

"NOT very many so far." She sighed gloomily. "You get so interrupted—those children!"

"Children are pretty bad," he admitted. "Have you a large family?"

Pen glanced at him from the corner of her eyes, the dimples reappearing. "You're laughing again. But Don and Peggy do bother. I don't like brothers and sisters much, do you?"

"Well, off and on."

"I love them," she said virtuously, "but I don't exactly like them. Of course they're awfully young, and Peggy's dreadfully fat too. She's only five, so she prob'ly can't help it."

"Probably not."

"She's got a lovely disposition too; everyone says so. But you can't have everything. I've got a perfectly horrible disposition myself."

"Have you, indeed?"

"Horrible," she repeated with melancholy satisfaction. "Everybody says that too. Is this a very long play?"

"Not very; I wish that I could give it to you, but it isn't mine."

"I wish you could too," said Pen frankly.

"Pippa Passes"—is she the heroine?"

"Yes; she's the heroine, though you hardly ever see her; it's mostly about other people."

"She's just a little Italian girl, who passes by through the streets on her holiday, singing; but she changes the lives of all the people who hear her."

"She must have had a perfect beautiful voice," commented Pen, round-eyed.

The man laughed joyously. "Well, I'm not so sure that it was the voice."

"I don't see what else it could have been," said Pen earnestly. "Did she know how she'd changed them?"

"No, she never knew. I don't think that they did either; but she went by, singing, and the base and the cruel and the cowardly and the sad heard her—and they changed."

"I DON'T think that one little girl could do all," remarked Pen skeptically; "not possibly—no matter what kind of a voice she had. Oh, are you going?"

"Alas and alas!" said the man; "you might come with me, of course. The fire-shod stallion could manage us both; couldn't you do it?"

"I should just love to," she said. "But I'm afraid that Madre Mia wouldn't like it. Oh, I do wish that I could remember who you look like."

"Some one horrid?" he inquired anxiously.

"No," she assured him, shaking her copper curls; "some one perfectly fine."

"Then that's all right; you gave me a dreadful minute. I hate to go, Dryad, but the sun's almost down, and the fire-shod one is champing at the bit. And one of these days I'll come back, because it's going to be lonely without you."

"Are you quite, quite sure about the fairies?" asked Pen.

"Quite, quite sure," maintained this perfect, gentle knight, and he looked her straight in the eye. "Don't cry any more, Dryad; and wish me luck, because I'm going pretty far away—and I'm going to fight dragons."

Pen tore the brown ribbon from her hair with reckless fingers. "Bend down!" she commanded. "Antoinette will half kill me, because it's my last one; but oh, sir knight, you've rescued your damsel in distress, and you must wear her favor."

THE man knelt at the brown sandaled feet, and Pen knotted the ribbon on his arm with swift and skillful fingers.

"There!" she said, and he sprang up with a bound that could only belong to one a thousand years young.

Another spring landed him in the saddle, and he turned in it to laugh down at her radiantly.

"I'm sorry for those dragons!" he cried. "And don't forget me; don't forget me, because I'm coming back. Good-by, my Dryad—hail and farewell!"

"Farewell!" answered Pen clearly, winking very hard to keep the tears from her lashes.

A touch of the crop and they were off, down the green lane; and she stood staring after them, a small, forlorn figure with knitted brows. That shining head, those shining, shining eyes—surely she had seen them somewhere before—somewhere, somewhere —

And then in one great flash, she remembered. She sprang forward, calling desperately to that vanishing figure:

"Oh, come back! It was you; it was you; come back!"

But he did not hear; he was singing. The song drifted back to her, joyous and distant:

"There was a lady, fair and kind,
Was never face so pleased my mind—
I did but see her, passing by,
Yet will I love her—till—I—die."

Pen stood quite still in the middle of the green path, the tears frozen on her lashes, the small, white face touched with a wonder deeper than grief, higher than joy. The fairy prince had come—he had come and gone; and she had not known him!

Tiny Motors Need Extra Good Oil

Don't ever neglect the small motor in your vacuum cleaner, washing machine, electric vibrator and fan.

Proper lubrication with high-grade oil means longer life and much better service with a minimum of repairs. Such a small quantity is required at a time that you can well afford the best. A very little every time you use the machine is most satisfactory.

3-in-One The High Quality Household Oil penetrates smallest bearings. Stays in and lubricates perfectly. Won't dry out, burn out or become gummy.

Use also on locks, hinges, bolts, window pulleys and catches to stop squeaking and make them work easier.

3-in-One is sold at all good stores in 1-oz., 3-oz., and 8-oz. bottles and in 3-oz. Handy Oil Cans.

FREE. Generous sample and de luxe edition of Dictionary of Uses. Write for both on a postal card.

THREE-IN-ONE OIL CO.,

165 O Broadway, New York City

E 371

Reduce or Increase Your Weight—to Music

NOW you can have the lessons by which I have reduced or built up the weight of over 100,000 women—in a new form—set to music on phonograph records. Every exercise, I know from twenty years' work with women, is safe and beneficial for them.

My exercises are individual, with directions for breathing, bathing, diet (when needed), adapted to your special needs. I study your case as a physician, giving, instead of medicine, exercises to help Nature restore you to normal health and figure. Let me help you to

Get Well—In a Delightful New Way

Let me help you build up vitality, stimulate circulation, strengthen vital organs, be free from nagging ailments. My pupils say:

"I have gained 31 pounds and it is just four months today since I began your work."

"When I first took up your course I weighed 190 pounds. I have reduced myself to about 158 pounds. It is such a joy to know that I do not have to be fat."

"I am entirely cured of indigestion. My friends remark on my robust appearance and good health."

"I cannot realize that six months ago I was a physical wreck and under the doctor's care all the time; and now I feel perfectly well all the time. My friends all think my case nothing short of a miracle."

Send for My First Lesson

Record A—for reducing weight.
Record B—for increasing weight.
Each record includes my fascinating walking lesson.

May I prove that I can reduce or build up your weight, improve your health and figure? Let me send you my first exercises, set to music. It costs you nothing to try them. Mail the coupon NOW, telling me your faults of health or figure that I may advise you individually. If you do not want the phonograph records, write for information about my regular course for reducing or increasing flesh and building health. I will send you FREE my booklet of helpful hints to women.

Susanna Cocroft

Five Day FREE TRIAL Coupon

Miss Susanna Cocroft
Dept. 36, 1819 Broadway, New York, N. Y.

Please send me your new record, together with complete information about your work. At the end of five days' free trial, I will either enroll for the full course, or return the record in good condition. My weight is _____ my height is _____ my age is _____

Name _____

Street _____

Town _____ State _____ (16)

All You Demand of Silk Hose

Smart appearance. Durability. Faultless fit. Moderate price.

Humming Bird Silk Hose are distinctly good looking. They show only pure Japanese thread silk, no matter how low your pumps, or how high the wind.

"Humming Bird Hose wear longer." Double mercerized tops withstand garter-clutch unusually well. An anti-run strip stops "ladders" at the knee. Toes and heels are mercerized. Backs and soles are specially reinforced with heavy thread silk.

Humming Birds are slim of ankle, smooth underfoot, elastic overknee, two and a half inches longer than is usual.

Humming Birds cost little. Price them in your city. You'll be agreeably surprised.

DAVENPORT HOSIERY MILLS
Chattanooga, Tennessee

Humming Bird

PURE SILK HOSIERY

Planters PENNANT SALTED PEANUTS

Everywhere in the
"Red Pennant Bags"

5c

What tea, reception, or card party is complete nowadays without "Planters Pennant Salted Peanuts"? No matter whether the occasion be formal or informal, everybody eats "Planters"—and likes them, too!

Sheer goodness made "Planters Pennants" popular. Their flavor is irresistible—that's why everybody eats "Pennants". That flavor is roasted in—"Planters" has an exclusive method of roasting "Pennants" in a combination of rich vegetable oils. This, together with the natural high oil content of "Pennants", makes them a real physical help—an aid to digestion.

And nourishing! A 5c bag of "Planters Pennants" contains food value equal to a slice of roast beef—250 calories by actual test.

Planters Nut & Chocolate Co.

Wilkes-Barre, Pa.
New York
Boston

Suffolk, Va.
Chicago
San Francisco

Eat them daily for hunger and health

The Easter People

(Continued from Page 13)

is gay with red tulips. Margaret Anne bows her little square-cropped head to ask the old Moravian blessing:

*Come, Lord Jesus, our guest to be,
And bless the gifts bestowed by Thee.*

It is still dark at half past five when we go out into the street. As Miss Bertha's guests we have the good fortune to be admitted within the ropes which bar all entrance to the square and also cut off the streets leading up to the graveyard. Beyond the square, from earliest morning there has been gathering a phalanx of crowd stretching for blocks. We wait close to the church among the members of the home congregation. Just across from us is the side wall and sloping roof gable of an old brick house. Against this house wall in the dusk and shadow the trombone bands, returned two hours ago, are massed. Their torches glow orb and ruddy, gleaming now on the polished shaft of a long horn, now on some face suddenly flashing forth against the dark. Above the house roof there is lace-work of woven branches, softened by their first leaf shoots. Beyond the branches floats the silver wafer of the paschal moon shining through raveled cloud.

We wait there with eyes glued to the hooded front of the old church door. "Watch!" whispers Miss Bertha, for we must not miss the opening of that door. At last an electric light flashes up within that arched entrance. No word is spoken anywhere.

The door swings in. First come the ushers, then the choir, next the pastors of all the Moravian churches of the city, and then the mayor. It is as if all the congregation in the square and all those close-packed thousands in the surrounding streets—it is as if each of us drew a long breath, waiting. Suddenly, silently, he is there, the white-haired bishop, standing in the stream of light from the church entrance. For blocks and blocks of dark streets people will hear his voice, a beautiful voice now pushed to its uttermost:

"The Lord is risen! He is risen indeed!" Unnoticed the whiteness of the morning has become visible against the outlines of old roofs. The tension of expectancy slackens to the beauty of realization. As with one single spontaneous voice the old square sings:

*Hail, all hail, victorious Lord and Saviour,
Thou hast burst the bonds of death;
Grant, as to Mary, the great favor
To embrace Thy feet in faith:
Thou hast in our stead the curse endured,
And for us eternal life procured;
Joyful we with one accord
Hail Thee as our risen Lord.*

The Easter liturgy is an affirmation of triumphant belief, of which the bishop reads first the statement of faith, while at the close the congregation proclaims assent.

The March to the Graveyard

THE stanza of a hymn closes the service in the square, which is now broken by the march to the graveyard, where the "Easter Morning Litany" will be completed. The bishop now addresses "those of many faiths, from many places, gathered here." He begs those far crowds, in the name of the risen Lord, to move quietly, each person mindful of each other's need, each preserving the Easter spirit, as all march, forming into fours, congregation and visitors all proceeding in long, unbroken column to the graveyard. The bishop leads the procession. He wears a black cap, a long black overcoat, which, buttoned to the throat, faintly suggests the outline of a black gown, but there is absolutely no insignia, no hint of ceremonial. The bishop is but one of a great concourse whom he leads to celebrate the resurrection.

The first trombone band follows just behind the bishop. The others come at intervals. They play antiphonally, passing their music back along the line as runners might pass a torch. Day is brightening everywhere.

The bishop enters at the middle gate, passing beneath the white arch inscribed, "I am the Resurrection and the Life." He takes his stand at the center of the graveyard. The crowd is massed solidly in the broad intersecting paths. There are no ropes to protect the graves, but not a foot transgresses on their privacy. At every entrance now the crowd flows in, in steady fours, endlessly. As he passes beneath the lettered arches, every man bares his head.

Within the graveyard all face toward the bishop. In the long, reverent waiting for all to assemble there is a low hum of talk, but no noise anywhere. The birds, jocund at seven of a radiant March morning, can be clearly heard in the budding branches over our heads. The service is always timed to take place exactly at sunrise, but to-day it has been impossible to calculate the length of time it will take the procession to enter. The sun shows first a burning rim, then climbs to balance a scarlet disk on the far horizon beyond the trees, and is mounting high above the hill line, while still the crowd streams into the graveyard, twenty thousand when they have finished.

The Peace of a Beautiful Memory

AT LAST all are gathered within the ivied portals, and there among the flower-heaped graves the beautiful Easter Litany is completed.

The old hymns float up above the branches. Far over the hushed concourse the bishop's voice rings in age-old words of deathless triumph:

"I have a desire to depart, and to be with Christ, which is far better: I shall never taste death; I shall attain unto the resurrection of the dead: for the body which I shall put off, this grain of corruptibility, shall put on incorruption; my flesh shall rest in hope."

"And the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, the great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, shall also quicken these our mortal bodies, if so be that the spirit of God hath dwelt in them."

In deep, murmured unison sounds the response: "We poor sinners pray, hear us, gracious Lord and God."

Then come words that express the inmost spirit of this graveyard service, words that embody the aspiration that has made Easter the key of the Moravian creed:

"And keep us in everlasting fellowship with those of our brethren and sisters who, since last Easter Day, have entered into the joy of their Lord, and with the whole church triumphant, and let us rest together in Thy presence from our labors."

When the service is completed, the great crowd in silence pours forth again through the white-arched entrances, thridding the streets of the city in all directions, moving homeward.

One cannot talk, going home from that Easter worship by the graves.

Even when, in the afternoon we leave old Salem, we cannot talk much, for the peace of a beautiful memory holds our spirits too deeply for words.

The idea of having frilly pillow shams on the pillows at the right was borrowed from a very lovely old Empire bed in Northern Vermont.

This high four-poster is dressed in dimity valances both above and below, the top one edged with netted fringe and tassels.

Old Beds and Their Dressing

By ALICE VAN LEER CARRICK

WHICH isn't at all what I want you to do; rather, I urge you to keep yours, for I hope to tell you how charming a bed can look—particularly an old one—when the valances are just the right fullness and the draperies hang in fine and dignified folds; with ruffy, starched pillow shams, long pillowcases clustered with tucks, and counterpanes that are miracles of stitchery. You see, to go back to Margery, what she sold was probably her mattress and hangings and counterpane, the considered part of a bed in those Mother Goose days. And they are important, for a bed, no matter how just the proportions, how delicate the carving, will lose all its effect if the wrong things are put upon it; but the simplest "low poster" will be very engaging appropriately dressed. Not that "low posters" are to be despised; indeed, most of us are more likely to have them than the rarer eighteenth-century beds and the seventeenth-century examples, miraculous to possess. Anyhow, I own one that is the pride and joy of my life, and maybe you do too. Mine is nearly four feet high, maple, but stained mahogany, as so many of those old beds were; every post is carved with graceful acanthus leaves, and the head and foot boards are prettily curved, and only a little lower than the posts.

What shall I begin with—the valance, or the ruffy shams, or the counterpane? The valance, I suppose, since that is almost a foundation. Now, a valance, of course, means a drapery that adorns either the base or the tester frame of a bed, but in this case, naturally, it applies merely to the concealing flounce that reaches from the frame to the floor.

My Spread

SUCH simple materials will make effective valances: muslin—not too sheer, however—dimity, striped and substantial; and for children's beds a crinkled seersucker is very pretty. The depth of your valance naturally must depend upon the height of the bed frame from the floor, but the fullness should be once and a half, it should be gathered upon a stout tape, and an excellent method of attaching it is by thumb tacks pressed into the frame.

And now, have you a counterpane? If you haven't, please copy mine (page 160). It is so artless, so captivating and so easy to do. Do you remember, my dear friends in collecting, how scornful I was of misguided owners of "trunk heirlooms," people who kept things to look at and never used them? Well, I'm one, or rather I was, for I knew that I had this lovely thing; occasionally I would take it out and say, "Some day I'll mend it—and use it and enjoy it." I even made little furtive attempts, but I never really finished it until a fortnight ago; and then, although the mending was easy—just a proper darning with linen thread that matched the mesh of the fabric, filling tiny holes where the fingers of time had pressed over heavily—I found that my counterpane was badly stained and yellowed. My remedy was Javelle water put directly on the spots and then washed quickly out; and this process was repeated for three days, in the meantime leaving it to soak in a tub of lukewarm water. Next I pinned it carefully on a clothesline, choosing a windless January night, and let it freeze and bleach for forty-eight hours, and a delicate creamy shade resulted, just the color that well-used old linen should be.

Family tradition has it that the counterpane was woven for one of my Southern great-grandmothers, well over a century ago, and that the embroidery was done by a favorite "black mammy." The fabric, as I said, is linen, heavy and well woven, and the embroidery is done with a coarse cotton thread. I clipped a dangling end, matched it in knitting cotton and found that a number eight for the heavier outer stitches, and twelve and fourteen for the more delicate inner ones, would give precisely the effect I wanted. The pattern is simple but very lovely. Scrolling acanthus leaves done in long and short stitches form the border; the inner design is a basket with flower sprays, the same motif that you constantly see on eighteenth-century glass and old faience, worked in samplers, and occasionally on very old rugs, while in between are graceful vines and flowers and grape clusters. And the variety of stitches is almost endless: long and short, outline, chain, featherstitch, satin stitch, buttonhole and cross-stitch; you can hardly go wrong. Sometimes the larger leaves are what William Morris called "inhabited"; that is, they are filled in with smaller leaves and flowers—an appropriate legacy from seventeenth-century needlewomen—and this work is usually done in feather, buttonhole or satin stitch. I do not impose this pattern upon you without alternative; I fancy any quaint design would serve, but always remember that the flowers and leaves are formal, not naturalistic, and that the whole effect must have a flowing largeness.

Evidently my ancestress did not intend to have the counterpane cut at the corners, but I hope that both she and you will approve what I am going to do. For, without too much marring of the pattern, it can be cut to fit the foot posts of the bed, and no old counterpane shows to full advantage unless this is done. My valance shall be of "dimothy"—I like to call it that just as my great-grandmother must have done—and I shall edge my counterpane with little bobbing ball fringe to match the trimming of the spotted muslin curtains that hang, sheer and straight, inside my coral-pink window draperies.

Frilly Shams

I LIKE things that I go together, don't you? L—, who has the completest house of my acquaintance, is even so consistent as to cover all her comforters with prints and muslins copied from old-fashioned patterns, matching her colors to her rooms, with the result that everything is harmonious and antiques agreeable.

I hope you like my frilly pillow shams as much as I do; they are new but old, the idea frankly borrowed from an Empire bed in Northern Vermont. Mine are made of long cloth, the finest I could get, but I think that they would be charming in dimity and even more delightful in a lightweight linen. Mine measure just thirty-five inches in length and a trifle more than twenty inches in width, but of course the size can be adapted to any pillow. The narrow-hemmed, gathered-in-the-middle ruffles are an inch and seven-eighths wide, and are set three inches apart, the gathering of the first coming just at the edge of the

The old-time candlewicking spread above has all the dignity of fine bas-relief, and Mrs. Carrick says it is the finest example she has seen.

Quaint and imaginative is this "pop-corn" candlewicking spread. One threads a large darning needle with wicking to do the work.

SANITAS MODERN WALL COVERING

Make Your Walls An Investment—
Not An Expense

WALLS and ceilings decorated with Sanitas stay clean and attractive for years—the cost per year is less.

Sanitas is made on cloth with four coats of durable oil color. Can be applied on new walls without waiting for walls to settle. Hides cracks and minor wall defects on old walls.

Sanitas does not crack, peel or fade. Can be cleaned with a damp cloth.

Styles for every room in the house—plain tints, dull-finished, decorative, and glazed tile effects.

The new styles are most artistic—don't select your wall coverings until you see Sanitas at your decorator's.

Write for Samples and Booklet

THE STANDARD TEXTILE PRODUCTS CO.
320 BROADWAY, DEPT. 1, NEW YORK

Sew at Home and Have More Clothes

BY doing your own sewing, you can have more clothes for yourself and the children.

The manufacturers of J. & P. Coats Spool Cotton recently issued a twenty-four-page book of designs for children's clothes. It also contains valuable information about hand and machine sewing, which every mother and daughter should know.

If your dealer cannot supply you, send ten cents for a copy of J. & P. Coats Book No. 10 to the Spool Cotton Company, Dept. 59, 315 Fourth Ave., N. Y.

J. & P. Coats Spool Cotton
The Best Thread for Hand and Machine Sewing

Old Beds and Their Dressing

(Continued from Page 159)

sham because this way is so much less heavy than with a wide hem and a ruffle too. I have just one pair, but I mean to make more, and when I do I shall buy myself a gossamer iron like dear Mrs. Tiggywinkle's, for these ruffles are very hard to do up, although I must admit that they are most rewarding to labor when they stand fresh and frilled and whitely erect.

I do not use my frilly pillow shams with my old-fashioned pillowcases, because occasionally I like a change, and because, too, these pillowcases are quite pretty enough all by themselves. The really old ones—pillowcases they used to be called—are narrow and very long, quite forty or forty-one inches, and the charmingest have little edges of lace and embroidery and tiny tucks in clusters of twos and threes. Pillowcases used to be most elaborate; in the seventeenth century they were rich in delicate cut work, and it has remained for these degenerate days to emphasize their plainness. But here a little caution as to tone. If my counterpane had a creamy color—and old ones almost always do—I should not rinse my shams and cases in bluing water and thus increase their dead-white tone, but instead use a little clear coffee in their final dip and so harmonize the effect of the entire bed as to give a satisfyingly artistic effect.

But you don't have to copy my coverlet. Perhaps you would prefer to make a candlewicking spread. This means, it is true, a great deal of work, but properly made, in the old manner, such designs are completely delightful, and you will never regret your labor. Most of the reproductions utterly lack the old feeling, and, while I have seen interesting and effective pieces of modern work, they never for a moment suggest the past. To begin with, I should use linen instead of cotton, although in some cases cotton cloth, I believe, was employed; linen rather loosely woven with a ridge in it if I could get it, and I should openly copy some long-ago pattern, in order that the spirit of the original work might be preserved. Either that, or study examples in collections and museums until I was familiar with the old style.

The Two Types of Spreads

THERE were two types of candlewicking spreads, you know, the older called "pop corn," the later "tufted." Personally I have never seen an earlier dated spread than one that was worked in 1815, and, despite legend, I have yet to be convinced that they were made much before the nineteenth century, or until candlewicking became a commercial product. For the Colonial woman was far too busy to spin wicking for such frivolous purposes as mere embroidery. I never know which kind I prefer, for though the pop-corn work is quaint and engaging, a beautifully tufted spread has all the dignity of a fine bas-relief. But the pop-corn certainly is easier to do; after the pattern is marked it is a mere matter of threading a large darning needle with the wicking and following the outline with small, meticulous stitches, working closely, unless a raised effect is desired, when the loops should be drawn out longer. For this work knitting cotton, either number two or four, according to the fineness of your work, may be used instead of the candlewicking, but for the tufted there is nothing to be compared with the actual wicking itself. Fortunately this can be bought in quantity, as it is needed, at approximately two dollars a pound or thereabouts.

The spread above was woven over a century ago and embroidered by a favorite black mammy in Mrs. Carrick's family. The fabric is heavy linen and the embroidery is done in coarse cotton thread. The pillowcase is edged with a wide old crochet.

Do not, by the way, purchase the unbleached candlewicking, unless you are doing the work on an unbleached material, for bleaching is a tedious process and, when done at home, often seriously rots the fiber.

The tufted type, generally speaking, is a combination of both manners, although I have seen a few that show just the tufting. For this work it will be better if your material is unbleached, for then the wicking will be held in place so much more firmly; your needle must be double threaded, and practice alone will show you just how thick to draw in the strands. Really the work always reminds me of a drawn-in rug, for the weight of the fabric serves to hold the wicking in place, and the drawn-out loops are sheared to form the tufts in just the same way.

An Old-Time Knitted Fringe

IF YOU own an old one you are fortunate indeed, but you are infinitely more lucky if you find that your heirloom is named and dated; and you must always remember that in such cases no shams or pillowcases are necessary, for the initialed or dated end is meant to pull straight over the pillows, testimony to the maker's industry. As to the matter of fringe, even if I thoroughly understood it, I dare not enter the discussion of netting, for it would take an entire article. Moreover, it is difficult and tedious, and I am quite willing to accept Doctor Johnson's definition of it as "a complicated concatenation of rectangular angles," and let it go at that. But many department stores carry effective and not too expensive fringes, very suitable for these old coverlets, and also I have discovered, in an antiquated Ladies' Guide to Needlework, a pleasant and pretty knitted fringe that would be most appropriate.

To make this fringe you cast on nine stitches. FIRST ROW: Make one, knit two together, knit one; repeat. Make one, knit two together; insert the point of the needle in the last stitch, as if to knit it; wind the cotton over the needle and first and second fingers of the left hand five times, the sixth time over the needle only; draw all these loops through the last stitch. SECOND ROW: Knit all these loops together as one stitch, put the stitch back on the left-hand needle, and seam it very tightly; make one, seam two together, seam one, make one, seam two together, repeat from third stitch, once. THIRD ROW: Make one, knit two together; knit one; repeat twice. Fourth Row: Seam one, make one, seam two together; repeat twice. Repeat from first row until enough is done to go round the counterpane.

(Continued on Page 161)

Candlewicking spreads are very agreeable additions to high post beds, whether they are square testered, or with the curving top known as a "field" or "tent" canopy. The latter is a late eighteenth century development, while the square frame has continuously existed from the time that tall post beds were first used in the fifteen hundreds through to the Empire period. This type, to my way of thinking, requires draperies of straight lines and a fairly substantial fabric, while the curving canopies are best hung with figured net or muslin. An old netted canopy is a gift straight from heaven, and if you have a lovely one full of the delicate grace of that treasure which hangs in the Blue Chintz Room in the Aldrich Memorial at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, I shall be your envious admirer. But, failing that, you can create charm for yourself by using sheer, sprigged muslin or net, and edging it with dangling tassel or ball fringe.

Let me tell you what I am going to do with my tall-pillared, square-testered bed. Sometime, I mean, for it looks like a life work, though a very pleasant one. But first you must remember that curtains were not idle adornments; they were very practical protections against drafts and cold. In the illustration of the rope-carved four-poster you will see that these curtains are looped back; but they could be pulled forward to shut out the chill of a winter night, and this effect must never be lost or the decoration will become meaningless. I am going to make a set after this fashion: tester valance, counterpane, hangings; I am going to copy the most engaging embroidery I ever beheld.

Loveliest of All Embroideries

WORKED in the seventeenth century was this loveliest of embroidery, in crewels upon a stout linen fabric, and you can see how delightful the design is from the old tester strips in the photographs. Once upon a time no doubt, counterpane and curtains existed too, but they have gone, alas, and only a part is left of all this old beauty. Still it will be easy enough to copy the design, placing it at formal intervals over the linen. What did worry me was what to work it in. Iceland wool is the very nearest thing that approaches the strand; there must have been some magic process in those bygone days, for no present material has the shine, the glimmer, of this old material of that far-off time.

The embroidery is done in three tones of blue—blue the high holiday color; deep indigo; and a light and a dark old blue, while the stitch most used is what was called the "crewel" or "plumage" stitch. Really a satin stitch would give the same effect and certainly go much faster, for there is an intricate working in and out of needles in the first, and satin stitch is perfectly consistent, since it was frequently employed in seventeenth-century embroideries. But you must be careful to shade the various blues into each other by a slightly irregular outline, for otherwise the effect will be rigid and monotonous and entirely lack

This most engaging crewel embroidery was worked on a real seventeenth-century tester of stout linen. Embroidery is in three tones of blue. Iceland wool is the nearest approach to the original floss with which this was worked.

the old feeling. Naturally there are other stitches too: the outline stitch, which is used in the stems and for forming the birds' heads; chain stitch, which, skipping one each time, scatters tiny blue seeds just around the eyes; and an occasional featherstitch, which is used in the wings.

A Joyous Counterpane

AS TO measurements, these tester strips are fourteen inches at their greatest depth, seven feet long for the side pieces, and five and a half feet for the front; of course, though, these would vary with individual beds. Nor are you bound to use pure linen, for a mixture of linen and cotton, which is the old fustian, would be equally correct. In fact, variety is yours; you may have other colors: shades of red, cardinals, crimsons or scarlets, or many greens. An entry in Judge Sewall's Letter Book in 1687 reads:

I have two small daughters who begin to go to schoole; my wife would intreat your good Lady to pleasure her so far as to buy for her white Fustian drawn, enough for curtains, wallen counterpane for a bed, and half a doz. chairs, with four threaded green worsted to work it.

Ah, in those old days how afraid they were of folded hands and Satan's power! A little further on Sewall writes, evidently with the first letter in mind:

So that she may set her Little daughters on work, and keep them out of Idleness.

Or would you like to make a joyous counterpane, colored like the rainbow and full of Oriental motifs? Look at the bright and engaging pattern on the testers and tell me. Motifs similar to those on the tester are scattered over the counterpane. The embroidery, mostly crewels, though now and then there is a little brightening dash of silks, is done against a background of lightly quilted écru linen, and so many, many stitches you never saw in all your life: satin stitch, cross-stitch, chain stitch—whole flowers are filled in this way quite in the Chinese method—buttonhole stitch, seed stitch and finest featherstitch. It is very Chinese, but Chinese translated into English; not so marvelously perfect, but with the little intervention of humanity that makes it all the more lovable. And it is the gayest thing! Like a parterre of bright flowers! It would make sunshine even in the shadiest room. And that's a decorating hint!

Still, I'm sure I prefer my high holiday blues, and I think I know how and why my admired and long-ago lady was inspired to work them. Oriental influences were very strong in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, you know, and I think she sat in a tall old room in an English manor house, a room hung with Chinese wall paper, newly imported and highly prized, "feuille de papier la Chine, fond blanc à fleurs et oiseaux"; sat there copying the designs, for the pheasant and flower motifs are almost identical with this kind of paper; embroidering all her thoughts and voyaging dreams during long afternoons and candlelit evenings. For needlework used to be a pleasure as well as a task, and if our beds are to be as lovely as theirs we must follow our ancestresses' industrious example.

A LOVELY complexion is the exemplification of refinement. Pears' Soap has been "Matchless for the Complexion" Since 1789

Pears' SOAP

"Good morning! Have you used Pears' Soap?"

GORDON-VAN TINE
Home Plan No. 607
A Dutch Colonial Home of rare charm. Six rooms, bath, fireplace, large living room, 3 bedrooms, built-in conveniences, linen closet, pantry case, etc. All materials complete as specified . . . $2804

Distinctive Homes at Guaranteed Prices
200 Plans FREE!

Buy at wholesale prices. Our guaranteed price on a Gordon-Van Tine Home covers all materials as specified. No extras. Highest quality materials only. Shipped anywhere. Many customers write our prices save them $200 to $2,000.

We have helped thousands save money and get better homes. Don't judge building costs by what people tell you of local conditions—investigate Gordon-Van Tine's wholesale prices today.

By Ready-Cut method—all sawing, cutting and fitting by machinery in 4 big mills—you make big savings in lumber and labor costs. Specifications conform to all city building codes. Prompt shipment—safe arrival guaranteed.

Ready-Cut Garages $75 and up. Build it yourself. Easy to put up.	Summer Cottages Well planned; 1 to 5 rooms. Inexpensive.	Four Big Mills Davenport, Ia.; St. Louis, Mo.; Chehalis, Wash.; Hattiesburg, Miss.
---	--	--

Gordon-Van Tine Co.
ESTABLISHED 1868
Satisfaction Guaranteed or Money Back
164 Case Street Davenport, Iowa

GORDON-VAN TINE CO., 164 Case St., Davenport, Iowa
I expect to ☐ Build ☐ Repair

Send me FREE BOOKS as follows: _____
Name _____ City _____
St. No. or R. F. D. _____ State _____

200 Home Plans—FREE
Learn about our service. Send for our Book of Plans, "Gordon-Van Tine Homes." Photos, prices, specifications, full descriptions of homes for town and country. Colonial bungalows, 1 and 2 story cottages, etc. Many conveniences—built-in pantry cases, cabinets, linen closets, etc.

Building Material Catalog—5,000 bargains in lumber, screens, paint, roofing, etc., at wholesale prices.

60 YEARS OF CHANGING STYLES

but always the same
wonderful Gingham

Two Ways to Judge Gingham

Half a century ago, when your grandmother bought gingham, she tested every piece for texture and strength and fast color. Because she was such a critical buyer, she eventually found one gingham that never varied in those high standards upon which she always insisted.

That gingham was Wm. Anderson Zephyr.

You, too, can judge gingham by the test method. Or you can save time by always purchasing the genuine Wm. Anderson Zephyr, for these wonderful Scotch gingham are just as superior today—just as sunfast and tubfast, just as exquisite in soft, glove-like texture—as they were sixty years ago.

Another beautiful gingham is Wm. Anderson IVANHOE Zephyr, made in America. Like the imported, it is supplied in hundreds of modern patterns and every piece is fast in color.

In fact, the name "Wm. Anderson" has become a mark of distinction on almost all wash fabrics of fashion—Voile, Organdie, Madras, and Dotted Swiss. On selva or bolt end, it gives assurance of highest quality of loomings, design and color.

Sold only through retail merchants.

Wm. Anderson

Textile Manufacturing Co., Inc.

48-50 White Street
New York

Glasgow,
Scotland

The most timid essayist would gain courage if she were frocked in the soft white batiste with flounces of sheer, fine lace at left above. A ruching of doubled lace forms a setting for the orchid grosgrain ribbon girdle. Batiste also makes the center frock, with white bead girdle and bands of batiste embroidery or lace. The batiste at right has bands of embroidered organdie, and a silk-covered cord, coiled, makes the girdle. There are no patterns exactly like these models, but No. 3510 may be easily adapted to the frock at left, No. 3492 to frock in center, and No. 3504 to frock at right. These patterns are in sizes 12 to 20.

You Can Make Your Graduating Dress

By RUTH SILL

YOUR graduating dress is a group problem as well as an individual one. In every class there are girls with widely varying incomes. The average girl hates to say "I can't," and I have had enough experience in schools to know the misery and heartaches that are suffered by girls who cannot "keep up." Don't forget that it is a group party and that every one wants to enter into the festivities as a part of the group rather than as a distinct and uncomfortably different unit.

It is a good plan to call a class meeting, frankly discuss the clothes problem and decide that no dress shall cost over a certain amount, making sure that this amount is well within the means of every single member. It is no disgrace to have a very limited allowance and to say so, but it is a disgrace to lack consideration.

Artistic and interesting clothes are not necessarily expensive. They are simple in design, made of good, honest materials, and any decorations applied are suitable and harmonious in texture with the material.

To make a successful class picture it is not necessary to have all the frocks exactly alike, although this may be done; but the frocks must be sufficiently friendly in materials and designs to make an attractive group. Colored frocks may be worn if you have good teamwork. I know one school that used colored organdies. Each girl in the class submitted samples. The colors were chosen which were becoming to the individuals and at the same time effective in coloring for the group picture.

Dotted and figured Swiss, organdie, voile, dimity, lawn, batiste, handkerchief linen and similar materials in white and light colors are all pretty and suitable. Many of the new models are trimmed with the material of the frock; this is desirable, for then you may put all your money into the material.

Different materials respond to different kinds of decoration. Voiles, batistes and handkerchief linen are especially good-looking when hemstitching, hand-run tucks and fine shirrings are used. Organdies are attractive trimmed with picoté ruffles, or with little fluted trimmings in which crispness is an asset. Lawns and dimities may have gathers, machine tucks, and ruffles either machine hemmed or picoté. Of course the easiest way is to apply lace or embroidery as in the sketches above, but self-trimming is every bit as effective and, if you do the work yourself, less expensive. And you can easily make your own dress. Many of the new spring models are entirely safe for the veriest novice to tackle.

Having decided on the general type of frock for the class, get the individual patterns. The long-waisted bloused waist with straight gathered skirt is the most popular mode. Many patterns have this sort of foundation, and at the same time offer rather elaborate decorations, which just aren't worn at commencement parties. Use your own good taste and cater to your personality in your trimming, and be sure that your frock helps to make the entire class an attractive picture.

Misses' patterns are bought according to age. Notice the bust and hip measurements marked on the envelope, for you may not

(Continued on Page 165)

The Fleisher Yarns

"EVERY COLOR IN THE RAINBOW"

Your spring sweater will be easy to knit

Simply Follow These Directions:

MATERIALS—Fleisher's Corinthian Yarn: 4 balls Pigskin No. 956, 1 ball each of Black No. 971, Steel No. 972 and Tangerine No. 988.

NEEDLES—1 pair No. 4. HOOK—No. 3. 11 stitches—2 inches. 1 pattern—1 inch.

PATTERN—1st row—with Black—purl. 2nd row—with Steel—knit. 3rd row—with Tangerine—knit 1, *, yarn over, purl 2 together. * Repeat between *'s, ending with knit 1. 4th row—with Steel—knit. 5th row—with Black—purl. With Pigskin, knit 5 rows. Repeat from the 1st row.

With Pigskin, cast on 80 stitches. Knit plain for 2 inches. Commence pattern. Work 15 patterns even. Cast on 20 stitches at the end of each of the next 2 rows. Then cast on 10 stitches at end of each of the next 8 rows. Work 3 patterns and 9 rows on the next pattern. On the 10th row knit 87 stitches. Slip on a stitch-holder, bind off 26 stitches for the neck, knit 87 stitches. Take up the last 87 stitches, work 1 pattern and 5 rows of the next pattern. On the first 87 stitches, work in the same way. Cast on 30 stitches in the center front and work across the stitches of first shoulder. Finish pattern and work even 3 patterns and 6 rows of the next pattern. On the 7th row, beginning at the end of sleeve, bind off stitches, same as cast on. Finish front same as the back. Bind off.

Cuffs—With Pigskin and No. 4 needles, pick up 40 stitches at the end of sleeve. Knit 4 inches even. Bind off. Sew up sweater.

Around the neck, working in single crochet, make 1 row each of the following colors: Black, Steel, and Tangerine. Fasten off.

THE directions for knitting this sweater are based on the use of The Fleisher Yarns, and the right results cannot be guaranteed unless The Fleisher Yarns are used.

The Fleisher Yarns fashion into sweaters of soft, lovely beauty. A wealth of clear sunlight colors offers every possibility for original effects and combinations, including all the newest shades of fashion.

Knit your sweater of The Fleisher Yarns. It will keep its softness, shape, and good looks indefinitely. The Fleisher trademark is a pledge of quality. Look for it on every ball of yarn you buy.

This Book Makes Knitting Easy

The new Fleisher Knitting and Crocheting Manual gives simple, complete directions for every new and worth while sweater fashion. Not only sweaters, but scarfs, hats, men's sweaters and the most fascinating new knitted novelties for youngsters. 30c per copy at stores where The Fleisher Yarns are sold. Or sent direct from us for 15c and 24 trademark tickets from The Fleisher Yarns.

S. B. & B. W. FLEISHER, Inc., Department B 4, Philadelphia, Pa.

Posed by Kathleen Martyn

© 1922, S. B. & B. W. F. Inc.

The "DENTWOLD"

A new sports sweater designed especially for The Fleisher Yarns.

PEACH CREAM PIE

PEACH CREAM PIE: $1\frac{1}{2}$ cups Blue Ribbon Peach pulp; 1 tablespoon cornstarch; 1 cup thin cream; 2 eggs, separated; $\frac{1}{2}$ cup sugar; 1 teaspoon vanilla; 1 tablespoon lemon juice. Pie crust: In a double boiler mix cornstarch and cream, cook over hot water until thick. Mix yolks of eggs with sugar; add peach pulp, vanilla, lemon juice. Pour slowly into cream, cook 5 min. Line pieplate with crust, fill with mixture, bake. Cover with meringue made of egg whites and two tablespoons sugar. Brown slightly and serve. Simply delicious.

A superb dessert made from BLUE RIBBON PEACHES

PEACH Cream Pie, made from Blue Ribbon Peaches, is one of those superb desserts which make for the reputation of a good cook, and it is not hard to make nor expensive, if one follows the above recipe and uses good, clean peaches, such as are packed under the "Blue Ribbon Brand."

They are different from ordinary dried peaches, because by our method of packing the fuzz and much of the peeling have been removed. Dried peaches contain all the elements of the fresh peach, only the water having been eliminated.

They are one of the most inexpensive foods you can buy and can be made into a great many beautiful and appetizing desserts, and as a sauce for breakfast they are unexcelled, especially if you soak them over night and allow them to cook slowly, thus bringing them back to their original form and appearance.

Investigate their real merit for yourself by asking your grocer today for a package of Blue Ribbon Peaches—and send us the coupon for a Blue Ribbon Peach Recipe Booklet.

CALIFORNIA PEACH AND FIG GROWERS INC.
Main Office, Fresno, California
OVER 7500 MEMBERS

COUPON

ROOM 5
CALIFORNIA PEACH & FIG GROWERS INC.
FRESNO, CALIFORNIA
Send free Recipe Book to:

Name _____
Street _____
City _____
State _____

Different from Ordinary Dried Peaches

PEACH SHORTCAKE: Blue Ribbon Peaches; Wash, soak several hours in cold water. Cook slowly until tender, but not enough to destroy shape. Crust: 2 cups flour; $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon salt; 4 teaspoons baking powder; 4 tablespoons shortening; $\frac{1}{2}$ cup sweet milk. Sift flour, salt, baking powder together, cut in the shortening and add milk slowly, to make a medium soft dough. Separate in two parts. Roll half the dough $\frac{1}{2}$ -in. thick. Place in greased pan, spread with softened butter. Roll other half dough same thickness, place on top of first. Bake in quick oven, turn on plate. Split dough, cover with peaches, cut side down, sweeten. Cover top crust with another layer. Served with whipped cream.

DELICIOUS PEACH PIE: 1 cup Blue Ribbon Peaches. Pie crust; 2 eggs, beaten; $\frac{1}{2}$ cup sugar; $\frac{1}{2}$ cup butter; 1 cup flour; $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon baking powder; $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon almond extract; 1 tablespoon cream. Line pie plate with crust, put in peaches which have been softened, slightly sweetened and cut in pieces. Beat butter and sugar until creamy; add eggs, flour sifted with baking powder; extract and cream. Beat well; spread on top peaches. Bake in moderate oven 30 min.

PEACH DUMPLING: Blue Ribbon Peaches; make rich baking powder biscuit dough. Roll dough as for biscuits, cut in 4 inch squares. In center of each square place two half peaches (soaked). Bring points of square together at top, press edges together. Place in greased baking dish. Make this sauce: 2 cups peach juice; 1 cup sugar; small piece butter; spice to taste. When boiling hot pour over dumplings in baking dish. Bake for 45 minutes.

PEACH AND ALMOND SALAD: Blue Ribbon Dried Peaches, mayonnaise dressing; $\frac{1}{2}$ cup chopped figs; $\frac{1}{2}$ cup blanched almonds. Wash peaches, soak several hours; stew in same water until tender. Select large half peach for each person and roll in blanched chopped almonds. Mix chopped figs and blanched almonds broken in pieces and fill center of each piece. (Other nuts may be used if preferred.) Serve on crisp lettuce with mayonnaise. A dainty salad.

FRIED PEACH PIES: 2 cups Blue Ribbon Peaches; $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon salt; 1 tablespoon sugar; $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon ginger; $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon nutmeg. Pastry: 1 egg, beaten; hot fat. Soften peaches in water 3 hours; drain, renew water, cook slowly 30 minutes, rub through sieve; add salt, sugar, spices. Cook until thick. Roll pastry; cut in circles. Place a spoonful of peach purée on circles; wet edges, turn over peaches; press together. Brush with egg, fry in hot fat, sprinkle with sugar.

You Can Make Your Graduating Dress

(Continued from Page 162)

be quite a regulation figure for your age. All standard patterns are cut according to average measurements. They are plainly marked, and very definite directions are given on the pattern envelope. There is a diagram to show how pattern should be placed on material; also notes to explain construction marks, notches, seam allowances, and the like.

Cut This Way

KNOW these directions well: Open the pattern and pin the body parts of the pattern together and hold it up to your person to see if the general outline is satisfactory; or better still, if possible cut the pattern out in cheap cambric or muslin and really fit it. This is always wise before cutting into expensive material. Of course one dares take more chances with the rather inexpensive washable materials and may cut the frock directly from the paper pattern. Plan for any necessary extra fullness or length and cut out frock.

First. Always straighten the material by pulling a thread.
Second. Place the pattern, following the directions given on pattern envelope, and pin in place.
Third. Cut material, allowing generous seams beyond the edges of the pattern on the neck, shoulder and armhole. This gives leeway in fitting, if you have any irregularities of figure.
Fourth. Mark all seam lines, construction lines and notches; also the center front and center back lines on both waist and skirt. This marking may be done in several ways. It is possible to trace seam lines and notches on some materials; but if tracing damages your material mark the seam lines and notches by lines of basting. To do this crease the pattern on the seam lines and make a line of basting close to the folded edge of the pattern through the upper thickness of the material. Mark notches by basting in the same way. Put pins through the basted lines to the under thickness of the material; turn the work over and make basting on the second side, following the lines of pins. Always mark the center front and back lines of the waist and skirt with basting threads.

Organdie and embroidered batiste make this frock. Pattern sizes are 14 to 20.

Now Sew

BASTE the seams of the waist and sleeve according to directions. Be perfectly sure to baste exactly on the seam lines and be perfectly sure that cross lines match. For example, in basting a shoulder seam be sure that the neck lines and armhole lines of the front and back exactly meet. Gather across the front and the back of the waist on the waistline markings. Baste the seams of skirt, and baste the hem in place. Do everything exactly right. Accurate cutting and accurate basting may save your disposition.

Now for a fitting: Put the waist on right side out with the seams turned toward the front. Pin the opening lines together, adjust the fullness on to a tape about three-quarters of an inch wide at the desired waistline. Pin in place on the right side only (one side is fitted and usually the right side). See that the blouse fits smoothly; mark with pins a neck line on the right side. The neck line of a gown is a very important factor in making it a success or a failure. Try out several styles. Be sure you finally choose wisely. Pin the

Some of the prettiest new frocks are decorated with ruchelike ruffles or tiny scallops of their own material, like those photographed above. Six double ruffles on the skirt, one at neck, two on sleeves, a ribbon sash—and a frock is complete.

The trimming possibilities in bias folds are many and interesting. Above, a fold is being fastened to a neck line; at left, a cord is inserted in the fold to make a cording around the neck. Be sure to use a true bias for all such finishes.

Patterns may be secured from any store selling Home Patterns; or by mail, postage prepaid, from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City. Dresses, 35 cents; Coats, 35 cents; Blouses or Skirts, 30 cents; Children's Patterns, 25 cents; Lingerie, 25 cents.

"I finally had to have it taken"

You can identify Collins folders by the Oak Leaf trademark on the back. Mention "Oak Leaf" to your photographer and he will know that you desire the best he can give.

No portrait is so completely satisfying as one made by a professional photographer.

THANKS to "mother and the girls," many a man has been urged to have his photograph made. All are delighted with the realization that a good photograph stays ever young; time only makes it priceless. The best photographs are made by professional photographers—men who make the camera record personality, not mere features. Such photographs are truly works of art.

Professional photographers everywhere use Collins Mounts and Folders to enrich and intensify the beauty of their work—as does the jeweler with the settings of his precious gems.

COLLINS Oak Leaf Folders "Add Charm to Every Photograph"

A. M. COLLINS MANUFACTURING COMPANY, Philadelphia

You are prettier than the du Barry!

Compare your face with hers. She was far from flawless. In contour and in feature, Nature gave more to you. In your face there is beauty of feature, and perhaps the glow of health. But you need more than these to be beautiful. You need the du Barry's naturalness of coloring of complexion, which she preserved and enhanced by the use of a French Face Powder like Bourjois' Java Face Powder. Java will give a deeper, richer tone to your natural coloring, soften the glow of your complexion and enhance the beauty of your face.

Bourjois' JAVA Face Powder

A compliment to your Complexion

Do you know how to rouge?

No woman rouges so successfully as the petite Parisienne who uses Bourjois' hand-made rouge, "Ashes of Roses"—it is as exquisite as Java Face Powder; and, when rightly used, as difficult to detect. Bourjois' Java Face Powder and Ashes of Roses Rouge are included in the 12 leading preparations to be found in the Bourjois' Cabinet Assortment at leading dealers everywhere.

Reg. U.S. Pat. Off. BOURJOIS (FRANCE - PARIS) NEW YORK, PARIS

A. BOURJOIS & CO., INC.
PARIS 27 West 34th St., NEW YORK

Enclosed find 10c for generous samples of "Java" Face Powder and "Ashes of Roses" Rouge. Check color wanted:
White ☐ Naturelle ☐ Rose ☐ Rachel ☐

Name _____
Address _____

"Gifts that Last"

Fashion Approves

GLEAMING against rich fabric or fur, the mesh bag is strikingly evident wherever smartly dressed women are seen. Fashion approves the mesh bag! And the wide range of prices at which Whiting & Davis Mesh Bags may be purchased makes possible the possession by every woman of this style necessity—a combination unusual of the beautiful and the practical.

WHITING & DAVIS COMPANY
Plainville, Norfolk County, Mass.

Originators of the Mesh Bag

Whiting & Davis MESH BAGS

In the better grades, made of the famous "Whiting" soldered mesh

The dome shaped design illustrated is new—a Whiting & Davis creation whose unusual beauty of line is sure to find favor among discriminating women.

WHITING & DAVIS CO.
MESH BAGS

When selecting your mesh bag be sure to find the Whiting & Davis trade-mark shown above—your guarantee of satisfaction.

ALLEN'S FOOT-EASE

Shake
ALLEN'S FOOT-EASE
into your Shoes and Sprinkle it in the foot-bath

Takes the friction from the shoe, freshens
the feet, makes walking a delight

The Antiseptic, Healing powder

for shoes that pinch and for tired, aching, swollen feet, corns, bunions, blisters and callouses.

1,500,000 pounds of powder for the feet were used by our Army and Navy during the war.

In a Pinch, use ALLEN'S FOOT-EASE

The Women of the Desert

(Continued from Page 25)

friendly to the British, who had given him far more protection than the Turks had ever given. We drove for miles across a gold-and-green desert, and stopped at last before the encampment.

There were the usual long tents with black tops and matting sides. A group of men stood in front of the tents to receive us. The sheik and his more important guests wore an underdress or jibbek of wool or silk; a silk overdress or abba, usually lavender or yellow, with a fine black stripe; a head covering or kefeh, held in place by an agil or head-round, made of silk skeins and silver or gilt wire. In the background stood the women and children, eager to see these visitors from the West whom their sheik was to entertain.

We placed our open palms in the palm of our host, not shaking hands, which would have been rude, and we said "Bismillah," which is, "In the name of God." Not to have said that would have meant bad luck for our hosts and ourselves. We entered the guest tent, which was spread with bright, beautiful rugs and furnished with camel saddles for us to lean against. After dinner my friend and the sheik talked of politics, of the Turks, of this and that bit of desert gossip. At last, when the time was ripe, she asked if we might be allowed to go to the women's tent. The sheik assented, but after that there was another period of waiting. The women were to be given a chance to change their clothes and put fresh kohl under their eyes.

At last a black woman, doubtless a slave, came to conduct us to the women's tent. About it was standing a group of women and children, of not sufficient importance to be permitted to sit with us. The women wore long black or blue cotton or woolen robes. Their hair, not very abundant I thought, hung down in two or more braids. Their jewelry consisted mostly of coins, earrings and bracelets. The coins were woven in their hair or hung on silver chains under their chins. They all had the free, fine look which I had already noticed in the desert women. Their complexions were dark, their noses aquiline, their lips full and soft. Some very old ones were tattooed on the chin.

WE WERE received by the sheik's chief wife, Anima, a tall, middle-aged woman whose graying hair had been dyed with henna and whose eyes had been darkened with kohl. Behind her were two other women, one perhaps twenty-five and the other sixteen. They were the sheik's other wives, Fatima and Mutra, evidently much in awe of Anima and very respectful to her. Mutra, as I afterwards discovered, was really not a wife at all, but was being kept under inspection, so to speak, until the sheik could decide whether or not he wanted her.

Anima wore a robe of blue silk embroidered with silver, and round her neck a mass of gold chains studded with turquoises. On her fingers were various heavy turquoise-set silver rings. Fatima wore a crimson silk robe, with a necklace of coral and seed pearls. Mutra's colors were gold and black, with a gold and turquoise ornament on her head and a harness of silver coins under her chin.

My friend told me that Anima held her position and probably always would hold it, because she was the daughter of a very important sheik with whom her husband wished to remain on friendly terms, and was, besides, a very tactful and wise woman.

Gradually other women entered the tent and sat down in front of us, quietly struggling for places in the front rank and eagerly listening to all that was said.

WE HELD a long conversation with these women, who struck me as far more intelligent than the women of the harems in towns.

Anima and Fatima showed us their jewels, and Fatima sent for her little sons. All the women seemed happy. When they told me the number of their children, they did not count the girls, and they laughed when I made the recount. But Anima sent for her one little girl, her baby, the same child I had seen in the guest tent, and, showing her to me with great tenderness, said: "Allah has been good to me; I have five sons. But this little child whom I call Sunshine (Shemseh) is my pearl, my treasure, my secret hoard. The sons belong to the father, but the daughter belongs to the mother."

No closer than that did we get to the real feelings of these desert women. They do not talk freely about their situation, for fear, probably, of saying something against their religion.

As we drove away, I realized that only the desert men are free. The women are as much chattels as the camels that groaned as our car passed them, as the greyhounds that barked after us.

The tents fell into shadow, the moon made them all mysterious, dreamlike, as if they stood only for romance, were remote from human woe. The call to prayer sounded: "There is no God but Allah, the compassionate, the most merciful."

Helpful Ladies' Home Journal Books

Order the following booklets from the Service Bureau, The Ladies' Home Journal, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania:

NEW JOURNAL BUNGALOWS. Price, 50 cents.
NEW JOURNAL HOUSES. Price, 50 cents.
YOUR FIREPLACE AND HOW TO BUILD IT. Price, 5 cents.

HOW TO BUY YOUR HOME. Price, 15 cents.
WHAT YOU SHOULD KNOW WHEN BUILDING A LITTLE HOUSE. Price, 10 cents.

PLANNING THE LITTLE HOUSE GARDEN. Price, 10 cents.

JOURNAL BIRD HOUSES. Price, 25 cents.

WEAVING THE NEW BASKETS. Price, 25 cents.

HOW TO SEW FOR THE CHILDREN. Hints on saving time and money. Price, 10 cents.

CHILDREN'S PARTIES AND BIRTHDAY CELEBRATIONS. Price, 15 cents.

HOW TO DRY FRUITS AND VEGETABLES. Price, 10 cents.

THE COMPLETE FURNISHING OF THE LITTLE HOUSE. Reprints of the articles comprising this series may be had for 10 cents each from the Interior Decoration Department, THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL.

THE BOOK OF SWEATERS AND KNITTING. Containing the latest designs. Price, 35 cents.

Order the following booklets directly from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City:

FAVORITE SELECTIONS FOR SPRING AND SUMMER. A thirty-two-page booklet containing over 250 attractive and popular designs for all occasions. Send two 2-cent stamps for postage.

MASQUERADE COSTUMES. A twenty-four-page booklet of novel designs for party, play or pageant. Price, 15 cents.

THE BRIDE'S BOOK. Charming illustrations for the entire trousseau, and many valuable suggestions for the wedding arrangements. Price, 15 cents.

YOUR CHILDREN'S CLOTHES. Twenty-four pages of simple and easily made garments for children, with complete instructions for cutting and making. Price, 15 cents.

THE MATERNITY BOOK. Illustrates attractive, sensible clothes for maternity wear, as well as all the necessary garments for the layette. Patterns supplied for all designs shown. Price, 15 cents.

SIMPLIFIED SMOKING. Teaches the one-process method of smoking, and shows 27 new designs, with many delightful suggestions for their application. Price, 25 cents.

Patterns may be had from any store selling Home Patterns by mail, postage prepaid, or from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City, at the following prices:

	CENTS
Dresses	35
Coats	35
Skirts	30
Blouses	30
Children's	25
Lingerie	25
Embroidery Transfer	25 to 75

THE 40th LEONARD YEAR

The ten great refrigerator ideas

Let the Leonard guard your family's health. It keeps food fresh, eliminates waste, saves work, worry and money. It gives the housewife extra hours for rest and recreation. The Leonard Cleanable Refrigerator crowns forty years of progress in the science of food preservation.

Here are the ten points of perfection that make the Leonard the logical choice of those who seek highest efficiency and greatest economy:

1. Ten walls of insulation—cold retaining, heat-resisting.
2. One-piece food chamber—triplecoated with porcelain.
3. Rounded inside corners, with porcelain lining extending to outside edge of door frame; sanitary, clean-easy.
4. Circulation system—chilled dry air, constantly moving.

Leonard CLEANABLE Refrigerator

"Like a Clean China Dish"

5. One-piece porcelain door-plate, pan-shaped; no wood exposed.
6. Self-closing air-tight lock.
7. Removable drain-pipe, non-sweating.
8. Patented non-leaking device. (No moisture can reach the wood frame.)
9. Retinned, woven-wire food shelves.
10. All-metal ice rack—no rust, no leak.

One out of every seven refrigerators sold is made by Leonard. A tribute to Leonard superiority!

Visit the Leonard dealer in your town. If you fail to find him, write us and we will see that you are supplied. Send for sample of porcelain, catalog illustrating over 75 styles and sizes of refrigerators. Mr. Leonard's own booklet on the "Selection and Care of Refrigerators" will be mailed, too.

GRAND RAPIDS REFRIGERATOR COMPANY, 24 Clyde Ave., Grand Rapids, Mich.

Be sure the refrigerator you buy is made in Grand Rapids

C. H. Leonard

There is a size and style of Leonard Refrigerator to suit every purse.

Making Friends and Money

MRS. HARRIET HARRISON lives in a little Oklahoma town, where there are a good many interesting people she wanted to meet and know, but she never seemed able to find time for making calls. She felt that her day belonged to her family—especially to the bright little youngster who appears with her in the engraving above. But one day she came upon a plan that not only enables her to add to her family income by earning extra money, but to get acquainted with the townspeople at the same time. Since then she has been able to make improvements in the family home, and has widely enlarged the circle of her friends.

YOUR Opportunity

WE will pay you cash for easy, pleasant, spare-time work as a representative of The Ladies' Home Journal, The Saturday Evening Post and The Country Gentleman. You can start right now, without experience, and make money. Some of our women workers earn $50.00 to $75.00 a week—and we will make you the same offer that they enjoy. For full particulars, write to:

The Curtis Publishing Company
485 Independence Square, Philadelphia, Pa.

Have Baby Comfy

In a Gordon Motor Crib. More pleasure for you when motoring with baby tucked snugly in this convenient crib. "The safest way," the doctors say. Crib easily strapped in any touring car. Spring arrangement absorbs all shock over roughest roads. Hood when raised protects against weather. Fold crib flat or detach when not in use. Sold everywhere or sent parcel post prepaid.

Send for illustrated booklet and dealer's name

GORDON MOTOR CRIB CO.

219 N. State St. Dept. 7 CHICAGO

Smith's NECK BANDS

You can make "custom-made" shirts at home so easily, and at such a small saving, that you will be truly surprised. They will fit "just" perfectly, with just the right sleeve length, cozy cuffs, full skirts and comfort around the neck that you know feel ready-made. To insure perfect fitting shirts: Invest upon SMITH'S Neck Bands and see that SMITH'S is stamped on them you buy. At your dealer's in Cashmere, at 15c, 14c and 12c; also Pongee at 25c and Pure Linen at 31c. Send us 19c for book "How I Make My Husband's Shirts," fully illustrated with charts and diagrams or 25c for the book and a SMITH'S Neck Band (20c quality). Mention size. Gossard & Smith Co., Inc., 137 West 17th Street, New York.

How I Make My Husband's Shirts by Gossard & Smith Co.

GET THIS BOOK ON HOME SHIRT MAKING

Italian Embroidery Done in Carpet Thread

By MABEL FOSTER BAINBRIDGE

Under the Direction of the Guild of the Needle and Bobbin Crafts

FOR a maximum of effect with a minimum of effort nothing excels Italian stitches. The Italians have always embroidered both their household and ecclesiastical linens, and, although the greater part of the work is exquisitely fine, we find much good stitchery in coarse thread on heavy hand-woven linen, after designs by artists. Though we substitute crash for the handmade linen and content ourselves with a plebeian thread made to sew carpets, we can use their old designs or at least adaptations.

It is surprising to see the lovely colors in which carpet thread is dyed. During the war it was almost the only colored linen thread procurable. It comes in various shades of brown, in red, gold, green, black, blue and, best of all, a fine linen color. For anything that demands constant laundering it is safer to use the natural linen-colored thread, but with care I have never experienced any difficulty with the colors. One may procure the thread in the small-ware department of the large stores, in thread and needle shops, and in a general country store.

Where the Italian hemstitching is done, an even-thread, loosely woven linen is desirable, but for the braid stitch or ladder stitch any kind or weave of linen or crash will serve.

A Simple Fine Old Stitch

THE sofa pillow cover, Page 171, is of linen-colored crash—originally designed for dish toweling!—with the interlacing design done in dark brown carpet thread. The pattern comes from an old pattern book called "Le Pompe," published in Venice about 1560, and it would seem that a design which has stood the test of over three hundred years is quite worth our while. In working the pattern care must be taken that the lines interlace. To be right they must weave under and over in crossing the intersecting line. This stitch, which is found on the earliest Italian linens—often just as a finish—has various names, but braid stitch is quite correct.

To apply this stitch, two lines may be drawn an eighth of an inch apart or one may work across a single line. Work progresses from right to left. To begin, bring the thread out below the stamped line at the right, hold it down under the thumb, to the left, on the line, letting the slack thread fall toward you. Insert the needle on the upper line, if two have been drawn, otherwise just above the single line, and take a slightly slanting stitch, bringing the needle out below the line a little to the left, carrying it first under and then over the thread, which has been held to the left under your thumb. (See photograph of process on Page 171.) As you pull the thread up, a twist or knot appears. Repeat until pattern has been fully worked, being careful to take the stitches as close together as possible, and the needle always slanting the same way.

This braid stitch is very simple to make, as you will see when you have worked it out, and—best of all—it goes fast. It is a stitch that can be used in open, rather widely scattered patterns instead of outlining, and is infinitely less tedious and more effective.

Make your pillow case any size you like and apply the bands—the case photographed on Page 171 is 12 by 18 inches—with a 2-inch fringe. Seam the case at the bottom and part way across the top, leaving an opening large enough to slip the pillow in. Overcast the fringed edges together at the ends, and tie in with a crochet hook or large-eyed needle strands of the brown carpet thread. Use a double thread and tie in by slipping the two ends through the loop.

Very useful for knitting or sewing or to hang in one's room for fine laundry is the bag of white linen and gold-colored carpet thread on Page 171.

For the ring use one of a pair of embroidery hoops, and have the linen one-third fuller

Carpet thread may even decorate a luncheon set most beautifully. Above is a service dolly of tan linen, Italian hemstitched in dull red carpet thread. Runners, tray covers, etc., may also be made.

The ladder stitch at the left is nothing but a buttonhole stitch, in which the previous stitch is drawn to the right to form a square. It has the double charm of being highly decorative and going very fast.

15021

A single unit in each corner of your bridge-table cover offers sufficient decoration and not too much distraction. One pattern includes transfer for cover above, bureau set, and pillow on Page 171.

The ladder stitch, which is described in article and shown in detail in photograph at bottom of page, has been worked in linen-colored carpet thread on white linen in this bureau set.

than the circumference of the hoop. The hoop in the illustration is eighteen inches in circumference, so the linen was cut twenty-four inches, while the bag is thirteen inches deep. Leave enough linen at the top to go over the hoop, then draw two threads, leave four, draw two, and Italian or double hemstitch over the four threads, taking up four vertical threads each time. Leave four threads, then draw two, leave four, and draw two. Italian-hemstitch over the last four threads, leaving the four plain between the two rows of hemstitching. Be sure to take up the same series of vertical threads each time. If the first row is even the others come very easily, and the little squares work in almost without counting.

Next leave twelve threads, and repeat the two rows of Italian hemstitching, with the four threads between, as above. In your band of twelve threads count down four threads and take a vertical stitch over four, then under four horizontally, over four vertically, under four horizontally, which brings your needle out where you started, with two sides of a square worked on the right of the linen; go back and complete the square. Make the square on even threads with your hemstitching, and, as I said before, it requires almost no counting. Leave sixteen threads and repeat your square. Continue across.

Punto Scritto is Easy to Do

BRING the thread out in the center hole between the four groups of hemstitches in the lower line of hemstitching. Count down eight threads; insert needle; bring it out again eight threads below. The first stitch is on the surface, the second on the back. From this point, sixteen threads below the hemstitch, count a square four threads on a side, this time on the diagonal. If at first it bothers you to count on a diagonal count four straight threads to the center, and from there four in each direction, and you have the corners of the square.

As before, every other stitch is on the wrong side. Go back and close your stitches; when you reach the point eight threads from the hemstitch take a slanting stitch to both the left and right, inserting the needle in the hole in the hemstitch, which is eight threads or two hemstitched groups from where you started. Skip one group of hemstitched threads and repeat the figure. The hemstitched group skipped is the one over which in the band above the square is worked. Perhaps this sounds complicated, but as a matter of fact this stitch, called in Italian Punto Scritto, is very simple and great fun to do. Use a blunt needle.

Now French-seam the bag up; sew onto the hoop; gather at the bottom, and finish with a simple tassel

(Continued on Page 171)

Can anyone afford not to

YOU may sometimes hear people say—"Well, I'd like to put in Simmons Mattresses, but I can't afford it just now."

Nevertheless, no "saving" can compensate anyone for sleeping on the mattresses of ordinary construction.

If Simmons Mattresses cost twice their very moderate prices—they would still be cheap, in view of their sleeping quality and perfect cleanliness. Built for Sleep—of pure, clean, new kapok or cotton. No "renovated" materials.

The "Tudor." Design 1963—in Twin Pair

Each Simmons Mattress delivered at your home in sealed carton roll—perfectly sweet and clean.

Your choice of five styles—distinguished by Labels of different color—at a popular range of prices—

Purple Label
Blue Label Green Label
Red Label White Label

Simmons Company makes this unqualified statement to the merchant—

"Cut open any Simmons Mattress that comes into your store. If you do not find it up to specifications or better—ship back every item of Simmons merchandise, and never send us another order."

A Service due the American Public

Today Simmons can give the public a complete sleeping unit. Beds, Springs and Mattresses, each built to fit the other—all built for sleep. In this way, you secure a real guarantee of sleep satisfaction.

Look for the Simmons Label

SIMMONS COMPANY

NEW YORK ATLANTA CHICAGO KENOSHA SAN FRANCISCO MONTREAL
(Executive Offices, Kenosha, Wis.)

SIMMONS BEDS

Built for Sleep

FREE BOOKLET ON SLEEP:
Write us for "Sleep and its Environment"

Every Fabric of Every Season Washed with a Fifth the Labor

GINGHAM dresses and aprons clean as new—without back-breaking rubbing. Children's play clothes made crisp and fresh—without the use of the fabric-destroying washboard. Soft organdie, batiste and silk waists and lingerie cleansed without straining delicate fabric. Sheets, bed-linen and towels soaked clean without rubbing.

La France brings you all this freedom from wash-day labor—all this insurance that garments will wear as they should.

La France is not a new soap. It is used with soap. It makes any good laundry soap remove dirt quicker, safer and absolutely without need for the washboard. Whether you boil clothes in the time-tried, old-fashioned way, whether you soak them clean in the newer fashion, or whether you use either hand-power or electric washing machines, you can use La France with benefit.

Blues as it Cleanses

Remember, too, that La France blues as it cleanses. It does away with the entire operation of bluing—saves all this labor. La France, too, blues perfectly—no rust spots, no over-bluing, no dingy, gray clothes. Just follow the simple directions on the package and La France will give you the whitest, cleanest clothes you have ever seen.

Domestic Science Teachers Say

All statements here made have been proved by exhaustive unbiased tests made by leading schools of domestic science and sworn to before a notary. In these tests La France was used on delicate silks as well as heavy sheets; on woollens as well as cottons. Read (in the panel at the left) exactly what these sworn tests prove.

Domestic Science Tests of La France

When clothes are Boiled or Soaked, La France added to soap saves one-third of the time, four-fifths of the labor, and all the wear of rubbing on a washboard. On an average family washing, thirty-four minutes are saved. No washboard or bluing required.

In Electric Washers, La France added to soap saves half the time and half the current. On an average family washing one hour and a quarter is saved. No bluing required.

Microscopic tests by these domestic science teachers prove that La France does not injure fabrics.

(Sworn affidavits of these official tests on file in Philadelphia)

Test at Our Expense

Your grocer either has La France in both tablet and powder or will obtain it for you. Write us direct, sending us your grocer's name, and we will send you free enough La France for next week's washing. La France Mfg. Co., Philadelphia, Pa.

Nothing washes summer dresses of cotton so safely as soap and La France. Try it. Your new spring dresses will last so much longer.

Flannel shirts, woolen hose, and all the between-seasons fabrics will wear best if they are washed frequently with soap and La France.

Before you put away heavy winter sweaters and children's winter clothes, wash them in soap and La France. Soiled garments attract moths.

Satina

Makes Ironing Easy

Starched pieces assume a delightful finish when Satina is added to the boiling starch. The iron ceases to stick, the smooth surface delights the eye, and La France Bouquet, with which the tablet is perfumed, imparts an elusive fragrance that appeals to critical women. We will mail you a free sample on receipt of your grocer's name.

Better Laundry With Any Soap

La France
TABLET & POWDERED
MAKES WASHING EASY

Italian Embroidery Done in Carpet Thread

(Continued from Page 168)

such as is described as the foundation tassel on Page 109, September, 1921, LADIES' HOME JOURNAL. For the Italian hemstitch follow the method described and illustrated on Page 124, LADIES' HOME JOURNAL for February, 1921.

The handle measures sixteen inches finished, and is made of two rows of hemstitching with a narrow hem on either side.

The bureau scarf and pincushion on Page 168, made of white linen and embroidered with linen-colored carpet thread, make a most attractive set. The pincushion top design measures two and a half by six inches and works out well on a five-by-nine-inch cushion. It is done in ladder stitch and round eyelets. Each corner supports two tiny tassels one inch long, made in the same way as that used for the bag.

The ladder stitch is so simple and effective that I wonder it isn't better known. The stitch is just a buttonhole stitch, in which the previous stitch is drawn to the right to form the top of the square. The work progresses from left to right.

The Ladder Stitch

BRING the thread out at point of the figure; hold the thread under your thumb to the right, and take a buttonhole stitch, inserting needle where thread came out, and slanting needle a little to the right. Do not pull this stitch up closely, but with the point of the needle pull the slanting thread out at the top to the right to form a square; insert needle, slant to the right; draw it out as before and you have a second stitch. Continue, taking care that the slant of the stitches conforms with your design. The round center of the design is a series of buttonhole stitches taken in the same central hole.

The eyelets are punched with a stiletto, and top-sewed. Draw the stitches tight, as no threads of the linen are broken, and this tight binding forms a symmetrical hole.

The design on the bureau scarf, which measures twelve by four and a half inches, could well be applied to any sized scarf or cloth. As on the pincushion, it is worked in ladder stitch and eyelets. The edge of the bureau scarf is a series of ladder stitches, with every two inches an eyelet; the hem is three-eighths of an inch wide and turned on the right side. The inspiration

Italian hemstitching in gold carpet thread on white linen makes the bag above, while below is a detail of the Punto Scritto stitch used for the tiny squares. At the top of the page is a detail of the braid stitch, which is used on the sofa pillow below and is so easy to make.

It had its beginnings in humble linen-colored crash dish toweling, but brown carpet thread applied in braid stitch according to a pattern that flourished in Venice in the sixteenth century makes it an effective and useful pillow.

for these ladder-stitch designs came from a lovely Italian cloth now in the Victoria and Albert Museum, London. In the original the pattern with a cut-work center is repeated diagonally over white linen cloth. Even though we work with carpet thread on crash, we are adapting to everyday use designs from the oldest known pattern book, and getting our inspiration from world-famous embroideries.

The tassels are just the same simple tassel as on the pincushion, and measure four inches.

Also a Lunch Cloth

THE bridge-table cover on Page 168 has a simple decoration, so that the guest won't spend too much time admiring the embroidery and ask too continually "What's trump?" The little unit is planned to come about two inches inside the edge of the table, so that it may show without distracting. The edge, with the hem turned on the right side, is three-eighths of an inch wide when finished. Like that of the bureau scarf, the edge is a series of ladder stitches with an eyelet about every two inches. The illustration is cream-colored linen, done in a lovely red carpet thread. This cloth is a yard square, and might also serve as a luncheon cloth in addition to that of being a bridge-table cover.

The tassels, measuring all done about six inches, are Number Thirteen of the Fringes and Tassels article in September, 1921, LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, Page 109. The beads are especially desirable, as they add weight to keep the cover in place.

So many uses suggest themselves for the little doily, I hardly know where to begin. The one photographed on Page 168 belongs to a set of service doilies, each about twelve by sixteen inches, and capable of holding the plate, silver, tumbler and butter plate. The centerpiece, which is larger, of course, than the service doilies, is made in the same way, except that the little bullion flower appears at regular intervals in the border on the sides. This centerpiece may be oblong or square; a sixteen-inch square is a serviceable size.

Select any good coarse-weave linen or crash in which the threads run evenly. That is, the warp and wool threads must be of the

(Continued on Page 172)

0120—Flesh color brocade. Four hose-supporters. $3.00

0112—Flesh color Dobby Cloth. Two hose-supporters. $1.00

0123—Flesh color Francine Cloth. Four hose-supporters. $2.00

The advantage of a Corset—The appearance of Uncorseted-effect

Model
corset-brassiere

Fashion declares: "This season, that figure is best corseted which is least corseted." The MODEL Corset-Brassiere gives the helpful advantage of wearing a corset with a youthful appearance of natural lines.

Ask for MODEL Corset-Brassieres—$1.00 to $6.50—at your favorite shop in your preferred material and in your accustomed fastening. All other types of MODEL Brassieres—50c to $8.50. If not obtainable, write direct to the manufacturers.

Model Brassiere Co.

Dept. 15
London . 200 Fifth Avenue, New York . Paris
Illustrated Style Book sent upon request

HOME OF BEAUTY HOUSE NO. 101

The view above shows Home of Beauty House No. 101, built by Mr. Leslie Welter at Moorhead, Minnesota. Mr. Welter says: "We are very well pleased with our building experience. A leading architect of Fargo, N. D., said that this house is the best designed and best looking house of any he has seen in this section of the country. Our house created such a favorable impression that several houses have been built of brick in this vicinity this season. I wish to thank you for the excellent service you rendered me at a cost that was practically negligible."

Better Homes

AS THE MANY advantages of the Face Brick house—its supreme beauty, its unmatched durability, its safety from fire and its marked economies—should be available to the average home-builder, to whom the architect is not accessible, we have issued various designs for small Face Brick houses, ranging in sizes from three to eight rooms.

During the last year and a half 100,000 of these plan booklets have been sent out on request and they have received enthusiastic endorsement from home-builders everywhere. "The Home of Beauty" shows fifty houses, mostly two stories, designed by architects in all parts of the country. They represent a wide variety of architectural designs and carefully planned interior arrangements. Sent for 50 cents. We have complete working drawings, specifications and quantity estimates for these houses at nominal cost.

"Face Brick Bungalow and Small House Plans" are issued in four booklets, showing 3 to 4 room houses, 5-room houses, 6-room houses, and 7 to 8 room houses, in all ninety-two, each reversible with a different exterior design. These designs are unusual and distinctive, combined with convenient interiors and economical construction. The entire set for one dollar. Any one of the booklets, 25 cents. We have the complete working drawings, etc., at nominal prices.

"The Story of Brick" is an artistic booklet with numerous illustrations and much valuable information for home-builders. It discusses the many advantages and economies of the Face Brick house. Sent free.

Address, American Face Brick Association, 1125 Westminster Bldg., Chicago, Ill.

NOVELITE SPREADS

You can't resist their colorful appeal—their smart stripes, quaint cross-stitch effects, fanciful blocks! They come in gleaming white, as well.

Novelites are always fresh because you may so easily rinse them out. The fabrics are light but enduring, each color tub-fast and sun-fast.

In all desired sizes, tuck-in or cut-out corners, plain or scalloped, bolster covers to match. Priced from $3 to $8.

Write us today for Novelite Style Book and samples, naming your favorite store. No charge.

MARGRAVE MILLS, Inc.,
JAMES F. WHITE & CO., Inc.,
54 Worth St., New York
Selling Agents

DR. PRICE'S VANILLA

DO you realize how important it is to have vanilla that is just right in strength? Too strong vanilla often brings disastrous results because it overflavors; too weak vanilla leaves your cooking flat and tasteless.

Price's Vanilla is always the same high quality; always evenly balanced in strength—neither weak nor too strong.

Price's Vanilla is the pure extract from choicest vanilla beans. It is aged in wood to bring out all its richness and delicate flavor. You will like Price's Vanilla the same as other women have for nearly seventy years. Ask for it by name from your grocer. Write for our new book of recipes—"Delicious Desserts and Candies." It's free.

PRICE FLAVORING EXTRACT CO.
"Experts in Flavor"
Chicago, Ill.

Look for Price's
Tropikid on the label.

Italian Embroidery Done in Carpet Thread

(Continued from Page 171)

same size; an irregular weave crash is troublesome to work on.

Measure in three-eighths of an inch, draw two threads, leave four threads, draw two threads. Turn the hem to the first two drawn threads, and with ordinary spool cotton hem it. Then Italian-hemstitch all around over the four threads, taking up four vertical threads each time. Leave twenty-four threads; draw two; leave four, and draw two. Draw these threads just to the first line of hemstitching, not through—again Italian-hemstitch over the four threads.

In the little squares, in the corners, formed by the second row of hemstitching, make a little flower with four bullion petals. Bullion stitch is described in the HOME JOURNAL for October, 1921. Example VII, page 121.

The hemmed edge is simply top-sewed over, taking a stitch in each opening left by the hemstitching, and using care that the stitches slant evenly.

In the corners, and where the second line of hemstitching reaches the hem, are little tassels. Bring the needle out through the hem, hold an ordinary-sized pencil parallel with hem, and wind thread six times around it, each time inserting needle into hem; draw pencil out, and bind loops by making one tight buttonhole or push stitch over loops close to hem; fasten thread.

This doily is most useful for any little cover.

You Can Make Your Graduating Dress

(Continued from Page 165)

sleeve in place. Now remove the waist, mark the corrections on the right side and make several cross markings on the belt and waistline of the waist, so that fullness may easily be put in place again. Alter the waist and baste together again. The seams on the waist may be stitched on the seam lines. Raw edges should be turned toward the seam and then turned and the edges run together; or entredeux or cording may be used. Put in the sleeves, adjust the fullness at the waistline onto tape, the right side of the tape being to wrong side of waist, and baste into place. Try on a second time and pin the skirt to waist.

The straight skirt is hung from the waistline, so after adjusting the fullness at the waistline on the right side, see that bottom line of the skirt is an equal distance from the floor at all points. If it is not, correct by raising or dropping the skirt at waistline. Remove the dress and make alterations.

Cut off the skirt one-quarter of an inch above waistline, turn the raw edge to the wrong side of the waistline, and gather close to the turned edge.

Before gathering the skirt it is best to make a placket, so that it may be concealed by a sash or belt if possible. With long-waisted bodices short plackets are used. One way of finishing placket for a full skirt is first to cut the placket the desired length—about five inches—then cut a straight lengthwise strip of material twice the length of opening and about one inch wide. Place the right side of this strip to the right side of the opening, with the skirt toward you; baste and stitch one-eighth of an inch seam. Crease seam sharply onto the facing. Turn in the remaining raw edge one-eighth of an inch and baste and hem the folded edge exactly to cover the first stitching.

Make Your Trimmings

NOW you are ready to show your good taste by trimming just enough in just the right place. Here are described and illustrated a few thoughts I got from some models. May they help you to brilliant ideas and wonderful execution!

Bias folds fagot to material and narrow cordings were used on one nice frock to decorate the neck and sleeve lines. Most of the neck and sleeve finishes are flat. Points and scallops like those in the photograph at the right were used to finish tucks and hems on skirts.

The French, who lead all others in clever needlework, frequently use scallops and points on sheer crisp frocks in preference to other trimmings. Methods of construction are evident.

To make a bias fold to be attached by fagoting, cut bias strips of the material twice the desired depth of fold plus one-quarter of an inch. Turn the bias edges one-eighth of an inch to wrong side and baste the folded edges together. Be sure the fold is smooth. Turn raw edge of garment to wrong side on seam line and baste in place. Baste this seam line to paper, being sure to keep the garment in shape. Baste the bias fold in place, stretching where necessary to keep flat, about one-quarter of an inch above the seam line of the garment. Then with embroidery cotton take three or four stitches through the fold of the garment close together. Make the fourth stitch through one edge, then in the middle of space between the fold and garment, put the needle around a group of threads and through a loop of the thread coming from the cloth. Take next stitch through second edge to complete the group of four stitches. Advance to left about one-eighth of an inch.

Scallops and Cordings

THE dainty little scallop in the photograph on page 165 is very effective for neck and sleeve finishes. It is sometimes used as folds on skirts. The material is cut on a true bias and folded as for a tuck. Then take two or three little over-and-over stitches over the fold. The length of the stitch is determined by the depth of scallop desired. Slip the thread along the wrong side of the material the desired width of scallop and repeat over-and-over stitches. Advance to the left.

The deep scallop photographed below is attractive on organdie, and quickly done. The material is cut on the true bias, the depth being determined by desired size of the scallop. Roll one edge carefully, then sew the end to a piece of tape. Catch the rolled edge to the tape at intervals, as illustrated, and fasten material between.

For fine cording, which is always attractive, cover a cord with bias material. Fold the bias evenly, slip the cord close to the fold and sew in place by fine running stitches. Be sure the bias is drawn tightly over the cord. Cording is placed to garment seam line, right sides together, and sewed by hand close to the cord. Finish raw edges on the wrong side by whipping together or with a wider edge of facing.

Sashes may be of the material or of ribbon, but be careful to have your whole frock give an impression of simplicity.

Patterns for Italian embroidery done in carpet thread may be secured from any store selling Home Patterns; or by mail from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City.

What women need today is more people they can depend upon

MANY a woman looks back and wonders how her mother got along with "so little to do with."

No one a generation ago would have dared to picture a woman's release from drudgery as it is today.

Just as no one conceived the electric home as the Hotpoint people have conceived it—and made it come true.

* * *

Talk with friends about electric cooking and heating—and you hear "Hotpoint" mentioned most often.

Inevitably with high regard, perhaps, because Hotpoint has never traded on the needs of a woman to sell her a mere electrical contrivance that looks good enough to take home—but doesn't do much after that, except "get out of order."

Remember that Hotpoint has pioneer traditions to protect. Every Hotpoint Servant has its origin in a housekeeping engineer—and not in some casual workshop.

* * *

The story of the Hotpoint Iron, for example. Nearly 5,000,000 women know how electric ironing was revolutionized when Hotpoint discovered how to make the point even hotter than the rest of the iron.

Thus producing the first practical electric iron. Maximum results—minimum current—least work for the housewife.

Hotpoint invented the Hinged Plug Cord Protector, which does away with most of the jerk, bending and breaking of the cord.

And the strength-saving Cantilever Handle, which lessens the strain and makes ironing easier than you ever thought it could be.

Then, too, there is the Hotpoint Attached Stand, so that one simply tilts the iron back on its heel, instead of lifting it to and from the old-fashioned ironing stand—a saving of many hundred pounds of lifting in a day's ironing.

* * *

Hotpoint Servants are so named because they actually do deliver service in day after day work in the home.

They are sold everywhere you find a merchant who feels responsible for the practical service of electricity in housekeeping—as compared with the dealer in indiscriminate electric novelties and devices.

There is a HOTPOINT

Boudoir Set
Utility Ironing Set
Chafing Dish
Curling Iron
Radiant Grill
Air Heater
Hedlite Heater
Radiant Heater
Heating Pad
Household Iron
Laundry Iron
Tailor's Iron
Ovenette
Portable Oven

Hotpoint

SERVANTS

EDISON ELECTRIC APPLIANCE CO., Inc.

New York Atlanta Chicago Ontario, Cal. Salt Lake City

There is a HOTPOINT

Percolator
Coffee Urn
Disc Stove
Radiant Stove
Table Stove
Toaster Stove
Teapot
Tea Kettle
Toaster
Vacuum Cleaner
and the Hotpoint-Hughes
Electric Ranges

Rubens
Look for this trade-mark

This is the all-spot. Protect it with the double thickness.

On and off like a coat. Always fits the GROWING body perfectly.

Mothers—their future health depends on present care

Any doctor or nurse will tell you that poor protection over baby's chest and stomach is a too frequent cause of illness.

They will tell you, too, that Rubens Infant Shirt affords the needed protection as no other infant shirt does.

Double Thickness Means Double Warmth and Better Health

Cut with the simple convenience of a coat. No buttons, no tapes. Adjustable belt fastens with a single safety pin. Knitted in softest and finest materials for baby's delicate skin.

Insist upon the genuine Rubens, taken from the famous striped box. Look for the above trade-mark on the shirt. If any dealer can't supply you, write us.

Manufactured only by
RUBENS & MARBLE, Inc.
24 No. Market St., Chicago
Established 1890

RUBENS INFANT SHIRTS

Why Do Our Mothers and Babies Die?

(Continued from Page 32)

from any person her individual right to select any medical assistance she chooses, but it will to a very great extent bring to the women of this country the kind of health education they have a perfect right to demand in order that their lives and the lives of their children may be saved.

About a year ago, at a hearing before Congress on the Sheppard-Towner Bill—or, as it was sometimes called, the "mothers and babies' bill"—Mrs. Florence Kelley, secretary of the National Consumers' League, asked: "Why does Congress want our mothers and babies to die?" Congress proved that it does not want our mothers and babies to die, although Mrs. Kelley's question was perfectly justified by the circumstances. I feel that it is the business not only of Congress but of every man and woman in this country to see that the mothers and babies of the United States are as well protected and cared for as the mothers and babies of any other country.

It costs so little in money, time and energy to save mothers and babies that one wonders why this work is not and has not always been universal. THE HOME JOURNAL has determined that it will do its share in assuring health and safety to the mothers and babies of this country. The program for saving these lives is one that is easily within the reach of any community. It does not mean the expenditure of any vast sums of money, although it would be most desirable in every way if there could be in every county or township a hospital where women could receive the care they need.

First of all, mothers should find out what part their community is playing in making the United States at the present time the most dangerous country in the world for babies to be born in. If they find that conditions are good and that the maternal and infant death rates are low, they should try to make them still better and save more mothers and babies. If, on the other hand, they find that conditions are bad, it should be all the greater incentive for them to raise their local standards to the highest possible plane.

The Community's Duty

WHENEVER the infant mortality rate of any community is greater than seventy-five deaths to each one thousand babies born, it must be considered entirely unwarranted. This is not an ideal standard, for even in our largest cities it has been found to be a practical accomplishment. As a matter of fact, there is no reason why half this number of babies should die before they reach the first birthday; but just as a standard to work on, seventy-five infant deaths per one thousand births may be taken to indicate a commonplace goal for our largest cities, where conditions of insanitation, lack of proper hygiene, poverty and the presence of vast groups of people of foreign nationalities present a problem that is difficult to solve. In country districts or rural communities, from thirty to fifty deaths of babies out of every thousand born should be taken as the highest permissible standard.

In general, it may be said that in our Western States and in rural communities or small towns that do not have to meet the problems of our big cities, the death rate of mothers and babies can easily be reduced to the vanishing point. Each community should see that competent medical advice is available. In the great rush to the cities that has occurred during the last ten years the doctors have not been left behind, and large numbers of rural communities are finding themselves without any opportunities for medical care. The call to the great centers of population is an insistent one; nevertheless the country and its people must be served, and while all cases of sickness need the most expert attention they can receive, it is also true that childbearing, which is really not a sickness at all, may have ill-health, sickness or even death as a penalty if the right kind of knowledge and care is not available. If one township cannot offer sufficient inducement for a physician to settle there, several townships should combine and make it financially worth while for a doctor to come and stay. In any event, whenever it is at all possible for her to do so, every mother should place herself under the care of a physician as soon as she knows that a new life is expected. If this is not possible, she should make every effort to obtain the advice of a competent nurse. This is much more easily obtained, for there is no community that cannot benefit by employing a public health nurse.

The usual objection is that the town or county cannot afford the expense. But if the town or county thinks anything at all of the well-being of its population, it cannot afford not to spend the necessary money for this service, which pays greater dividends than any other possible investment. Whenever a public health nurse has been employed it has been found that sickness has decreased, the death rate of mothers due to causes incident to maternity has been reduced, and babies are kept well, so that their death rate has also been lowered to an astounding extent.

Sacrifices May be Avoided

WHEN the Sheppard-Towner Act goes into effect, any community may well demand that its state department of health give it this service. If the mothers of this country will see that its measures are carried out effectively, and if individual mothers will take advantage of the information that is readily available to them, then there will be an end to the present sacrifice of the lives of our women and children.

The problem is one that must be solved both by community and individual responsibility. The community must be stirred to action, and in this all the fathers and mothers of the country must bear their share of responsibility. The spirit of universal motherhood must be aroused in our American woman, and no woman can free herself of her responsibility in this regard. She owes it to her community, to herself and to other women to take an active part in seeing that proper legislation is enacted, that the community takes advantage of every opportunity and that there is not a single mother in her town or city who cannot obtain freely and easily the simple information that may mean life for herself and certainly will mean health for her children.

While the provision of all facilities for proper care is a matter which depends upon community action, there still remains the individual instruction of the mother. I have written a series of nine letters, one for each month before the baby comes. These letters outline the care a mother needs to keep herself in good health. They teach her how to prepare for her baby's birth in an intelligent manner and how to insure good health for her baby. They will be sent, one each month, to any mother who cares to send for them. The time the baby is expected should be mentioned so that, if several months have already elapsed, the earlier letters may be sent to her at once.

These letters will contain the same kind of information that may be made available by the Sheppard-Towner Act. It is the same kind of instruction that has already saved the lives of thousands of mothers and babies. There is nothing difficult or unusual in these suggestions for keeping well. Every mother can carry them out for herself. The methods outlined do not require the expenditure of money, and they are so simple that they can be carried out in any home. There is no reason why every mother in this country should not have this information, and every reason why she should.

One million five hundred thousand babies were born in the United States last year, and of this number three hundred thousand did not live to reach their first birthday. If we choose to do so, we can save the lives of one hundred and fifty thousand of these babies next year and, in addition, we can save the lives of ten thousand mothers in the next twelve months. It has been estimated that the cost of saving these lives is no greater than one-twentieth the cost of a single modern battleship. Isn't it worth as much as this?

Sensitive Feet Have a Right to Style as well as Comfort

TIRING, irritating feet are in themselves enough of a cross to bear, without adding the humiliation of styleless shoes.

But a new pride awaits you in the grace of Martha Washington Comfort styles. In the safe consciousness of their good appearance, it is almost your own secret that a yielding ease softens the strain on sensitive surfaces and that comforting support tempers the weight of tiring steps.

Only at Martha Washington dealers' can you find this happy combination that it is your right to enjoy.

F. Mayer Boot & Shoe Co., Milwaukee

"Sincerity in shoe making—for more than forty years"

Mayer Martha
Washington
Comfort Shoes

"Yes, Madam, We Have the HOOSIER in Your Height"

The New HOOSIER provides your kitchen with a working center which, in addition to everything the HOOSIER has done heretofore, robs your household tasks of their greatest fatigue.

HOOSIER OWNERS tell us that the HOOSIERS of the past have done more to save steps, time and energy than any device ever created for the use of womankind.

But here is a New HOOSIER, which not only does all these things better than the HOOSIER has ever done them before, but in addition makes your table top just high enough to enable you to work in greatest comfort.

And this is only one of a number of New HOOSIER improvements, incorporated in a kitchen cabinet for the first time.

These new improvements are in addition to all the exclusive features of the HOOSIERS of the past.

But most important of all, is HOOSIER's logical, labor-saving arrangement. If the HOOSIER were arranged in any other way it would not save nearly so much time and work.

You owe it to yourself to go to your dealer and see his complete line of New HOOSIERS and HOOSIER porceliron tables, ranging in price from $11.00 to $92.50 f. o. b. factory.

HOOSIER MANUFACTURING COMPANY

422 Jackson Street, Newcastle, Indiana

BRANCH: Mezzanine Floor, Pacific Bldg., San Francisco, California OFFICES: 158 Portage Avenue, Winnipeg, Man., Canada

© 1922

HOOSIER Saves Steps

The Faith of a Baby

WHAT a warmth of inner pleasure is found in the knowledge that someone of importance trusts us. And who is of such importance or trusts with such innocent confidence as—a baby!

Keep the faith with your baby as completely as it is given you to keep—that is the Golden Rule of Motherhood.

Be as careful in your selection of powders as you are of Baby's milk. The rest of the family may choose as they please for their own hardened skins, but use on baby a baby powder.

Can you think of any powder that's as much a baby powder as Johnson's?

First suggested for babies by a well-known specialist.

Used on babies for over thirty years.

Made for babies in laboratories that prepare over 400 articles for physicians and nurses.

Keeps baby's skin cool, soft and comfortable.

Relieves itching and chafing. Just try it.

© 1922
J & J

YOU HAVE ALWAYS WANTED A SOOTHING BABY CREAM

One that can be used freely to soothe delicate baby skin without injurious effects—a Cream that absolutely prevents and relieves chafing, chapping and skin irritations. Johnson's Baby Cream—suggested by nurses—is as much a daily needful as Baby Powder. Ask your druggist.

Johnson's Baby Powder
Best for baby—Best for you

YOUR DRUGGIST IS MORE THAN A MERCHANT

Who helps the physician make home a safer, happier place to live in?
—your druggist.

Who prepares the prescriptions that turn illness into health and pain into comfort?
—your druggist.

Who spends years in scientific study so that he may serve you with articles of thoroughly tested quality?
—your druggist.

IV

SQUIRRELS do not name their babies as we do; they do not think of them by names; and yet each one is itself, has individual looks or ways that stand for that one in the mother's mind, and so is in some sort its name. Thus the biggest one of the three graycoat youngsters had a very brown head and a very gray coat. He was stronger than the others, could leap just a little farther and was not so ready to bite when playing with the rest.

The second brother was not so big as Brownhead, and he had an impatient way of rebelling at any little thing that did not please him. He would explode into a shrill Cray! which was a well-known squirrel exclamation; only he made it very thin and angry. Even to father and mother he would shriek Cray! if they did in the least a thing that was not to his wish.

The third and smallest was a little girl squirrel, very shy and gentle. She loved to be petted and would commonly snuggle up to her mother, whining softly, Nyek, nyek! even when her brothers were playing as well as at feeding time.

So in this sort they named themselves: Brownhead, Cray and Nyek-nyek.

The first lesson in all young wild life is this: "Do as you are told"; the penalty of disobedience is death; not always immediate, not clearly consequent; but soon or late it comes. This indeed is the law, driven home and clinched by ages of experience: "Obey or die." If the family is outstretched in the sun and the keen-eyed mother sees a hawk she says Chik, chik! and the wise little ones come home. They obey and live. The rebellious one stays out, and the hawk picks him up, a pleasant meal.

If the family is scrambling about the tree trunk and one attempts to climb a long, smooth stretch, from which the bark has fallen, the mother cries Chik, chik! warning him that he is going into danger. The obedient one comes back and lives. The unruly one goes on. There is no claw hold on such trunks. He falls far to the ground and pays the price.

If one is being carried from a place of danger and hangs limp and submissive from his mother's mouth, he is quickly landed in a place of safety. But one that struggles and rebels may be cut by the mother's tightening teeth or dropped by her and seized on by some enemy at hand. There are always enemies alert for such a chance. Or if he winks to drink at the familiar spring and sees not what mother sees, a black snake lurking on a log, or heeds not her sharp "Keep back!" he goes and maybe takes a single sip, but it is his last.

If one, misled by their bright color, persists in eating fruit of the deadly nightshade, ignoring mother's warning Quare, quare! he eats, he has willed to eat; and there is a little quirel body tumbled from the nest next day, to claim the kindly care of growing plants and drifting leaves that will hide it from the view.

Yes, this is the law, older than the day when the sun gave birth to our earth that it might go its own way, yet still be held in law: Obey and live; rebel and die.

Boisterous, strong and merry was Brownhead, the very son of his father—eager to do and ready to go, and yet quick to hear when the warning Quare came or the home call, Chik, chik! Well fleshed was he and deeply fur-clad, although it was mid-May; and his tail already was past the switch stage and was frilling out with the silver frill of his best kin.

PROLICSOME, merry and shy, very shy was Nyek-nyek. In some speech she would have been styled a "mammy-et." Happy with mother, playing with her brothers, but very ready to go to mother—slight of body, but quick to move, quick to follow and nervously quick to obey, she knew and learned the learning of her folk.

Last was Cray, quickest of them all, not so heavy as Brownhead, yet agile, inquisitive, full of energy; but a rebel all the time. He would climb that long, smooth column above the nest. His mother's warning held him not. And when the claw held failed he slipped, but jumped, and landed safe on a near limb.

He would go forth to investigate the loud trampling in the woods and far below him watched with eager curiosity the big two-legged thing that soon discovered him. Then there

HE GALLOPED UP A MIGHTY PINE TREE, ON WHOSE HIGHEST LIMBS WERE TWO GREAT FLICKERS CLACKING, THEN CLINGING TO A BARK FLAKE THAT PROVED LOOSE HE WAS LAUNCHED INTO AIR

Bannertail

The Story of a Gray Squirrel

By ERNEST THOMPSON SETON

Decorations by Charles Livingston Bull

was a loud crack like a heavy limb broken by the wind, and the bark beside his head was splintered by a blow that almost stunned him with its shock, although it did not touch him. He barely escaped into the nest. Yes, he still escaped.

These are among the lessons that a mother squirrel by example teaches, and that, in case of failure, are emphasized by many little reproofs of voice or even of blows:

Clean your coat and extra clean your tail; fluff it out, try its trig suppleness, wave it, plume it, comb it, clean it; but ever remember it, for it is your beauty and your life.

When there is danger on the ground, such as the trampling of heavy feet, do not go to spy it out; but hide. If near a hole, pop in; if on a big high limb lie flat and still as death. Do not go to it. Let it come to you, if it will.

In the air, if there is danger near, as from hawks, do not stop until you have at least got into a dense thicket or, better still, a hole.

If you find a nut when you are not hungry, bury it for future use. Nevertheless, this lesson counts for but little now, as all last year's nuts are gone and this year's are far ahead.

If you must travel on the ground, stop every little while at some high place to look around, and fail not then each time to fluff and jerk your tail.

When in the distant limbs you see something that may be friend or foe, keep out of sight, but flit your white tail tip in his view. If it be a graycoat, it will answer with the same, the wigwag: "I'm a squirrel too."

Learn—and practice also—the far jumps from tree to tree. You will surely need them some day. They are the only certain answer to the red-eyed fury that lives on mice, but that can kill squirrels, too, if he catches them; that climbs and jumps, but cannot jump so far as the graycoats, and dare not fall from high, for he has no plummy tail, nothing but a useless little tag.

Drink twice a day from the running stream, never from the big pond in which the grinning pike and mighty snapper lie in wait. Go not in the heat of the day, for then the black snake is lurking near, and quicker is he even than a squirrel on the ground. Go not at dusk, for then the fox and the mink are astir. Go not by night, for then is the owl on the warpath; silent as a shadow, he is far more to be feared than the swish-winged hawk. Drink then at sunrise and before sunset, and ever from a solid log or stone which affords good footing for a needed sudden jump. And remember ever that safety is in the tree tops—in this and in lying low.

These were the lessons they slowly learned, not at any stated time or place, but each when the present doings brought it in. Brownhead was quick and learned almost overfast; and his tail, responding to his daily care, was worthy of a grown-up. Lithe, graceful Nyek-nyek, too, was growing woodwise. Cray was quick for a time. He would learn well at a new lesson, then, devising some method of his own, would go ahead and break the rules. His mother's warning Quare! held him back not at all. And his father's onslaught with a nip of powerful teeth only stirred him to rebellious fight.

V

CURIOSITY may be the trail to knowledge, but it skirts a dangerous cliff. The rose moon, June, was on the hills; its thrill joy set the whole wood world joy thrilling. The Bannertail family had frolicked in a game of tag and catch all around the old hawk nest and up the long, smooth pole went Cray to show that he could do it. His mother warned him—"Quare!"—but up he went and down he came without a hint of failure.

Then they scattered scampering for a game of hide and seek, when the heavy sound of some big brute-a-coming was wind-borne to them. The mother gave the warning Chik! Three of them quickly got to the safe old nest. Silvergray flattened on the upside of a rugged limb. Cray, seeing nothing near and scoffing at their flurry, made for a big crotch into which he could sink from sight if need be, and waited. In vain his mother cried Chik! Cray wouldn't chik; he wanted to know what it was all about.

The heavy, trampling sound came near. Silvergray peeped over and could see very well; it was the two-legged brute with the yellow, yapping Four-legs that she more than once had met before. They rambled slashingly around, the yap cur eagerly wagging his tail. He swung his black snout in the air and gave out a long "yap," another and another. Then Two-legs came slowly nearer, staring up into the rooftrees and moving awkwardly sidewise, round and round the tree.

Cray peered out farther to watch him. In vain the wise little mother squirrel whispered, Chik, chik! No, he would not chik. As the ground brute circled the tree, Cray, trying to keep him in sight, quit all attempt at hiding. The yellow Four-legs yapped excitedly. Then the big ground brute held very still. Cray was amused at this; he felt so safe that he called out a derisive Grrrr!

There was a loud sound like thunder, a flash like lightning, and Cray fell headlong, splashing the gold-green leaves with his bright hot young blood.

His mother saw him go with a clutching of her mother heart. And Mother Carey saw him go and said: "It had to be." For this is the fulfilling of the law. This is the upbuilding of the race; this is the lopping of the wayward branch.

The big ground beast below seized on the quivering warm young body and yelled aloud: "Billy, Billee! I got him—a great big silvergray. Ya-hoo!"

But the meaning of that was unknown to the little mother and the rest. They only knew that a huge savage brute had killed their little brother, and was filling the woods with its hideous, blood-curdling roars.

Bannertail was now in fresh, midsummer coat of sleekest gray. His tail was a silver plume and bigger than himself. His health was perfect. And just so surely as a sick one longs to be and stay at home, so a lusty squirrel hankers to go roaming.

SWINGING from tree to tree, leaping the familiar jumps, he left the family one early morning, drank deeply at the spring brook, went on aground, "hoppity-hop" for a dozen hops, then stopped to look around and frisk his tail; then on, and again a look-around. So he left the hickory woods and swung a mile away, till at last he was on the far hillside where first he met Redhead.

High in a tasseled pine he climbed and sat, and his fine nose took in the pleasant gum smells with the zest that came from their strangeness as much as from their sweetness.

And as he sat he heard a rustling, rackety little noise in the thicket near. Flattening to the bough and tightening in his tail he watched. What should appear but his old enemy, the Redhead, dragging, struggling with something on the ground, stopping to sputter out his energetic, angry Snick, snick! as the thing he dragged caught in roots and twigs. Bannertail lay very low and watched intently. The red squirrel fussed and worked with his burden, now close at hand. Bannertail saw that it was a flat, round, red thing

(Continued on Page 178)

A Better Sweeper

Made to Do More Work and to Last Longer

Carpet sweepers may look the same—but they differ greatly. Not only in method of operation, but in strength and durability. The Bissell method is radically different from any other. It is more than four wheels, a box and a rotating brush. It alone has the famous "Cyco" Ball Bearing principle, which always allows the brush to come in correct contact with any kind of carpet, giving maximum sweeping power. And the average life of a Bissell is 10 to 15 years.

BISSELL'S "Cyco" Ball Bearing Carpet Sweeper

Now Priced as Low as $5.00

There are other models as low as $4.50. Toy sweepers 25c and up. All prices are slightly higher in West, South and Canada. Even when there is an electric cleaner, the Bissell is still indispensable—the handiest and most efficient sweeping tool ever perfected. When you think of sweeping think of Bissell's.

At dealers everywhere. Booklet on request.
BISSELL CARPET SWEEPER CO.
214 Erie St. Grand Rapids, Michigan
(West and Largest Sweeper Co. in U.S.)
Put Your Sweeping Reliance on a Bissell's Appliance

A 30-day GATES TOUR to Europe to cost you only $395

AND this sum includes all Steamship, Hotel and ordinary sightseeing expenses. Write today for the complete Gates European Tour Booklet—various tours are described costing from $395 to $950, ranging from 30 to 90 days.

Special Gates Tour Booking for 1922 Oberammergau

We have special booking arrangements for the 1922 performances of this old world religious drama to be staged from May to September. Booking outward on any of our regular sailings will permit you to see the Passion Play and visit 36 old world cities in France, Switzerland and Italy.

Gates Tours founded in 1892 have a social character that makes them particularly attractive and congenial. Apply direct or to Raymond & Whitcomb Co., Gen'l Agents in New York, Boston, Chicago, Philadelphia, Detroit and Toledo. Write today for the Gates Booklet "B-13."

All Gates Tours without extra cost include: Pass, the Airplane and the other American Bookings.

GATES TOURS—Founded 1892

"World Travel at Moderate Rates"

225 Fifth Avenue, New York
London—Paris—Rome

CANDY MAKING MADE EASY

ANYONE may learn from my book to make delicious candy for pleasure or profit. Write me today.

Margery Ricker, Dept. 4, Lynbrook, L. I., N. Y.

Wedding Invitations, Announcements, Etc.
100 or more letters, in ink, two or four colors, $1.50; 100 or more cards, $2.00. Write for catalog.

L. OTT ENGRAVING CO., 3033 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

Bannertail

(Continued from Page 177)

like an acorn cup only many times larger, and reddish, and with a big thick stem on the wrong side, a stem that was white, like new-peeled wood.

Bannertail had seen such growing in the woods, once or twice; little ones they were; but his nose and his inner guide had said "Let them alone." And here was this fiery little red squirrel dragging one off as though he had a prize.

There was a warning blue-jay note. Red-head ran up the nearest tree—as it happened, the one in which was Bannertail—and in an instant the enemies were face to face. "Scold and fight" is the red squirrel's first impulse; but when Bannertail rose up to full height and spread his wondrous tail, the red one was appalled. He knew his foe again; his keen, discriminating nose got proofs of that. The memory of defeat was with him yet. He retreated snick-sputtering, and finally went wholly out of sight.

When all was still, Bannertail made his way to the broken mushroom, rosy red and beautiful its cap, snowy white its stem and its crisp, juicy flesh. But of this he took no count. The smelling of it was his great chemic test. It had the quaint, earthy odor of the little ones he had seen before, and yet a pungent foodlike smell, like butternuts indeed, with the sharp pepper tang of the rind a little strong, and a whiff, too, of the many-legged crawling things that he had learned to shun. Still, it was alluring as food.

AND now was a crucial time, a veritable trail fork. Had Bannertail been fed and full, the tiny little sense of repulsion would have turned the scale, would have reassured and strengthened the first true verdict of his guides: "Bad, let it alone." But it had an attractive, nutlike aroma that was sweetly appetizing, that set his mouth a-watering; and this thing turned the scale—he was hungry.

He nibbled and liked it, and nibbled yet more. And though it was a big, broad mushroom, he stopped not till it all was gone. Food, good food, it surely was. But it was something more; the weird juices that are the earth child's blood entered into him and set the fountains of his life force playing with marvelous power. He was elated. He was full of fight. He flung out a defiant Qua! at a hen hawk flying over. He rummaged through the pines to find that fighting red squirrel. He leaped tree gaps that he would not at another time have dared. Yes, and he fell, too; but the ample silver plume behind was there to land him softly on the earth.

The sun was low when, feeling his elation gone, feeling dumb and drowsy indeed, he climbed the homestead tree and glided into the old hawk nest to curl in his usual place beside his family.

The next day Bannertail had no desire to move. The sun was low when at length he went forth and down at the crystal spring drank deep and drank again. Next sunup he was himself again, the big, boisterous, rollicking squirrel of the plummy tail, the playmate of the young ones, the husband of his wife. And their merry lives went on—till one morning on the bank of the creek that flowed from the high hill country he found a tiny shiny fragment of the weird, spellbinding mushroom.

HE GORGED on them. Then, sensing the red squirrels, he pursued them in a sort of berserker rage, eager for fight, desperate fight, any fight, fight without hate that would outlet his dangerous boiling power, his overflow of energy. He galloped up a mighty pine tree, on whose highest limbs were two great flickers clacking. He chased them recklessly, then clinging to a bark flake that proved loose he was launched into the air a hundred feet to fall.

Not happy was his homcoming that night. But next morning! Why should it be told? It was as before, but far worse. More than one sun arose and set before he was once more the strong, hale, hearty Bannertail, the father of his family, the companion and protector of his wife.

But big and everywhere is the All-Mother, Mother Carey, the wise one who seeks to have her strong ones build the race. Twice had she warned him. Now he should have one more chance.

The thunder moon, July, was dominating Jersey woods when the lusty life force of the father graycoat inevitably sent him roving to the woods of the madcaps. Plenty they were now, and many had been stored by the red squirrels for winter use; for this is the riddle of their being that the red squirrels long ago have learned: In the bank when they are rooted in the earth, their juices from the underworld are full of diabolic subtlety, are tempting in the mouth as they are deadly in the blood and sure destruction in the end. Uprooted, they must be carried far from the ground and the underground, and high hung in the blessed purifying pine tops where Father Sun can burn away their evil. There after long, after months of sun and wind and rain purgation, their earthborn bodies are redeemed, are wholesome squirrel food. This was the lesson Mother Carey had taught the redheads; for their country is the country of the fool-trap toadstools. But the graycoats know it not. And Bannertail came again.

THE feast was like the other, but shorter, more restrained. There were little loathsome whiffs and acrid hints that robbed it of its zest. Long before half a meal the little warden that dwells somewhere betwixt mouth and maw began to send offensive messages to his brain, and even with a bite between his teeth there set in strong a fearful, devastating revulsion, a climax of disgust, a maw revolt, an absolute loathing.

His mouth was dripping with its natural juice, something gripped his throat, the last morsel was there and seemed to stick. He tight closed his eyes, violently shook his head. The choking lump was shaken out. Pains shot through his body. Limbs and lungs were cramped. He lay flat on the bank with head downhill. He jerked his head from side to side with violent insistence. His stomach yielded most of the fateful mass. But the poison had entered into his body, already was coursing in his veins.

On the third day he was well enough to scramble up the hill; he passed a scattering group of the earthy madcaps. Oh, how he loathed them! Their very smell set his mouth a-dripping, refusing its own proper juice.

When he reached home the first impulse of Silvergray was hostility. But Bannertail flicked the white flag on his tail tip, and slowly climbed the tree. Silvergray came cautiously forward. Their whiskers met; she sniffed, smell-tested him. No question now. A little changed, a little strange, but this was surely her mate.

THE red moon of harvest came. The gray-coat family was grown and happy in the fullness of their lives, and Bannertail was hale and filled with the joy of being alive, of leading his family beyond old bounds, teaching them the ways of the farther woods, showing them new foods that the season brings. He was a wise leader now, who once had been so unwise. Then Mother Carey put him to the proof. She led him; and he led them farther than they had ever gone before, in the remotest edge of the hickory woods. On a bank half-sunlit as they scampered over the leaves and down the logs, Bannertail found a blushing, shining gnome cap, an earthborn madcap. Yes, the very same, for in this woods they came, though they were rare.

One whiff, one identifying sniff of that satanic exhalation, and Bannertail felt a horrid clutching at his throat; his lips were quickly dripping, his belly heaved, he gave a sort of spewing, gasping sound, and shrunk back from that shining cap with eyes that bugged in hate, as though he saw a snake.

And the young ones were caught by the unspoken horror of the moment; they took it in; they got the hate sense. They tied up that horror in their memories with that rank and sickly smell. They turned away. The loathing of the earthborn fiend was implanted in Bannertail's race, and through them would go on to bless his generations yet to be.

(Continued in the May Home Journal)

Use only Heisey's Glassware on your table. It is the best of its kind. Besides, its durability makes it possibly the cheapest product on the market. Any responsible dealer will confirm this statement.

A. H. HEISEY & CO.
Department L-16
Newark, Ohio

On Every Place

On Every Place

FOR THE TABLE

Know Your Eye Glass Case

WHEN your optician, optometrist or oculist supplies a Farrington Eye Glass Case you get the best that he can buy; lasts longer, looks better, opens easier, closes tighter. It's part of superior service to give

Farrington Eye Glass Cases

An Exceptional Profession for Capable Women

A Profession yielding financial returns in exact proportion to her own efforts—

A Profession offering full scope to her personality, her good taste, her ambition to secure independence—

—that is what Mrs. P. found when she joined the nation-wide group of NuBone Corsetiers. The more customary channels of women's activities were uninteresting to her and not promising of congenial work or sufficient income. As a NuBone Corsetiere, on the contrary, she employed her initiative, profited by her knack of tasteful dressing, moved in her accustomed atmosphere and found a happy, profitable outlet for her energetic spirit.

This standing as a Professional woman—this success as a business woman—both combined to enhance her social position.

She has succeeded because she recognized an opportunity peculiarly fitted to her individuality—because she took full advantage of it—and because she applied herself earnestly and with a deep sense of responsibility toward those she served. Mrs. P. now is financially independent—and happy.

Would not this Profession, with its promise of independence and financial success, appeal to you?

The NuBone Corsetiere individually measures and fits what hundreds of thousands of women proclaim the most comfortable, the smartest corset in the world—she renders this individual service in her customer's own home.

Write us immediately. Tell us as much about yourself, your plans and aspirations as you will—everything that will help us to judge whether you may expect to be successful in a NuBone Corsetiere. Perhaps you, too, can achieve financial independence, comfort and happiness in greater measure. The prestige of the NuBone Corset; the greatness of the NuBone Company, and our practical help will support your effort. Don't delay—write us that letter today.

NuBone Corset Company

Dept. G. P., 28th at Ash Street, Erie, Pa.
Corry, Pa. Erie, Pa. Los Angeles, Cal.

For sixty years
the one best glycerine soap

THE bath room or wash room which contains a cake of No. 4711 White Rose Glycerine Soap is made luxurious by that one touch alone! Such a delightful sensation of mildness in its use! Such richness of purifying, creamy lather! Such a faint, agreeable perfume! No wonder this soap is found wherever particular people make their ablutions. Take a cake home today, in a box. Your favorite shop has it.

No. 4711 White Rose Glycerine Soap

You will also enjoy the use of:

No. 4711 Eau de Cologne—the genuine old-fashioned Cologne water, made the same since 1792—and

No. 4711 Bath Salts—which come in seven exquisite perfumes. Nothing like these Salts for softening the water and exhilarating the bather!

MULHENS & KROPPF, Inc.
Made in U. S. A.

25 W. 45th St. New York

Automatic Rapid Electric Cook Stove

EASIEST method known to prepare family meals. Saves 50% to 75% fuel cost—saves time, labor. Inexpensive better prepared, more tasty food. Gives every facility of electric cooking plus every convenience of best cookstove at lowest cost—just a good all-around.

New Invention

Revolutionizes Cooking. Bakes, roasts, boils, steams, fries, broils, boils. No oil, no grease, no fat. Shifts from oil to electric cooking. No special wiring. No gas. No fire. FREE trial offer. Can be left in place and special instructions, direct factory prices, sent name and address.

WM. CAMPBELL, CO.
Dept. 13 Detroit, Mich.

The Unspeakable Gentleman

(Continued from Page 23)

My father, frowning slightly, rubbed his thumb along his sword blade. "Forgive me if you can," he said. "I have often feared my manners would fail me sometime."

She looked up at him then, and her eyes were very bright. "Suppose," she said softly, "I told you there was nothing to forgive. Suppose I said—"

My father, bowing his lowest, politely and rather hastily interrupted. "Mademoiselle would be too kind. She would have forgotten that it is quite impossible."

"No," said mademoiselle, shaking her head slowly. "It is not impossible. You should have known better than to say that. Suppose"—her voice choked a little, as though the words hurt her—"suppose I bade you recall, captain, what you said on the stairs at Blangy, when they were at the door and you were going to meet them. Do you remember?"

MY FATHER smiled and made a polite little gesture of assumed despair. Then his voice, very slow and cool, broke in on her speech and stilled it. "Good heaven, mademoiselle, one cannot remember everything." Playing with the hilt of his sword, he stepped nearer, still smiling, still watching her with a polished curiosity. "I have said so many little things to women in my time, so many little nothings. It is hard to remember them all. Your pardon, my lady, but I have forgotten, forgotten so completely that even the stairs seem merely a gentle blur."

And he pressed his hand over his brow and sighed, while he watched her face flush crimson.

"You lie!" she cried. "You have not forgotten." My father ceased to smile.

"And suppose I have not," he said. "What is it to mademoiselle? What are the words of a ruined man, the idle speech of a fool who fancied he would sup that night in paradise, and what use is it to recall them now? Is it possible you believe I am touched by such trivial matters? Because everyone had done what you wish, do you think I shall also? Do you think you can make me give up the paper as though I were a slithering, romantic fool in Paris? Do you think I have gone this far to turn back? Mademoiselle seems to forget that I have the game in my own hands. It would be a foolish thing to throw it all away, even"—he paused and bowed again—"even for you, mademoiselle. I have arrived where I am to-day only for one reason. Can you not guess it? It was a pleasure to take you from Blangy. It is business now, and they cannot be combined."

"LISTEN, mademoiselle," he continued. "Not three miles off the harbor mouth is a French ship tacking back and forth, and not entirely for pleasure. Around this house at present are enough men to run your estates at Blangy. A sloop came into the harbor this morning and has landed its crew for my special benefit. A dozen of Napoleon's agents are waiting to spring at my throat. I have succeeded so that there is not a man in town who would not be glad to see me on a yardarm. And yet they are waiting, mademoiselle. Is it not amusing? Can you guess why they are waiting?"

He took a pinch of snuff and dusted his fingers. "Because they fear that I may burn the paper if they disturb me. They believe if they keep hidden, if I do not suspect, that I may venture forth. They hope to take me alive or kill me and still obtain the paper. Indeed it is their one hope. It would be a pity to disappoint them."

His lips had parted, and his eyes were shining in the candlelight. "There are few things which move me now, my lady. All that I really enjoy is an amusing situation, and this one is very amusing. Do you think I have crossed the ocean to deliver this document, and then I shall stop? No, mademoiselle, you are mistaken."

He bowed again and stepped backward towards the door. "Pray do likewise, mademoiselle, and forget," he said. "There is nothing in this little episode fit for you to remember. It is not you they are after, and you will be quite safe here. I have made sure of that. My son will remain until your brother arrives and will dispense what hospitality you require. I trust," he added, turning to me, "you still remember why you have been here?"

"Indeed, yes," I answered.

"Then it is good-by, Henry. I shall not bother to offer you my hand. Brutus, you will remain here with my son until a quarter to seven."

EVEN now I cannot tell what made a mist come over my eyes and a lump rise in my throat any more than I can explain my subsequent actions on that evening. Was it possible I was sorry to see the last of him? Or was it simply self-pity that shortened my breath and made my voice seem broken and discordant?

"And after that?" I asked.

He looked at me appraisingly, tapping his thin fingers on his sword hilt. "After that"—he stared thoughtfully at the shadows of the darkened room. Was he thinking, as I was, of the wasted years and what the end would be? "After that"—he repeated half to himself, "come, I will make an appointment with you after that—on the other side of the Styx, my son. I shall be waiting there, I promise you, and we shall drink some corked ambrosia—and then perhaps you shall tell me what happened—after that. I shall look forward—I shall hope, even, that it may be pleasant. Good-by, my son."

I think he had often planned that leave-taking. Surely it must have satisfied him.

VIII

HE WAS gone, and mademoiselle and I were left staring at the black rectangle of the broken door. I drew a deep breath and looked about me. Slowly my mind seemed to free itself from a hundred illusions and to move along more logical paths. Brutus went to the arms rack in the corner and selected a rusted cutlass from the small arms that still rested there, thrust it at me playfully and grinned.

For a minute, or even more, the single log that was still burning in the fireplace hissed drowsily, and I could bear the vices tapping gently on the windows.

Then I heard a pistol shot, followed by a hoarse cry. Mademoiselle started to her feet and then sank back in her chair again, and from where I was standing I could see that her face was white and her hands were trembling. So she loved him. My hand gripped hard against the back of a chair. Why should I have hoped she did not?

"Heaven!" she gasped. "I have killed him."

"You!" I exclaimed; but I do not think she heard me.

"Hub!" said Brutus, and his grin grew broader. "Monsieur's pistol. He kill him."

"Indeed," I said; "and whom did he kill, Brutus?"

Brutus cocked his head to one side and listened. Somewhere beyond came a confusion of shouts and the thudding of horses' hoofs. "He kill Mr. Jason Hill," said Brutus.

"Are you sure?" mademoiselle demanded sharply.

Brutus nodded.

The dull, fixed look went out of her eyes and slowly a touch of color returned to her cheeks. And then there was a clamor of voices and a tramp of feet and a crash on the door outside.

Brutus looked about him in wild indecision.

(Continued on Page 180)

Sani-Flush

Cleans Closet Bowls Without Scouring

Always keep Sani-Flush on hand and have a closet bowl that always looks like new—a bowl and trap so clean that odors are eliminated and disinfectants unnecessary.

Just a little Sani-Flush sprinkled into the bowl according to directions, and flushed out, will eliminate all the work and the danger involved in other methods requiring mops, pails and acids.

Sani-Flush will positively not injure bowl or connections. Keep it handy in your bathroom.

Sani-Flush is sold at grocery, drug, hardware, plumbing and home-furnishing stores. If you cannot buy it locally at once, send 25c in coin or stamps for a full sized can, postpaid. (Canadian price, 35c; foreign price, 50c.)

THE HYGIENIC PRODUCTS CO.

Canton, Ohio

Canadian Agents

Harold F. Ritchie & Co., Ltd., Toronto

The Old Way and the New

The old way of cleaning, dusting and polishing hardwood floors and woodwork means hard, back breaking work.

The New Way—the O-Cedar Way—means a pleasant task. A saving of time, work and money and much more satisfactory results.

With the O-Cedar Polish Mop you clean, dust, polish and beautify all at one—the same time. You banish work, dust, care and trouble.

Your dealer guarantees the genuine O-Cedar Polish Mop.

Charnell Chemical Co., Chicago, Toronto, London, Paris

SALAD SECRETS

100 recipes—Brief but complete. 15c by mail. 100 Measless recipes 15c. 30 Sandwich recipes 15c. All three 30c.

B. A. BRIGGS, 250 Madison St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

Wedding Invitations & Announcements Engraved in the very latest styles. Write for samples. VIRGINIA STATIONERY CO. RICHMOND, VA.

MENDEL TRUNK

DUST-PROOF WARP-PROOF

The Easter Parade on the Board Walk

Many of the splendid gowns that make the Easter parade at Atlantic City the country's greatest style show, travel under the protection of Mendel Dustproof Wardrobe Trunk. The capacity is unusually large for the trunk dimensions—arranged for compact, but wrinkle-proof packing, and thoroughly Dustproof.

Locking arrangements are easily operated and extraordinarily secure.

Write for brochure and the name of nearest dealer.

THE MENDEL-DRUCKER CO.
Dept. A, Cincinnati, Ohio

Look for the Dust-proof, warp-proof moulding on the trunk you buy.

Window drapings set off to charming advantage by Kirsch Curtain Rods. They hang smoothly and evenly with headings erect.

The ends are pleasingly curved and permit draping to the casings; no side light spoils the effect.

Kirsch Curtain Rods

Flat in Shape—No Sag, Rust, Tarnish

Because of the special Kirsch flat construction, Kirsch Curtain Rods combine grace with strength and sturdiness—easiest to put up—never come down accidentally. Beautiful white or velvet brass finish stays like new for years. With ordinary care, a permanent fixture.

With a Kirsch single, double or triple curtain rod, you can fit any window—produce any window draping effect. Extension style or cut-to-fit. Sold by better dealers everywhere.

This Booklet Yours—For the Asking

Bigger and better than ever—devotes a few pages to Kirsch Flat Rods and other Kirsch Products, but mostly pictures attractive windows for every room, and suggests materials, color schemes, etc. Gladly mailed free on receipt of request.

KIRSCH MFG. COMPANY

111 Prospect Ave. Sturgis, Mich., U. S. A.

Kirsch Mfg. Co., of Canada, Ltd., 550 Tecumseh St., Woodstock, Ont.

Remember to ask for Kirsch

The Original Flat Curtain Rod

The Unspeakable Gentleman

(Continued from Page 179)

"We have callers," I observed. "Who are they, Brutus?"

Brutus, however, had forgotten me and had sprung into the hall. At almost the same instant someone must have discovered that the door was unlocked, for a sudden draft eddied through the passage. Then there was a confused babel of voices, to which I did not listen. I was busy swinging up the sash of the nearest window.

"Quickly, mademoiselle," I whispered.

SOMEONE shouted a curse from the hall and cried: "There's another of 'em." And there came the crack of a pistol that echoed loudly in the passage.

"It is time we were going," I said. "Out of the window, mademoiselle." In my haste I almost pushed her from the sill to the lawn and was leaning towards her. "Mademoiselle, listen! The stables are straight to the left. Can you saddle a horse?"

She nodded.

"The first stall to the right. I shall be there in an instant." For I remembered my sword and sprang back into the room to get it.

"Get that man!" someone was shouting. "In after him, you fools. Don't shoot in the dark."

I had a glimpse of Brutus darting through the passage and making a leap for the stairs. Then there was a crash of glass.

"Begad!" came a hoarse voice. "He's jumped clean through the window!" And another pistol exploded from the landing above me.

"Five hundred dollars for the man who gets him." I could swear I had heard the voice before. "Curse it, don't let him go! Out the door, all of you. Out the door!"

There was a rush of feet through the passage. I had a glimpse of men running past, and then I was half out the window.

"Stop!" someone shouted.

I took a hasty glance behind me, to find that my Uncle Jason had entered the morning room, his clothing torn and disarranged, the good nature erased from his face, and a gash on his left cheek that still was bleeding.

"Stop," he shouted again, "or I fire!"

THEN I was out on the lawn with the cool air from the river on my face, and running for the stable. Mademoiselle had bridled the horse and was swinging the saddle on him when I reached the stable's shadow. I could hear my uncle shouting for assistance as I tightened the girths, but Brutus must have led his men a very pretty chase.

I mounted unmolested, as I somehow knew I should, and helped her up behind me. Somehow with that first crash on our front door I knew that the game had turned. I knew that nothing would stop me. An odd sense of exaltation came over me, and with it a strange desire to laugh. It would be amusing enough when I met my father, but I wondered—I wondered as I clapped my heels into my horse's flanks.

What had my uncle to do in this affair?

The autumn light was fading out of the sky. Thick, heavy mists were rolling in chill and heavy from the river and leveling the hollow places in the land. The shapes around us were fast losing their distinctiveness. And it seems to me that I never knew the air to seem more fresh and sweet.

We had broken into a sharp gallop down the rutted lane. We swerved to the left and were thudding down the level road, when an exclamation from mademoiselle made me turn in my saddle. My look must have been a somewhat blank interrogation, for mademoiselle was laughing.

"To think," she cried, "I should have said you resembled your mother! Where are we going, monsieur?"

But I think she knew without my answering, for she laughed again. It was pleasant to feel the bite of the salt wind and to see the trees and the rocks by the roadside slip past us. I knew the road well enough, which was fortunate, even when we turned off over a track that was hardly as good as a foot path. Once on the path, the farm was not half a mile distant, just behind a ridge of rocks that was studded by a stunted undergrowth of wind-beaten oak.

I knew the place. I could already picture the gaping, black windows, the broken, sagging ridgepole and the crumbling chimney. It was not strange that its owners had left it, for I can imagine no more mournful or desolate spot. Our own house, three miles away, was its nearest neighbor. Around it was nothing except sogged meadows that scarcely rose above the salt marshes that ran to the dunes where the Atlantic was beating.

"IT WAS good of you to take me with you," said mademoiselle.

"Surely, mademoiselle," I replied, "you did not think that I would leave you?"

"I should if I had been you," she answered. "I was rude to you, monsieur, and unjust to you this morning. You see, I did not know."

"You did not know?"

"That the son would be as brave and as resourceful as the father. You are, monsieur, and yet you are different."

"Yes," I said.

"And I am glad—glad," said mademoiselle.

"And I am sorry you are glad," I said.

"You are sorry?"

"Perhaps, mademoiselle," I replied with a tinge of bitterness, "if I had seen more of the world, if my clothes were in better taste and my manners less abrupt, you would feel differently. I wonder. But let us be silent, for we are almost there." Somehow I feared we might be too late.

At a turn off the path I reined up and listened. It was very still. Already the light had gone out of the sky, and little was left of the land about us, save varying tones of black. Had he gone? I cautiously dismounted. In a minute we would see. In a minute—then mademoiselle interrupted me.

"We are there?" she inquired.

"Softly, mademoiselle," I cautioned her; "if you will dismount you can see the place. It is not three hundred feet beyond the thicket. So! If you will hold the horse's head I shall go forward."

I DID not listen to any objection, but slipped hastily through the trees. As the ugly mass of the house took a more certain shape I felt my pulse beat more rapidly, and not entirely through elation. Even to-day when I look at a place that men have built and then abandoned something of the same feeling comes over me, but not so strongly as it did that evening. It was another matter that made me hesitate. From the shadow of the doorway I heard a sound too much like the raising of a pistol hammer not to make me remember that a sword was all I carried.

"There is no need to cock that pistol," I said in a tone which I hoped sounded more confident than my state of mind. I halted, but there was no answer and no further sound.

(Continued on Page 182)

"We are there?" she inquired.

"Softly, mademoiselle," I cautioned her; "if you will dismount you can see the place. It is not three hundred feet beyond the thicket. So! If you will hold the horse's head I shall go forward."

I DID not listen to any objection, but slipped hastily through the trees. As the ugly mass of the house took a more certain shape I felt my pulse beat more rapidly, and not entirely through elation. Even to-day when I look at a place that men have built and then abandoned something of the same feeling comes over me, but not so strongly as it did that evening. It was another matter that made me hesitate. From the shadow of the doorway I heard a sound too much like the raising of a pistol hammer not to make me remember that a sword was all I carried.

"There is no need to cock that pistol," I said in a tone which I hoped sounded more confident than my state of mind. I halted, but there was no answer and no further sound.

Old English Wax

"Finished in an hour—
and this floor is polished for a lifetime!"

Given Away!

A can of Old English Wax will be given away with every Old English Waxer-Polisher. This new time- and labor-saving device both applies the wax and polishes the floor. It's a great improvement over any weighted brush, because with it you can polish just as well and wax the floor besides, as easily as running a carpet-sweeper. It lasts a lifetime. If your dealer can't supply you, take advantage of our short-time offer. Just mail the coupon below.

Quickly, as you wax and polish your floors, they take on a rich, velvety lustre—not a temporary polish, but a hard finish that will not show heel-marks and scratches, that will last a lifetime with just a little care.

"Touch up" now and then the places most used—that's all you need to do. From first to last, waxing and polishing floors with Old English Wax is surprisingly easy! You needn't wait days to use the room; you can walk on a waxed floor at once.

The new, easy way

Anyone who can run a carpet-sweeper can both wax and polish floors with the Old English Waxer-Polisher shown here. It's the new, easy way. Of course a soft cloth will do; but the Waxer-Polisher is much quicker and easier. It saves wax, too.

The inexpensive floor finish

Because Old English Wax contains more hard, high-grade, imported wax it goes farther, lasts longer, and costs less. Old English Wax costs about one-third of most other finishes. It is the ideal finish for the floors in any home, however simple or magnificent.

Wax just one floor

Try it. See for yourself the permanent beauty Old English Wax gives all your floors—whether they're unfinished hardwood or softwood, varnished or shellaced—as well as your woodwork and furniture.

For dancing

Just sprinkle Old English Powdered Wax lightly over the floor—the feet of the dancers put on the polish.

THE A. S. BOYLE COMPANY, 1029 Dana Avenue, Cincinnati, Ohio
Canadian Factory: Toronto

How to Clean Your Floors

Old English Brightener is the ideal cleaner for your floors—waxed, varnished or shellaced—and for your woodwork and furniture. It is the preparation that cleans perfectly without injuring the finish. It leaves a light film of wax that polishes beautifully, protects against wear, and makes the finish last twice as long. Keeps linoleum pliable and protects the surface. Old English Brightener contains no oil, so it will not collect dust, discolor the wood, or soil your rugs.

Mail Coupon for FREE Book

Into this book we've condensed expert advice based on our experience of more than a quarter of a century to help you in finishing your floors, woodwork, furniture, linoleum, etc.

Get Old English products at your paint, hardware, drug, housefurnishing or department store. Or write us direct. At least mail the coupon for the free book.

THE A. S. BOYLE COMPANY, 1029 DANA AVENUE, CINCINNATI, OHIO

- ☐ Send me your free book, "Beautiful Floors, Woodwork and Furniture—Their Finish and Care."
☐ Send me, all charges paid, an Old English Waxer-Polisher at the special time-limited price, $3.50 (Denver and West, $4.00), which I enclose.

Name _____

Address _____

OMO Dress Shields

Cleanly and Comfortable

FOR the light gowns of Spring and Summer, OMO Dress Shields provide perfect protection and comfort.

They are designed to be invisible with the sheerest dresses, and may be washed regularly without losing their shape.

61 shapes and sizes to choose from at the Notion Counters.

THE OMO MANUFACTURING CO.
Main Office and Factory
Middletown, Conn.

When Coffee "breaks jail"

From the thousands of tiny cells in every grain of roasted coffee, the rich coffee oils are ready to escape. Grind the coffee, and out they come! The grinding frees them. That's why you should grind your own coffee, as needed, with

ARCADE CRYSTAL COFFEE MILL

Then the goodness of the coffee goes into your cup instead of escaping into the air as it always must from store-ground coffee.

The Crystal Mill keeps your coffee crisp and fresh in its air-tight container, up on the wall, out of your way, but always ready to grind. Adjustable to any degree of fineness, and measures as you grind. Sold by all dealers. Send postal for our free folder, "How to Make Coffee."

ARCADE MFG. CO.
Freeport, Ill.

Maternity

LANE BRYANT Maternity Clothes enable you to dress stylishly during all stages of maternity—and after baby comes, as well. Very latest modes, cleverly designed to conceal condition. Patented adjustments provide expansion.

Style Book FREE

76-page Style Book, picturing latest styles in Maternity Coats, Suits, Dresses, Skirts, Corsets. Write today.

Lane Bryant New York

The Unspeakable Gentleman

(Continued from Page 180)

"I said," I repeated, raising my voice, "there is no need to cock that pistol. It is a friend of Captain Shelton who is speaking."

"So," said a voice in careful, precise English. "Walk three paces forward if you please, and slowly, v-e-r-y slowly. Now. You are a friend of the captain?"

"In a sense," I replied. "I am his son. I have come to you with a message."

"So," said the voice again, and I saw that a man was seated before me on the stone that had served as a doorstep, a man who was balancing a pistol in the palm of his hand. "I fear I have been rude," he said, "but I find this place—what shall I say?—annoying. Your voices are alike, and I know he has a son. You say you bring a message?"

I HAD thought what to say. "It is about the paper," I began. "The captain was to bring it to you here, and now he finds he cannot."

"Cannot?" he said, with the rising inflection of another language than ours.

"Rather," I corrected myself hastily, "he finds it more expedient to meet you elsewhere."

"Ah," he said, "that is better. For a moment I feared the captain was dead. So the paper—he still has it?"

"He not only has it," I said, "but he is ready to give it to you—at another place he has named. You are a stranger to the country here?"

"Absolute!" the man replied. "Do you take me for a native of these sink holes? Heaven! Does your mud so completely cover me? But surely it must be this cursed darkness, or you would have said differently. Where is this other place?"

I pointed to the left of the trees where mademoiselle was standing. "I quite understand," I said politely, "even a day with this paper is quite enough. You see where I point? Simply follow that field in that direction for half a mile perhaps, and you will come to a road. Turn to your right, and after three miles you will see a house, the first house you will meet, in fact. You can reach it quite easily. It has a gambrel roof and overlooks the river. Simply knock on the door so—one knock, a pause, and three in succession. It will be understood. You have a horse?"

"What is left of him," he replied; "though only heaven knows how he has carried me along this far. Well, we are off, and may the paper stay still till we get it. You wait here?"

"In case we are followed," I said.

HE POINTED straight before him. "I have been hearing noises over there, breaking of branches and shouts."

"Then in the name of heaven ride on," I said, and added as an afterthought, "and turn out to the side if you see anyone coming."

The pleasure I took in seeing him leave was not entirely unalloyed. As I walked to the oak thicket where mademoiselle was waiting I even had some vague idea of calling him back, for I do not believe in doing anyone a turn that is worse than necessary. Yet there was only one other way I could think of to keep him silent besides sending him where he was going. She was feeding the horse handfuls of grass.

"It is quite all right, mademoiselle," I said. "Let us move to the house. It may be more comfortable in the doorway."

We stood silently for a while, listening to the wind and the dull, monotonous roar of the surf, while the night grew blacker. "Tell me, monsieur," said mademoiselle, "what sort of woman was your mother?"

"She was very beautiful," I said.

She sighed. "And very proud," said mademoiselle. "Why did she call him a thief?"

But I did not answer.

"You are certain your father is coming?" she asked finally.

"I think there is no doubt," I told her. "I have seen him ride. It would take more than a dozen men to lay hands on him. Listen, mademoiselle! I believe you can hear him now."

For a minute we listened in silence, and then on the wind I heard more distinctly still the regular thud of a galloping horse. So he was coming, as I knew he would. I knew he would be methodical and accurate.

"Yes, mademoiselle," I continued, "my father has many accomplishments, but this time even he may be surprised. Who knows, mademoiselle? Pray step back inside the doorway until I call you."

But she did not move. "No," said mademoiselle, "I prefer to stay where I am. I have seen too much of you and your father to leave you alone together."

"But surely, mademoiselle," I protested, "you forget why we have come."

"YES," she answered quickly, "you are right. I do forget. I have seen too much of this, too much of utter useless folly, too many men dying, too many suffering for a hopeless cause. I have seen three men lying dead in our hall and as many more wounded. I have seen a strong man turned into a black-guard. I have seen a son turned against his father, and all for a bit of paper which should never have been written. I hate it—do you hear me?—and if I forget it, it is because I choose. I forget it because—"

She seemed about to tell me more, and then to think better of it. "Surely you see you cannot. He is your father, monsieur, the man who is coming here."

"Mademoiselle," I replied, "you are far too kind. I hardly think he or I have much reason to hold our lives of any particular value, but as you have said, my father was a gentleman once, and gentlemen very seldom kill their sons, or sons their fathers. Pray rest assured, mademoiselle, it will be a quiet interview. I beg you be silent, for he is almost here."

I was not mistaken. A horse was on the path we followed, running hard and crashing recklessly through the bushes.

Before I had sight of him I heard my father's voice. "Ives!" he called sharply. "Where are you?"

And in an instant he was at the door, his horse breathing in hard, sobbing breaths, and he had swung from the saddle as I went forward to meet him.

"Here," he said, "take it and be off."

There he was, half a pace away, and yet he did not know me. On the wind, far off still, but nevertheless distinct, was the sound of voices. "It is time we were going," said my father. "I only gave them the slip five minutes back. It was closer work than I had expected." And then he looked at me intently through the darkness. "How did you get here?" he demanded.

THAT was all. He never even started. His hand still rested tranquilly on the reins and he still half faced me. Had it been so on that other night long ago, when his world crumbled to ruins about him? Did he always win and lose with the same passive acquiescence? Did nothing ever astonish him? There was a moment's silence, and I felt his eyes on me and suddenly became cautious. I knew he would not let it finish in such a manner, but what could he do? The game was in my hands.

"Quite simply," I told him. "My horse was in the stable." When he spoke again his voice was still pleasantly conversational. "And Brutus?" he asked. "Where was Brutus? Surely the age of miracles is past. Or do I see before me"—he bowed with all his old courtesy—"another David?"

(Continued on Page 183)

Corns Lift Right Off

Drop a little "Freezone" on a touchy corn or callus for a few nights. Instantly it stops aching, then shortly you lift it right off. Doesn't hurt a bit.

You can lift off every hard corn, soft corn, corn between the toes, and the "hard-skin" calluses on bottom of feet. Just get a bottle of "Freezone" at any drug store, anywhere.

Edward Wesley and Co., Cincinnati, O.

Drumfire Dishwasher

While the Drumfire is washing the china, silver and glass, you use the same water as it comes out at its spout on pots, skillets and pans. The Drumfire works on a new principle—

"It shoots off the grease!"

The work is all done in a jiffy. It washes vegetables also. Housewives sing its praises just as we do. See it perform. It costs only $45. Partial payments arranged if desired. We are so sure you will like it that we give you a 10-day free trial in your own kitchen. Write direct to our factory.

The Dietz Manufacturing Co.,
Dept. A-4, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Good territory open to high grade women to act as our representatives.

GIVEN: To introduce our embroidered Fancy Goods dresser scarfs, pillow cases, towels and bed spreads, we will send the PIN CUSHION COVER as illustrated, embroidered in fast color lustrous yarn upon receipt of 10c to cover cost of postage and packing. State color—white, blue, rose or gold.

AGENTS WANTED: Earn $3 to $10 per day. Must have $25 capital for our money back guarantee plan. Write for particulars.

Walter H. Hildebrand & Co., 932-36 North Ave., CHICAGO

CONSOLATION THE BOOK OF COMFORT

New and original gift for your bereaved friend. Unusual selection of masterpieces from famous writers. Cherished long after flowers have faded. $2.00 postpaid. Send to

A. B. Lipscomb, Publisher, Box 814, Nashville, Tenn.

Digitized by Google

OAK FLOORS

(For Everlasting Economy)

Now Cost 71% Less Than a Year Ago

The highest plain grade of Oak Flooring for a room 14 x 14 feet may be purchased in most localities for $20 to $30. You often pay more for a lamp or a chair. But no amount of costly furnishings can give the effect of quiet elegance that goes with an Oak Floor. Dustless, sanitary, easy to clean, with a beauty that improves with the years—Oak Flooring is almost demanded by modern standards of living.

New Floors Over Old

A 3/4 of an inch thickness is made especially for laying over old floors. Costs even less, as the old floor makes the sub-floor.

Ask any dealer for figures, and write for three FREE booklets, in colors.

OAK FLOORING MERCAISON
1053 Ashland Block, Chicago, Ill.

pet BLOOMERS

THE special design of "pet" bloomers in-creased length through seat and hips, without binding. Wearers like them for the comfortable and trim fit, and the high-grade fabrics and making, which mean economy through longer wear. Ask for "pet" next time. In desirable fabrics for Spring and Summer.

The Pet
Garment Co.
Bryan, Ohio

Free on request—illustrated booklet of "pet" Skirts, "pet-a-letts" and Bloomers

PLAN YOUR FUTURE HOME NOW

Send for Stillwell Building Books with Economy Plans

of new California Styles suitable for any climate. Famous for comfort and beauty.
"Representative Cal. Homes" $5.00 (includes 7 to 10 Rooms)—$1.
"The New Colonials" $5.00 (includes 6 to 10 Rooms)—$1.
"West Coast Bungalows" $5.00 (includes 3-4-5 Rooms)—$1.
"Little Bungalows" $5.00 (includes 3-4-5 Rooms)—$1.
SPECIAL OFFER: Send $2.50 for any three of these books and a Garage Folder FREE.
Money back if not satisfied.

W. STILLWELL & CO., Architects, 750 Calif. Bldg., Los Angeles

Try This New Cream

If you are troubled with superfluous hair you must avoid creams which might tend to stimulate the growth. My Superior Massage & Cleansing Cream, delightfully cooling, is guaranteed to contain no ingredients that stimulate hair growth. At your dealer's or by mail, 60c. Write for FREE BOOK "Beauty's Greatest Secret," or step in to see me.

MADAME BERTHE—Specialist with JEAN JORDEAU Inc.
Dept. 2A 542 Fifth Avenue (46th St.), New York

The Unspeakable Gentleman

(Continued from Page 182)

"Brutus," I replied, "jumped through a second-story window."

"Indeed?" he said. "He always was most agile."

"He was," I replied. "Not five minutes after you left, Uncle Jason arrived."

My father removed his hand from the reins and looped them through his arm. "Indeed?" he said. "He came in heels first, I trust?"

"No," I said; "he is alive and well."

"The deuce!" said my father, and sighed. "I am growing old, my son. I know my horse spoiled my aim, and yet the man fell and I rode over him."

I had hoped to be finished with your Uncle Jason. You say he entered the house?"

"And told me to stop," I said.

"And you did not?"

"No," I replied. "I succeeded in getting out of a window also."

And then, although I could not see him, I knew he had undergone a change, and I knew that I was facing a different man. His hand fell on my shoulder and, to my surprise, it was trembling. "Do you mean to tell me," he cried, in a voice that was suddenly harsh and forbidding, "you left mademoiselle and never struck a blow? You left her there?"

"Not entirely," I replied.

MY FATHER became very gentle. "Will you be done with this?" he said. "The lady, where is she now?" And then half to himself he added: "How was I to know they would break in the house after I had gone?"

"Mademoiselle," I replied, "is not fifteen feet away."

His hand went up to the clasp of his cloak, and again his voice became pleasantly conversational. "Ah, that is better," said my father. "And so you got the paper after all. Yes, I am growing old, my son. I appear to have bungled badly. Do you hope to keep the paper?"

In the distance I heard a voice again raised in a shout. Surely he understood.

"They are coming," I said. "Yes, I intend to keep the paper."

"Indeed?" said my father. "Perhaps you will explain how, my son. I have had an active evening, but you—I confess you go quite ahead of me."

"Because," I said, "you are not anxious to go back to France, father, and you are almost on your way there."

"No, not to France," he answered, and I knew he saw my meaning.

"And yet they are coming to take you. If you so much as offer to touch me again I shall call them, father, and we shall go back together. Your horse is tired. He cannot go much farther." He was silent for a moment, and I prudently stepped back.

"You might shoot me, of course," I added, "but a pistol shot would be equally good. Listen! I can hear them on the road."

HE SIGHED and smoothed his cloak thoughtfully. "I fear that I have become quite hopeless. As you say, if I fire a pistol they will come, and now I can hardly see any reason to keep them away. Can it be that I have failed in everything? Strange how the cards fall even if we stack the deck. Ah, well, then it is the pistols after all." There was a blinding flash and the roar of a weapon close beside me, and I heard mademoiselle scream. My father turned to quiet his horse. "Do not be alarmed, mademoiselle," he said gently; "we are not killing each other. I am merely using a somewhat rigorous method of bringing my son to his senses."

He paused, reached under his cloak, drew a second pistol and fired again. From the road there came a sound that seemed to ring pleasantly to my father's ears.

"Nearer than I thought," he said brightly. "They should be here in three minutes. Shall we sit a while and talk, my son?"

He threw his bridle over his arm and was walking toward the doorstep, lightly buoyant, as though some weight were lifted from his mind.

Hastily I seized his arm. "Stop!" I cried. "What is to become of mademoiselle? We cannot leave her here like this."

Then for the first time he laughed, and his laughter, genuine and carefree, gave me a start which the sound of his pistol had not. The incongruity of it set my nerves on edge. Was there nothing that would give him genuine concern? "Good heaven, sir," I shouted furiously, "there's nothing to laugh about. Don't you hear them coming?"

"Ah," said my father, "I thought that would fetch you. So you have come to your senses then, and we can go on together? Untie your horse while I charge the pistols."

My hand was on the bridle rein when a shout close by us made me loosen the knot more quickly than I intended. I could make out the black form of a horseman moving toward us at full gallop.

"It must be Lawton," observed my father evenly. "He is well mounted and quite reckless. I suppose we had better be going. I shall help mademoiselle if she will permit. No, it is not Lawton. I am sorry." He raised his arm and fired. My horse started at the sound of his shot, and as I tried to quiet him I saw my father lift mademoiselle to the saddle.

"Yes," he said again, "I think it is time to be going. The tide is out, and we can manage the marsh."

"The marsh?" I exclaimed.

"Quite," he replied tranquilly. "If Brutus is alive he will have a boat near the dunes opposite. It seems as though we might be obliged to take an ocean voyage."

IT SEEMED to me he had gone quite mad. The marsh, he knew as well as I, was as full of holes as a piece of cheese. Even in the daytime one could hardly ride across it. And then I knew that what he said was true, that he would stop at nothing; and suddenly a fear came over me. For the first time I feared the quiet, pleasant man who rode beside my bridle rein as though we were traversing the main street of our town.

I put my horse over a ditch, and straight ahead. I may have ridden four hundred yards with the even beating of his horse behind me before what I feared happened. My horse stumbled, and the pull of my bridle barely got him up again. I gave him the spur, but he was failing. In a quarter of a minute he had fallen again, and this time the bridle did not raise him. I sprang free of him before he had entirely slipped down in the soft sea mud. He was lashing about desperately.

My father reined up beside me and dismounted. "His leg is broken," he said. "It is inopportune. Ah, they are still after us." And he turned to look behind him.

"Why are you waiting?" I cried. "Ride on, sir."

"And leave you here with the paper in your pocket?" said my father. "The fall has quite got the better of you. The other pistol, mademoiselle, if you have finished loading it. Here they come, to be sure. Would you not think the fools would realize I can hit them?"

He fired into the darkness and a riderless horse ran almost on top of us. With a snort of fright, he reared and wheeled, and a second shot answered my father's.

"Ah," said my father, "they always will shoot before they can see. The pistol from the holster, if you please, mademoiselle."

THEY had not realized we had halted, for the last rider charged past us before he could check himself. I had a glimpse of his face, white against the night, and I saw him tug furiously at his bit—an unfortunate matter, so it happened, for the footing beneath the marsh grass was bad and his horse slewed and fell on top of him.

"Pah!" exclaimed my father. "It is almost sad to watch them. Let us go, Henry. He is knocked even more senseless than he was before. Keep the saddle, mademoiselle,

(Continued on Page 185)

This new range is a wonder for cooking

Bakes Bread, Pies, Biscuits
Broils, Roasts, and Cooks
Nine Different Vegetables
All At One Time.

Although it is less than four feet long it can do every kind of cooking by gas in warm weather, or by coal or wood when the kitchen needs heating. The beautiful new pearl grey porcelain enamel is quickly cleaned with a damp cloth.

Gold Medal Glenwood

Note the two gas ovens above—one for broiling and one for baking, with new Thermolator oven heat control. The large oven below has the Indicator and is heated by coal or wood. See the cooking surface when you want to rush things—five burners for gas and four covers for coal. It "Makes Cooking Easy."

Write for handsome free booklet No. 201 that tells all about it.
Weir Stove Co., Taunton, Mass.
Western Branch, 209 N. State St., Chicago
Makers of the Celebrated Glenwood Coal, Wood and Gas Ranges, Heating Stoves and Furnaces

Lessens Mother's Cares

Cyclone Fence affords children the freedom of the yard—yet keeps them at home and out of dangerous streets. Relieves mother of worry and care.

Cyclone Fence is strong, durable and artistic; unobtrusive and dignified—the ideal fence for enclosing your home.

Write Dept. V100 for beautiful booklet, "About Fence for your Home." No obligation.

CYCLONE FENCE COMPANY
GENERAL OFFICE: WAUKEGAN, ILLINOIS
Factories: Waukegan, Ill., Cleveland, O., Fort Worth, Texas.

Cyclone ORNAMENTAL LAWN Fence

New Money-Making Plan

Do you want $2 an hour or more for your spare time—$35 to $50 a week for entire time? Our new sales system is making big money for men and women who sell—WRITE TODAY.

Malloch-Knit Hose

Guaranteed for 6 months

and quality underwear—direct from mills to wearer. Let us start you in a business of your own with our Free Sample Outfit and new plans. We pay all expenses. Become our District Manager—appoint sub-agents and we pay you a commission on the goods they sell—WRITE TODAY.

Malloch Knitting Mills
624 Grant St. Grand Rapids, Mich.

Arch Preserver Shoes satisfy both Nature and Fashion

NATURE'S law is that your foot must be supported not only at heel and ball but also at the outer arch. But Fashion insists that your heel and arch be raised, thus depriving the arch of the ground's support. The weight of your body, bearing down on your unsupported arch, strains it, and Nature retaliates by making the foot uncomfortable and tired.

But it no longer is necessary to provoke Nature that you may wear fashionable shoes. The Arch Preserver Shoe raises your heel and arch from the ground the same as any fashionable shoe, has inimitable grace, advance style and glove-like lines, yet it satisfies Nature perfectly because it supports your outer arch as firmly and as permanently as the ground supports the bare foot.

Unlike all other shoes, the Arch Preserver Shoe has a scientifically designed, built-in arch-bridge extending under the entire arch of your foot. Your outer arch, instead of being left unsupported when the heel is raised, rests on this bridge. Therefore the weight of your body cannot strain the arch. Your feet, though exquisitely shod, are absolutely comfortable, do not tire and are freed from even the remotest possibility of foot trouble.

The Arch Preserver Shoe is the only shoe of its kind because its distinctive construction is patented. To satisfy both Nature and Fashion you therefore must be sure that you are buying the genuine Arch Preserver Shoe. The trade-mark (as shown below) on the sole, is your guarantee.

Nature plans that the foot rest on heel, ball and outer arch.

Fashion demands that heel and arch be raised.

The Arch Preserver Shoe satisfies both Nature and Fashion.

Write for Style Book Number 35 and name of dealer in your city

Made only by

THE SELBY SHOE COMPANY

25 Gallia St., Portsmouth, Ohio

Makers of women's fine shoes for more than 40 years

THE ARCH PRESERVER SHOE

Arch Preserver Boots and Low-Cuts are made for women and misses in all styles, widths AAAA to E. Sold by 3000 dealers. Look for the Arch Preserver trade-mark. It appears on every genuine Arch Preserver Shoe.

© 1922 The Selby Shoe Co.

The Unspeakable Gentleman

(Continued from Page 183)

and we will lead you across. I fancy that is the last of them for a moment."

So we stumbled through the mud at a walk, slipping noisily at every step, but only the noise of our progress interrupted us. My father walked in tranquil silence at the bridle, while I trudged beside him.

"Father," I inquired, "will you answer me a question?"

"Perhaps," said my father.

"What has my uncle to do with the paper?"

"My son," said my father, "may I ask you a question?"

"Perhaps," I replied.

"How much money did your mother leave you at her death?"

"She had none to leave," I replied quickly.

"Ah," said my father, "have you ever wondered why?"

"You should be able to tell me," I answered coldly.

"Indeed," said my father. "But here we are at the dunes. The boat, my son; do you see it?"

I SCRAMBLED up ahead through the sand and beach grass, and the white line of the beach, which even the darkest night can never hide, lay clear before me. A high surf was running, and beyond it I could see three lights, blinking fitfully in the black, and nearer on the white sand was the shadow of a fishing boat pulled just above the tide mark. A minute later Brutus came running toward us.

My father was evidently used to such small matters. Indeed, the whole affair seemed such a part of his daily life as to demand nothing unusual. He glanced casually at the waves and the boat, tossed off his cloak on the sand, wrapped his pistols inside it, and placed the bundle carefully beneath a thwart.

"The rocket, Brutus," said my father. "If you will get in, mademoiselle, we will contrive to push you through the breakers. Best take your coat off, my son, and place it over the pistols."

Brutus had evidently kept a slow match burning, for with a sudden flare a rocket flashed into the wind. A breaker crashed down on the beach ahead of us.

"Get aboard," said my father. "The oars, Brutus."

Drenched and gasping, I pulled myself over the side just as we topped a second wave. My father was beside me, as bland and unconcerned as ever.

"You see, mademoiselle," he said, "we are quite safe. The Sea Tern is standing in already. While Brutus is rowing, my son, we had better load the pistols."

Soon we could make out the ship's spars under shortened sail, and presently we were hailed from the deck. My father leaned forward and thrust something into my hand. "A pistol, Henry," he said. "Put it inside your shirt. It will be a souvenir for you when you are home again."

We could hear the waves slapping against the vessel's sides, and the orders from the deck above us. As I looked it seemed a perilous distance away.

"Alongside, Brutus," said my father.

Two lanterns cast a feeble glow on the sheets of water that rolled under us, shouldering our frail boat impatiently in their haste to move along. Brutus pulled an oar sharply. I saw a ladder dangling perilously from the bulwarks. I saw Brutus seize it, and then our boat, arrested and stationary, began to toss madly in ill-concerted effort. My father sprang up, balancing himself lightly against each sudden roll.

"Now, mademoiselle," he said, "we will get on deck. Brutus will carry you up quite safely. Hold the ladder, Henry, or we may be in the water." His voice was still coldly precise, not raised even to a higher pitch.

BRUTUS, holding mademoiselle on one arm, managed the ladder with ready adroitness, and I followed safely, but not before I had been hurled against the side with a force that nearly drove away my breath. I reached the deck to find a lantern thrust into my face, and stared into it, for the moment quite blinded. "It is the son," remarked a voice which I thought I remembered.

Then my father followed me. "We are on board, Mr. Aiken," he called. "Never mind the boat. Get your men on the braces, or we'll blow on shore."

"Yes, Captain Shelton," said the voice again. "You are on board, to be sure, and very prettily done. I have been waiting for you all evening."

"Indeed," said my father in his old level tone, "and who may you be?"

"Mr. Sims, captain," came the reply. "I managed to seize your ship before she left the river. It is hard, after so much trouble, but you are my prisoner, Captain Shelton."

(Continued in the May Home Journal)

Fulla-Pep!

(Continued from Page 9)

There was a group of new young people, and Virginia responded to her sister's introductions charmingly.

"Mrs. Lyman?" repeated Tom Burchard, an overgrown, string-bean-like youth with freckles disappearing beneath his clothes at every border line.

"She has a baby too," Pamela said proudly. "How old is he now, Ginia? And did you bring him?"

"I brought him," said Virginia, "but spare me." She bent an amused look on her sister's bewilderment, and then turned her attention to the group.

She was surprised, perhaps more surprised even than Jimmy would have been, at their complete acceptance of her. As laughter rippled towards her at the close of some absurd remark, as Tom Burchard and Arnold Landstreet hitched a little nearer her seat, she felt some of the old thrill. She completely forgot to wonder whether her mother knew that Junior's cereal should be cooked for two hours.

The players on the court made their strokes unwatched; finally Coby flung down his racket and, in the dramatic moment when the group glanced up, leaped the net gracefully and sauntered to Virginia's side.

"Pulling Tom Mix-Doug Fairbanks stuff these days, Coby?" she asked, looking up lazily. The girls giggled. "How've you been?"

"All right. You're looking fine." He sat down at her feet.

"Why not?" Virginia resumed, pulling the bark from her stick. "Got a knife, anyone?"

Coby's knife was in her hand before either of the other two that were held out to her.

"Let me do it. What's it for, anyway—going lame?"

She looked down at him, smiling. "It's for company," she answered. "You see, mother put everything in my room that I might need—towels, letter paper, hairpins, needles, every old thing—except a beau. Gotta have somebody to take walking with me. Don't you think hostesses should supply beaus, Coby?"

Tom Burchard was quicker. "She probably thought you'd rather take your pick," he suggested.

The girls stirred uneasily.

"Who'd rather take their pick of what?" demanded a gentle voice, and Virginia looked up.

She did not need Pamela's introduction to realize that the girl who stood before her was Teddy Tilden. They shook hands, and Virginia found plenty of time to observe her rival without any of the veiled glances that women usually call forth. Miss Tilden glanced at her, murmured "Very pleased,"

(Continued on Page 186)

Youth and Style Belong Together!

Style 715

Ask for Ferris at the leading stores. The genuine has the name on the garment.

Ferris

Fashions seem planned for the slender, supple lines of the youthful figure!

That is one reason why the Ferris Corset Waist is so popular with all ages. It carries the beauty of a lovely figure, which is the priceless possession of girlhood, into the dignity and poise of gracious womanhood.

Ferris Corset Waists come in attractive washable materials, both pink and white. There are styles for women as well as misses of all ages; with or without shoulder straps; button or clasp front.

Send for free catalog illustrating all styles of Corded Corsets, Corset Waists, Sport Corsets and Maternity Corsets.

THE FERRIS BROS. CO.
5-7-9 Union Square West
New York

Ferris Corset Waists

SAUER'S VANILLA AND 32 OTHER FLAVORS

Flavor is the soul of food. If the flavor is good the food will be delicious and tempting. If the flavor is poor, no amount of other good ingredients can make it taste right.

Quality has been the first consideration in the manufacture of Sauer's Vanilla and Sauer's thirty-two other flavors. It is the best because it is made from the finest selected Vanilla beans and mellowed with age both before and after manufacture.

Sauer's Vanilla comes to you with that rich, delicate flavor which distinguishes the BEST Vanilla from ordinary Vanilla.

Sauer's Pure Flavoring Extracts have been the choice of housewives for more than a third of a century, because they know there will be no "failures" if their pastries and desserts are flavored with Sauer's.

Send for recipe booklet.

THE C. F. SAUER COMPANY

Established 1887

Richmond,

Virginia

THE LARGEST SELLING BRAND IN THE U.S.
17 HIGHEST AWARDS AND MEDALS FOR PURITY, STRENGTH AND FINE FLAVOR

3-minute dishwasher

The quick sanitary way of washing dishes, pots and pans

The 3-Minute Dishwasher washes, sterilizes, and dries dishes, glassware, pots and pans in but a few minutes—without putting the hands in hot, greasy dish water.

Insanitary dish cloths, towels, mops, are eliminated. The once tiresome and disagreeable three times a day task of washing dishes becomes a matter of but a few minutes' pleasant work. Washes the dishes better than the old fashioned dish-pan method.

The 3-Minute Dishwasher attaches to the hot water faucet of the kitchen sink, requires no special fittings and costs little to operate. Is so simple a child can use it. And the cost is so low that every home can afford one.

Write for booklet K-1 giving full description and name of nearest dealer.

Price Complete $7.50 east of the Rockies
$7.75 west of the Rockies $9.50 in Canada

HOUSEHOLD APPLIANCE CO., Jefferson City, Mo.
General Sales Offices, Saint Louis, Mo.

CANADIAN DISTRIBUTORS, HOUSE & HOME SPECIALTIES, LTD., WINDSOR, ONT.

Dealers and Distributors
Valuable Territory still open.
Write for details.

"Harem Scarem" DRESS

THE WONDER DRESSES FOR LITTLE GIRLS

Forms its own bloomers all in one piece

Dressed in a "Harem Scarem" your little girl is comfortably and sturdily attired for the most strenuous sort of play—At the same time she is dressed suitably and prettily for school and other occasions.

HAREM SCAREM'S are made in a great variety of materials, patterns and colorings.

Sizes 3 to 12 yrs. — Moderately priced.

Your dealer can quickly secure HAREM SCAREM dresses should he not have them in stock or you can order direct from our booklet which will be sent FREE upon request.

RITZWOLLER & CO. Inc.
16 East 32nd St.
New York

The genuine HAREM SCAREM bears this label.

Fulla—Pep!

(Continued from Page 185)

and turned her attention instantly to the male element.

Virginia followed suit promptly, before continuing her inspection.

"Can you smooth off the end of the stick, too, Coby?" she asked, leaning over so that her hat brushed the boy's face. He had just removed the last strip of bark and had glanced towards Miss Tilden. "It's awfully rough and prickly—look!" She offered him a small white hand, its palm faintly reddened. They were all too young to know that it was Virginia's finger nails that had done the damage an instant before.

As Coby looked at the outstretched hand his seventeen years held him back from the obvious answer, the answer that should have been a gesture rather than a word.

He brushed a brown finger tentatively over the soft palm, looked down, confused, at the stick, and said "Sure." He was again intent on the whittling, and Virginia looked at Theodora Tilden.

SHE was quite small, yet there was little that was childish in her figure. She was wholly confident; the careless middie blouse and skirt showed that, although her coiffure, which looked as if it had been poured into a mold lined with a hair net and allowed to harden, revealed her flapperhood. Her face was more piquant than pretty, vividly colored like Virginia's, with narrow eyes that turned up slightly at the corners and a wide mouth with even teeth protruding slightly.

"Oh, Coby darling," she said suddenly. "Yeah?"

"I think you'd better not call for me till half past eight to-night. That silly dress-maker hasn't quite finished my dress."

"All right."

"There's a dance to-night at the country club," Pam explained. "Do you want to come?"

Virginia smiled. "You going?"

"She's going with me," said Tom Burchard. "Why don't you come along with us?"

"Oh, I couldn't possibly do that. I'll see, though; I may drop in." She looked down at Coby speculatively. "My stick all ready, old man?"

"Perfect. Probably the best stick ever seen in Hendon." He held it out to her.

"And all hand done too!" She admired it for a moment before she rose to her feet.

"Mind if I walk along with you?" Coby said abruptly.

Virginia smiled. "Of course not. And you can hold the other end of the stick—Coby darling."

It was Teddy Tilden who looked up, startled, this time. Coby seized an end of the stick solemnly and, both of them pleasantly conscious of the audience they loved, they crossed the tennis court and disappeared over the knob of the hill.

BACK at the house Virginia followed her mother to the piazza and took up her place in the hammock.

"Did you find the children?"

"Yes." She listened absently as Mrs. Garrison's gentle voice drifted along the trail of Hendon gossip.

"Do you want to go to the club to-night and watch the children?"

She had heard vaguely before, made the proper answers and exclamations, but this question roused her. "No," she said decidedly, and at her mother's look of surprise, "I'm rather tired after the trip. We'll go some other night."

Just then Pamela, with Teddy Tilden, appeared on the veranda. "Teddy wants to see the baby," said Pam, sinking into a chair and crossing her long legs.

"Asleep," said Virginia shortly. She turned to the other girl. "Come along over to-morrow, Miss Tilden."

Miss Tilden was looking at Virginia reflectively, her pointed chin thrust forward. "I've got a trade for you," she said abruptly, and again before her voice stopped it became a giggle. "I'm sure you'll take it as a compliment, Mrs. Lyman. After you had gone, Arnold Landstreet asked me who that young girl was who came to see Pam."

Virginia's wince was wholly internal; her smile flashed instantly. "It's so nice to have people want to know about you," she said smugly.

After Teddy had gone, a look of things unfinished still in her eyes, Pam curled up in the opposite end of the hammock.

"I know that Teddy Tilden is just the silliest old thing," she said, "and I feel so foolish sometimes taking her seriously. But the boys don't seem to see it at all. She's always coming and taking them away in her car, and whenever any of us are having any fun she always comes along and wants 'Coby darling' to do something for her—fix her automobile or help her pick blueberries."

"Or whittle a stick,"

Virginia said absently.

"I know, Pam; it's all such old stuff." She looked at the girl appreciatively. Pam was infinitely prettier than Miss Tilden.

"Coby and I used to have lots of fun," said Pam. "We liked each other lots and used to talk about things. And now—oh, he's changed so, Ginia. I can't quite explain. And —"

"YOU'RE an old dear," Virginia said irrelevantly. "I like you, Pam." She leaned forward and kissed her. "I've got a new white evening dress that I think you'd better wear to the dance to-night. Come along upstairs."

After Pamela had been whirled away in Tom Burchard's car Virginia pleaded sleepiness and went to her room. She sat, looking out through the casement window at the night, with the moonlight falling across her face, making angular patches like a cubist portrait.

"I wonder what the matter is with me?" she asked herself. A great wave of dissatisfaction had broken over her again, and as she looked around the familiar room she was glad Jimmy was not there. It was strange to be glad of that; they had been separated so little, and always before she had been so desperately lonely. Now — "But I love Jimmy!" she said. There was no question of that, nor of his loving her. But she wanted to be alone.

She felt somehow as though she had reached the first crisis of her marriage. Oh, she was perfectly happy in her marriage, all right. She was merely rebellious at Jimmy's attitude towards her; more than that, at her own attitude towards herself. She didn't want to flirt with other men—at least not very often; she didn't want to keep Jimmy constantly worried and alert, as young girls keep beaux, as some married women keep their husbands. But she did want him to know that she could if she wanted to. Jimmy seemed to assume, without even bothering to think about it, that she had lost the gentle art of coquetry, and she was uncertain herself.

IT MIGHT sound absurd, but at least it was enough to bother her constantly, to make her glad of being away from Jimmy, even. She could pretend that she was bored with being the old wife and mother; it sounded much more reasonable. Or she could pretend that she merely wanted to show the ruthless Teddy Tilden her place, in order to recover Pamela's beau. But she knew that all she wanted really was to prove that she was still in the running, that if she liked she could be the belle she had been before her marriage.

It was nice to be at home again, alone in her young-girl room. She began unpacking her trunks. As she lifted an evening gown from its tissue-paper sheathing she thought of Teddy Tilden. Beneath the dress, in a pile of folded pink underwear, lay a leather-framed photograph of Jimmy. She lifted it out, set it on the dressing table and regarded it humorously for a moment.

(Continued on Page 187)

Fulla—Pep!

(Continued from Page 186)

"Going to need some of that pep, daddy," she said.

The first thing she heard in the morning was Junior, carrying on a highly spirited conversation with himself in the nursery. She tiptoed down the hall and went to him, dressed him methodically and abstractedly. Already the sun was above the edge of trees. At the end of the sandy path that curved from the macadam road she could hear the sea pounding.

"I wonder whether the dashing Coby Dana takes an early dip the way young heroes used to when I was seventeen?" she asked herself.

She slipped into her sea-green bathing suit, tied an orange scarf over the heavy rubber cap. Junior pranced at her side as they walked along the path, and she hummed cheerfully. At the edge of the beach she paused and looked down the sloping bank of white sand to the morning sea. At the shore the water was clear and sparkling like a sheet of blue crystal; beyond the raft a line might have been drawn with a ruler across the surface, separating the inland border from the cloudy purple of the outer ocean. Towards the horizon the sea still seemed lost in night; the water that touched the pale blue sky line was inky.

VIRGINIA'S eyes traveled back to the float and to a blond head that had appeared beyond the springboard. For a few feet the head seemed to float in the current like a ball, then a pair of brown arms tore upwards to the sunlight and shoulders and a bit of dull red bathing suit rose above the surface. Coby climbed up on the raft and she watched him pleasurably.

"I thought you were a merman!" she called out suddenly, and he raised his head, surprised.

"Why, hello!" he called. "I didn't see you." He dived off and swam to the shore; Virginia and Junior walked down the beach to meet him. "This your kid?"

She nodded. "Going to teach him to swim?"

"Sure thing." Coby bent a puzzled look on the little boy. "What's his name?"

"Jimmy." She turned, too, to look at her son. "Will you play here in the sand while I go out to the raft, Junior?" she asked.

He nodded, and Virginia, with a backward smile at Coby, ran down the beach and plunged into the water. They swam out silently, side by side; Coby took her hand and helped her up on the float.

"Have a nice time at the dance last night?"

"Not so nice as if you'd been there."

"Why, Coby?"

"Really."

Virginia grinned. "Oh, I wasn't doubting your obviously indisputable statement," she said. "I was just marveling at you for being so quick before breakfast."

"You're not so slow yourself."

SHE jumped to her feet and mounted the springboard. "Fifty-yard dash for the coffee pot," she announced, and cut the water cleanly.

As they reached the beach and Junior, the same puzzled expression crept into Coby's eyes.

"How old is he?" he asked.

"Three," answered Virginia. She looked from her son to the boy and smiled. She didn't tell Coby that she hoped Junior would grow to be a straight slim youth like himself with clear eyes holding that amazing combination of sophistication and naiveté.

"Want to play tennis after breakfast?" Coby asked.

"After breakfast?" She considered. "I don't believe mother has any plans for me. Come along around and see, if you like."

They had reached the road, and Coby ran up the hill towards the Dana house, while Virginia and Junior retraced the path.

"Well, son," she said, looking down at him, "Exhibit One is over. You, my child, are my greatest liability in this wild career of flapping I'm undertaking. Do you know what a liability is?"

"No."

She leaned over and picked him up, swung him to her shoulders. "Little boys are sometimes," she announced, and galloped along the path to the house, her son screaming delightedly from his seat.

VIRGINIA found it amazingly easy to ensnare Coby. During the whole summer, his second in the boy-and-girl world, he had flitted from one girl to another, never taking any of them seriously, never realizing, even, that they thought of him any longer than he considered them. He had had a real friendship for Pamela, and occasionally, when his conscious manhood came to his mind, he had found her hand little and soft to hold in his in the darkness of the moving-picture theater. Once, even, because it was the proper thing, he had kissed her in an interval between dances—a breathless, absurd little kiss that had delighted them both in the new game their seventeen years had brought them. Teddy Tilden, with her quick answers, her mocking coquetry, had stirred him. He had not cared for her as a companion; he had scarcely liked her even; but he had seen that she represented a new element in the new, grown-up world. Coby had learned to flirt and found it amusing.

From the moment when Virginia first appeared on the tennis court he had liked her. In the years before, he had answered when she spoke to him, admired her tennis and her swimming, but the gulf of seven years' difference in age had stretched impassably. After her marriage she had been for a time quite removed from any interest, however slight, on his part. And now, when her married state made being with her so constantly a delightfully mature and sophisticated adventure, he could not seem to remember that she was married.

Coby, without fully realizing it, found in Virginia not only the intellectual companionship of older people but the added gayety of a youthful flirtation.

Virginia, from her twenty-four years, understood all this and felt no twinges of conscience. She was elated to discover that she could play at being seventeen, and when Teddy Tilden began to watch her apprehensively, to hesitate a little in her flagrant assurance, some of the thrill of the old game came back to her.

SHE had been in Hendon a month when Jimmy's letters began to speak rather plaintively of her return. In her letters to him she told him of the things she was doing, but made no comments. When he referred to her "whirl in the younger set," even to her "second childhood," she made no answer. When he hurled at her the epithet of "cradle snatcher" she answered only with a photograph of the boys and girls on the raft, herself between Coby and Tom, indistinguishable from any of the youngsters. Then, abruptly, Jimmy's letters ceased. They had written to one another daily, and for three days there was no mail for Virginia in the Garrison box. On the third day when Pamela returned from the post office empty handed Virginia bit her lip reflectively. She strolled out of the house towards the beach, to sit there and think it over, and met Coby coming to find her.

(Continued on Page 188)

Sold by the pound

Hand Loom

NOTE PAPER

the best writing paper
that can be made

Obtainable at the better stores—

DES ARTS
STATIONERY
STYLE AND QUALITY

Whiting & Cook Inc.
Holyoke, Mass.
New York Sales Room 200 Fifth Avenue

If unable to purchase Hand Loom, send us your dealer's name and $1.00 for a pound box (eighty sheets) and fifty envelopes to match. Free samples of other Des Arts style papers will be included.

I am free ~ You may be

Do You Perspire to Excess?

Keep the Underarms Sweet and Dry

HUMILIATION, self-consciousness and ruined gowns are the inevitable results of excessive armpit perspiration. And yet how unnecessary this suffering and expense—how simple the means of avoiding the worry—how easy to be assured of "personal daintiness"—the greatest of all womanly charms.

Permit NONSPI to be your friend in need, use it—about TWICE a week—and normally dry, absolutely odorless underarms will be the result. Relief will come so surely and so quickly that (as one woman expressed her happiness) you will "bless the inspiration that conceived it."

NONSPI—a pure Antiseptic Liquid, unscented and free from artificial coloring matter—is more than a mere deodorant, it is ALSO a remedy for the Excessive Armpit Perspiration itself—one trial and you, like a million other users, never again will be without a bottle on your bath-room shelf.

(An Antiseptic Liquid)

OUR TESTING
SAMPLE WILL CONVINCE YOU!
Send us for Testing
Sample and what the medical authorities say about the harmfulness of Excessive
Armpit Perspiration

Never raised in Price—never lowered in Quality, now as always, 50c (several months' supply) at toilet or drug dealers' or by mail direct.

2624 Walnut Street THE NONSPI CO. Kansas City, Missouri

Write for this helpful little book. It will be sent you free

Madge Evans HATS for Little Ladies

EVERY girl of 6 to 16 who wants to look her loveliest should wear a Madge Evans Hat. If you would like to know how Madge Evans, herself, chooses her hats, just write: "Dear Madge: Send me your new booklet—'Secrets of a Young Movie Star,' and I promise to look for a Madge Evans Hat before buying my Spring Hat." Address:

MADGE EVANS HAT CO., 390 Broadway, New York City

DEALERS: If there is no Madge Evans representative in your locality, write us at once for exclusive agency.

A good home ages gracefully

Why are some of the homes built in early colonial days among the most charming homes of today?

They are old, but throughout the centuries they have been maintained and cared for because they inspire home love and home reverence.

Their charm is their woodwork—their entrances, doors, windows, moldings, stairs, corner cupboards, paneling.

When you plan a home you cannot look too carefully to woodwork details.

Curtis Woodwork brings the home spirit into a house. Its quality insures the graceful aging of a home.

Foremost architects have drawn every line of Curtis Woodwork. Lumber experts select and prepare every piece of wood in it. Skilled workers construct every article of it.

After inspectors approve it, each piece is stamped with our name. This is like an individual rather than a corporate guarantee to you.

Curtis on woodwork means a class, a quality, rather than a style or type.

All over the country retail lumber dealers sell Curtis Woodwork at prices low for such quality and service to home builders.

See a Curtis dealer. Study his big Curtis Catalog. Write us today for beautifully illustrated literature.

Write us number of rooms you want, and for fifty cents in stamps we will send plan book of at least thirty-two homes

1866 CURTIS WOODWORK

"The Permanent Furniture for Your Home"

THE CURTIS COMPANIES' SERVICE BUREAU
Dept. B Clinton, Iowa

Maintained by the Curtis manufacturing and distributing plants at:

Clinton, Iowa
Oklahoma City, Okla.
Lincoln, Neb.

Detroit, Mich.
Chicago, Ill.
Topeka, Kans.

St. Paul, Minn.
Waukegan, Wis.
Minneapolis, Minn.

Sales offices at Pittsburgh, New York, Baltimore

Fulla—Pep!

(Continued from Page 187)

"Teddy's just been down to the house," he said gloomily. "She has a girl friend visiting her, and she wanted to know if I'd take her to the dance to-night."

Virginia smiled. "Dear me," she said. "And what did you say?"

"Told her I'd ask you." He looked at her disappointedly. "You're going with me and I don't want to drag along another girl. You're going back soon and —"

"It is rather horrid." She smiled as she considered Teddy Tilden's methods. She knew perfectly that if she consented to take the girl friend along with her and Coby, Teddy would make charming remarks about what a perfect chaperon Mrs. Lyman was. "You'd better take the girl, Coby," she said. "I'll come along over with mother; she said she'd like to go up to the club and watch the dancing."

"But I want to take you."

"Do you, Coby?" She smiled at the sulky boy that had cropped out in him. "Maybe she'll be awfully pretty."

"PRETTY! What do I care?" He snapped off a branch from one of the bushes and began breaking it into small pieces violently. "She won't be any prettier than you, and it doesn't matter anyway. I'm sick of young girls. I like someone I can talk to, and you —"

"Can talk even if I am doddering?" she supplied, just to see him flush and protest.

It was strange to watch him flash from a sophisticated, slightly daring young man to an awkward boy, and back again.

"It really won't make any difference," she said finally. "You can pass the girl on to someone else after you get there, and we'll dance."

As a matter of fact, she thought to herself it would make a great deal of difference. It should, if all went well, offer her the opportunity to force Teddy Tilden's hand. And ever since the week before when Teddy had returned unexpectedly from a week-end visit and joined a party to an amusement park a few miles away, commandeering Pam's beau with a high hand and leaving her to sit alone in the roller coasters and flying baskets, Virginia had been waiting.

"Who's Teddy going with?" she asked.

"Arnold Landstreet."

Virginia grinned. She had Arnold pretty well under her thumb by this time; she wasn't at all worried about him. "Well, we'll see," she said. "I'm going to dash along now, Coby. Buck up, old boy."

She stayed in the house all day, taking care of Junior, sewing on the new frock Pamela was to wear, planning her own costume.

AFTER dinner she went to her room; across the hall she could hear her sister humming as she dressed.

"It's fun to be going to parties with you," Pam called. "I remember when I was a kid how you used to call me in to powder your back, and I used to wish so hard I could go too. And now —"

"Any little thing I can do for you?" asked Virginia.

"Not yet."

Virginia paused in her dressing to smile.

"May I come in?" Pam asked finally.

"Of course."

"I can't fasten this book and—why, Virginia Garrison Lyman!"

Virginia turned and faced her sister. "What, honey?"

Pam stood in the doorway, staring. "I never saw anything so lovely in my life," she said finally.

"Why, Pam?"

Pam forgot the book that she could not fasten, forgot that it was almost time for Tom to arrive. "I wish Jimmy was here," she said solemnly.

Virginia laughed. "Funny little girl." She whirled her sister about, and her practiced fingers explored the intricacies of hooks and eyes. "As a matter of fact," she said softly, "so do I."

Tom and Pamela departed, and Virginia threw a cloak about her shoulders and walked out to the garage to get the car.

"Ready, mother?"

"Isn't it a little early?"

"I don't believe so. Come along."

SHE drove recklessly to the clubhouse and drew the car up neatly beside the others. The great hall was silent except for voices, and Virginia smiled approvingly.

"Hurry up, mother."

They entered the building, and Virginia glanced around quickly. Pamela and Tom were talking in one corner; Coby and the girl friend, a shy, blond person, not unattractive, were standing by the window. She continued to search; her eyes, resting on Teddy Tilden and Arnold, stopped. Teddy looked up and smiled, and in that one smile were more things than Virginia could have counted on her fingers. Outwardly it was rather respectful, but the insolence and triumph that lurked beneath the sugar coating were unbelievable. Teddy's lazy eyes turned towards Coby, his back slightly towards them, and traveled to Pamela and Tom.

"Thumbs down," announced Virginia to herself. "No mercy to the conquered." She thought of Pamela, sitting alone in the roller coaster while Teddy talked gayly with the worried Tom, and her eyes darkened.

There was a stir, and the orchestra, still pompously pleased that all must wait on its pleasure, crashed forth; from the corner of her eye Virginia saw Teddy Tilden step impatiently from the center of the floor to make way for the dancers.

Arnold did not move; his glance was fastened to Virginia, and he seemed to be waiting. "Did you come alone?" he asked as Coby and the girl friend danced past.

"TEDDY asked if Coby would take her friend," Virginia answered demurely, "so I'm afraid I'm doomed to be a wallflower for this dance." She was swaying gently to the music, not seeming to see either her mother or Miss Tilden, but wondering all the same which of them looked most enraged at her conduct.

"You couldn't be a wallflower if you tried," Arnold answered gallantly; "anyone else first. And, anyway, if you're not afraid of my big feet —"

Virginia's lashes dropped; he put his arm about her waist and they swung out into the center of the shining floor. As she caught sight of Teddy Tilden's face amusement and an unconquerable sense of triumph crowded out all shame; Teddy had deserved it. She did not see Coby when he danced towards them and pulled her from Arnold's arms, substituting the shy girl friend. She was not sorry, even, when she saw Teddy thread her way among the dancers towards the dressing room; Miss Tilden had done this sort of thing heartlessly too many times not to merit a taste of her own medicine.

"I didn't think anyone could look any prettier than you did at the last dance," Coby was whispering. "But honest, Virginia —"

He flushed and did not finish.

"Coby, you're a darling. If there's one thing a girl needs, it's to be told at the very beginning of a party that she looks pretty."

"Pretty!" he said, disgusted with the inadequacy of the word.

They danced in silence, and she half closed her eyes so that she could better hear

(Continued on Page 190)

To make housekeeping an easier and happier task

THE beautiful Sellers of today offers you a measure of convenience that is, to say the least, unusual. Time after time you find your needs anticipated in a way that is almost human. Arrangement is perfect.

30 years have been concentrated on the design and improvements which make this convenience possible.

To the right, a few of the newest Sellers developments are listed and described. These are conveniences every woman has wanted and they are combined only in the Sellers. Without them we doubt if any woman can ever be fully satisfied. Please read the descriptions.

Yet, due to the broad policy of this company, the beautiful Sellers with all its improvements, costs no more than any good cabinet. And it costs only about half the expense of building a cabinet into the kitchen. Besides, it has sanitary features that a built-in cabinet never has.

At present reduced prices the Sellers is the greatest value of our history. Your local dealer will gladly arrange terms to suit your income. See him today for a demonstration. In the meantime, write for a FREE copy of the Sellers Blue Book. It pictures and describes all the cabinets and the famous Sellers features.

G. I. SELLERS & SONS COMPANY, ELWOOD, INDIANA
Canadian Branch of Sellers Kitchen Cabinets, Brantford, Canada

30th Anniversary

THIS is the 30th year of Sellers' progress. It marks, we believe, the highest development yet attained in the kitchen cabinet. As proof of this we ask you to check over the features listed here. These are improvements which you will find combined on no other cabinet. Most of them are exclusive features developed in the great Sellers factories at Elwood, Indiana.

Extending Table Drawer Section—A feature every woman has wished for and which is perfected only on the Sellers—makes it possible to get into the big table drawer even when the work table is extended and covered with work things.

The Only Automatic Lowering Flour Bin—comes down level with the work table. Filled with ease. Saves heavy lifting and dangerous climbing.

Automatic Double Base Shelf Extender now brings BOTH base shelves, and their contents, forward. You can reach the pot or pan you need from where you sit at the cabinet, with perfect ease.

Invisible and Dust-Proof Base Top underneath the Porcelain Work Table. Keeps the lower cupboard free from dust and dirt that work in under the work table in most cabinets.

Silverware Drawer. This is just above the roll front. Plush lined and a convenient place for knives, forks and spoons in most frequent use in the average kitchen of today.

Anti-Proof Casters. Put a little common borax in the caster cups. Then set the cabinet one-half inch from the wall and the ants will not bother you.

In addition there are such things as Sanitary Glass Drawer Pulls; Oil, Hand-Rubbed Finish; Dovetail Joint Construction; Sanitary Leg Base; Full Roll, Open Front; Roller Bearings on Work Table; and others.

IMPORTANT

By the number of conveniences the Sellers contains you might imagine it is too large for your kitchen. This is not so. The largest Sellers requires no more floor space than your kitchen table.

SELLERS

THE BEST SERVANT IN YOUR HOUSE

There's no other drink like ROOTBEER made from

One 25c package makes 80 glasses

ROOTBEER from Hires Household Extract is easy to make. It is pure and delicious—fragrant with the blend of sixteen roots, herbs, barks and berries. Bottle according to the simple directions printed on the package. Use good corks or ask your grocer for Hires Patent Bottle Stoppers.

Ask for HIRES HOUSEHOLD EXTRACT

If your dealer cannot supply you send 25 cents and we will send, postpaid, package direct. Or send $2.80 for carton of one dozen.

Ask for Hires at the fountain, or carbonated in bottles, ready to drink, from your dealer.

THE CHARLES E. HIRES COMPANY
206 South 24th Street Philadelphia, Pa.

A Delightful Spring Creation

This exquisite brassiere is typically DeBevoise in its charming blending of practical design and irresistible lacy daintiness of workmanship.

It serves the double purpose of bandeau and camisole, is extra long and is created in a number of light fabrics suitable for Spring and Summer.

"Willoway," at the left, is our wonderful, modernized Bandeau which has taken women by storm. It extends comfortably over the hips, eliminating the need of corsets. It gives ample support without the slightest restraint. Front and back hoesupporters are detachable.

Made, Labeled and Guaranteed by
CHAS. R. DEBEVOISE CO., Newark, N. J.

World's oldest and largest Brassiere Manufacturers

De Bevoise

Brassieres that Beautify

All Figures All Occasions All Prices

De Bevoise
Brassiere
ORIGINAL—BEST

Fulla—Pep!

(Continued from Page 188)

the music. Virginia did not want to talk; she was wholly happy, at least almost wholly happy. There was one thing lacking.

Coby's voice, protesting, broke in on her thoughts. "No cutting in allowed on this dance," he was saying.

She looked up at—her husband. She felt suddenly melted, as though she were going to burst into tears.

She swallowed and smiled. "Why, hello," she said, her eyes starry. "You—you haven't got a girl, so you can't cut in, you know. You —" Coby had whirled her past, and she looked back helplessly.

Her heart was pounding; the color in her cheeks mounted higher and higher. She turned her head so that she could still see Jim; his eyes were on her, his lips slightly parted. When they passed again she could find no word, and she tossed him the azalea blossom from her hair.

"Who's that guy?" Coby demanded in a rather proprietary tone.

"Don't you know Jim?" Virginia asked, and laughed.

"No. Who is he?"

"He's—only my husband," she murmured. Her eyes met the boy's, and they looked at each other steadily for a moment.

COBY'S minute of being in love with her had ended. "It's all over then?" he asked finally.

She was silent; then her eyes commenced to dance and she shrugged. "He's always been my husband, you know," she said lightly.

Coby hesitated, too, before he laughed. The disappointment was gone from his eyes, and he was grinning defiantly. "Come along and sit out the rest of this dance then," he dared.

She looked at him hesitantly, unwillingly. "Oh, Virginia!" His voice taunted her; again he was wholly the sophisticated young man.

They broke away from the dancers; she turned a last glance at the hall, but Jimmy seemed to have vanished. Perhaps her mother—Coby was whistling in a bored manner; she lifted her head high and turned to him with a smile.

They sat down on the running board of his car, silent for a moment.

"I've had an awfully nice time," he said finally.

"So've I," she answered. Silence again.

"I'll bet Teddy Tilden's one mad white woman; not that she didn't get what was coming to her."

Virginia laughed. "Coby, you're a nice boy," she said. "I have hopes for you. I think you're the only person in Hendon who's onto me at all."

"Are you going to bring up Jimmy Junior to be just like me?" he asked, grinning.

She stared at him. "Coby, sometimes I think you know rather too much. What you'll be like in ten years—I'd have been desperately in love with you if I'd been born about eight years later."

"Sorry you have to let eight little years wreck my hopes," he returned. He stood up, a slim figure in white flannels, his hair gold in the light that streamed from the clubhouse. Virginia was twisting the handkerchief with which he had ceremoniously presented her. "Virginia, you're a peach," he said. "You're just as game as they make 'em. Now beat it; I don't hold it against you that you want to see your husband."

THE orchestra was playing again when they entered the room. They hesitated for a moment in the doorway while Virginia searched the dancers. Jimmy and Teddy Tilden danced by, and Coby, with a flash at the girl by his side, cut in on them promptly.

"Well!" said Jimmy as his wife slipped into his arms.

"Well!" echoed Virginia happily.

They circled the room, reached the door again, and he extricated her from the moving crowd and bore her to the piazza. In the remote corner where the moonlight spluttered through the vines like candlelight in a windy hall he kissed her. They stood looking at each other for a moment.

"This place fairly echoes with the ghosts of predecessors," said Jimmy, smiling. He pulled her towards him again.

"Oh, Jimmy!"

"Ginia!" He sat down on the railing and looked up at her. "The things I've been hearing about you!"

"Have you?" She smiled like a small girl, watching him uncertainly.

HIS mouth twitched upwards at the corners. "I'll say I have. Gosh, it's good to see you. And you're so pretty, so lovely."

"Really, Jimmy?"

The door opened and Teddy Tilden and Arnold Landstreet came out; Teddy's arm was resting lightly on his and she was looking rapturously into his face.

"Isn't she the most amusing kid?" Virginia asked. "Heavens, Jimmy, to think that I used to work as hard as that when I was her age!"

Jimmy snorted. "I don't see that she has anything on you now," he said.

She turned towards him slowly. "You're prejudiced," she said softly.

"Prejudiced!" said Jimmy. "That's just what I'm not. We've been together all the time for four years; if anybody could discover that you were ever dull or unattractive, I'd be the guy."

"And I'm not?"

"You know you're not." He took her hand in his. "Oh, Virginia, you're so lovely. I guess I've got to keep on the job pretty hard or else someone will be snatching you away from me."

She looked at him solemnly.

"Of course these kids are just kids," he went on. "But if you, with a three-year-old son tagging around, can keep seventeen-year-olds hopping—well!"

VIRGINIA drew a deep breath; the eyes that clung to his were wide and serious. Suddenly she grinned, and two little stars shattered the solemnity of her gaze. "Let me tell you a secret, son," she said confidentially, picking up his hand in hers and emphasizing her words by patting it with the other.

"You're all, all wrong. Of course I shouldn't let you know that I like you to think you've got to work to keep my girlish interest. And I shouldn't let you suspect that I'm not madly in love with every dashing young man who wanders past my eyes." She laughed aloud. "And I shouldn't—oh, never—let you find out the real honest-to-goodness low-down. But I feel truthful to-night, and I may as well get it out of my system. Listen!" She leaned her lips close to his ear and whispered: "I'm not the gay old thing at all, Jimmy boy, and I don't want to be. I'm—I'm really the old wife and mother."

Her husband laughed. "I'm not going to bank on it," he returned, "whatever you think. And, anyway, you know what the wise man says."

"The wise man?" she repeated happily.

"Sure; the world's greatest son."

She leaned her head against his shoulder. "What?" she demanded.

"Mummie fulla—pep!"

She stood up and put both her hands in his. "I believe I have the next dance with you, Mr. Lyman?"

Jimmy rose too; suddenly he began to chuckle. "Better hurry," he said. "Wait a minute; listen!"

Within the lighted hall the weary orchestra was jazzing "Home, Sweet Home."

Peyton and Peyton

(Continued from Page 7)

"Well, for one thing"—some of Betty's gay exultation spilled out of her eyes into her voice—"Tom's had a raise."

"Oh, Betty! Really! Isn't that simply splendid! How did it happen?" Tom's mother's eyes and voice lighted suddenly to match his wife's.

"He didn't even ask for it," said Betty proudly. "But the firm decided to use the plan he worked out to submit for the Young Hero Memorial, and the committee chose it. Mr. Grantland was so tickled that he called Tom in yesterday and raised his salary. It's ten a week—five hundred and twenty a year more. That will make an awful difference when you sail as close to the wind as we do."

"I SHOULD say it will! Oh, Betty, honestly, I can't tell you how happy I am. And coming in such a way makes it ten times as nice. I should say we will celebrate. We'll get Tom and —"

It was fun to have someone so sympathetic, so thoroughly understanding. Mrs. Peyton's accents were almost tremulous. In her happiness Betty quite forgot any little antagonism she had ever had for her mother-in-law.

"And that isn't all, either," she exulted. "I've got a job myself."

"A job! What do you mean? What kind?"

"Well, at first, it will be just my old one back," Betty admitted. "Down at the Venner Company, you know. I stopped in at the office a minute yesterday to see some of the girls I used to see so much of before I was married. Mr. Rice came out to speak to me and asked me to stop in his office before I left. I did and he offered me my old job back—he more than offered it; he almost begged me to come and said he would pay me five a week more than I used to get. That will be more than any girl in the office gets now. He says the three years I've been away have been one nightmare of incompetent stenographers."

BETTY talking fast in her eagerness felt a shade of lacking enthusiasm in Mrs. Peyton's face and rushed on to set forth her opportunity in all its splendor:

"But that's just for a starter, you see. He's going to fix it for me to work into the demonstration department a little afternoons, and if I can learn to drive a car, he'll let me try to sell some myself. Why, there's no end to where I might go in time, with commissions and everything, if I just make good. And I'll make good; I will."

"But, Betty, what about the house, and Tom, and the babies?"

"I've got it all planned out. It will work wonderfully. I'm going to get thirty a week. I can get Tina Patten to come for fifteen. It's a big price, but she's wonderful with children, and a good housekeeper. She'll take care of the babies and do everything else except the washing. Oh, I lay awake almost all last night, planning it out. When I can get anybody like Tina, that proves that at home I was really, actually worth only fifteen dollars a week and not improving any from year to year. Downtown I'm worth thirty right now, with a chance of increasing to almost anything."

"But to be back working again, when you're a married woman with a husband and two babies —"

"Back working!" Betty echoed.

"Back working! Good heavens, I've never stopped working! Why, being in the Venner Company from eight-thirty to five is play compared with doing all the housework and taking care of June and Jerry. At five o'clock when I leave the office I'm through for the day. Tina will have given the babies their supper and I can play with them for an hour or so before they go to bed, just the way Tom does. Then we'll have a good hot dinner, got all ready for us; why, Mother Peyton, you only know office work; you just see house-keeping from the outside. Going back to Venner and Company will be like a vacation."

And as Mrs. Peyton's enthusiasm still failed to respond:

"Besides, think of what the money will do. Suppose Tina costs twenty dollars a week with her meals—that leaves ten clear gain. Think of the things Tom and I can do with ten dollars a week. Why, with his raise, we'll be on Easy Street. I can have a decent dress once in a while, and he can give that overcoat of his to the Salvation Army. It will mean all kinds of little luxuries that we've never been able to afford. And we'll save some, too. Tom won't be harassed and worried to death all the time."

"How does Tom feel about it?" Still the dubious chill in Mrs. Peyton's voice.

BETTY laughed, a tender, maternal laugh. "He hates it," she admitted, "right now. He's old-fashioned, you know. Believes that woman's place is in the home, wants to take care of his wife and children all himself, thinks that my going to work is a kind of reflection on him—all that mid-Victorian stuff. Goodness knows where he gets it, with such a thoroughly modern mother! But he'll get over it; I know Tom."

"How do you mean, get over it?"

"Get used to it. He'll fuss a little at first, the way he did when I decided to board Mr. Weeks summer before last. But by the time I'd got sick and tired of the extra work and was glad to have Mr. Weeks go, Tom had entirely forgotten that he hadn't wanted him to come, and missed him like everything. This will be just the same. He won't like it at all just at first, but he'll get used to it and then he'll see how much easier it makes things all around, and he'll be as pleased as I am."

Betty paused, the evident chill of Mrs. Peyton's lack of enthusiasm at last striking through the warmth of her own eagerness.

At last, "What's the matter, Mother Peyton?" Betty asked anxiously. "Don't you think it's a wonderful chance?"

Mrs. Peyton turned from the window, her eyes hard, unsympathetic. "No," she said.

"I don't. I agree absolutely with Tom. Your place is at home with your babies. He is taking the best care he possibly can of you; it would be a reflection on him for you to go out working in an office."

FOR a moment Betty stared at her mother-in-law, speechless with astonishment. She had been so sure of understanding, of sympathy here. "But —"

"I think it would be very unfortunate if Tom should get over feeling just as he does about it. There's no use my pretending that I think it would be a fine thing for you to do, because I don't. I think you'd be making a

(Continued on Page 192)

Sturdy Clothes for Growing Boys

PAUL JONES suits for boys are proper clothes for "reg'lar fellers." Clothes with the style and grace that youngsters appreciate and look for just as much as parents.

At the same time, they are made for real wear. Buttons that are sewed on to stay—seams that do not give with every strain—material that wears and wears. Sturdy, comfortable real boys' clothes.

And above all, Paul Jones Suits for boys are sensibly and reasonably priced!

Ask for Paul Jones Suits and Middies at your dealer's. If he cannot supply you write direct to us.

DRESS YOUR KIDDIES IN PAUL JONES MIDDIES

Look for this label.

MORRIS & COMPANY, Inc. Dept. A-1, Baltimore, Md.

PAUL JONES MIDDIES

ARCH-TONE SHOE

"THE TONIC FOR TIRED FEET!"

You CAN wear smart snug-fitting shoes

No need to sacrifice style for comfort

STURDY, active, tireless feet can be yours—in the Arch-Tone Shoe. The foot condition that fatigues you so—weak, tired arches—is relieved by this special-built shoe. A strong but light invisible steel shank gives firm support to the sagging arch of the foot, and extra strong counters hold the heel in place. The Arch-Tone Shoe is made over lasts which hug the instep, yet provide an extra bit of roominess for the forepart of the foot. Walk, dance, hike—be as active as you will—yet have the joy of comfortable tireless feet. And with it have perfect style, trim, graceful glove-fitting lines. Write for free book showing the new Arch-Tone styles and the name of the store where you will find them, or if you live in a town of 70,000 or over, call Tel-U-Where.

The Krohn-Fechheimer Co.
737 Dandridge Street, Cincinnati, Ohio
Makers of the famous Red Cross Shoe

No. 706—The Princeton—Refined simplicity in this black patent one strap. Price $9.00

No. 707—The Atlanta—Very smart, in Mahogany Calfskin, patent leather or kid. Price $9.00

PORCE-NAMEL

"The Better Kitchen Table"

The Executive Desk of the Good Cook

THE only things manufactured in the home are MEALS. To produce good meals is a science, not an accident. Success calls for knowledge and Porce-Namel equipment—the table that is the executive desk of a good cook.

Convenient?—none equals it! Clean?—yes, and easy to keep clean! Beautiful?—indeed and permanently so! Seasoned woods throughout; 3-ply panel construction on front, back and ends; 3 coats of snowy enamel all over it, inside and out—guarantee that Porce-Namel will not warp, crack, swell, shrink or discolor in heat and steam of the kitchen. All of the 12 Porce-Namel models have metal-backed, chip-proof tops, rust-proof metal bins and hardware and many have the famous swinging, disappearing stool.

See our dealer; see our line; send for our free catalog.

MUTSCHLER BROS. COMPANY
Nappanee, Ind.

Makers of Fine Tables Since 1892

"My profits on the time given to Curtis work are more generous than profits on any other kind of work I have ever tried."

Mrs Joseph H. Beach
OF GEORGIA

To learn without obligation all about our liberal offer to YOU for work as a subscription representative of our three nationally popular publications, send your name and address on a post card to The Curtis Publishing Company, 461 Independence Square, Philadelphia, Pa.

Peyton and Peyton

(Continued from Page 191)

very grave mistake, and I'd think it over well, if I were in your place, before I decided to do it."

"But, Mother Peyton"—pleadingly—"I don't understand your feeling this way; it's not like you to be old-fashioned; why, it's nothing but what you've done yourself, what thousands of women all over the country are doing."

"I don't care if millions of women are doing it. For a man to take care of his wife and children may be old-fashioned, but I think it's a very good fashion. It was different with me; you're not going into some special work you love; it's just for the money. You don't know that you'll make any great success. You may always have just a thirty-dollar-a-week job. Tom doesn't want you to do it; I think you ought to respect his wishes."

"But I tell you he'll get over it; it's just because the idea startled him. Oh, please don't set yourself against it so, Mother Peyton. I know it will work all right." Betty felt childishly hurt at Mrs. Peyton's lack of sympathy, as unexpected as a step down in the dark. "Please try to see how it looks to me. Even if it never amounts to any more than a thirty-dollar-a-week job, the difference just that would make to us! You know I'd never let my babies be neglected. And it's for Tom just as much as it is for me. Oh, please, Mother Peyton, try to see how it would look to you if you were in my place; please try." She leaned forward in her eager plea for understanding.

MRS. PEYTON looked coolly past the flushed, pleading face. "I can't stop your doing anything you like, of course," she said levelly. "You're Tom's wife, and I suppose you have the right to go ahead and ruin his life if you want to. I'm only his mother; I can't stop you. But don't pretend that you're doing it for him. You're ducking your real responsibilities, deliberately doing what he's asked you not to, turning your back on your home and children. And you're doing it because you're tired of the bargain you made yourself, and you don't mind going back on it. You knew what Tom was making when you married him; you knew that he would have to work hard and that you wouldn't have much money for clothes and luxuries. You knew he wanted a wife who would be a homemaker. You wanted to do it all right then. You went into it with your eyes open. Now you're tired of housework; you're bored with what Tom can give you; and you're not a game enough sport to stick to your bargain. I can't stop you, of course; but I'm not going to pretend that it isn't a wicked, selfish thing you're doing."

For a moment Betty merely looked at her mother-in-law in puzzled surprise. Then the surprise was swept away. All the petty antagonism, the envious resentments, the hurt sense of injustice that through three years Betty had kept stifled, hidden, burst out now in a sweeping hot flame of anger.

"YOU tell me I'm wicked and selfish!" After three years of smiling silence Betty felt strangely amazed to hear the words her own voice was speaking. "You call me selfish—you! You would try to keep me from doing what you yourself have done. And I know why too. It isn't on account of Tom and the babies, and it isn't because you are afraid I'll fail; you're afraid I'll succeed. That might take a little glory away from you. You want to be 'the brilliant Mrs. Peyton,' 'the successful Mrs. Peyton.' You like me for contrast! You like to have people say 'But this can't be your daughter!' It makes you feel young and successful. When people say 'And what does this Mrs. Peyton do?' you love to say 'Oh, she's the most perfect little housekeeper you ever saw!'"

I make such a splendid background for you. Don't you suppose I see through it, that I have right along? Don't you think I can see that you like to have me poor and shabby, getting prosy and old with sweeping and baking and washing dishes day after day? If I weren't, you couldn't patronize me."

They were the grievances of smiling weeks, of months, of years, that came rushing hotly from Betty's angry lips.

"You talk about my going back on my bargain, ruining Tom's life, that you're 'only his mother.' A fine mother you've been to him! You shipped him off to military school when he was nine so that you wouldn't have to be bothered with him at home; you let him work his way through college while you were wearing imported dresses; there wasn't money enough for him to join a good fraternity, but there was plenty for you to join all the clubs. You ride in taxis and think it is a good joke when he walks to save the street-car fare. You've gone your own way and got all you could out of life for yourself. Now when I want to help my husband in my own way, you talk to me about sticking to a bargain; you call me wicked and selfish. All right; I don't care what you think. You are right in one thing anyway; you can't stop me."

HER voice, grown high in anger, choked huskily and broke. She could see Mrs. Peyton's orange scarf blurring through a haze of tears. Betty fumbled for the arms of her rough, damp coat. If she could only get out of the office and away before she broke down!

"Wait a minute, Betty; wait a minute." But Betty was already groping for the door knob. "There's no need to wait," she said. "I've told you what I'm going to do. You can't stop me."

The hall outside was deserted. Betty walked quickly past the elevator and on to the window at the end, dragging at her gloves, dabbing at her eyes with her handkerchief.

A door down the hall opened, there were hurried steps along the tiled floor. Betty, keeping her face turned away from the intruder, pretended to be sauntering toward the elevator.

The steps came nearer; she felt a hand on her arm. "Please, Betty, come back for a minute."

She tried to draw away from Mrs. Peyton. "There's nothing to come back for," she said huskily.

"Come back a minute; I've got to tell you something." And as Betty still hesitated, "I'm sorry I said you were wicked and selfish. Please come back."

BETTY turned, and the two walked back to the real-estate office. For several moments Mrs. Peyton did not speak, standing by her desk, fumbling with the pencils, with the city directory. "I've got to tell you something," she repeated. "I've got to—tell you something. Please take off your coat, Betty, and stay."

Stiffly, Betty took off her damp coat and hung it on the coat rack.

Twice Mrs. Peyton turned from her desk as though to speak, twice turning back again, away from Betty. "I wouldn't ever have told you," she said suddenly, "if it hadn't been for this job of yours. I've never told a living soul before. I wouldn't tell you, just to keep you from thinking what you do of me—that doesn't make any difference."

Betty waited, saying nothing, her anger almost forgotten in sudden curiosity.

Mrs. Peyton stood for several seconds, fingering the articles on her desk, as though she could not go on. Suddenly she turned. "Betty, haven't you ever thought—surely

(Continued on Page 194)

The Spring issue of "The Tailored Woman" magazine is now out and you are entitled to a copy from the Wooltex merchant in your community. If you do not know who that is, write us and we will advise you and see that you receive a copy of the magazine at once. There is no charge.

SPRING COATS

Have you made your choice?

From the Spring issue of The Tailored Woman fashion magazine—and there is a copy for you at the store that sells Wooltex in your community—you will see that the spring coat has come into its own.

For those who know the grace a sweeping cape affords, there are varied effects. In some the cape is manifestly a cape, in another you will find it over each shoulder but flat and coat-like in back; again, it loses its identity in a luxurious wrappy coat or full, straight one. And equally alluring are coats of severer line—brisk top coats with snug shoulder and mannish collar, short coats for sports wear.

And the fabrics! Were they ever so fascinating and colorful?

Soft Marvella and Veldyne, the new éponge, wool crash and chinchilla—these are only a few. For the town and country coat tweeds reign supreme, real Bonnie Brae and Dunmurray tweeds, while brushed wool and Angora must not be overlooked.

Daring greens and scarlets, blue and rose in shades one never dreamed of, a fairly fragrant orchid tone. Even the tans and greys have a rosy tint, the browns a tawny cast.

And, best of all, you may see these Wooltex Tailor-mades for yourself in the store that sells Wooltex in your community. You may choose the model which becomes you, examine the fabric and finish and assure yourself that the Wooltex signature appears inside the collar. This signature is your guarantee that style, material and workmanship are the kind which lasts—which gives you "That Well Dressed Look."

"That Well Dressed Look"

Wooltex

Tailor-mades and Knockabouts

Wooltex Tailor-mades, $38, $48, $58

Wooltex Knockabouts, $25, $38, $45

"At the store that sells Wooltex"

NIAGARA GUARANTEED WALL PAPERS

What's in a name?

LIKE the craftsman of old—the maker of a good wall paper distinguishes its quality standard with a name. To discerning buyers this means much.

For instance—when one selects Niagara Wall Papers, he knows he is buying the finest decoration, American, French and English art has achieved. Further—he is assured full weight, full length, substantial material guaranteed by the maker because all paper is made in our own plant from spruce log to finished roll.

Easy to hang—extremely durable
Present conditions allow us to reduce prices to less than half. Look for this trade-mark

Niagara Wp. Co. U.S.A.

on the selva and guarantee with every roll.

Send for FREE BOOK

You can inspect the NIAGARA line at your dealer's or if you prefer we will gladly send free miniature sample book in colors on receipt of dealer's name and 2c stamp to partly cover postage.

Niagara Wall Paper Co.
105 Walnut St.
Niagara Falls, N. Y.

VISITORS to our modern plant always welcome.

HOME SUGGESTION BOOK FREE COPY SENT UPON REQUEST

Practical ideas for home decoration. Attractive treatments for kitchens, bathrooms, drawing rooms, porches, halls and all parts of the house. Showing the right use of Tiles—the enduring decorative material. Beautiful illustrations give ideal color and decorative combinations.

The Associated Tile Manufacturers
1282 Seventh Ave., Beaver Falls, Pa.

CONARD ROSES BLOOM or your money back

Did you ever hear of guaranteeing so fragile a thing as the bloom of a rose? We do it. A new plant or your money back should any Conard Star Rose not bloom. Send for big free catalog. This celluloid Star tag labels your growing rose and is the sign of our guarantee—two exclusive C. & J. features.

CONARD ★ ROSES
★ James Co. Box 20
West Grove, Pa. Right. Pity. Price.
A. Winner. V. Free. Backed by over 30 years' experience.

Peyton and Peyton

(Continued from Page 192)

you must have seen that Tom is a little like his father?"

"He's almost exactly like him," said Betty, puzzled. "They look alike; they have the same ways—"

"But they aren't much alike, not really. Looks and ways don't count. Really, they are only a little alike, just the least little bit. But Tom is like him, though, that little bit—what you said about boarding Mr. Weeks, you know."

"About boarding Mr. Weeks?" Betty repeated, bewildered.

"Yes; little things like that. Oh, Betty, can't you see why I don't want you to take a job? That little bit might grow. Tom might get to be like his father."

"Might get to be like his father," Betty repeated. "Why shouldn't he?"

"Oh, he should," Mrs. Peyton agreed eagerly, "in most ways. You—you like your Father Peyton, don't you?"

"I love him," said Betty honestly. "I can't remember my own father, but I know that if I did I couldn't love him any better than I do Father Peyton."

"And Tom—admires his father, doesn't he?" There was something strangely pleading in Mrs. Peyton's eagerness.

"Very much," said Betty.

THERE was a silence in the office. Betty was too puzzled to break it. Mrs. Peyton seemed uncertain how to go on. She sat drawing elaborate designs on her desk blotter. At last she looked up.

"I'm glad you love him," she said. "He is Tom's father. A man doesn't have to be a success to be lovable."

"But Dad is successful too," said Betty, puzzled.

"Tom thinks he is, too, doesn't he?" The pleading eagerness again.

"Of course," said Betty. "Everybody who knows anything about insurance knows Peyton and Peyton."

Mrs. Peyton dropped her pencil and leaned across the desk, her hands clutching the edges. "Betty," she said pleadingly, "won't you trust me? Everything of Peyton and Peyton's will be yours and Tom's some day. Won't you just be patient? Can't you stick things out as they are for a few years? Won't you just trust me?"

"If you mean won't I give up the idea of going back to work," said Betty, "I won't."

For a moment Mrs. Peyton looked full into her daughter-in-law's face, as though estimating the strength of purpose that she saw there. "There isn't any other way then," she said, "but to tell you. Nobody else in the world knows this. Peyton and Peyton isn't dad and me; it's me alone."

"But —"

"EVERYBODY thinks we're partners; oh, how I've lied and twisted and schemed to keep everybody thinking so! Partners! I am Peyton and Peyton myself. I started the firm with my own money that I'd earned and saved; it would have been on the rocks in a year if it hadn't been for me. It's all my work, all my responsibility. I tell you, I am Peyton and Peyton."

"But I thought —"

"Of course you did; everybody does. Oh, between us we've kept up the bluff; we've fooled the world. Without me he'd be a clerk in the office. But nobody knows. He is liked and respected; he belongs to clubs; everywhere he is treated as a successful business man—Mr. Peyton, of Peyton and Peyton. Oh, I've kept up the bluff. Nobody in the world, not even his own son, knows that he is a failure, a bluffing, satisfied, irresponsible failure."

"Why, I can't believe—Are you sure —"

"Sure! Do you think I've wanted to believe it? I've blamed myself; I've tried to shut my eyes to it; I've even fooled myself sometimes for awhile. But you can't do that forever. Oh, yes, I'm sure. Nobody else in the world knows it, but it's true enough."

Betty did not speak. There was no doubting the bitter sincerity in the other woman's voice. Yet to make this new truth fit the Father Peyton she had known, the best table in the restaurant, settling large financial problems with a phrase—

"Oh, I wouldn't believe it myself, for years. I felt just as you do—more because he was my husband. I hated the first man who tried to open my eyes, for years. He was the head of a firm where Tom had lost a job; he was always losing jobs when we were first married, or giving them up; and I went to see the man myself."

"I WAS so sure that the office manager who had let Tom go had been unfair. I thought if I could go over his head I could have him made to take Tom back. I saw the head of the firm himself, and he told me why the office manager had been right. I have never forgotten his words. He said: 'Mrs. Peyton, I don't want your husband working for me. He is a four-flusher. He bluffs and swaggers and that's all. He never makes good.'"

"I hated him for saying it, and I didn't believe it—not then. But it was true. It took me years to find it out—years after I went back to working; years when as fast as I helped out with one responsibility after another, Tom shuffled off his share of it; years when he gave up this job because there was no future in it, that one because he wasn't getting ahead fast enough, another where he was fired; years when I stuck to a job where there wasn't any future; years when I learned to get along with any boss because I had to. There was rent and food and clothes and little Tom to pay for; somebody had to have a job and hold it."

"I didn't set out to be a successful business woman. I was going to work for a year or two to help out, just till Tom got on his feet." She looked around the office and laughed—a mirthless laugh. "Well, I'm still working. You can't imagine what it is, Betty, to see a man you love go to pieces; to see him bluster because you want to pay the extra rent yourself when you need a little larger apartment; bluster—and then let you pay it; and, after a while, let you pay the rent of the whole apartment 'for just this one month,' and finally take it for granted that you will do it right along. Oh, it starts, little by little, in ways like that."

"AND it never stops; it goes on to bigger and bigger things. I wouldn't let myself see the truth. When I had saved money enough and had a good chance to open this office, I thought it would answer the problem. Here would be a place for Tom where there'd be all the future he could make, where there'd be no difficult boss, where we could get ahead as fast as we could, together. We'd be partners—Peyton and Peyton. Betty, nobody can ever know what those years were while I was learning that what Tom's old boss had said was true."

"I pulled Peyton and Peyton along, fixed one thing after another so Tom could do no harm, and made good. But it's been in spite of him every step, never because of him. By the time the business was on a paying basis it was really mine altogether. Tom had stopped feeling the least responsibility in it or for his wife and son."

"I've made good in a business way, very good, but I've seen the most precious thing a woman can have, her respect for her husband, crumble and disappear—not because Tom wasn't a good business man—plenty of fine men aren't—but because I came to see that he wasn't really manly, that all that high-handed male way of his was just bluff—cheap, irresponsible bluff. It's many a bitter pill a woman has had to swallow, Betty, before she gets to where she'll admit to herself that the man she has married is just a four-flusher."

(Continued on Page 195)

Do You
Need Money?

WRITE TO ME NOW!

and I will tell you an easy way to have more money to spend

Thousands of women have a vital need for more money—to properly bring up their family—to meet the present cost of living and tide them over this period of unemployment. Many of them have been helped in this problem and now have money to spend and a permanent assured income by becoming our representatives and selling our

World's Star
Hosiery and Knit
Underwear

to their friends and neighbors. As we have shown them, we can show you a fine independent way to have more money to spend.

We've Helped More Than 25,000

They are now enjoying large and prosperous businesses with constantly increasing sales. With our help their incomes are growing larger every day. You can do the same as they have done.

Write to-day! We will send you our beautifully illustrated catalog—shows how easy it is to become a World's Star Money Maker. Protected territory—prompt deliveries. We have been in business for twenty-seven years.

WORLD'S STAR KNITTING CO.
DEPT. 32, BAY CITY, MICH.

Dennison's

CHILDREN'S PARTIES

—such fun to give but so hard to make a success—unless you charm the youngsters with the Dennison "Children's Party Goods." Fascinating novelties for the clever party—pretty invitations, place cards, decorations and "fixings." The kiddies love it all and mothers are grateful. Ask your nearest dealer.

Write for "The Further Adventures of Jim, John and Jane"—the children will be delighted.
DENNISON
DEPT. A4
Framingham, Mass.

What Next?

$3 BRINGS THIS COLLAPSIBLE Acme DRESS FORM INTO YOUR HOME

MAKES DRESSMAKING EASY
Perfect fitting dresses easily and quickly reproduced! Makes dressmaking a pleasure and satisfaction. As necessary for fitting in the sewing machine for cutting.

DUPLICATES YOUR EXACT FIGURE
By setting "each section of form" it quickly and independently adjusts Neck, Shoulders, Bust, Waist, Hips and Skirt to exactly reproduce any woman's style, size or figure.

EASY PAYMENT TERMS
Rent $3 and we will send you our guaranteed $15 Acme Collapsible Adjustable Form. Pay the balance of $12 at the rate of $3 a month. Ten Days' Trial. If unsatisfactory, return form and we will gladly refund your $3.

Order on "Acme" Form today or write for Free Illustrated Catalogue with detailed information.
ACME SALES COMPANY, Dept. 47
350 Throop Avenue Brooklyn, N. Y.

Write for Illustrated Catalog and Easy Payment Terms

KEEPS SHOES SHAPELY HIDES LARGE JOINTS

Affords instant relief for bunions and large joints, hides irregularities of foot form. Worn in any shoe; no larger size required. Over one-half million in use. Ask your shoe dealer or druggist. Write today for special free trial offer. No pay if no relief. State size of shoes and if for right or left foot.

THE FISCHER MANUFACTURING CO.
First National Bank Bldg., Dept. 46, Milwaukee, Wis.

Digitized by Google

Transform Your Home

Modernize your natural or dark finished woodwork with

Luxeberry ENAMEL
The Finish Immaculate

The result of 18 years of enamel making. Made in six color tones and a "white that stays white"—LUXEBERRY ENAMEL never peels, checks or cracks—write for booklet on Beautiful Homes.

BERRY BROTHERS
World's Largest Makers
Varnishes and Paint Specialties
Detroit — — — — — Walkerville, Ont.

Dye Old Faded Things New with "Diamond Dyes"

Each package of "Diamond Dyes" contains directions so simple that any woman can dye or tint faded, shabby skirts, dresses, waists, coats, sweaters, stockings, hangings, draperies, everything like new. Buy "Diamond Dyes"—no other kind—then perfect home dyeing is guaranteed, even if you have never dyed before. Tell your druggist whether the material you wish to dye is wool or silk, or whether it is linen, cotton, or mixed goods. Diamond Dyes never streak, fade, or run.

Wells & Richardson Co., Burlington, Vt.

$100 a Week FOR DRAWING

How would you like a fine position at $100 a week? If you like to draw, develop your talent in a practical way. Good commercial artists earn this much, and more. Well-trained beginners soon command $50 a week.

Learn Quickly at Home

The "Federal" Master Course teaches you by mail in your spare time. No experience needed. Read "Your Future," a splendid book telling all about this remarkable course, and the success of Federal Students. Send for it today—it's free for the asking. State age and occupation.

Federal School of Commercial Designing 923 Federal School Bldg.
Minneapolis, Minnesota

Bea Nurse

Learn in spare time at home Earn $30-$35 a week Every woman should learn. We train Beginners, Practical Nurses, Mothers and Religious Workers by our Fascinating Home-study Method. Leading Chicago System. Endorsed by physicians. Established 12 years.

Earn while learning

If you are over 18 and under 35 years of age write for illustrated catalog and 32 Sample Lesson Pages with FREE details of Money-Back Guarantee and FREE NURSE'S EQUIPMENT.

Chicago School of Nursing, Dept. 34, 421 Ashland Blvd., Chicago

Peyton and Peyton

(Continued from Page 194)

"Oh, how I have wondered if it was partly my own fault, if it wasn't wrong for me ever to have taken the first step! I have come to see so clearly, so painfully, how a man needs responsibility; it's like ballast for a ship; he is never a real man until he has learned to carry it. Tom's father will be just a boy, an immature, bluffing, irresponsible boy as long as he lives. Perhaps he couldn't have been anything else anyway—I don't know. But I shall always be miserably sure that having to carry responsibility is the only thing in the world which could possibly have made a man of him—and I robbed him of that."

"I've kept everybody else from finding him out, though. At least I've done that. You wouldn't think a whole city could be so fooled. His bluffing, high-handed way was what made it possible. People always did believe in him, just naturally, and kept on believing as long as they possibly could, on account of that way of his. Well, I just backed up that way—made good on his bluff. Oh, between us we've built up a glorious fairy tale. And after all these years everybody believes it. I doubt there is a person in the whole city who suspects that it is my money that cashes the checks he signs, that they are my decisions that he gives out with such dash, that his very walking sticks and tobacco are charged to 'our accounts' at the stores, and that I pay for them."

She laughed, a hard laugh that suddenly broke. Her chin trembled. "It's almost funny, isn't it?" A tear ran down her cheek, furrowing the powder, making her look suddenly old, made up.

SHE fumbled in her desk drawer for a handkerchief, and something in the bent shoulders caught Betty's heart in a sharp twist of pity. The expensive frock and shoes, the Irish lace vest—all these were just the gay trappings of a middle-aged and disappointed woman, who was gamely making the best of a bad bargain.

Quickly Betty crossed the office and caught the other woman's hand. "I'm awfully sorry I talked to you the way I did," she said. "I didn't understand; I'd give anything on earth to unsay it."

"Oh, never mind that; I'll never think of it again," Mrs. Peyton dabbed at her eyes, keeping her face averted.

Suddenly she turned. "You see now, don't you, why I'm fairly praying you won't take this job. Oh, Betty, I'm so afraid!"

"You mean that you are afraid Tom, my Tom, might get to be like that too?"

"Oh, I don't think so; not really. But there's always the chance; he's got his father's looks and his father's ways—you said so yourself. You said he hated your going back to work now, but that he'd get over it. That—that scared me a little. He's the one thing that has made it worth while—this bluffing and planning. To have a son with all his father's loveliness, but without his weakness."

"I've done all I can to make a strong man out of Tom—military school when he seemed just a baby, making him earn all his own money, never helping him out, letting him worry himself half sick over bills it would be nothing for me to pay. Whenever I'd feel that I couldn't stand it any longer, I'd go out and buy one of you some silly, extravagant thing. It was slim comfort, though, to give you diamonds when you needed coal. But it's paid, Betty; it has paid. For some way or another Tom has always managed to buy the coal himself."

"It's been especially hard since June came, seeing him overworking and worrying; two children are almost more of a burden nowadays than a man on a small salary can carry. But Tom's carrying it. He's doing it. And he worries over it, Betty; he worries over it; that proves that he's a real man. Oh, how glad and relieved I was when he went back to his old place after quitting it in a huff. I don't know whether he or Caxley was right; it doesn't make any difference; it showed that Tom isn't like his father. He didn't put his 'pride' ahead of his responsibilities."

"AND now he's getting ahead—think of the honest pride of it, Betty!—getting ahead on honest work and ability. Oh, don't do anything to rob him of the satisfaction of it; he's worked so hard, don't make him feel that you can't wait for him to go on, that his efforts alone aren't enough. Don't take the chance I took. It isn't just a mother's fondness; I know you've got better human material than I had to work with. But Tom is the least little bit like his father; oh, don't give that little bit the chance to grow!"

"It wouldn't grow, no matter what I did," Betty said. "Tom's all man, Mother Peyton, clear through. I know him better than you do, even if you are his mother. There's nothing of the bluffer, the four-flusher, about Tom. He may have the cocksure, high-handed way once in a while, but he always does his everlasting best to back it up. He's—why, he's everything a real man ought to be."

"That's all he needs, Betty, somebody to have that kind of faith in him. It's what you can give him, don't you see? I can't have it; I can only hope; what I've gone through has taken the faith all out of me. I keep looking for the other in him; I'm afraid."

"But it isn't just 'having faith'; surely you must see that it's true. You must know what Tom really is."

"And you're so sure," wistfully, "that you're willing to put it to the test?"

"I'm so sure," said Betty proudly, "that I don't need to put it to the test. If you honestly think it is any comfort or—or inspiration to a man to have a woman prove that she's willing just to wait and trust everything to him—well, I'm willing to gamble a few years on Tom."

IN THE rose-shaded restaurant of the Dunwoody the Junior Peytons were dining with the Senior Peytons. The two people who had stopped at their table on the way out were chatting with Mrs. Peyton, Senior.

"I'll tell you what it is," the other woman declared plaintively, "there's nothing like having a career to keep a woman young. It makes me simply furious every time I look at you to know that you're a year older than I am and yet see you looking like a flapper."

Mrs. Peyton laughed with blithe complacency, waving a new, flame-colored, feather-tipped fan. "I'm glad if it does something," she said gayly. "My poor husband ought to have some compensation for letting his wife be around underfoot all day. Most men have a few hours a day vacation from the matrimonial treadmill, you know."

She glanced a young, coquettish challenge at her husband, and he responded, including the other woman in the compliment, with the genial gallantry that always made women, young and old, ardent admirers of the successful Mr. Peyton.

"And what does this Mrs. Peyton do? I suppose you're going to have a career of some sort too?"

Betty smiled up from behind her new flame-colored, feather-tipped fan, an expensive, useless, outrageously lovely celebration gift exactly like her mother-in-law's.

"I'm afraid not," she admitted. "I have a young son and daughter who furnish me with about all the career I can manage. I guess I shall have to be one of those women who shine in their husbands' reflected glory."

She did not glance at Tom, so she did not see the look of flattered, protective tenderness that flashed across his face. But over the flower-decked table the eyes of Mrs. Peyton, Junior, met those of Mrs. Peyton, Senior. It was the smile of a moment only, comradely, gallant, gay, the smile of one dead-gone sport at another.

The Very Latest in "Fiskhats" describes the service that Fiskhat dealers offer. New models constantly reach them, shipped the very day they were created. The label "Fiskhats" means "Style and Quality Assured."

Your Fiskhat Dealer is Style Leader in your community. Kept in intimate touch through us with the latest trend of the styles—always ready to assist you in a wise and becoming selection.

Write for Style Letter

A choice showing of latest Fiskhats. Please mention your dealer's name.

D. B. FISK & CO.

Creators of Correct Millinery
225 North Wabash Ave., Chicago
New York — Chicago — Paris

The name that means "Style and Quality Assured"

DRESSMAKING MADE EASY

You can now learn, easily and quickly, right in your own home, during spare time, by a wonderfully simple and practical new method, how to plan and make all your own and your children's clothes and save half or more on everything.

You can make your last season's dresses and suits over into stylish new garments. You can make fashionable clothes from inexpensive materials. You can prepare for success in the dressmaking or millinery profession and have a cozy, profitable shop of your own.

Write today for handsome illustrated book and learn from the experience of over 125,000 delighted members what the Woman's Institute can do for you. State whether most interested in Home or Professional Dressmaking or Millinery.

TEAR OUT HERE

WOMAN'S INSTITUTE

Dept. 38-D, Scranton, Penna.

Please send me one of your booklets and tell me how I can learn the subject marked below:

☐ Home Dressmaking ☐ Millinery
☐ Professional Dressmaking ☐ Cooking

Name _____ (Please specify whether Mrs. or Miss)

Address _____

CLARK'S CRUISES by C. P. R. STEAMERS

Clark's 3rd Cruise, January 23, 1923

ROUND THE WORLD

Superb SS "EMPERESS OF FRANCE"

19481 Gross Tons, Specially Chartered

4 MONTHS' CRUISE, $1000 and up

Including Hotels, Fees, Drives, Guides, etc.

Clark's 19th Cruise, February 3

TO THE MEDITERRANEAN

Sumptuous SS "EMPERESS OF SCOTLAND"

25000 Gross Tons, Specially Chartered

65 DAYS' CRUISE, $600 and up

Including Hotels, Fees, Drives, Guides, etc.

19 days Egypt, Palestine, Spain, Italy, Greece, etc.

Europe stop-overs allowed on both cruises.

Europe and Passion Play Parties, $400 up

Frank C. Clark, Times Building, New York.

American Lady Corsets for the Well-Developed Figure

ONLY in one way can the woman with a stout figure wear her clothes smartly, and that is by wearing a corset that was definitely designed to meet her needs—a corset that combines fashion, health and service—an American Lady Corset scientifically designed for the stout figure.

American Lady Corsets for the well-developed woman guide the stout figure into lines of fashionable symmetry—provide correct support—and promote healthful posture. Every gusset, every line of design, the length of every strand of Mightybone which enters into each model has been studied to aid the stout figure. To the minutest detail, American Lady Corsets are scientifically individualized!

Mightybone, too—exclusive with American Lady models—meets the demands of the well-developed woman. It holds the figure trimly and snugly, yet affords a willowy pliancy!

Your dealer will show you an American Lady model for each type of stout figure—models that are designed to reduce over-development—models featuring the new exclusive American Lady Plio-Top. Find the model that fits your figure—the corset will do the rest!

There is an individual American Lady Corset for every type of figure—slim, medium or stout.

AMERICAN LADY CORSET COMPANY, INC.
DETROIT CHICAGO NEW YORK SAN FRANCISCO

Plio-Top model 892. Pink coutil with elastic inserts at back and medium length skirt. Sizes 26 to 36. $6.00

Plio-Top model 908. Made with a long skirt to lend to the thighs and side inserts of elastic to allow for expansion in sitting. Pink coutil. Sizes 24 to 38. $8.00

Model 776. A long skirt and side inserts of elastic to allow for expansion in sitting. Made of pink coutil. Sizes 24 to 36. $4.00

Model 704. Fashioned of pink brocade with medium length skirt. Sizes 24 to 34. $3.50

This tag is attached to every American Lady model. It guarantees a specialized corset.

American Lady Youthful Stout Corsets

Old Dog—New Tricks

(Continued from Page 19)

There was something pathetic in dear old Laddie's pleasure over the new trick he had learned, or so it seemed to the two people who loved him. And they continued to flatter him for it even when, among other trophies, he dragged home a pickax momentarily laid aside by a road mender and an extremely dead chicken which a motor-truck wheel had flattened to waferlike thickness.

Which brings us, by degrees, to the Rennick kidnapping case.

Claude Rennick, a New York artist of considerable means, had rented for the summer an ancient colonial farmhouse high among the Ramapo hills, some six miles north of the Place. There he and his pretty young wife and their six-month-old baby had been living for several weeks when, angered at a sharp rebuke for some dereliction in his work, Schwartz, their gardener, spoke insultingly to Mrs. Rennick. Rennick chanced to overhear. Being foolishly in love with his wife, he did not content himself with discharging Schwartz. Instead, he thrashed the stalwart gardener then and there and ended the drastic performance by pitching the beaten man bodily out of the grounds.

Schwartz collected his battered anatomy and limped away to his home in the hills just above. And that night he called into council his two farmhand brothers and his wife. Several characteristic plans of revenge were discussed in solemn detail. These included the burning of the Rennick house or barn, or both; the shooting of Rennick from among the hillside bowlders as the artist sketched; waylaying him on his walk to the post office by night and crippling him for life; and other suggestions equally dear to the hearts of rural malefactors.

BUT one plan after another was vetoed. Then it was that Mrs. Schwartz hit upon an idea which promised not only punishment but profit. She had done washing for the Rennicks and she had access to the house. She proposed that they steal the Rennick baby on the first night when opportunity should offer, carry him to a car the brothers were to have waiting and thence take him to her sister in Paterson.

There the youngster would be well cared for. In a family of not less than seven children the presence of an extra baby would not excite police query. Her sister had more than once taken babies to board with her, during their mothers' temporary absence in service or in jail. And the newcomer could pass readily as one of these.

Negotiations could set in; and if care were taken a reward of at least two thousand dollars might be extracted safely from the frantic parents. Thus the Rennicks could be made to sweat blood, and money too, in payment for the injuries wrought upon the aching frame of Schwartz.

The next Thursday evening Rennick and his wife went as usual to the weekly meeting of a neighborhood bridge club which they had joined for the summer. The baby was left in charge of a competent nurse. At nine o'clock the nurse went to the telephone in reply to a call purporting to be from an attendant at a New York hospital. This call occupied the best part of twenty minutes. For the attendant proceeded to tell her in a very roundabout way that her son had been run over and had come to the hospital with a broken leg. He dribbled the information and was agonizingly long-winded and vague in answering her volley of frightened questions.

Shaken between duty to her job and a yearning to catch the next train for town, she went back at last to the nursery. The baby's crib was empty.

It had been the simplest thing in the world for Mrs. Schwartz to enter the house by the unfastened front door while one of her husband's brothers held the nurse in telephone talk; and to go up to the nursery unseen while the other servants were in the kitchen quarters. There she had picked up the baby and had carried him gently down to the front door and out of the grounds.

ONE of Schwartz' brothers was waiting beyond the gate with a disreputable little runabout. Presently the second brother joined him. Mrs. Schwartz lifted the baby into the car. One of the men held it while the other took his place at the steering wheel. The runabout had started upon its orderly fourteen-mile trip to Paterson before the panic-stricken nurse could give the alarm.

Mrs. Schwartz then walked toward the village, where her husband joined her. The two proceeded together to the local motion-picture theater. There they laughed so loudly over the comedy on the screen that the manager had to warn them to be quieter. At once the couple became noisily abusive. And they were ordered ignominiously from the theater. There could scarcely have been a better alibi to prove their absence of complicity in the kidnapping.

Meanwhile the two brothers continued quietly on their journey toward Paterson. The baby slept. His bearer had laid him softly on the floor of the car. A few drops of paregoric administered by Mrs. Schwartz as the child awoke for an instant on the way to the gate insured sound slumber. The joggling of the car did not rouse the tiny sleeper as he lay snugly between the feet of the man into whose care he had been given.

The first six miles of the easy journey were soon traversed. Then, with a pop and a dispiritedly swishing sound, a rear tire collapsed. Out into the road jumped both men. Their nerves were none too steady. And already in fancy they could hear all the police cars in New Jersey close at their heels. It behooved them to change tires in a hurry and to finish their nerve-twisting trip.

The driver vaulted over the side nearest him and began to explore the under-seat regions for a jack. The other man picked up the baby and hurried to the rear of the runabout to detach the spare tire from its dusty rack. Manifestly he could not unstrap the tire while he was carrying a baby in his arms. So he set down his burden at the roadside near him.

Then, still obsessed by fear of pursuit, he hit on a safer scheme. Picking up the sleeper again, he carried the warm little bundle to the far side of the road, some thirty yards beyond, and deposited it there behind a dwarf alder bush, which screened it from any stray automobilist who might be passing.

(Continued on Page 198)

Charming Hats for Girls of All Ages

The PRISCILLA DEAN HAT Label—gold on the rich purple silk lining—is your assurance of superior value and high quality. Distinctive styles, beautiful colors, exquisite workmanship—yet PRISCILLA DEAN HATS cost no more than ordinary hats. Every hat's a beauty, every value a delightful surprise. And the range of head sizes is complete for all ages—from six to eighteen. See the display at the store that sells these hats—you'll be delighted!

And write for the Spring Style Book. With it we send the second of the "Stories for little ladies."

BAER BROS. MFG. CO.
906 W. Lake Street, Chicago, Ill.

Priscilla Dean Hats
The Standard of the Millinery

TABLE SERVICE-WAGON
Large Broad Wide Table Top—Removable Glass Service Tray—Double Drawers—Durable Handles—Lugs—Deep Underbelly—"Silent-cally Silent"—Rubber Tired Swivel Wheels. A high grade piece of furniture unsurpassed for General Utility—Bar—Lobby—Saloon. Write for pamphlet and dealer's name.

WEDDING Engraved Invitations or Announcements, etc. If you want quality and service at moderate prices write for samples and correct forms. 100 engraved Visiting Cards $2.40. Birth Announcements 100 per doz. ROYAL ENGRAVING CO., 814 & Walnut St., Phila., Pa.

High School Course in 2 Years

You can complete this simplified High School Course at home inside of two years. Meets all requirements for entrance to college and the leading professions. This and thirty-six other practical courses are described in our Free Bulletin. Send for it TODAY.

AMERICAN SCHOOL
Dept. H-453 Drexel Ave. & 58th St., CHICAGO

"I Must Support Myself and Two Little Ones"

MRS. BERTHA L. SMITH of Massachusetts began work as our local representative in December of last year. She doesn't have much time to spare—she has her own home to care for, she is the sole support of her two daughters and she gives music lessons—yet she easily earned more than ten extra dollars before the end of this first month.

Do You Want Pleasant Part-Time Work That Pays Well?

OTHER busy women in all parts of the United States have, like Mrs. Smith, found in our offer a pleasant source of easy part-time profit. The Ladies' Home Journal, The Saturday Evening Post and The Country

Gentleman are popular, subscribers are easy to find, the profits are generous and the business is permanent. A post card request sent to the address below will bring full details of our liberal offer to subscription representatives.

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY

489 INDEPENDENCE SQUARE

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA

Butcher's BOSTON POLISH or Hard Wax Finish

is easy to apply. Quickly gives to floors and all wood-work a lasting finish—that rich luster approved by modern interior decorators as the only finish permissible in the well-furnished home. Prolongs the life of linoleums. Gives the final touch of elegance to your car. Be sure to get the genuine orange can with the Butcher Star.

If not at your dealer's send 25c for generous sample can and test its many merits. In any case let us send you our booklet, "Boston Polish," FREE.

The Butcher
Polish Co.

Mfrs. for Forty Years
Boston, Mass.

AEROLUX VENTILATING PORCH SHADES

LIVE on your porch; eat—sleep—rest—visit there—enjoy perfect privacy and healthful outdoor air, protected against scorching sunshine by Aerolux Porch Shades. Durable, economical, self-ventilating, beautiful. Won't flap in wind.

Write for "Book of Porches" that shows how to make porches more attractive and useful.

The Aerolux Company
2226 Oakland Ave., Waukegan, Wis.

Become a Nurse $25 to $35 a Week

BY training at home through our correspondence course. Twenty years of success—12,000 graduates. Age 19 to 55. The standard course of home training for nursing. Invaluable for the woman who wants to become a nurse. Indispensable for the practical nurse. Entire tuition earned in a few weeks. Two months' trial. Money refunded if dissatisfied. Send for catalog.

The Chautauqua School of Nursing
315 Main Street Jamestown, N. Y.

GORHAM SILVER POLISH WILL CLEAN SILVER, IVORY AND CELLULOID

SELLING AGENTS: HAROLD F. RITCHIE & COMPANY, INC.,
171 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK; ALSO OF LONDON, ENGLAND; TORONTO, CANADA; SYDNEY, AUSTRALIA.

$1 PERSONAL STATIONERY

100 special size ultra fashionable Hammermill Bond note sheets and 100 envelopes printed and mailed to you for $1.00. Postage 15c. CLOVERLEAF PRESS, Jacksonville, Illinois

Old Dog—New Tricks

(Continued from Page 197)

Thus in case of pursuit he and his brother would merely be changing tires and would know nothing of any missing baby.

Failing to find a jack under the seat the driver climbed over into the adjoining field in search of two or three big stones to serve the same purpose in holding up the axle. For several minutes the men worked fast and tensely, blind and deaf to anything except the need of haste.

Thus it was that neither of them saw a tawny-and-snow collie, huge and shaggy except for a pair of absurdly tiny white forepaws, come pacing majestically along the road from the direction in which they were heading. The car lamps played but faintly upon the advancing Lad, for the dimmers had been applied. The big dog was taking his usual before-bedtime stroll. Of old that evening stroll had been confined to the Place's grounds a quarter mile beyond. But lately his new obsession for finding treasures for the mistress had lured him often and oftener to the highway.

To-night, as for a day or so past, he had drawn blank in his quest. The road had been distressingly bare of anything worth carrying home. But now, as he moved along, his nearsighted eyes were attracted by a blur of white behind a bush at the road edge, just within the dim radiance of the car lamps. Even sooner than he saw this, his keen nostrils had told him of human presence there. He shifted his course to investigate.

STANDING over the compactly fastened swathing of clothes, Laddie bent down and sniffed. It was a human. He knew that, in spite of the thick veil that covered the slumberer's face. But it was also a bundle. It was a bundle which might well be expected to delight the mistress almost as much as had the parasol, far more than had the defunct chicken.

Daintily, with infinite gentleness, Lad fixed his teeth in the loosest portion of the bundle that he could find and lifted it. It was amazingly heavy even for so powerful a dog. But difficulties had never yet swerved Lad from any set purpose. Bracing his strength, he turned homeward, carrying the burden between his mighty jaws.

And now he was aware of some subtler feeling than mere desire to bring the mistress one more gift. His great heart had ever gone out in loving tenderness toward everything helpless and little. He adored children. The roughest of them could take unpardonable liberties with him. He would let them maul and mistreat him to their hearts' content, and he reveled in such usage, although to humans other than the mistress and the master he was sternly resentful of any familiarity.

His senses told him this bundle contained a child, a baby.

It had been lying alone and defenseless beside the road. He had found it. And his heart warmed to the helpless little creature which was so heavy to carry.

Proudly now he strode along, his muscles tensed, moving as if on parade. The bundle swinging from his jaws was carried as lovingly as though it might break in sixty pieces at any careless step.

The spare tire was adjusted. The men glanced nervously up and down the road. No car or pedestrian was in sight. The driver scrambled to his place at the wheel. His brother crossed to the alder bush behind whose shelter he had left the baby.

BACK he came on the run. "Tain't there!" he blithered. "Tain't there! 'Tain't rolled nowhere neither. It's been took. What—what're we goin' to —"

He got no further. His brother had scrambled down from the seat and pushed him aside in a dash for the alder. But a few seconds of frantic search proved the baby was gone. The two men glared at each other in silent horror. Then by tacit impulse they got into the car.

"It couldn't 'a' walked off, could it?" gurgled the driver. "They can't walk, can they—not at six months? Not far anyhow?"

"It—it was took," sputtered his brother between chattering teeth.

Another moment of scared silence. Then the driver rallied his awed faculties. Stepping on the self-starter, he brought the runabout into motion and headed down the road.

"Where are you goin'?" queried the other. "No use a-keepin' on this d'rection. It —"

"If it was took," answered the driver truculently, "twasn't took by no car. We'd 'a' heard a car or we'd 'a' saw it. If it had been took by two or three folks a-walkin', we'd 'a' heard 'em blat to each other when they seen the kid layin' there. That means it was took by one person all alone. He didn't pass us while we was workin'. Then, unless he's took to the fields, he's a-goin' the same way we are. An' we're due to overhaul him. There'll only just be one of him, and there's two of us. I ain't aimin' to lose my slice of that two thousand without hittin' a single lick to get it. If he — Sufferin' pink snakes!"

IN HIS sudden dismay he drove down both feet on the pedals. The indignant car stalled. Through the blackness ahead the white ray from the lamps had picked up a weird object. And the two brethren stared at it, slack jawed.

Walking sedately on, in front of the stalled runabout and in the exact center of the dusty road, moved an animal. Huge and formless it bulked as it receded into the fainter glow of light. It might have been anything from a lion to a bear in that uncertain glimmer. But the lamps' rays had played strongly enough on one detail of the apparition to identify it, past doubt, to both the dumfounded onlookers. They saw, clearly enough, a white bundle suspended from the monster's jaws, unquestionably the bundle which had been laid behind the alder.

For perhaps ten seconds the men sat motionless, gaping goggle-eyed.

Then the driver murmured in a far-away voice: "Did you—did you—was you fool enough to think you seen anything? Was you, Eitel?"

"I—I sure seen suthin', Roodie," quavered Eitel. "Suthin' with—with the kid in its mouth. It —"

"That's good enough for me," announced the heroic Roodie, stamping again on the self-starter. "If we both seen it, then it was there. And I'm goin' after it."

In another brace of seconds the lights once more picked up the dark animal with its white bundle. Eitel shrank back in his seat. But Roodie put on another notch of gas. And coming closer both recognized the strange bundle carrier as a dark-hued collie dog.

THE identification did little to ease their feeling of incredulous mystification. But it banished their superstitious dread. Both of them were used to dogs. And though neither could guess how this particular dog happened to be stealing the twice-stolen baby, yet neither had the remotest fear of tackling the beast and rescuing its human plunder.

Roodie brought the abused runabout to another jerky stop, within a few inches of the unconcerned collie. And he and Eitel swarmed earthward from opposite sides of the machine. In a trice Roodie had struck Lad over the head, while Eitel grabbed at the bundle to drag it away from the dog.

The weight of years was beginning to tell on Laddie. But that weight had not robbed him of the ability to call at will upon much of his old-time strength and bewildering swiftness. Nor had it in any way dampened his hero spirit or dulled his uncannily wise brain.

He had been plodding peacefully along, bearing home a wonderful gift—a gift oftener confided to the care of storks than of collies—when he had been attacked from two sides in most unprovoked fashion. He had been struck! His blood surged hot.

There was no law governing such a case. So, as usual in new crises, Lad proceeded to make his own law and to put it into effect.

A deft turn of the head eluded Eitel's snatching hand. With the lightness of a feather, Lad deposited the bundle in the soft dust of the road. In practically the same

(Continued on Page 199)

Built with Ideal Brick Walls—cost less than frame

Your Own Home

The Ideal Wall Makes
Your Dream Come True

THE Ideal Wall enables you to build a beautiful brick home at the cost of frame. This wonderful new idea cuts the cost of wall construction one-third, producing a dry, permanent, fire-safe dwelling. Suits any locality; uses any standard brick. Laid in any bond; any pattern.

Ideal Wall Saves Brick, Mortar,
Labor, Time, Furring and Lath

It is the strongest and driest air-spaced wall ever conceived. Any brick wall saves painting, insurance and upkeep—the Ideal Wall also saves materials and labor.

If you want to know how to build a brick house at cost of frame, send for free circular.

The Common Brick Industry of America
1328 Schofield Bldg. Cleveland, Ohio

G & R Hardy Roses

On their own roots. Sure to bloom. True to name.

Rainbow Collection
5 Hardy Roses. Different Colors
Columbia—Rich pink
Crusader—Velvety crimson
Gladys Holland—Buff and orange
Madam Butterfly—Pink, apricot and gold
Alexander Hill Gray—Ivory cream-flashed

Mailed postpaid $1 to any address. Guaranteed to reach you in good growing condition. All G & R roses are grown in large quantities, which enables us to sell them at moderate prices. Over four million roses sold by us last year.

SPECIAL OFFERS

6 Hardy Chrysanthemums—embracing all colors. $1.00
6 Gladys—Cream of newer sorts, selected colors. $1.00
6 Liberty—Choice colors—assorted. $1.00
3 Decorative Ferns—New sorts, Roosevelt, Teddy Junior and Dutch Plume. $1.00
4 Dahlias. A very select list which includes the most desirable colors: Salmon, Pink, Cactus, King of Autumn—Buff, Decorative, Mina Burgle—Richest Red, Decorative, Flora—Oxblood, Crimson, Cactus. $1.00
Special Offer—The 6 collections mailed postpaid for $5.00. Complete catalog mailed on application.

The Good & Reese Co.

Box 106 Springfield, Ohio

What 15c Will Bring You

Only 15 cents gives you the Pathfinder for one week on trial. The Pathfinder is a cheerful, illustrated weekly, published at the National Center for people everywhere; an independent home paper that tells the story of the world's news in an interesting, understandable way. This splendid National weekly costs but $1 a year. The Pathfinder is the friend of the publisher's world. Splendid serials and short stories and miscellany. Question boxes answer your questions and a mine of information. Send 15 cents and a will send the Pathfinder on probation 13 weeks. That's a deal, no more pay, but we are glad to invest in new friends. Address: The Pathfinder, 490 Langdon St., Washington, D. C.

Columbia Medallions

They are imperishable. They preserve in permanent beauty memories of those you love and honor. Pictures Fade—Columbia Medallions last forever. Series $1.25: Water Color (Hand Painted) $1.50. Satisfaction guaranteed. If not sold in your town, write for complete information and special proposition. Established 33 Years. COLUMBIA MEDALLION STUDIOS Dept. 11, 6628 Cottage Grove, Chicago

Infants' Wear

STYLE BOOK FREE. Pictures everything to outfit babies and children (up to 6 years). Also nursery furniture. Prices very low. Money back if not satisfied. Style Book Free. Write TODAY.

Lane Bryant New York

"Mizpah" Baby Nipples

Do not collapse—Prevent much colic Free to Mothers and Doctors Valve (A) prevents vacuum. Inside ribs (B) prevent collapsing when child bites nipple. Rim is made so nipple cannot be pulled off bottle. Guard your baby's health. Send no money! We send you a sample nipple free, postpaid on request. Write now to THE WALTER F. WARE CO., Dept. F Philadelphia, Pa.

STUDY NURSING FINE POSITIONS SECURED Write PHILADELPHIA SCHOOL FOR NURSES 2223 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

$100⁰⁰ PRIZE!

Here is a bona fide opportunity for any woman to win a $100 gold prize by simply making one practical suggestion.

Of the many kinds of good kitchen cabinets that can be purchased, no one cabinet has actually an exclusive feature so important to women as to set it apart from all the others.

We are one of the largest manufacturers of kitchen cabinets and have been in business 36 years. We make the finest cabinet we know how to build and thousands of women the nation over use and like Boone Cabinets. Yet we have been unable, we frankly confess, to give you a cabinet unusually better than others, and every other manufacturer of kitchen cabinets will truthfully admit the same condition.

We want the women who read The Ladies' Home Journal to suggest to us a new kind of a labor-saving, practical kitchen cabinet, or some improvement which we can adopt that will make the Boone Kitchen Cabinet mean more to women than kitchen cabinets have ever meant before.

To the woman who gives us the best suggestion we will pay $100.00 in gold.

To each and every woman who gives us a suggestion, we will send a check for $1, which will be redeemed by any Boone dealer by application on the purchase price of a Boone.

Go to your kitchen—study your requirements—decide what you would like to have in a kitchen cabinet built to your order—then write us about it. Please tell us, also, if you have a kitchen cabinet now.

CAMPBELL-SMITH-RITCHIE CO.
Lebanon, Indiana
Manufacturers of the Boone Kitchen Cabinet

For the BEST Fish Dishes

White flakes of tender, juicy codfish and haddock. No bones. Ready for instant use.

Burnham & Morrill Fish Flakes

AT YOUR GROCER'S

Quality

Recipes on label. More in "Good Eating Recipes," sent on request.

BURNHAM & MORRILL CO.
70 Water Street, Portland, Maine.

Babies thrive on Nestlé's Milk Food because it is pure cow's milk already modified

Send for 80 page Mother Book and Sample-FREE

Nestlé's Food Company 44 Nestlé Bldg. New York

NESTLÉ'S MILK FOOD

Old Dog—New Tricks

(Continued from Page 198)

gesture the dog's curving eyetooth slashed Eitel's outstretched wrist to the bone.

Then, staggering under a second head blow from Roodie, the dog wheeled with lightning-swift fury upon this more aggressive of his two assailants. Hurling himself at the man's throat in silent ferocity, he well-nigh turned the nocturnal battle into a killing. But Roodie's left arm by instinct flew up to guard his threatened jugular.

Through coat and shirt and skin and flesh the great dog's teeth sheared their way, their rending snap checked only by the bone of the forearm. The impetus of the eighty-pound body sent the man clean off his balance. And together the two crashed backward to the ground.

Lad was not of the bulldog breed which seeks and gains a hold and then hangs onto it with locked jaws. A collie fights with brain as much as with teeth. By the time he and Roodie struck the earth Lad tore free from the unloving embrace and whizzed about to face the second of his foes.

EITEL had taken advantage of the moment's respite to seize with his uninjured hand his slashed wrist. Then, on second thought, he released the wounded wrist and bent over the baby with a view to picking him up and regaining the comparative safety of the car's floor. But his well-devised maneuver was not carried out.

For as he leaned over the bundle, extending his hands to pick it up, Lad's teeth drove fiercely into the section of Eitel's plump anatomy which chanced to be presented to him by the stooping down of the kidnaper. Deep clove his sharp fangs. Nor did Eitel Schwartz sit down again with any degree of comfort for many a long day.

With resounding howls of pain, Eitel thrashed up and down the road, endeavoring to shake off this rear attack. The noise awakened the baby, who added his wails to the din. Roodie got dizzily to his feet, his left forearm useless and anguished from the tearing of its muscles.

"Shut up!" he bellowed. "D'you want to bring the whole county down on us? We——"

He ceased speaking and lurched at full speed to the car and to the top of its single seat. For, at sound of his voice, Lad had loosed his grip on the screeching Eitel and whirled about on this earlier adversary.

The man reached the car seat and slammed the door behind him, perhaps a sixth of a second too soon for Lad to reach him.

Eitel, warned by his brother's bawled command, made a rush for the other side of the machine and clambered up. He was a trifle less fortunate than had been Roodie in making this ascent. For Lad's flashing jaws grazed his ankle and carried away in that snap a sample of Eitel's best town-going trousers.

Thus, on the seat of the car, swaying and clutching at each other, crouched the two sore-wounded brethren; while Lad ravened about the vehicle, springing upward now and again in futile effort to clear the top of the closed door.

Far down the road shone the lights of an approaching motor. Eitel dropped into the driving seat and set the runabout into motion. Once more the dread of pursuit and of capture and of prison danced hideously before his frightened mental vision.

THE mistress and the master were sitting on the veranda. It was almost bedtime. The master arose to begin his nightly task of locking the lower windows. From somewhere on the highroad that lay two hundred yards distant from the house came the confused noise of shouts. Then as he listened the far-off sounds ceased. He went on with his task of locking up and returned in a minute or two to the veranda.

As he did so, Lad came walking slowly up the porch steps. In his mouth he carried something large and white and dusty.

This he proceeded to deposit with much care at the feet of the mistress. Then he stood back, tail waving, dark eyes mischievously expectant.

"Another dividend from the curve," laughed the master. "What is it this time? A pillow or ——"

He broke off in the middle of his amused query. For even as he turned his flashlight on the dusty and blood-streaked bundle the baby began once more to cry.

THE local chief of police in the village across the lake was making ready for bed, when a telephone summons brought him back to his lower hallway.

"Hello!" came the master's hail over the wire. "Chief, has there been any alarm sent out for—a missing baby?"

"Baby?" echoed the chief. "No. Have you lost one?"

"No. I've found one. At least Laddie has. He's just brought it home. It is dressed in unusually costly things, my wife says. There was a white baby blanket strapped around it. And there are dust and streaks of fresh blood on the blanket. But the baby himself isn't hurt at all and ——"

"I'll be over there in fifteen minutes," said the chief, alive with professional interest.

But in ten minutes he was on the wire once more.

"Has the baby blanket got the monogram 'B. R. R.' on one corner?" he asked excitedly.

"Yes," answered the master. "I was going to tell you that when you hung up. And on ——"

"That's the one!" fairly shouted the chief. "As soon as you finished talking to me I got another call. General alarm out for a kidnaped baby. Belongs to those Rennick people up the valley—the artists that rented the old Beasley place this summer. The baby was stolen an hour ago right out of the nursery. I'll phone 'em that he's found, and then I'll be over."

"All right. There's another queer point about all this. Our dog ——"

"Speaking of dogs," went on the garrulous chief, "this is a wakeful evening for me. I just got a call from the drug store that a couple of fellows have stopped there to get patched up from dog bites. They say a dozen stray curs set on 'em while they were changing a tire. The druggist thought they acted queer, contradicting each other in bits of their story. So he's taking his time fixing them till I can drop in on my way to your house and give 'em the once-over. So ——"

"DO MORE than that!" decreed the master on quick inspiration. "What I started to tell you is that there's blood on Lad's jaws as well as on the baby's blanket. If two men say they've been bitten by dogs ——"

"I get you!" yelled the other. "Good-by! I got no time to waste when a clew like that is shaken in front of me. See you later!"

Long before the chief arrived at the Place with triumphant tidings of his success in sweating the truth from the mangled and nerve-racked Schwartzes, the two other actors in the evening's drama were miles away among the sun-flecked shadows of dream-land.

The baby, industriously and unsanctarily sucking one pudgy thumb, was cuddled down to sleep in the mistress' lap. And in the depths of his cave under the living-room piano Lad was stretched at perfect ease, his tiny white forepaws straight in front of him.

But his deep breathing was interrupted now and then by a muttered sigh. For at last one of his beautiful presents had failed to cause happiness and praise from his gods.

Instead, it had apparently turned the whole household inside out, to judge by the noisy excitement and the telephoning and all. And even in sleep the old dog felt justly chagrined at the way his loveliest present to the mistress had been received. It was so hard to find out what humans would enjoy and what they wouldn't.

LABLACHE

FACE POWDER

"Cherie petite—have you likewise discovered the secret—the charm of a lovely complexion?"

Is it because of Lablache, the powder adorable, that your skin is so smooth and free from blemish?

Ma foi, I do not know! But Lablache I like and shall always use, because it's so clinging—so pure—so fragrant. As I love my complexion, likewise do I love Lablache."

Refuse Substitutes

They may be dangerous. Flesh, White, Pink, or Cream, 50c, a box of druggists or by mail. Over two million boxes sold annually. Send 10c. for a sample box.

BEN. LEVY COMPANY
French Perfumers, Dept. 132
125 Kingston St., Boston, Mass.

Raise the Kiddies on Wheels

From babyhood, "American" baby vehicles promote the health and afford comfort and protection to the tiny tots. As the little ones grow, help them achieve self-reliance and poise from vigorous exercise indoors or out, on Autos, Scooters, Hand Cars, Tricycles, Velocipedes, Express and Coaster Wagons of

The American Line

The line is equipped with ball bearings and non-skid or pneumatic tires for easy riding, with special hub caps for protection to clothing and furniture both indoors and out.

This auto is No. 552-E, L., an original and distinctive American model; has real electric head, tail and spot lights, Jarrett springs, wind shield, fenders, gas tank and spare wheel and is especially attractive to the youngsters.

Write for catalog "J" or a juvenile line of "B" on Baby Vehicles.

"See American Line First"

THREE FACTORIES

The American National Company
DEPT. 104 TOLEDO, OHIO

Hotels Need Trained Women

Nation-wide demand for trained women; all departments, hotels, clubs, apartment houses; uncrowded field; fine living, quick advancement. Our methods endorsed by leading hotels everywhere. Write for FREE BOOK "Your Big Opportunity." LEWIS HOTEL TRAINING SCHOOL, Room 513, Washington, D. C.

Music Lessons Complete Conservatory Course by Mail

Wonderful home study music lessons under great American and European teachers. Endorsed by Paderewski. Master teachers guide and coach you. Lessons a marvel of simplicity and completeness. Write for name course you are interested in: Piano, Harp, Voice, Public School Music, Viola, Cornet, Mandolin, Guitar, Banjo or Reed Organ—and we will send FREE CATALOG. SEND IT NOW!

Any Instrument

University Extension Conservatory, 552 Siegel Myers Bldg., Chicago

The Reason Why

ON THE outskirts of a prairie town in the Middle West is prominently displayed the usual commonplace warning to motorists: "Don't drive faster than fifteen miles an hour through this town." But this particular warning is by no means commonplace, for some knight errant of the road, who has presumably acquired the knowledge through sad experience, has smeared in large letters of axle grease underneath the original lettering: "Or you'll break your springs!"

Kind Hearts More Than Coronets

SHE is a dear, little old lady who lives in one of the tiniest tiny cottages on what she happily calls "the hoopskirts" of a large city. Unpleasantly materialistic persons—who insist on being what they call "plain-spoken" and only succeed in being plain horrid—might say that she is extremely poor. But we who have fortunately been born with rose-colored "specs" on—which, between you and me, is ever so much better than being born with a gold spoon in one's mouth—would quite fail to see any poverty in the little home.

On the contrary, she would impress us as one of the richest women we know; for although, to quote her again, the house is so small that one has to go outside to turn round, yet it contains a wealth of happiness that would make the treasure of Aladdin's cave seem insignificant by comparison; and then, besides, she has the most wonderful little garden imaginable, where she raises perfect dears of old-fashioned flowers and choice ferns.

It was just recently that she received an invitation to the golden wedding anniversary of some old friends. Not wishing to go empty-handed, she thought long and deeply and at last took from among her few poor, little treasures a very quaint, old-fashioned, gilded flower-basket and transplanted into it one of her most beautiful young ferns. Then she composed some verses to go with the gift and got a boy next door, who was by way of being artistic, to letter them on a card for her; and this is what it said:

*This little fern has come to say:
"God bless your Golden Wedding Day
And all the other days to be Through all the years that you may see!"
And every leaf will wish you joy
And peace and love that knows no end—
And by all this you'll surely know
It comes from one who is*

Your Friend.

And the little gilded basket and the little golden-backed fern stood up bravely among the golden spoons and forks and vases, and the gold-painted cake platters, and were not a bit ashamed, for in their hearts they knew right well that they were the very best gift of all.

And when the bride of fifty years came to the fern basket, she asked her husband to read the little verses out loud to all the guests; and she wasn't a bit ashamed, either, of the tears that brimmed over as she kissed her friend.

—LOUISE WATSON.

Not Aimed at Her

DURING a thunderstorm in the South a large oak tree within thirty feet of a negro cabin on a plantation was completely shattered. The crash was terrifying, the ground for quite a distance around the tree was broken up as if it had been plowed and pieces of the tree were hurled many yards and showered on the cabin roof.

The next morning, when the old negro woman went to the house to work, her mistress said sympathetically: "You must have been very much frightened when the tree was struck last night, Jennie."

"Oh, no'm," Jennie reassured her; "I wasn't skeered. I never did see no use in feelin' skeered after sumpin's ovah. I jus' said dat I knowed if de Lawd had a-been aimin' at us, he wouldn't a-missed us dat far, an' went back to sleep."

At Last

A LITTLE girl and her father were strolling one Sunday afternoon through the cemetery, where she found little to interest her until she came upon a headstone on which a lamb was carved.

"Daddy!" she whooped, "come look. I've found where Mary's little lamb is buried!"

Exactly So!

A CLERGYMAN who had held his pastorate for many years was preaching one Sunday morning to a congregation much depleted through deaths and removals.

"Some have gone to their rest," he declared sonorously. "Others have gone elsewhere."

Table of Contents

COVER DESIGN BY HENRY J. SOULEN

	Page		Page
Editorials	28	NEEDLEWORK
FICTION		Jersey-by-the-Yard Makes the
The Prince Rides By—		Blouses	83
Frances Noyes Hart	3	Old Beds and Their Dressing—
Peyton and Peyton—		Alice Van Leer Carrick	159
Fannie Kilbourne	6	You Can Make Your Graduating
Fulla—Pep!—Phyllis Duganne	8	Dress—Ruth Sill	162
The Pageant Widow—		Italian Embroidery Done in Carpet
Corra Harris	10	Thread—Mabel Foster Bain- bridge	168
Four-square: Part II—		FOR CHILDREN
Grace S. Richmond	14	The Eskimo Twins in the Winter
The Confessions of a Useless Wife:		Night—Lucy Fitch Perkins	36
Part II (Conclusion)—		The Eskimo Twins (Paper Dolls)	38
Margaretta Tuttle	16	ART FEATURE
Old Dog—New Tricks—		Gethsemane—
Albert Payson Terhune	19	Heinrich Johann Hofmann	21
The Unspeakable Gentleman: Part		HOUSEHOLD
III—J. P. Marquand	22	"The Home I'd Like to Have"—
Bannertail: Part III—		William Draper Brinckloe	26
Ernest Thompson Seton	177	Furnishing the Small Apartment for
SPECIAL ARTICLES		One Thousand Dollars—
The Most Powerful Lobby in Wash-		Ethel Davis Seal	35
ington—Charles A. Selden	5	Creating Color Schemes—
The Easter People—		Ethel Carpenter	99
Winifred Kirkland	12	Where I Test Ladies' Home Journal
Why Children Lie—		Recipes—Caroline B. King	123
Miriam Finn Scott	18	Colette Cooks Eggs—Marie Jacques	124
Human Nature in the Bible—		To Save You Two Dollars or More
William Lyon Phelps	20	Easter Salads and Desserts—
The Women of the Desert—		Caroline B. King	130
Maudie Radford Warren	25	Your Garden in April—
College Women and Race Suicide—		J. Horace McFarland	132
William S. Sadler, M.D.	29	POEMS AND MUSIC
Why Do Our Mothers and Babies		The Revolt of Julia LeClair—
Die?—S. Josephine Baker, M.D.	32	Anne Gertrude Snodder	30
Life's Pathways—Sarah D. Lowrie	40	Easter Morning (Music)—
FASHIONS		Anice Terhune	42
The Summer Bride and Her Belong-		Resurrection—Alma Adams Wiley	47
ings	64	When April Came—Lillian Gard	114
Minimum of Seams With Maximum		MISCELLANEOUS
of Style	66	Programs for Children's Week—
Lingerie from Premet for American		H. Augustine Smith	45
Brides	69	Bumbleton Folks—Claude Callan	48
The Bride and Two of Her Guests		A Shower of Showers—
Matrons' Frocks With Youthful		Claire Wallis and Uthai Vincent
Lines	75	Wilcox	57
Some Leaves from a Paris Sketch		Easter is Here—Lillian Gard	152
Book	76, 77	Making More Extra Money!—
The Three Smartest Sports Cos-		Manager of The Girls' Club	153
umes	78	Helpful Ladies' Home Journal Books	166
Coats With Lines Correct and Wear-		The Office Dog	200
able	80
The School Clothes of the Well-
Dressed Child	84
Mary Brush Williams Writes of Paris
Hats	87

A Special Word to Subscribers

WHEN you receive notice that your subscription has expired renew it at once, using the blank inclosed in your final copy. Please sign your name exactly as it appears on your present address label.

A request for change of address must reach us at least 5 weeks before the date of the issue with which it is to take effect. Duplicate copies cannot be sent to replace those undelivered through failure to send this advance notice. Be sure to give your old address as well as the new one.

Should your subscription expire with this issue of the HOME JOURNAL your renewal should be sent promptly to insure receipt of the May issue before it is "sold out." We cannot begin subscriptions with back numbers. Subscribers should always use Postal or Express money orders or Bank drafts in remitting. All Rural Free Delivery carriers can supply Postal money orders.

Our Advertising Branch Offices

[For advertising business only. Subscriptions not received.]

PHILADELPHIA: Independence Square
NEW YORK: 366 Madison Avenue
BOSTON: Merchants' National Bank Building
CHICAGO: Home Insurance Building
SAN FRANCISCO: First National Bank Building

Inside Discipline

WHILE a country school superintendent in the South was making a tour of inspection, he visited a negro school where the order maintained by the teacher was remarkable. Every child seemed to be absorbed in the school work and yet the teacher did not impress the superintendent as a disciplinarian. Finally, after watching proceedings for a while, he turned and said in a low tone to the teacher: "Johnson, how in the world do you keep such good order? Do you whip the children much?"

"No, sir," the teacher declared; "I never whip them."

"Do you keep them in?"

"No, sir; I never keep them in."

"Do you make them do extra work for punishment?"

"No, sir; I never make them do any extra work."

"Then how ever do you manage them?"

"Well, sir, I'll tell you," the teacher replied confidentially. "When they don't do right I just eat up their dinner, and I don't have any more trouble."

An Intelligent Fire

ONE wing of a large summer-resort hotel had burned, and the manager and a group of hotel employees were gazing mournfully at the ruins.

"Strange," murmured the manager, "that the fire should have stopped at that gate."

"Why, sir," excitedly exclaimed an intelligent bell boy, "didn't you know? That gate was shut."

He Explained

"SO YOUR name is Johnny Thompson," the teacher said, to make sure of the facts, "but your mother's name is Jones."

"Yes, ma'am," Johnny said. "You see, she married again, and I didn't."

The Strangest Word in Our Language

IT WAS one of those social affairs that you point to with pride and view with alarm, and at ten o'clock things were dragging dreadfully when a bright young man saved the situation by asking: "What is the strangest word in our language?"

The other guests looked blank until he explained: "It is a word of one syllable and five letters, four of them vowels. While there are five letters in the word, there are only three different letters. And the freakiest thing about it is that it is pronounced as a single consonant."

Had he not made that last statement the guests might have been guessing yet. But with that to go upon, the alphabet was gone slowly over and the word finally guessed—"queue," a pigtail or a line of persons waiting anywhere. There it was—one syllable, five letters, of which one was a consonant and four were vowels, only three different letters—q, u, e—and pronounced like the single consonant, "q."

A Modern Elephant

JOHNNY came back from the circus very much excited.

"Oh, mamma," he cried as soon as he got in the house, "Kate spilled some peanuts, and what do you suppose the elephant did? He picked 'em all up with his vacuum cleaner!"

Gardening

DIGGING, raking, planting, sowing. Cultivating, weeding, hoeing—What a job to get things growing!

But no other job a-going Does so set the heart a-glowing, June-grass-scented breezes blowing, Woods with birds' songs overflowing—Then the eating and the oh-ing!

If you want to do some crowing, Get a little garden growing.

—LINCOLN MILLET.

KALBURNIE GINGHAM

Name on Every Yard

32 inches wide

Lancaster

Mills, Makers

Ginghams Are Blithe and Gay

The patterns and colorings of Kalburnie Gingham suggest happy hours. Smiles seem woven in every thread. The colors and designs please the eye. The price pleases the pocketbook.

For all-the-year wear Kalburnie Gingham makes excellent play and school frocks. The weave is sturdy. The weight is heavy enough for wear, and light enough for coolness. Guaranteed to satisfy or your money back.

Kalburnie Gingham is woven at Lancaster Mills, the oldest, most experienced gingham mills in the country. Ask for it at any dry goods store, priced at thirty cents a yard. Samples on request.

Amory, Browne & Co., Department 237, Box 1206, Boston, Mass.

Nashua Blankets

Gilbrae Gingham

Indian Head Cloth

Parkhill Gingham

Copyright 1912 Amory, Browne & Co.

Cashmere Bouquet

Medium size, 10c

Large size, 25c

Sold at your favorite store

She was a discriminating person, the girl of long ago who made Cashmere Bouquet Soap her choice, and so set this fragrant soap apart—as the favored toilet soap for women.

Many types of girls have come and gone since Grandmother's courtship days. But Cashmere Bouquet Soap has remained the choice of each succeeding generation, with its fragrance of sweet flowers, its soft refreshing lather, and a lasting quality that makes it an economical toilet soap.

COLGATE & CO.

Est. 1806

NEW YORK

UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA
walt,cls 1922-Jan.-Apr.

Ladies' home journal

3 1951 000 583 382 B